

~~EX LIBRIS~~

Al 2.7.

Ex Libris

Bibliothecae Facultatis
Juridicae Edinburgi

THE MODERN PART
OF THE
UNIVERSAL HISTORY.

Compiled from

ORIGINAL WRITERS;

BY THE

AUTHORS of the *ANTIEN*T.

Which will perfect the WORK, and render it

A Complete Body of HISTORY,

FROM THE

EARLIEST ACCOUNT of Time, to the PRESENT.

Ἱστορίας ἀρχαίας ἐξέρχεται μὴ κατανόει, ἐν αὐταῖς γὰρ εὐρήσεις ἀκόπως, ὥστε ἕτεροι συνῆξαν ἐγκόπως. Basil. Imp. ad Leon. fil.

VOL. I.

LONDON:

Printed for T. OSBORNE, C. HITCH and L. HAWES, A. MILLAR, J. RIVINGTON, S. CROWDER, P. DAVEY and B. LAW,
T. LONGMAN, C. WARE, and S. BLADON.

M.DCC.LIX.

---

ADVERTISEMENT

TO THE ## READER.

THE Arabs rendered themselves so famous, both by their extensive conquests and their cultivation of antient literature, after the introduction of Islamism amongst them, that their glory, for several centuries, eclipsed that of all other nations. Nay, the vast empire they erected seems to subsist, even at this day, in those of the Ottomán Turks, Persians, Tartars, and Moguls; who derived from them both their religion and polity, both their sacred and civil institutions. No wonder then that a complete history of this wonderful people, from the birth of their false prophet and legislator Mohammed, to the reduction of Baghdád by the Tartars, extracted chiefly from the oriental authors, should have been so long desired in these western parts of the world. Nothing, therefore, of that kind having yet appeared in any of the European tongues; we flatter ourselves, that the laborious and difficult work now offered to the public, which comprehends a clear and succinct detail of the most remarkable events that happened in the Arab empire during the aforesaid period, and has been deduced principally from the eastern writers, will meet with a favourable reception from all our candid readers. For the more effectual attainment of which desirable end, it has been judged requisite to mention here the most celebrated authors who have supplied us with materials for this history, and the assistance we have received in the compilation of it.

For the life of Mohammed, which may not improperly be considered as the first part of the modern history of the Arabs, we have had recourse to Abu Jaafar Al Tabari, as abridged by Al Makín, Gregory Abu'l Faraj, the Korán, Al Shabrestáni, and above all the famous Ismael Abu'l feda, both in his life of that impostor and his general history; the former of which has been published by Mr. Gagnier, with a Latin version, at Oxford, in 1723. We have likewise been furnished with innumerable extracts by Al Kodai, Sharíf Al Edrisi, Al Beidaswi, Al Zamakhshari, Ebn Al Athír, Ebn Heshám, Abmed Ebn Yusef, Abunazar, Al Beibaki, Al Jarra, Al Háfedh, Makhzum, Ebn Khalecán, Rustem Al Maulavi, Al Bokhári, Jallalo'ddín, Abmed Ebn Yahya, Al Firaouzabádi, Ebn Shohnah, Mohammed Ebn Abd'al Báki, Abd'allah Ebn Al Abbás, Ebn Al Júzi, Abu Horeira, Al Termedi, Ebn Al Kbassai, Ebn Ishak, Abu-Zeid Seid, Al Jawhari, Al Wákedi, Al Gbazáli, and many more oriental writers, whose names it would be too tedious barely to enumerate here. Besides which, we have inserted in this part of our work every thing material to be met with, either in the later Greek historians or other Christian authors, particularly M. D'Herbelot, relative to the Moslem prophet. We doubt not, therefore, but our readers will find the life of Mohammed, contained in this volume, the most complete and perfect piece of its kind that in any European language has ever yet appeared.

With regard to our history of the Khalífs, or successors of Mohammed, from the death of that impostor to the abolition of the Khalifat, this has been likewise compiled almost intirely from the most celebrated eastern writers. Our readers will not only meet with here the substance of what has been handed down to us, relative to the Moslem history, by Eutychius, Abu Jaafar Al Tabari, Kemálo'ddín Al Armlávi, Al Makín, Gregory Abu'l Faraj, Ismael Abu'l feda, Ebn Shohnah, Mírkoud, Khon- demir, Al Emîr Yahya Ebn Abd'ollatîf Al Kafwîni, Ahmed Ebn Mohammed Abd'al-jaasar Al Kazwîni, Abu Mohammed Abd'alazîz Ebn Shedâd Tamîm Al Sanbâji, Al Kâdi Shabâbo'ddîn Ebn Abi'dam Al Hamawi, Takîo'ddin Ahmed Al Makrîzi, Al Emîr Abu'l Mahassèn Yusef Ebn Tangri Wirdi, Ibrahim Ebn Mohammed Ebn Dakmak, and other oriental historians, more generally known, during the above-mentioned period, but also with extracts from some eastern authors scarce ever heard of in these parts of Europe before. As Erpenius's Latin version and printed copies of Al Makîn end with the 512th year of the Moslem æra, and Abu'l Faraj's historical epitome is too short and jejune, with respect to the Arab affairs, after that year; in order to supply both those defects, we have, by the assistance of the Reverend and Learned Dr. Hunt, Professor of Hebrew and Arabic in the University of Oxford, been enabled to insert, from a manuscript in his possession, a translation of Ebn Shobnah's annals, from the 512th to the 656th year of the Hejra, in this work. To render more valuable this addition, which has never yet been printed, Dr. Hunt has collated his manuscript with two others of the same author, preserved in the Bodleian library, Oxon. in those passages that seem to have been the most vitiated and depraved; for which, both we and the public are extremely obliged to him. For the illustration of Ebn Shobnah, who sometimes writes in too concise, obscure, and elliptical a manner, we have also improved our modern history of the Arabs with not a few extracts from the inedited part of the Târîkh Al Moslemîn of Al Makîn. As to the materials afforded us by the famous Ismael Abu'lfeda, one of the best of the Arab writers, tho' some of these are immediately deduced from a manuscript of his chronicle or general history itself, our grateful acknowledgements for them are principally due to F. Assemani and M. Reiske <sup>a</sup>, whose shining abilities and exalted merit are sufficiently known to the whole learned world. But it would be superfluous to expatiate largely at present on this head, as what is here remarked will be obvious to every one that shall peruse the sheets of which our Arab history is composed.

However, it may not be improper to observe, that we have inserted in the body of our history the Cambridge Chronicon Siculum; which contains no inconsiderable number of particulars, relative to the Arab affairs in Sicily, not elsewhere to be found. Who was the real compiler of this piece, or what degree of credit is due to it, we shall not now take upon us to determine; but that he was not Abu Mohammed Abd'alazîz Ebn Shedâd Tamîm Al Sanbâji, who composed the Moslem <sup>b</sup> annals of Sicily and Kairwân, as Carusius seems to suppose, we think there is the highest reason to believe. For the words of this annalist, which have been preserved both by Abu'lfeda and Al Kâdi Shabâbo'ddîn Ebn Abi'dam Al Hamawi, as translated by Marcus Dobelius and M. Reiske, and those of the Cambridge Chronicon Siculum, describing the same event, by <sup>c</sup> no means correspond. From whence it may be very naturally inferred, that these two pieces were the productions of different pens. But this point is clearly evinced, in a place to which the discussion of it more properly belongs.

We must beg leave farther to inform our candid readers, that this modern history of the Arabs is interspersed with critical, philological, and explanatory notes, placed at the bottom of the page, tending to illustrate those parts of the text to which they refer. The extensive utility of which notes must appear to all that read them, as they are not only relative to the genius, government, religion, language, learning, customs, accomplishments, manners, &c. of the Arabs and neighbouring nations, but likewise to almost every other branch of oriental literature. We have also transfused into this part of our work the substance of some curious MS. notes upon Abu'l Faraj, which not seldom emend Dr. Pocock's Latin version of that author, now in the possession of the Reverend John Swinton, M. A. of Christ-Church, Oxon. F. R. S.

<sup>a</sup> JOS. SIM. ASSEMAN. in Italic. Hist. Scriptor. &c. tom. III. cap. ii. p. 45—213. Romæ, 1752.
JO. JAC. REISKE, in Abulfed. Annal. Moslemic. &c. pass. Lipsiæ, 1754.

<sup>b</sup> JOAN. BAPT. CARUS. ad Chron. Sicul. Cantabrigiense. Præfat. p. 3.

<sup>c</sup> Chronic. Sicul. Cantabrigiense. apud Joan. Bapt. Carus. in Histor. Saracenico-Sicul. var. Monument. &c. p. 14. Panormi, 1720. ut et ipse JOAN. BAPT. CARUS. ibid. AL KADI SHAHABO'DDIN EBN ABI'LDAM AL HAMAWI et ABU MOHAMMED ABD'ALAZIZ EBN SHEDAD TAMIM AL SANHAJI, apud Joan. Bapt. Carus. ubi sup. p. 19. ABU'LFED. in chron. ad ann. Hej. 336.

as well as several MS. extracts from Mojiro'ddîn Al Hanbali, the author of the Persic chronicle, denominated Nokhbat Al Tawârîkh, or the marrow of chronicles, and other oriental writers little known in these parts of the world. The ingenious explications of all those earlier Arabic coins found near Stegen, on the coast of the Baltick, not far from Dantzick, in 1722, published by M. Kehr <sup>d</sup> at Leipsick, in 1724, are likewise inserted in this history; to which we have added those of several others, and shewn that on some occasions these coins support the authority of the eastern historians, in much the same manner as the Greek and Roman medals do that of the Greek and Roman writers. Upon the whole, therefore, we think we may venture to assert, that the performance now submitted to the judgment of the public is vastly preferable to every thing of its kind that has in any of the European tongues yet appeared; and that it may even at least be deemed in all respects such a history of the Khalîfs, or successors of Mohammed, as Mr. Ockley's is only a specimen of, the publication of which in his days that eminent orientalist <sup>e</sup> seems so greatly to have desired.

From the foregoing observations our readers will naturally infer, that the modern history of the Arabs we present them with is no translation from the French, no collection from collections; but extracted from almost an infinity of original oriental authors, of the best repute, who are constantly quoted at the bottom of the page. Nay, so far have we been from following any modern versions of those authors, when the originals themselves could be procured, that we have not depended upon either Erpenius's Latin version of Al Makîn, which indeed must be owned faulty enough, or the celebrated Dr. Pocock's of Abu'l Faraj; but have adhered to the Arabic text of those two historians with a religious exactness, and even emended it in several places. We have also now and then corrected the Latin translation of the Cambridge Chronicon Siculum, published by Carusius, though revised by the famous <sup>f</sup> F. Assemani, and even restored the true reading in several passages of the Arabic original itself. How widely different from M. l'Abbé De Marigny's execution of his plan is such an immediate deduction of facts from the best oriental authors <sup>g</sup>? This ingenious, tho' too superficial and inaccurate, (A) compiler seems to have formed his history of the Arabs, under the government of the Khalîfs, chiefly of passages extracted from M. D'Herbelot, and a few other western moderns (B) of a still later date. This piece, therefore, cannot well be viewed in any other light than that of the performance of a secondary writer, whose productions scarce merit the attention of the most sensible part of the public. But as we shall hereafter touch upon this subject, and the variety of materials collected for the first part of our large and extensive work, we shall easily be permitted to supersede any farther account of them here *.

<sup>d</sup> Monarch. Asiatico-Saracen. Stat. &c. ex num. argent. prisc. Arab. script. Kufic. &c. illustrat. a M. Geor. Jacob. Kehr, Sleusinga-Franco orientali. Lipsiæ, 1724.

<sup>e</sup> See OCKLEY's preface to the first vol. of his hist. of the Saracens, p. 17.

<sup>f</sup> JOAN. BAPT. CARUS. ad Chron. Sic. Cantabrigiens. Præfat. p. 3. Panormi, 1720.

<sup>g</sup> Histoire des ARABES, sous le Gouvernement des CALIFES, par M. l'Abbé DE MARIGNY. A Paris, 1751.

* See Vol. II. p. 110.

(A) To omit many other instances of our author's inaccuracy, it may be sufficient to observe here, that he has copied several of M. D'Herbelot's mistakes, and that his orthography of the Arab proper names is frequently wrong (1).

(B) We cannot forbear taking notice here of the mean and illiberal partiality of M. l'Abbé De Marigny, so common to the French writers; which can proceed from no other source, notwithstanding their pretended politesse, than an utter dislike, if not a fixed and rivetted aversion, to the English nation. He makes honourable mention of both M. D'Herbelot and M. Renaudot, his countrymen, from whom, it must be owned, he has extracted a very considerable part of his work; but is not pleased to inform his readers, that he has been likewise obliged to the learned Mr. Ockley, who has supplied him with materials for perhaps the greatest part of the first and second volumes of the performance now before us (2).

(1) For a full proof of this, our readers may have recourse to the book itself.

(2) See M. l'Abbé De Marigny's preface to his history of the Arabs, under the government of the Khalîfs.

---

---

MODERN HISTORY:

BEING A

CONTINUATION

OF THE

UNIVERSAL HISTORY.

---

BOOK I.

---

CHAP. I.

The LIFE of MOHAMMED.

- a* NO person celebrated in history has, perhaps, been considered in more different lights than Mohammed, the legislator of the Arabs, and the founder of the Moslem power. Some Christian writers have represented him as an odious impostor, contemptible for his defects both of body and mind, and a man of the most dissolute morals. Others, on the contrary, have not scrupled to pronounce him one of the most eminent legislators that ever appeared in the world, adorned with the finest intellectual endowments, rendered more amiable still by the practice of every social virtue, and equally famous for his vast capacity, and the excellency of his institutions. Nay, some of these, on whom the principles both of natural and revealed religion seem to have sat easy enough, more than insinuate, that, as he transfused into the Korân all the essentials, without any of the corruptions, of Christianity, his religious system seems at least as worthy of God as that of the Gospel, if he was not the last great prophet sent to perfect even the dispensation of Jesus himself <sup>a</sup>.

- b* BUT as, on the one hand, it ought not to be denied, that Mohammed had very considerable talents, and an intermixture of good and bad qualities, like many other men; so, on the other, it must be allowed, that, by pretending to revelations, and conferences with GOD HIMSELF, all which were absolutely false, he indubitably proved himself an impostor, and consequently a most wicked wretch. As for the tenets of the Korân, notwithstanding the fine picture given us of it by some late writers, who seem to have been most unreasonably prejudiced in its favour, a man must be lost to common sense, as well as piety and religion, before he can put them on a level with the sublime doctrines of the Gospel. In fine, whatever truths may be found in the Korân, that it contains many absurdities, will be acknowledged by every sober and intelligent person. Nor did either the excellency of its precepts, or the abilities of its author, contribute so much to the introduction of it into so large a part of the world, as the disposition of the Arabs, when Mohammed first laid claim to a divine mission, the general luxury and effeminacy of the Greeks, the declining condition of the Persians, the corrupt and distracted state of Christianity at that juncture, besides other concurring causes, an ample and circumstantial account of which will be given in the sequel of this history <sup>b</sup>.

<sup>a</sup> PRID. life of Mahom. pass. SALE's prelim. discours. pass. BOULAINVILLIERE's life of Mahom. pass.

<sup>b</sup> PRID. SALE, BOULAINVIL. ubi supra. See also D'HERBEL. biblioth. orient. p. 598—603. SALE's explanatory notes on the Korân, and the Korân itself.

Mohammed descended from Ishmael.

MOHAMMED, according to the eastern writers, descended in a direct line from Ishmael, the son of Abraham, and consequently from the patriarch Abraham himself. Kedar, or, as the Arabs call him, Kidâr, after his father Ishmael's death, seems to have communicated his name to the greater part of Arabia Petræa, as may be inferred from Scripture. Kidâr was succeeded in his possessions and authority by his son Hamal, as Hamal was by Nabet, or Nabt, and Nabet by Salâmân. After Salâmân came Al Homeisa, and then Al Yafâ, whose son Odad begat Odd, the father of Adnân. This series of descents, which contains nine generations, we take to carry with it a greater air of probability than that suggested by Mohammed's wife Omm Salma, who pretended, that her husband counted only three persons in a lineal succession between Ishmael and Adnân; viz. Berâ or Nabet, Zeid or Al Homeisa, and Odad. However, that it cannot be considered as strictly agreeable to truth, appears from the remote age of Abraham, compared with the small number of generations comprehended by the interval between Adnân and Mohammed. Nor do the Arab writers agree among themselves in this particular, as has been elsewhere observed. But they are so defective in point of chronology, and knew so little of any remarkable events coeval with the patriarch Abraham, that such a disagreement to persons even moderately versed in oriental literature will not be matter of great wonder or surprize.

Ten generations between Adnân and Febr.

THE second series of descents in Ishmael's family, or rather that of Mohammed, commenced at Adnân, and ended in the person of Febr, surnamed Koreish. It consisted of ten generations, as appears from Mohammed's progenitors, in continual succession between Adnân and Febr. Moad, or Maad, the son of Adnân, has been represented by the Arabs as a celebrated warrior, and a declared enemy to the Jews. Zohari mentions a tradition received from Ali Ebn Moghâira, according to which, Moses was cotemporary with Moad, and had the birth of Mohammed revealed to him. 'Tis likewise pretended by the Arabs, that Bokht-Nasr, or Nebuchadnezzar, king of Babylon, lived at the same time; which must be allowed a fresh proof of their great accuracy and skill in chronology. Moad begat Nazâr, another famous soldier, whose standard is said to be still preserved in the temple of Mecca; which, from those very times, has always been esteemed the principal sanctuary of Arabia. He surpassed most of his countrymen in beauty and vivacity, and had his face adorned with the prophetic light. Nazâr became father to Modar (A), or Modr, whose son (B) Al Yâs begot Modrecab (C), the <sup>c</sup> ABULFED. de vit. Mohammed. c. ii. p. 6—8. Oxon. 1723. AL. BEIHAK. apud Abulfed. ubi supra. Poc. not. in spec. hist. Arab. p. 45—51. SALE's general tab. of the naturalized Arabs. See also JER. c. xlix. v. 28. ISAI. c. lx. v. 7. EZEK. c. xxvii. v. 21. PSAL. cxv. v. 5. JER. c. ii. v. 10, &c. See likewise Univ. Hist. vol. xviii. p. 374. not. (O).

(A) This prince is said to have been a very comely person, and to have excelled all the other Arabs in sweetness of voice. He had three brothers, Ayyad, Rabîa, and Anmâr; and, tho' younger than Ayyad, was made by his father Nazâr prefect or guardian of the Caaba. Ayyad, from whom a numerous posterity sprang, left Hejaz, and with his family, settled in Irâk. Rabîa became the father of several tribes, a minute and particular account of which we find in Abulfeda's General History. The famous Arabian poet Motalammes, who descended from Debiyah, one of the sons of Rabîa, was sent by the king of Hira, upon whom he had been very satirical in some of his poems, long before the time of Mohammed, to one of his governors, with a letter, wherein that officer had orders to put the bearer to death. But the poet, suspecting the contents, broke open the letter, and thereby discovered the whole affair. Hence the proverb so current amongst the Arabs, THE LETTER OF MOTALAMMES — This clearly proves the Arabs, at least in the opinion of some of their best and most authentic writers, to have had letters in use among them many years before the birth of Mohammed. Anmâr, the youngest of Nazâr's sons, seated himself in Yaman, where his family greatly increased; but the members of it soon incorporated themselves with the original inhabitants of that country (1).

(B) Al Yâs, whose name signifies despair, he being born when his father Modar was arrived at a very advanced age, and consequently despaired of ever having a son, was also called Habîb, that is to say, well-beloved. He adhered to the religion and pious traditions of his ancestors; and, on all occasions, expressed a singular concern for the honour and dignity of the temple at Mecca. For which reasons his countrymen highly esteemed him, looking upon him to be as great a sage as Lokmân, an account of whom has been already given in the history of the Arabs. Being the prince of his people, and lord of his tribe, no affair of importance was ever decided without his concurrence and participation. His brother Kais, surnamed Aylân, was the father of many tribes; the principal of which were the following: 1. The Harwâzenites, to whom belonged the sons of Saad Ebn Becr Ebn Harwâzen, who brought up Mohammed. 2. The Banu Kelâb, from whom descended the lords of Hâlib, or Aleppo; the first of whom was Saleh Ebn Merdas. 3. The tribe of Okail, from whence sprung the royal family of Mosul. 4. The Banu Amer, the Banu Sâsaab, and the Banu Khafâjab, who have, for many ages, been masters of the province of Irâk. 5. To these may be added the Banu Helâl, the Banu Thakîf, whom some take to have been a part of the Ayyadites, and others the remains of the ancient Thamudites, inhabiting Al Tâyes, the Banu Nomair, the Banu Bâbelab, the Banu Mâzen, the Banu Gatsân, the Banu Abas (of which tribe the celebrated hero Antara was a member), and others enumerated by Abulfeda, in the valuable history above-mentioned.

The Banu Dhobîyân, who were a branch of the Banu Gatsân, maintained a forty years war against the Banu Abas. This went, among the Arabs, under the appellation of the war of Dahes and Câbra, which were the names of two horses that ran against two others, called Al Khatar and Al Fana. The difficulty of determining on which side the advantage lay occasioned that bloody contest, which lasted forty years, and afterwards passed into a proverb; it being said of every long and tedious process, This is the war of Dahes and Cabra (2).

(C) Modrecab had a brother, named Tabekhab, from a the father of Khozaimab (D), from whom sprung Kenánab (E), the father of Al Nadr (F), whose son Malec was the immediate progenitor of Febr. From Febr, who went among the Arabs by the surname of Koreish, the whole tribe of Koreish deduced their name. In the time of Adnán, the Arabs fixed the rule to be observed for the conservation of their genealogies, in order to preserve the distinction of their tribes and families. 'Tis no wonder, therefore, that they should seldom trace their genealogies higher than Adnán, whom they acknowledge as the father of their tribes; the descents from him downwards being pretty certain and uncontroverted <sup>a</sup>.

(1) Abulfed Al Meidan, &c.

(2) Abulfed. hist. gen. Poc. not. in spec. hist. Arab. p. 47, 48.

FEHR seems to have distinguished himself by some glorious actions, since the Arabs suppose him to have been denominated Koreish from his undaunted bravery and resolution. Be that as it will, he may be considered as the root of the politest and most celebrated tribe of the Arabs. He had three sons, Galeb, Mobáreb, and Al Háreth. From Mobáreb the Banu Mobáreb, denominated likewise Sheibán, deduced their origin; from Al Háreth, the Banu Al Kholoj; and from Galeb, in a direct line, the impostor Mohammed. A modern author takes Galeb to have been a considerable proficient in the i pagiric art; but this does not by any means appear. Galeb was the father of (G) Lowa, and he (H) of Caab, whose (I) son Morrah had, for his immediate descendant, Keláb, the father of Kosa. From Keláb's son Zabrah issued the Banu Zabrah, of which tribe Saad, the son of Abu Wakkás, was a member; as was also Amene, the mother of Mohammed. Caab, according to the Arabs, changed Arubab, the ancient name of the sixth day of the week, which we call Friday, into Jama'a. The former of those words signifies the day of pleasure, jollity, or public diversions; the latter, the day of the assembly, or congregation. From whence it appears, that, in the opinion of the Arabs, he first set Friday apart for divine service. Keláb's true name was Hakim, and Kosa's Zeïd. The latter of these rendered himself famous to all posterity by an exploit, of which we shall beg leave to give our readers here a short and succinct relation <sup>c</sup>.

Febr the root of the politest tribe of the Arabs.

<sup>a</sup> ISM. ABULFED. de vit. Mohammed, c. 11. p. 6—8. Poc. not. in spec. hist. Arab. p. 45—51. GAGN. la vie de Mahom. tom. prem. p. 25—46. <sup>c</sup> ABULFED, ubi supra. Poc. & GAGN. ubi supra. BOULLAINVIL. la vie de Mahom. liv. sec.

whom descended the Banu Tamim, the Banu Rabbáb, the Banu Dabbab, and the Banu Mozzinab. Modrecab and Tabekhab had the surname of Khendef; which they assumed from that of their mother, whose name is said to have been Lili. She was the daughter of Holván, the son of Amrán, the son of Al Háf, the son of Kodbaab. All the aforesaid tribes were sometimes called Banu Khendef (3).

(D) Khozaimab's brother Hodhail was the father of the Hedhailites; to which tribe belonged the poet Abu Dhorwaib, Gulab, Saad, Kais, and Abd'allah Ebn Mas'ud, Mohammed's partner, or companion (4).

(E) Kenánab derived his name from the word Ken, which signifies a cover, umbrage, protection, &c. he having been the protector and asylum of his people. He had two brothers, Al Harun and Asad. From Al Harun sprung the tribes of Adal and Al Daisb, which were called Al Kúrah, because they were joined together, and considered as one people. From Asad issued the Cábelites, the Dudánites, and others, who all bore the name of Asadites. Kenánab had several sons besides Al Nadr, viz. Malcán, Abd Manáh, Amru, Amer, and Malec. From Malcán came the Banu Malcán; from Abd Manáh the Banu Gbifár, the Banu Baer, the Al Doylites, the Banu Leith, the Banu'l Hareth, the Banu Madloj, and the Banu Damrah; from Amru the Amruites; from Amer the Amerites; and from Malec the Banu Ferús. From Kenánab also came the Ababishites, whom some have confounded with the Abassins, or Ethiopians (5).

(F) Al Nadr received his name from his beauty, and the brightness of his face. We find him called Koreish by Al Jannábi; but, according to Abulfeda, that was the surname of Febr. Nor is Al Jannábi intirely consistent with himself in this particular. With regard to the origin of the word Koreish, it denotes a sea-monster, which devours the other monsters produced in the watry element, and is remarkable for its strength and bravery. As therefore Febr resembled that animal in hardness and valour, he was honoured with the name of Koreish. Others deduce it from the verb karásha, which signifies to assemble, collect, or draw together; the descendents of Febr having been assembled by Kosa, when he formed the design of making himself master of the Caaba. But the former etymon seems to be the best approved of by the most celebrated Arab historians (6).

(G) Lowa had eight sons besides Caab, according to the author of the Masalec; viz. Saad, Khozaimab, Al Háreth, Amer, Asámab, Jesham, Aruf, and Amru. From four of these descended as many tribes; but Al Háreth died without issue. Amru, the son of Abd Wadd, who was slain by Ali in the war of the ditch, was of the tribe of Amer. From Lowa likewise, or rather his son Caab, sprung the Banu Jemab, and the Banu Sabm, whose progenitor was Hofais, the son of Caab, and the Banu Ada, so denominated from Ada, another of Caab's sons. To the former tribe belonged Omyya, the son of Kbalf, an enemy to Mohammed; and to the latter Omar, one of Mohammed's successors; as also Said, the son of Zaid, one of the ten martyrs (7).

(H) His brother's name was Tayem, surnamed Al Adram; that is to say, without a beard. The posterity of Tayem, amongst the Arabs, went under the denomination of Adramites (8).

(I) Abu Becr, father-in law to Mohammed, and his successor in the Khalifat, was a Tayemite, and consequently descended from Tayem, one of the sons of Morrah; as was also Talba, one of the ten martyrs. Kháled, the son of Al Walid, and Abu Jahl, the son of Heshám, whose proper name was Amru Ebn Heshám, were two of the Banu Makhzum, who deduced their origin from Yokdbah, another of the sons of Morrah (9).

(3) Poc. not. in spec. hist. Arab. p. 48. Gagn. la vie de Mahomet, tom. prem. p. 42. hist. Arab. p. 49. Gagn. la vie de Mahom. p. 43.

(4) Poc. & Gagn. ubi supra. (5) Poc. not. in spec. hist. Arab. p. 50. ut et ipse Pocock, ibid. & Gagn. ubi supra. (6) Al Jannabi, Poc. & Gagn. ubi supra. (7) Aut. lib. Masalec, apud Poc. not. in spec. hist. Arab. p. 50. ut et ipse Pocock, ibid. (8) Gagn. la vie de Mahom. tom. i. p. 47, Al Amsterdam, 1732. (9) Poc. not. in spec. hist. Arab. p. 50.

Kofa possesses himself of the guardianship of the Caaba.

THE guardianship of the Caaba was first possessed by the family of Ishmael, but afterwards translated to the house of Jorham. Here it continued for several ages; after the expiration of which, it was wrested out of the hands of the Jorhamites by the tribe of Khozâa. This post gave its possessors no small influence and authority, as the temple of Mecca was held in excessive veneration by all the Arabs in general, if we only except the tribes of Tay and Khatbâam, and some of the posterity of Al Hâreth Ebn Caab, who used not to go in pilgrimage thereto. Kofa, therefore, in order to aggrandize the Koreish, and gain reputation to his family, meditated the acquisition of this important charge; imagining that so honourable a station would make him to be revered through the whole peninsula of the Arabs. The execution of this design he facilitated, by marrying the daughter of Halil, who then governed Mecca, and kept the keys of the Caaba. Having had by her three sons, Abd'al Dâr, Abd Menâf, and Abd'al Uzza, and his affairs being in a flourishing situation, whilst those of Halil went greatly to decay, he found it no difficult matter to engage the Koreish to support him in the enterprize he had formed. Having, therefore, privately assembled a body of troops, he posted them about Mozdalifa, between mount Arafat and Mina, on the day when the ceremony of throwing the stones in the valley of Mina was performed. At the head of these he rushed out of his ambuscade, whilst the pilgrims were employed in that exercise, and fell upon the Khozâites with such fury, that he put a great number of them to the sword, and forced the rest to cry out for quarter. After this blow, Halil and Kofa referring their differences to arbitration, Tâ'amer Ebn Awf, who was chosen umpire by both parties, adjudged the sovereignty of Mecca, and the custody of the Caaba, to Kofa; who immediately assumed the title of king, and took an oath of allegiance from his new subjects. He then divided the town into four parts, and gave houses in the centre of it to those who had the most distinguished themselves in the late expedition<sup>a</sup>.

SOME authors relate this affair in a different manner. They pretend, that Kofa circumvented Abu Gabshân, then the guardian of the Caaba, whilst in a drunken fit, and bought of him the keys of that sacred place for a bottle of wine. But the tribe of Khozâa, according to the same writers, resenting the affront offered them in the person of Abu Gabshân, by Kofa, at that time prince of the Koreish, formed a design of repossessing themselves of the Caaba. Kofa, receiving advice of this, privately drew together a considerable party of the Koreishites, with which he surprised the Khozâites, made himself master of Mecca, and secured that important conquest in such a manner that it remained in his family till the time of Mohammed<sup>b</sup>.

WE must not omit observing here, that, according to some of the Arab historians, the Ishmaelites expelled the Jorhamites from the city of Mecca, and the Caaba, but were at last themselves chased from thence by the Khozâites, supported by the descendents of Beor, the son of Abd Manah, the son of Kenânab. It ought also to be remarked, that the Khozâites were of the house of Joktan, and settled originally in Yaman, but were forced to abandon their native country by the inundation of Al Arem. After the terrible destruction occasioned by that inundation, the people of this tribe retired to the valley of Marri, near Mecca, where they soon arrived at a very considerable degree of power. In fine, they possessed themselves of that city, and the temple there, from whence they were dislodged by the Koreish, under the conduct of Kofa, in the manner already related<sup>c</sup>.

Abd Menâf. ABD MENAF, the second son of Kofa, was declared prince of the Koreish in his father's life-time, and his subjects then took an oath of allegiance to him. The prophetic light, which, as the Moslems pretend, manifested itself in his face, gave him the right of primogeniture. His proper name was Al Moghâira, or Moghirah, and one of his surnames Al Kamar, or the moon, which he received on account of his transcendent beauty. He is said to have been a religious prince, and a great encourager of piety and devotion. Abd Menâf died at Mecca, and was buried on a little hill called Al Hajun; which, in after-ages, became a common place of interment. Abd'al Dâr was the father of the Banu Shibah, who were porters of the temple of Mecca. From Abd'al Dâr likewise descended Al Nodar, the son of Al Hâreth, one of Mohammed's most implacable enemies, who was put to death by his order, after the battle of Bedr. From Abd'al Uzza, Kofa's youngest son, sprung Al Zobaïr, the son of Al Awâm, one of the ten martyrs; as also Khadîjah, the first wife of Mohammed, and Waraka Ebn Nawfal. The name Abd'al Uzza signifies the servant or worshipper of Al Uzza, an idol of the Meccans, mentioned in the Korân; it having been a common practice among the pagan Arabs to assume such names as these, in order to shew how profound a veneration they entertained for their false deities<sup>d</sup>.

<sup>a</sup> AL JANNAB. ABULFED. Poc. not. in spec. hist. Arab. p. 42. 50. 342, & alibi. MOHAMMED. in Al Kor. sur. cvi. AER. ECHELLENS. hist. Arab. p. i. c. 3. Fortalit. fidei, lib. iv. confid. 1. GOLII notæ ad Alfraganum, p. 4. PRID. life of Mahom. p. 2, 3. GAGN. la vie de Mahom. tom. prem. p. 51—54. <sup>b</sup> Poc. not. in spec. hist. Arab. p. 42. 342. PRID. life of Mahom. p. 2, 3. <sup>c</sup> AL BEIDAWI. PRID. life of Mahom. p. 2. GOLII notæ ad Alfraganum, p. 4. <sup>d</sup> ABULFED. ubi supra. Poc. not. in spec. hist. Arab. p. 50, 51. GAGN. ubi supra. p. 54.

a NOTHING, therefore, can be more palpably absurd, than the notion the Mohammedans entertain of the religious sentiments of Kösa, and his son Abd Menâf. They suppose them both to have been distinguished by the prophetic light, and consequently to have been of the true religion, or at least always to have maintained the unity of the divine nature. Whereas the very names Abd Menâf, Abd'al Uzza, amount to a clear and incontestable proof that they were immersed in a most gross and shocking idolatry*.

'Tis true, the Mohammedans distinguish between the prophetic light and the gift of prophecy; making the latter a much more noble and sublime donation than the former. They considered the prophetic light as an internal impulse, disposing men to a compliance with the dictates of reason, and reclaiming them to a more perfect use of it; whereas they b take the gift of prophecy to consist in an extraordinary mission to declare to men some ancient, neglected, or forgotten, revealed truths. However, as they intimate, that the aforesaid light was communicated to Adam after his repentance, and has since been imparted to none but the prophets, or such wise and good men as have rendered themselves praiseworthy for their piety, they ought not to suppose that any gross idolaters were ever favoured with it. Besides, such a supposition seems to run directly counter to what has been advanced by Mohammed in the Korân. But this is not the only absurdity to be met with in the Moslem historians<sup>1</sup>.

HASHEM succeeded his father Abd Menâf in the principality of the Koreish, and consequently in the government of Mecca, and custody of the Caaba. His proper name was c Amru, with the surname of Al Ola, or the Sublime, on account of his high dignity, annexed to it. Hâshem, his other surname, denoted one that broke bread; and was given him on account of his great liberality during a famine at Mecca, when he supplied all the inhabitants of that city with bread. Having amassed large sums of money, he took a journey into Syria, according to some of the Arab writers, where he purchased a vast quantity of meal, and made cakes of it, which he broke with his own hands, and divided amongst the people of Mecca, upon his arrival there. He likewise killed a prodigious number of camels, with which he fed the Meccans, and thereby effectually relieved them in the time of their great distress. Nay, as the soil about Mecca was so very barren as to produce no fruits but what are common in the deserts, and consequently no corn or grain, which the Meccans d were obliged to fetch from other places, Hâshem took care to remedy this defect. He appointed two caravans to set out yearly for that purpose, the one in summer, and the other in winter; by means of which he amply supplied them with all sorts of provisions. These caravans of purveyors are mentioned in the Korân. The provisions brought by them were distributed twice a year, viz. in the month of Râjeb, and at the arrival of the pilgrims. In fine, Hâshem, by his prudent conduct, raised the glory of his people to the highest pitch; insomuch that all the neighbouring heads of tribes, and great men, made their court to him. Nay, according to some Mohammedan writers, the emperor Heraclius sought for an alliance with him. However, this will not be admitted by the learned; since the first year of the Hejra coincides with the twelfth of that emperor's reign. But the e Moslem historians are such wretched chronologers, that we ought not to be surprised at meeting in their works with blunders of this kind; tho' they clearly demonstrate their great ignorance, falshood, and partiality. Hâshem died at Gâza in Syria, or Shâm, about twenty, or twenty-five, years before the war of the elephant<sup>m</sup>.

HASHEM had three brothers, whose descendents made a very considerable figure amongst the Arabs. Abd Shems, the first of them, begot Ommiyah, from whom descended the Ommiyahan khalifs. Amongst these may be ranked Othmân Ebn Affân, Moawiyah Ebn Abu Sofiân, Yezid Ebn Moawiyah, Moawiyah Ebn Yezid, Merwân Ebn Al Hakem, &c. as will hereafter more fully appear. From Al Motâllab sprung the Motâlebites; amongst whom the Imâm Mohammed Ebn Edris Ebn Al Abbâs Ebn Othmân Ebn Shâfêi, commonly called f Al Shâfêi, was of principal note. Nawfal has always been considered by the Arabs as the progenitor of the Nawfalites; to which tribe belonged Waraka Ebn Nawfal, who left idols, and acknowledged but one God, before the mission of Mohammed. The memory of Hâshem is held in such high veneration by the Moslems, that, from him, the kindred of Mohammed, amongst them, are called Hâshemites; and he who presides over Mecca and Medina, who must always be of the race of Mohammed, has the Arabic title of Al Imâm Al Hâshem, that is, the prince, or chief, of the Hâshemites, even to this day<sup>n</sup>.

* ABULFED. POC. PRID. & GAGN. ubi sup. <sup>1</sup> AL SHAHRESTAN. lib. de generat. & nutritur. Mahomet. POC. ubi supra, p. 53, & p. 68. PRID. life of Mahom. p. 6. BOULAINVIL. ubi supra. AL KOR. MOHAMMED. sur. iii.

<sup>m</sup> POC. not. in spec. hist. Arab. p. 51. ISM. ABULFED. de vit. Mohammed. c. 2. sub init. AL KOR. MOHAMMED. sur. cvi. GAGN. ubi supra, p. 55—59. AL ZAMAKHSAR. JALLAL. AL BEIDAWI. ABR. ECHELLENS. hist. Arab. par. i. c. 3. AL SHAHRESTAN. lib. de generat. & nutritur. Mahomet. GABR. SIONIT. in append. ad SHARIF AL EDRISI, c. 7. PRID. life of Mahomet, p. 3. SALE's prelim. disc. p. 4. <sup>n</sup> EBN AL ATHIR. AL BEIDAWI, ABULFED. de vit. Mohammed, p. 16. POC. ubi sup. p. 157. GAGN. & GABR. SIONIT. ubi supra. SALE's prelim. disc. p. 43.

Abd'al Motalleb.

ABD'AL MOTALLEB, the son of Isham, had the name of Shaiba Al Hamd, that is, a venerable old age; because he came grey-headed into the world. The Meccans surnamed him Abd'al Motalleb, or the servant of Al Motalleb; because, having lost his father in his infancy, he was brought up by his uncle Al Motalleb. In the beginning of the month of Ramadan, he entertained the poor upon the flat roof of his house, and afterwards supplied the very fowls of the air, and wild beasts of the field, with provisions of various kinds, which he ordered his servants to leave upon the summits of the neighbouring mountains. The Arabs represent him as extremely affable, and easy of access. From what has been just observed, he likewise appears to have been a person of a most generous and excellent disposition °.

WE are told by the Mohammedans, that God discovered to Abd'al Motalleb, in a supernatural manner, the well Zemzem, about five hundred years after it had been filled up by Anru, the son of Al Hareth, prince of the Jorhamites, a little before he abandoned the territory of Mecca, and fled with his people into Yemen. During the aforesaid interval, the spot this famous well had formerly occupied was intirely unknown. The Koreish at first gave Abd'al Motalleb, and his son Al Hareth, some obstruction in the execution of their design; but, at last, Abd'al Motalleb, having got twelve sons to support him, carried his point with a high hand, and, in obedience to the divine command, opened the well Zemzem. The Mohammedans are persuaded, that Zemzem is the very spring which gushed out for the relief of Ishmael, when Hagar, his mother, wandered with him in the desert; and some pretend, that it was so named from her calling to him, when she spied it, in the Egyptian tongue, zem, zem, that is, stay, stay; tho' it seems rather to have had the name from the murmuring of its waters. Others deduce it from the verb zem, which signifies to issue out of the earth. The water of this well, which is on the east side of the Caaba, and covered with a small building, and cupola, is reckoned holy, and highly revered; being not only drank with particular devotion by the pilgrims, but also sent in bottles, as a great rarity, to most parts of the Mohammedan dominions. Abd'allah, surnamed Al Hafsedh, from his great memory, particularly as to the traditions of Mohammed, gave out that he acquired that faculty by drinking large draughts of Zemzem water. The citizens of Mecca had, for a long time, no other water than that with which they were supplied by this well; but the great concourse of pilgrims, and caravans, in after-ages, rendering a more copious supply of water necessary, an aqueduct, that had been begun from a spring at a considerable distance some time before, was, after several years labour, finished by the Kbâlif Al Moktader °.

Abd'allah.

ABD'ALLAH, Mohammed's father, was a younger son of Abd'al Motalleb, and the most beautiful person of the tribe of Koreish. However, he cannot be supposed to have been his father's youngest son, as M. de Boulainvilliers asserts; since Hamza and Al Abbâs were both younger than Abd'allah. Abd'al Motalleb is said to have had twelve sons besides Abd'allah, whose names have been given us in the following order by Abulfeda: Hamza, Al Abbâs, Abu Tâleb, Abu Lâheb, Al Ghidâk, Al Hareth, Jebel, Al Mokawwam, Derâr, Al Zobeir, Kethâm, and Abd'al Caaba. From Al Abbâs descended the Abbâsides; of which family were several Kbâlifs. Abu Tâleb was the father of the famous Ali, the fourth Kbâlif, and successor of Mohammed. As for Abd'allah, the ladies of his own tribe fell so desperately in love with him, that some of them are said to have made the same attempt upon him that Potiphar's wife did upon Joseph, according to the sacred historian. He married Amena, the daughter of Wâheb, the son of Abd'al Menâf, in the twenty-fourth or twenty-fifth year of his age, if we will believe Abulfeda; tho' Abmed Ebn Yusef makes him to have been near ten years younger, when this event happened. Be that as it will, the Moslems represent Amena as the most beautiful, prudent, and virtuous lady of her tribe, and consequently the most worthy of so extraordinary a person as Abd'allah °.

ABD'ALLAH dying young, and in his father's life-time, left his widow, and infant son, in very mean circumstances; his whole substance consisting but of five camels and one Ethiopian she-slave. Abd'al Motalleb was therefore obliged to take care of his grandchild Mohammed; which he not only did during his life, but, at his death, enjoined his eldest son Abu Tâleb, who was brother to Abd'allah by the same mother, to provide for him for the future. Soon after which, Abd'al Motalleb expired; being, according to Ebn Amid, an hundred and ten years old at his death. That he was prince, or chief, of the Koreish during the war of the elephant, we learn from Abulfeda; and, from Al Juzi, that Abd'allah, being sent by his

° EBN AL ATHIR, ABULFED. AL ZAMAKHSHAR. AL JANNAB. ABR. ECHELLENS. POC. PRID. GAGN. ubi supra. ° Aut. lib. SAIRAT MOGHOLTAI, EBN HESHAM, GAB. SIONIT. & J. HESR. de nonnull. urb. orient. p. 19. D'HERBEL. bibl. orient. p. 5. GAGN. ubi supra. p. 60, 61, 62. SHARIF AL EDRISI, apud Pocockium. in not. ad spec. hist. Arab. p. 124. GOLII notæ ad Alfraganum, p. 99. SALE's prelim. disc. p. 3, 4. ° AL ZAMAKHSHARI, AHMED EBN YUSEF, AL JANNABI, ABULFED. in genealog. Koreishitar. GREG. ABU'LFARAJ. ubi sup. AL KODAI, POC. not. in spec. hist. Arab. p. 51. Vide etiam JOAN. GAGN. not. ad Abulfed. de vit. Moham. c. ix. p. 21. & la vie de Mahomet, p. 62--63.

a father to reconnoitre the enemy, brought the first advice of their supernatural defeat. Our readers will not expect a relation of Abraham's expedition against Mecca here, since we have already given a full and ample account of it in the history of the ancient Arabs, preceding the birth of Mohammed <sup>r</sup>.

FROM what has been said, it appears that Mohammed was not of such mean extraction as some Authors pretend; since his family had, for several descents, presided over the Koreish, the most noble tribe amongst all the Arabians. However, 'tis not to be wondered at, that Mohammed, in the beginning of his life, should have been in a very poor and despicable condition: for his father dying before he was two years old, and whilst his grandfather Abd'ol Motâlleb was still living, all the power and wealth of his family seem to have been distributed amongst his uncles. Of these, Abu Tâleb, who, after his father's death, bore the chief sway in Mecca, made by far the most considerable figure. He arrived at a good old age, and was extremely kind to his nephew Mohammed; instructing him in the business of a merchant, which he followed. To this end, he took the young prophet, to use the stile of the Moslems, with him into Syria, when he was but thirteen, and afterwards recommended him to Khadijah, a noble and rich widow, for her factor; in whose service he behaved himself so well, that, by making him her husband, she soon raised him to an equality with the richest in Mecca <sup>s</sup>.

FROM the preceding account it plainly appears, that the first series of descents in the genealogical line of Mohammed by no means corresponds with the course of nature. It contains only nine generations, a number apparently too small for the interval between Abraham and Adnân. For, unless we allow this, it must be maintained, that the whole space between Abraham and Mohammed, including near two thousand six hundred years, contained only thirty generations; which no rational person, moderately versed in history and chronology, will ever be disposed to admit. Those authors, therefore, who enumerate between Ishmael and Adnân forty generations, approach much nearer the truth than either Al Beibaki, Al Jarra, or the tradition derived from Omm Salma. But even that number is too small, as it will not make the whole genealogical series between Abraham and Mohammed to consist of above sixty descents; whereas that vast interval must at least have comprehended sixty-seven or sixty-eight generations, even tho' we should make the greatest allowance that can in reason be desired for the superior extent of human life during the ages preceding David. We cannot therefore but dissent from Abulfeda, tho' a writer in good repute amongst the learned, when he gives the preference to Al Jarra's sentiments in the point before us; since that author places only eight generations between Ishmael and Adnân; whereas other Arab chronologers enumerate about forty descents between them. Besides, Abulfeda makes the creation of the world to have preceded the Hejra 6216 years, and has placed the age of Ishmael at as great a distance from that of Mohammed as the patrons either of the Hebrew, Samaritan, or Septuagint chronology; and consequently ought to have assigned as large a number of generations to the interval between those ages as any Christian historian. However, as accuracy in chronological matters is not to be expected from the best of the Moslem historians, we are not surpris'd to find Abulfeda so deviating from the course of nature, and consequently from truth, in the particular here touched upon. But we cannot so easily excuse Mr. Gagnier and Mr. Sale, who have both implicitly followed Abulfeda on this occasion, and consequently decided in favour of Al Jarra; though, to all persons moderately versed in the first principles only of history and chronology, nothing can appear more absurd than such a decision <sup>t</sup>.

As for the Count of Boulainvilliers, we consider him only as a secondary writer in the eastern, or rather Arabian, world; and therefore do not greatly wonder that he should transcribe the errors of the Arab historians, without making proper remarks or observations upon them: nay, that he should not be able to distinguish such errors, when they occur, from facts which have the most obvious and indelible characters of truth impressed upon them. That nobleman was little acquainted with the spirit and genius of the eastern writers; nay, he was an utter stranger to the Arabic tongue, as appears not only from his own confession, but likewise from his numerous corruptions of Arabic proper names; which betrays a total ignorance of even the first rudiments of that noble language. His chronological knowledge scarce comes up to even that of the Arabs, as must be allowed apparent from his making Maïec, who preceded Mohammed but thirteen generations, coeval with Jehoshaphat,

<sup>r</sup> ABULFED. de vit. Moham. p. 2. GREG. ABU'L-FARAJ. ubi supra. EBN AMID. AL JUZI, GAGN. la vie de Mahom. p. 67, 68. AL KOR. MOHAMMED. sur. 105. Sale's prelim. disc. p. 38. Univ. Hist. vol. xviii. p. 424, 425, 426, 427.

<sup>s</sup> ABULFED. ABUNAZAR, ABU'L-FARAJ. hist. compendios. dynasty, p. 161, 162. ELMACIN. lib. i. c. 1. HOTTINGER. hist. oriental. lib. ii. c. 1. GUADAGNOL. tract. ii. c. 10. PRID. life of Mahom. p. 4. GAGN. la vie de Mahom. liv. prem.

<sup>t</sup> AL BEIHAKI, AL JARRA, & OMM SALMA apud Ism. Abulfed. de vit. Moham. c. ii. ut & ipse ABULFED, ibid. & c. xxiii. p. 47—50. GAGN. la vie de Mahom. introduit. par. ii. SALE's genealogic. tab. in prelim. disc. p. 8. See also dissertat. on the chronology of the septuagint, Lond. 1741.

king of Judah. Nor is his sincerity, or veracity, at all superior to his abilities. He frequently runs counter to the whole stream of Arab antiquity, contradicting all the most celebrated Arab historians: nay, sometimes he does not scruple to advance points which are entirely unsupported by any noted Arab writer. Thus, to omit others that might be produced, he asserts, that Malec revived in his family the prophetic light; whereas, according to the Arabs, all Malec's predecessors, even up to Adnân, were adorned with that light. He also affirms Gâleb, the son of Febr, to have been a most celebrated chemist; and that his chemical works have been translated into the vulgar tongue; by which he must mean either Latin or French; intimating hereby, that chemistry was understood by the Arabs near four hundred years before the birth of Mohammed; whereas Jeber (K), who lived above an hundred years after that event, was the first Arab famed for his knowledge in the spagiric art, and the earliest Arab chemist, whose works are now extant. As the word Jeber, in the Arabic language, signifies a great man, and a king, the author last mentioned is commonly supposed to have been a prince; and, as he wrote in Arabic, a prince of Arabia. This undoubtedly gave occasion to the count de Boulainvilliers to assert, that Gâleb, in his chemical works, was dignified with the title of king; which clearly proves him to have confounded Gâleb, the son of Febr, with Jeber the great reformer and improver of chemistry. Such an egregious blunder as this cannot fail of prejudicing all our learned readers against his performance, and convincing us that he was unequal to the task he undertook, when he ventured to write the life of Mohammed. But of this we shall hereafter meet with many flagrant proofs. In fine, the count de Boulainvilliers's piece now before us ought not to be considered as a history of Mohammed, but as an impious romance, interspersed with arbitrary assertions, void of all foundation and authority; or, if we please, as a panegyric upon that impostor, abounding with blasphemous reflections, that strike at the very fundamental principles of the Christian religion<sup>u</sup>.

His translator a writer of the same principles and capacity.

In vain, therefore, does his translator endeavour to palliate the ignorance, chimerical notions, and irreligious sentiments, so conspicuous in this piece, by styling them comprehensive learning, profound reading, dignity of thoughts, refined sentiments, and excellent documents. With the same success does he attempt to vindicate the count's sincerity, by asserting, that this writer only levelled his reflections at the corruptions of the church of Rome. For that many of his observations are clearly subversive of some fundamental articles of our holy faith, and were therefore probably intended by him to overturn the foundations of Christianity, cannot, as we apprehend, be well denied. Besides, as he professed himself a member of the church of Rome, when he wrote his LIFE OF MOHAMMED, it did not so well become him, considered as a man of uprightness and sincerity, to expose the corruptions of that church. But it is a common and stale artifice, amongst the propagators of infidelity, to pretend to have only in view the errors of the church of Rome, which must be owned to be a corrupt and idolatrous communion, when they are either sapping the foundations of revealed religion, or making a direct and formal attack upon it. So that, in our opinion, the translator of the count de Boulainvilliers's LIFE OF MOHAMMED discovers himself to have been a person of the same capacity, of the same extensive reading, of the same profound erudition, of the same sincerity and veracity, and, lastly, of the very same religion, with the original author. But it is time now to put an end to this digression, and return to the history of Mohammed<sup>w</sup>.

Mohammed
born in the year of Christ
578.

MOHAMMED the legislator of the Arabs, and founder of the Moslem power, honoured by his followers with the glorious title of THE APOSTLE OF GOD, was born at Mecca, in the year of CHRIST 578, soon after the commencement of the æra of THE ELEPHANT, as has been already observed. The principal epochs of the ancient world preceded this famous event, according to Abulfeda, the following number of years<sup>x</sup>.

<sup>u</sup> M. le Comte de BOULAINVILLIERS vie de Moham. liv. sec. & alibi pass. ABULFED. AL ZAMAKHSHAR. AL JANNAB. alique scriptor. Arab. GAGN. ubi sup. in introduct. p. ii. H. BOERH. hist. of chem. p. 143. Lond. 1727. <sup>w</sup> BOULAINV. pass. See also his translator's ded. and pref. <sup>x</sup> ISM. ABULFED. de vit. Mohammed. c. xxxiii. p. 46—50. Edit. Gagn. Oxon. 1723. GREG. ABU'L-FARAJ, hist. dynast. p. 162. Oxon, 1663.

(K) Jeber, or Febr, according to Leo Africanus, was originally a Greek, and a Christian; but afterwards embraced Mohammedism, went over into Asia, and there learned the Arabic tongue. He adds, that his book was wrote in Greek, and translated thence into Arabic; and that he was not known by the name Jeber till after this version.

Golijs, professor of the oriental languages in the University of Leyden, presented Jeber's piece in MS. to the public library there. This he translated into Latin, and published first at Leyden, in folio, and afterwards in quarto, under the title of Lapis Philosophorum. It contains many useful and curious things about the nature of metals, their purification, fusion, malleability, &c. with excellent accounts of salts, and aque fortes. Abundance of his experiments, according to the famous Dr. Boerhaave, are verified by present practice; and several of them have passed for modern discoveries. Except for what relates to the philosopher's stone, says the same learned author, the exactness of his operations is really surprising. He seems to have lived, continues this writer, in the eighth century. For a farther account of him, we must beg leave to refer our curious readers to Dr. Boerhaave, in the piece here mentioned (10).

(10) Boerhaave's history of chemistry, p. 14, 15. Lond. 1727. See also Leo Africanus. lib. iii. c. 106.

a	THE creation of the world,	—	—	—	—	6163.
	THE universal deluge,	—	—	—	—	3921.
	THE confusion of languages,	—	—	—	—	3251.
	THE birth of Abraham ,	—	—	—	—	2840.
	THE building of the Caaba ,	—	—	—	—	2740.
	THE death of Moses ,	—	—	—	—	2295.
	THE building of the temple at Jerusalem ,	—	—	—	—	1749.
	THE commencement of the æra of Nabonassar ,	—	—	—	—	1316.
	THE destruction of the temple at Jerusalem ,	—	—	—	—	1297.
	THE conquest of the Persian empire by Alexander the Great ,	—	—	—	—	881.
b	THE victory at Actium ,	—	—	—	—	599.
	THE commencement of the Christian Æra,	—	—	—	—	578.
	THE destruction of the temple of Jerusalem by Titus ,	—	—	—	—	505.
	THE first year of the emperor Hadrian ,	—	—	—	—	454.
	THE insurrection of Ardesbir , the son of Bâbek ,	—	—	—	—	369.
	THE beginning of the reign of Diocletian ,	—	—	—	—	286.

THE pretended prophet first saw the light on Monday the twelfth day of the month called by the Arabs the former Rabî, precisely at the sixth hour of the day ; or, according to our manner of computing, about noon. This answered to the same hour of the twenty-second day of the Syriac month Nisan, corresponding with our April ; the sun being then in the tenth degree of Aries, as has been particularly remarked by some of the Moslem historians <sup>y</sup>.

THE Mohammedan writers pretend, that the moment their prophet was taken out of his mother's womb, there rushed out with him a luminous appearance, that enlightened, in an extraordinary manner, all the cities, towns, villages, castles, and public places of Syria. They add, that, at the same instant, he fell upon his knees, and, lifting up his face towards heaven, in a devout manner, pronounced, with an audible and distinct voice, the words Allah Acbar, &c. that is to say, God is great ; there is only one God, and I am his prophet. They likewise affirm, that he was born circumcised (L), and with his umbilical vessels cut, to the great astonishment of all who were present at his birth <sup>z</sup>.

SOME of these writers have also handed down to us a long detail of the prodigies that attended his birth, as they were related by his mother Amena. Our curious readers will not be displeased to meet with a few of the most remarkable of them here ; as they will serve to give them a tolerable idea of the Arab genius, and clearly demonstrate how easily and grossly the Mohammedans may be imposed upon <sup>a</sup>.

FIRST, All the demons, or evil spirits, that had posted themselves in the constellations, and signs of the Zodiac, to pry into the actions, and overhear the discourses, of the inhabitants of heaven, as also to tempt them, were dislodged from thence : nor could they ever after animate idols, or deliver oracles upon earth ; their influence there, in that respect, being totally destroyed <sup>b</sup>.

SECONDLY, The sacred fire of the Persians, which had remained burning, without intermission, above a thousand years, ever since the time of Zoroaster, or Zerdusht, immediately after the delivery of Amena, was totally extinguished <sup>c</sup>.

THIRDLY, The waters of the lake of Sawa, belonging to the Banu Hamdân, were so entirely dried up, that a city was built on the bottom of it, which has preserved the name of Sawia even to this day <sup>d</sup>.

FOURTHLY, Part of the king of Persia's palace was overthrown by an earthquake ; fourteen of its towers having been demolished by the violence of the shock. This so terrified Khosrû, that he immediately sent for the Mubadân (M), or Magian pontiff, to learn of him what

<sup>y</sup> ABULFED. ubi sup. c. 1. p. 2. GOLII not. ad Alfragan. p. 5, 6. Vide etiam lib. Pers. MU'GJIZAT PHARSI apud Cl. Hyd. in præfat. ad hist. relig. vet. Pers. fol. penult. init. & GAGN. not. ad Abulfed. ubi sup. p. 2.
<sup>z</sup> AL HAFEDH apud Abulfed. ubi supra, p. 3. ut et ipse ABULFED. ibid. GAGN. la vie de Mahom. tom. i. p. 77, 78. <sup>a</sup> EEN HESHAM, AL HAFEDH, MAKHZUM, & ABULFED, ubi supra. <sup>b</sup> Al Kor. MOHAMMED. f. xv. v. 16. AL BEIDAWI, JALLALO'DDIN, &c. Vid. etiam GAGN. ubi supra. <sup>c</sup> AL HAFEDH, ABULFED. MAKHZUM, & al. Vide etiam LUDOVIC. MARRACC. prodr. par. i. p. 40. <sup>d</sup> Idem ibid. & GAGN. ubi supra.

(L) This prodigy seems to have been feigned by the Mohammedans, in imitation of the Talmudists ; according to whom, there were only the following fourteen persons born circumcised, from the creation of the world ; Adam, Seth, Noah, Shem, Melchisedek, Jacob, Joseph, Job, Moses, Balaam, Samuel, David, Jeremiah, and

Zerubbabel. Not the least mention is made of circumcision in the Korân ; but a long account of this rite, as used by the Arabs, may be met with in Dr. Pocock, and others (11).
(M) The most ancient order of ecclesiastics amongst the Persians was called, in their language, Mîgh, or the

(11) Telammidenu, fol. iv. col. 4. R. Gedalia in Shalshelet Hakabbala, ex R. Nathan. Perke Aboth, &c. Vajikra Rabba, f. c. iv. Poc. not. in spec. hist. Arab. p. 319. Had. Reland, de relig. Mohammed. p. 75, & 268. Gagn. in not. ad Abulfed. ubi supra, p. 3.

what such a disaster might portend. The Mûbadân, or Mûbadbân, instead of satisfying the king directly, told his majesty, that he had lately seen in a dream a fierce and strong camel vanquished by a beautiful Arabian horse; and that, after this, the Tigris seemed to him to overflow its banks, and lay all the neighbouring country under water: which, said he, imports, that we shall receive some bad news from the side of Arabia. Upon this, Khosrû dispatched an express to Al Nooman, the son of Al Mondar, an Arab prince, who held his residence at Hira, a city seated on the frontiers of Syria and Persia, one of his vassals, commanding him to come to court, and bring an Arabian interpreter of dreams and prodigies with him. Al Nooman, in obedience to this order, soon after presented to the king Abd'al Massib, the Ghassanite, to whom Khosrû imparted a particular account of the preceding prodigies, and desired an interpretation of them. To which Abd'al Massib replied, that he should easily satisfy his majesty, if he might have leave to consult his uncle Satib, a celebrated diviner, who resided in the eastern part of Syria. Which having obtained, he received for answer from the sage, that the fall of the fourteen towers, with the drying up of the lake of Sawa, the Mûbadbân's dream, and the extinction of the sacred fire of the Persians, denoted the failure of the royal family of the Sassanidæ, and the subjugation of the Persians, after the reigns of fourteen kings and queens; which accordingly happened. We are farther told, that Satib (N), being extremely affected with Abd'al Massib's relation of the foregoing prodigies, ordered himself to be carried to Mecca, where Mohammed was lately born. Here he met with Abu Tâleb, Mohammed's uncle, and Abd'allah, his father, to whom he foretold the future advancement of the child; and, amongst other things, said, "His name is known both in the LAW and the GOSPEL; his name in heaven is Ahmed, on earth Mohammed, and, in paradise, Abu'l Kâsem" (O).

The Moslems imitate the Evangelists.

WE need not inform our intelligent readers here, that these extravagant fictions have been coined by the Mohammedans, in order to represent the birth of their pretended prophet as similar to that of our Saviour CHRIST; or, in other words, to draw a sort of parallel between those two events: for, as we are assured by the sacred writers, that our Lord was God manifested, to destroy the works of the devil; that he should save his people, or all mankind, from their sins; that the glory of the Lord shone round about some shepherds abiding in the neighbouring fields, at his birth, when an angel of the LORD came upon them; that Simeon, an holy devout person, and Anna, a prophetess, predicted most illustrious things of him; that, some time after his birth, wise men, or rather Magi, came from the East, to worship him, and, in acknowledgement of his greatness, to make presents to him; that they were directed to Bethlehem, the place of his residence, by a star, or luminous appearance, &c.; so the Moslem writers affirm, that, at Mohammed's birth, a supernatural light spread itself all over Syria; that all demons were then expelled the celestial orbs; that other unaccountable prodigies happened; that Satib, a celebrated wise man, or diviner, being struck with them, went to Mecca, to see so wonderful an infant, and there foretold his future greatness, &c. From whence it clearly appears, that the Mohammedan writers imitated, or rather aped, the sacred penmen, in the point before us; tho' the relations of the latter are as different from those of the former, as reality is from fiction, religion from superstition, sacred and divine truth from diabolical error and delusion.

Abd'al Motaleb calls his grandson Mohammed.

ABD'AL MOTALLEB, Mohammed's grandfather, the seventh day after his birth, made a great entertainment, to which he invited the principal of the Koreish; who, after the repast, order of Magi. The next superior order was termed Mûbad, an abbreviation of Mûghbad, the prefect, or prelate, of the Magi. The arch-prelate, or supreme pontiff, of the Magi, was known by the name of Mûbad Mûbadân, and sometimes simply Mûbadân. For a farther account of this ecclesiastical officer, we must beg leave to refer our readers to Dr. Hyde, and the authors cited by him (12).

<sup>c</sup> AL HAFEDH, ABULFED: MAKHZUM, MARRACC, ubi supra. AL JANNABI, RUSTEM AL MAULAVI, AL BOKHARI. HYD. hist. rel. vet. Persar. p. 364. <sup>f</sup> 1 JOH. c. iii. v. 8. MAT. c. i. v. 21. LUK. c. ii. v. 8, 9, &c. MAT. c. ii. v. 1, 2, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11. AL KOR. MOHAMMED. AL BEIDAWI, JALLALO'DDIN, AL HAFEDH, ABULFED. EEN HESKAM, AL JANNAB. &c. ubi supra. Vide etiam LUDOVICUM MARRACCIIUM, ubi sup.

(N) This Satib, if Al Jannabi may be credited, reigned in the city of Najrân. According to Al Bokhârî, his true name was Rabîa Ebn Mazem. For a farther account of him, we must refer our readers to the aforesaid Arab authors, who have been pretty prolix on that head (13).

(O) Mohammed received the prænomen of Abul Kâsem, from Kâsem, the name of the eldest son he had by Khandijab, as was customary amongst the Arabs. According to Ahmed Ebn Yusef, Mohammed was the first who had the name of Ahmed, or Mohammed, imposed upon him; but this is contradicted by Ebn Khalecân, who, in his life of the celebrated poet Farazdak, relates, that three Arabs, before Mohammed, went by that name. However, if any regard be due to the Korân, as not many Christians perhaps will believe, the pretended prophet of the Moslems was the first Arab called Mohammed. The word Ahmed signifies praised, glorious, &c. and Mohammed, most praised, most glorious, &c. in the superlative degree (14).

(12) Gimâl Al Kôrasbi, Rustem Al Mânlawi, Halimi Persicus, aliique apud V. C. Tho. Hyde, in hist. relig. vet. Persar. p. 364—366, ut & ipse Hyde, ib. (13) Al Jannab, in vit. Mohammed. Al Bokhârî. Vide etiam Gagn. not. ad Abulfed. ubi supra, p. 4, 5. (14) Ahmed Ebn Yusef, Ebn Khalecân, & Al Kor. Mohammed, f. lxi. v. 6. Vide etiam Gagn. not. ad Abulfed. de vit. Mohammed. p. 7. & Pec. not. in spec. hist. Arab. p. 167—169.

- a desired him to give the infant, he had invited them to see, a name. Abd'al Motallib immediately replied, I name this child Mohammed. The Koreish grandees, astonished at this, asked him again, whether he would not choose to call his grandson by a name that had belonged to some one of his family. He answered, May the Most High glorify in heaven him whom he has created on earth! in which he seemed to allude to the name Mohammed, signifying praised, glorified, &c. 'Tis worthy of observation, that this account of the imposition of Mohammed's name is nothing more than an imitation of what St. Luke has related on a similar occasion; which is an additional proof that the history of Mohammed, as given us by the Arabs, abounds with fictitious circumstances; and that the veracity of the Moslem historians, in this point at least, is not much to be depended upon <sup>z</sup>.
- b MOHAMMED lost his father Abd'allah, when he was about two months old, according to Abulfeda; tho' others believe, that his father died before he was born. Abd'allah departed <sup>Mohammed lost his father very young.</sup> this life at Yathreb; being his father's favourite, both on account of the beauty of his person, and the excellency of his disposition. We must not omit observing here, that Yathreb was the ancient and proper name of Medina, or of the territory whereon it stands. Some suppose the town was so named from its founder, Yathreb, the son of Kâbiya, the son of Mablayel, the son of Aram, the son of Shem, the son of Noah; tho' others tell us it was built by the Amalekites. Be that, however, as it will, Yathreb was never called Medina, or Medinato'l-Nabi, i. e. the city of the prophet, till either Mohammed's retreat thither, or his interment there, in a magnificent building, covered with a cupola, and adjoining to the east side of the great temple, which is built in the midst of the city. Abd'allah was twenty-five years old, a little before the war of the elephant commenced, according to Abulfeda; but he is supposed to have been near ten years younger at that time by Al Jannabi <sup>h</sup>.
- c THE first nurse that suckled Mohammed, after his mother, was Thawiba, his uncle Abu Mohammed's Lahab's maid. She at the same time suckled her own son Masruh, Hamza, another of the <sup>nurses, &c.</sup> prophet's uncles, and Abu Salama, the son of Abd'al Asad, the Makbuzumbite. He was also nursed by Halima, at his mother Amena's request, the daughter of Abu Dowaid, the son of Al Hâreth, of the Banu Saad, who took him into the desert inhabited by her tribe, and, after some time, brought him again to Mecca. We are told by Abulfeda, that Halima, whilst Mohammed was under her care, and her husband Al Hâreth, the son of Abd'al Uzza, d one day found the young prophet strangely disordered; and were greatly surprised, when he informed them, that he had been thrown down upon the ground by two men, who had opened his belly. This induced Halima to think, that he had been either attacked by some hypochondriac disorder, or been frightened by some diabolical illusion; and therefore she immediately brought him home to his mother Amena. None of the Moslem writers have given us any clear and distinct account of the malady Mohammed was afflicted with; tho', from several hints to be met with in them, as well as in the Korân, it seems probable, that this was the epilepsy, or falling-sickness. Nor can this well be doubted, tho' it has been flatly denied by the learned Mr. Ockley, who was too much prejudiced in favour of the Arabian impostor. Mr. Sale takes the expression of opening the belly, or rather the breast, e to import no more, than that the mind of Mohammed was opened and enlarged, in order to receive the truth, and wisdom, as well as prophecy; or that it was freed from uneasiness and ignorance. The passage of the Korân he had in view is thought by some of the interpreters of that book to intimate the opening of Mohammed's heart, in his infancy, or when he took his journey to heaven, by the angel Gabriel; who, having wrung out the black drop, or seed of original sin, washed and cleansed the same, and filled it with wisdom and faith. Halima brought up with Mohammed, Abd'allah, Anisa, and Hadbâma, or Al Sbîma; and, being afterwards reduced to great poverty, had forty sheep given her, at Mohammed's request, by his wife Khadijah. Halima and her husband Al Hâreth were some of the first that embraced Islamism, or the Mohammedan religion. We are told, that the preceding disorder f happened to the young prophet immediately after his first return to Mecca, in the third year of his age, by Ahmed Ebn Yusef and Al Jannabi <sup>i</sup>.

MOHAMMED lived three years with his mother Amena, after he had been obliged to leave <sup>Amena dies;</sup> Halima, and her husband Al Hâreth, by the foregoing indisposition; at the end of which, she departed this life, her son being then about six years of age, at a town called Al Abcen, situated between Mecca and Medina. This town stood to the north of Al Johfa, from whence it was distant about eight parasangs. Amena had been visiting her uncles of the Banu Ada,<sup>a</sup> and died on the road, in her return home. After this sad event, his grandfather Abd'al Motalleb took the young prophet under his protection; and, in many respects, preferred him to his own sons; to whom he frequently said, We must take particular care of this young infant<sup>k</sup>.

<sup>z</sup> AL HAFEDH, ABU DEER AHMED AL BAIHEK. AL SHAF. apud Ism. Abulfed. ubi supra, ut & ipse ABULFED. ibid. LUK. c. i. v. 60—64. <sup>h</sup> ISM. ABULFED. ubi supra, p. 1, 2. AHMED EBN YUSEF & SHARIF AL EDRISI apud Pocock. in not. ad spec. hist. Arab. p. 122—128. ut et ipse Pocock. ibid. GOLI notæ ad Alfragan. p. 97. ABULFED. descript. Arab. p. 40. Vide etiam GAGN. la vie de Mahom. tom. i. p. 65, 66. <sup>i</sup> ABULFED. ubi supra, c. iii. & iv. p. 8—11. AL KOR. MOHAMMED. f. xciv. v. 1. AL BE:DAWI, AHMED EBN YAHYA, SALE's translation of the Korân, p. 494. ZONAR. HOTTING. hist. Orient. lib. i. c. 11. p. 10. LUDOVICUS MARRACCIUS, in refut. Alc. p. 762. col. 2. Pat. 1698. Vide etiam GAGN. not. ad Abulfed. ubi supra, p. 9. PLTAV. ration. temp. p. i. p. 507. & SIM. OCELEIUM, apud Gagn. ubi supra. AHMED EBN YUSEF, AL JANNABI. &c.

as does Abd'al Motalleb.

Two years after the death of Amena, Abd'al Motalleb likewise departed this life; but, before he expired, he enjoined his eldest son Abu Táleb, who was brother to Abd'allah, Mohammed's father, by the same mother, to provide for his grandchild Mohammed, for the future; which he very affectionately did, and instructed him in the business of a merchant. This happened towards the beginning of the reign of Khosrú Hormúz (P), the son of Khosrú Anushirwán, king of Persia; in which year, according to some of the eastern writers, Abu Becr<sup>b</sup> was born<sup>l</sup>.

Mohammed's first journey into Syria.

ABU TALEB, in order to perfect his nephew in the employment he had chosen for him, took him with him into Syria, whither he found himself obliged to go on affairs of commerce, when he was but about twelve or thirteen years of age. He no sooner arrived at Bosra (Q), an ancient city of Syria Damascena, than he visited a monastery, where he found a Nestorian monk, named Felix, the son of Jonas, the son of Abd'al Salibi, and surnamed Boheira; who advanced towards them, treated them with great marks of distinction, and gave them a grand entertainment<sup>m</sup>. We are told by Abu'l Hasan Ali Al Masudi, that this monk was called by the Christians Sergius, and belonged to the monastery of Abd'al Kais. From whence we may justly infer, as hath been observed by Dr. Prideaux, that he was the Sergius of Vincentius Bellovacensis, so frequently mentioned by other Latin writers. The word boheira seems to be equivalent to the Latin marinus, of or belonging to the sea, marine, &c.; tho' Dr. Prideaux assigns it another interpretation. Of this extraordinary person we shall have occasion farther to speak in the sequel of this history<sup>n</sup>.

He is entertained by Boheira.

UPON Mohammed's first approach to Boheira, the monk observed a sort of luminous or transparent cloud round his head, that preserved him from the solar rays; as also that the dry trees, on which he sat, were every-where covered instantly with green leaves, that served him for a shade: certain signs these that the prophetic dignity resided in him. He likewise discovered the seal of prophecy impressed between his shoulders, whilst he kissed the hinder part of his garment. Turning then to Abu Táleb, Depart, said he, with this child, and take great care, that he doth not fall into the hands of the Jews; for your nephew will one day become a very extraordinary person. Abu Táleb hereupon immediately returned to Mecca, and gave an account to the Koreish of the discoveries that had been made. In the mean time, Mohammed, as he advanced towards the years of puberty, grew extremely popular. He was remarkable for his amiable qualities, and shining accomplishments, both of body and mind. He was the most handsome and the best made man of all the Arabs of his time; and not only so, but he likewise surpassed them all in sagacity and good sense. He was judicious in his answers, just in his expressions, sincere both in his words and actions, and studiously avoided every thing that had but the least appearance of indecency and dishonesty; insomuch that he went amongst his countrymen by the name of Al-Amin, or the Faithful. In fine, he was blessed with all the moral and intellectual endowments that can adorn a great and good man. This is the fine portrait given us of Mohammed, at the age of fourteen years, by some of the Moslem historians<sup>o</sup>.

<sup>k</sup> ABULFED. ubi supra, p. 10. & in geogr. p. 13. AL JANNABI, GREG. ABU'L-FARAJ. hist. dynast. p. 161. 162. <sup>l</sup> ABULFED. ubi supra. AL MONTEK. apud Al Jannab. AL TABAR. apud Elmacin, &c. GREG. ABU'L-FARAJ. ubi supra. <sup>m</sup> ABULFED. ubi supra. AL JANNABI, AL KODAI, AHMED EBN YUSEF, ABU'L-FARAJ. hist. dynast. ABU'L-HASAN ALI AL MASUD. PRIDEAUX's life of Mahomet. Vide etiam Poc. not. in spec. hist. Arab. p. 170. & GENTII. not. ad Mufladin. Sad. p. 536. <sup>n</sup> AHMED EBN YUSEF, ABU'L-HASAN ALI AL MASUD. ABU'L-HASAN AL BECR comment. in Al Kor. VINCENT. BELLOVACENS. in specul. historic. Georg. monach. in dialog. cum Abu Salama, principal. Arab. PETR. PASCHAS. in hist. Mahumetic. c. viii. PRID. life of Mahomet, p. 41. <sup>o</sup> ABULFED. ubi supra. AL JANNABI, AL KODAI, AHMED EBN YUSEF. ABU'L-FARAJ. hist. dynast. ABU'L-HASAN ALI AL MASUD. PRIDEAUX's life of Mahomet. Vide etiam Poc. not. in spec. hist. Arab. p. 170. & GENTII. not. ad Mufladin. Sad. p. 536.

(P) The Arab writers call this prince Kesra, but the Persians write and pronounce his name Khosrú. He was surnamed, according to Ahmed Ebn Yusef, Al Malec Al-Adel, or the just king. The same author relates, that Abd'allah, the father of Mohammed, was born in the twenty-fourth, and Mohammed himself in the forty-second year of his reign. It ought to be remarked here, that Kesra, or Khosrú, was the common name of the Persian kings, especially of the house of the Sassanidae, as Cæsar was that of the Roman emperors (15).

(Q) This city, which is supposed by Reland to have been denominated by the Hebrews בעשטרה, beestera, or bostrai, from עשטרה, the house of Estera, or Altaro, is made by Abulfeda the metropolis of Hawran. He assigns it, from Al Biruni, the longitude of 60° 8', and the latitude of 33° 35'. It stands about four stations to the S. of Damascus, and near it was the monastery of Boheira, the monk. Ahmed Ebn Yusef informs us, that Mohammed, soon after his first arrival at Bosra, visited this monastery (16).

(15) Ahmed Ebn Yusef, in hist. sect. 54. Abulfed. ubi supra. p. 2. & alibi. Vide etiam Gagn. not. ad Abulfed. ubi supra, p. 2, 3. (16) Hadr. Reland. Palæst. illustrat. tom. ii. p. 261. Trajecti Batavorum, 1714. Al Birun. apud Abulfed. in geogr. ut & ipse Abulfed. ibid. Ahmed Ebn Yusef, in descript. urbium, &c.

a. BUT the Christian writers, on the contrary, who are the most to be depended upon, have set both the character of this impostor, and his doctrines, in a very different light. They have represented him as an inventor and publisher of the most flagitious falsehoods, as a propagator of the most wicked imposture, and as the founder of a religion, that is utterly destructive of all true holiness and purity of mind. And whether this representation be just or not, let even the memoirs of Mohammed's life, transmitted down to us by the best Moslem historians, the tenets of the Korân itself, and the principles professed by the Mohammedans, in consequence of those tenets, from the time of their pretended prophet to this very day, decide <sup>p</sup>.

The Christian writers give Mohammed a bad character.

As therefore the truth or falsity of what has been advanced by the Christian writers; in relation to Mohammed's character, as well as that of his doctrines, may be so easily and certainly discovered, Mr. Sale seems to determine with too much precipitation, when he more than insinuates the preceding representation to have been owing to the partiality of the Christians, who, on account of the great successes of the Mohammedans against them, must necessarily have been inspired with a horror of their religion. For this looks more like an apology for Mohammed and the Korân, if not a palliation of the cruelties exercised by that impostor's followers upon the professors of Christianity, than a true and just account either of the disposition of the one, or the spirit of the other <sup>q</sup>.

He is unjustly vindicated by Mr. Sale.

BUT to return to our history—Mohammed made his first campaign, when he was fourteen, according to Abulfeda, or twenty, as the other eastern historians will have it (which is indeed the most probable opinion) years of age, under his uncle Abu Tâleb, who commanded the Koreish against the tribes of Kenân and Hawazan. What gave occasion to this war, we are no-where told; but as it was carried on with great violence and fury through the course of the four sacred months Al Moharram, Rajeb, Dhu'lkaada, and Dhu'lhajja, without any regard thereto, it was termed the impious war. It may not be improper to remind our readers here, tho' we have taken notice of it before, that, during these months, it was held unlawful, amongst the Arabs, to wage war; they then taking off the heads from their spears, and ceasing from incursions, and other hostilities. Whoever was in fear of his enemy, lived then in full security; so that if a man met the murderer of his father, or his brother, he durst not attack him, or even offer him any manner of violence. The tribes of Tey and Khathâam, and some of the descendants of Al Hâreth Ebn Caab, who distinguished no time or place as sacred, were the only Arabs that slighted this institution. We must not omit observing, that the Koreish, under the conduct of Abu Tâleb and young Mohammed, in this war, were victorious; which could not fail of rendering the people of their tribe still more devoted to them <sup>r</sup>.

Mohammed's first campaign; &c.

'Tis pretended by Al Juzi, that Mohammed, about this time, tho' so young, gave a signal proof of his profound sagacity, on a very particular occasion. The Koreish, according to this author, having found that the Caaba, or the square stone-building of the temple of Mecca, was too small, and too low, formed a design of demolishing it, and erecting a larger and higher edifice in its room. But when the new building was raised to its intended height, continues the same writer, where the black-stone was to be placed, the tribes could not agree amongst themselves about the person who was to have the honour of placing it. However, they came at last to a resolution to refer the decision of this dispute to the person who should next approach the holy place, called by the Arabs Al Harâm; which happened to be young Mohammed. At his direction, the stone was raised on a piece of tapestry, by one man of every tribe, to its intended height, and then taken from them, and fixed in its proper place by the prophet himself. The Caaba was then covered with tapestry of various colours, and rebuilt by the Koreish on the old foundation. It was afterwards repaired by Abd'allah Ebn Zobeir, the Khalif of Mecca, and at length again rebuilt by Yusef, surnamed Al Hejâj, with some alterations, and covered with tapestry of silk, in the form wherein it now remains, in the seventy-fourth year of the Hejra. But of the Caaba, and every thing belonging to it, we shall give a full and ample description hereafter <sup>s</sup>.

He discovers great sagacity.

WE hear little farther of Mohammed, till he was twenty-five years of age, when he married Khadijah, a noble and rich widow, to whom his uncle Abu Tâleb first recommended him for her factor; after he had sufficiently instructed him in mercantile affairs. Khadijah was the daughter of Khowsaied, the son of Asad, the son of Abd' al Uzza, the son of Kosa, the son of Kelîb, of the tribe of Koreish. Mohammed undertook a second journey into Syria, after he had entered into her service, attended by her servant Maîsara; and acquitted

Mohammed marries Khadijah.

<sup>p</sup> ZONAR. HOTTING. hist. Orient. &c. Vide etiam LUDOVICUM MARRACCIVM, in prodr. & refut. Al-Koran. Patavii, 1698. PRIDEAUX's life of Mahomet, pass. SALE's pref. and prelim. disc. p. 40.

<sup>q</sup> SALE, ubi sup. & alibi. <sup>r</sup> AEULFED. ubi supra, p. 11. AL FIRAUZABADI, AL KODAI, AL JAWHAR. AL SHAHRESTAN. AL KAZWIN. AL MOGHOLTAI. Vide etiam GOLII not. ad Alfragan. p. 4, 5. & Poc. not. in spec. hist. Arab. p. 174, &c.

<sup>s</sup> AL JUZI in lib. de ritib. peregrinat. Meccan. c. lxxviii. ABULFED. ubi sup. c. vi. p. 13, 14. & in hist. gen. AL JANNABI. Vid. etiam GAGN. not. ad Abulfed. ubi sup. & SALE's prelim. disc. p. 116, 117.

himself so much to her satisfaction, that, soon after his return to Mecca, she thought fit to a make him her husband. Theophanes and Cedrenus were therefore undoubtedly mistaken, when they asserted Mohammed to have served Khadījah in so mean and low a capacity as that of keeper of her camels, at the time that she thought proper to bestow both her person and fortune upon him. This event was owing, if Abulfeda may be credited, to the high opinion she entertained of Mohammed's integrity, which was greatly heightened by Maīfara, who scrupled not to affirm, that he had seen two angels shade her factor with their wings from the scorching beams of the sun. If this be true, Mohammed began to act the part of an impostor pretty early; and discovered himself to be a person of some capacity, even at that time, by finding means to influence Maīfara in his favour. Be that however as it will, the prophet's first was Khadījah wife forty years old, when she married him. The Moslems b pretend, that she was the first convert to Islamism; and that Mohammed loved her so well, tho' she was so much older than himself, that he never had the least familiarity with any other woman, during her life. We learn from Abmed Ebn Yusef, that she had two husbands before Mohammed; the second of which was Abu Halat, a confederate of the Banu Abd'al Dari, and the other Atik, the Makbzumite. The commentators upon the Korān introduce a saying of their prophet, that among men there had been many perfect, but no more than four of the other sex had attained perfection; to wit, Asia the wife of Pharaoh, Mary the daughter of Imrān, Khadījah the daughter of Khowailed, and Fatemā the daughter of Mohammed.
Khadījah, according to Abulfeda, lived with her husband Mohammed ten years after the commencement of his mission, and died (R) three years before the Hejra <sup>1</sup>.

Mohammed made two journies into Syria.

It may not be improper here to observe, that the generality of the Arab historians, both c
Christian and Mohammedan, are clearly of opinion, that Mohammed made two journies into Syria, in conformity to what has been above advanced; tho' this seems not to be acknowledged, but rather denied by Erpenius. He was led into this error by the silence of Elmacin, who has not taken the least notice of either of those journies. Amongst others, who have asserted the reality of them, may be ranked Abmed Ebn Edris, Abu Nazar, and Al Becr; who have been followed herein both by Hottinger and Marracci. The first time Mohammed and Abu Tāleb entered Syria, they were attended by Abu Becr and Belāl, to whom, or Abu Tāleb, Bokeira delivered the above-mentioned predictions; advising all of them, at the same time, to retire as soon as possible, and, by all means, to avoid the Jews, whom he called the people of the Book. The second time he visited the merchants of Bosra, or Bosra, he had also an interview with Bokeira; and was according to an author of credit, then instructed by him in the principles of the CHRISTIAN FAITH: so that, upon his return to Mecca, he d could not forbear communicating to the Koreish the sentiments he had received; and, from this period, he seems to have meditated a reformation among the Arabs: which if we admit, it cannot seem so improbable, as Mr. Sale would insinuate, that this Nestorian monk, with whom Mohammed had some conference in his younger years, should assist him in the contrivance and composition of his Korān. Nor is it necessary, as that learned author supposes, that Bokeira should quit his monastery, and go with the Moslem prophet into Arabia, in order to enable him the more effectually to accomplish such a design; as he might either have assisted him in the formation of his plan, as well as the execution of it, when they conferred together at Bosra, or have afterwards, at various times, supplied him with materials for that purpose. For it can scarce be doubted, but that there was an easy canal of intelligence between Arabia, and particularly Mecca, as well as Medina, and Syria Damascena, where e Bokeira resided, by means of the caravans of merchants, which were continually passing and repassing between those countries. Nor is there any weight in the objection offered by Mr. Sale to the opinion generally received amongst Christians concerning the true authors of the Korān; to wit, that Bokeira's acquaintance with Mohammed at Bosra, was too early to favour the surmise of his assisting him in the Korān; which was composed long after. For the plan of the Korān might have been formed, and materials for the composition of it

<sup>1</sup> ISM. ABULFED. de vit. Mohammed. c. v. p. 11—13. AHMED EBN YUSEF, in hist. sect. i. cap. 40. AL JAN-
NABI, AL KODAI, &c. ABU'L-FARAI. ubi sup. Vid. etiam THEOPHAN. chronograph. p. 277, 278. Parisiis, 1655.
GEORG. CEDREN. historiar. compend. p. 421, 422. Par. 1647. LUDOVICUM MARRACCIIUM, in vit. Moham. c. i.
p. 15. EBN HAMDUN. apud Pocockium, in not. ad spec. hist. Arab. p. 171. ut & ipse Pocock. ibid.

(R) The Arab writers differ in the accounts they have transmitted down to us of Khadījah's age, when she departed this life at Mecca. Some of them, according to Marracci, believe that she died in the forty-ninth, or fiftieth, year of her age: which is repugnant to the faith of history; for it appears from Abulfeda, and all the other best Moslem historians, that when Khadījah was married to Mohammed, she was forty years of age; and that she lived with him twenty-four years. From whence it will follow, that at her death, she was sixty-four years old. And this is expressly asserted by Abu Horeira; who, at the same time, informs us, that she was buried at a place called Al Mo'alla (17).

(17) Abulfed. Abu Horeira, &c. Vide etiam Marrac. vit. Mohammed. c. i. p. 15. Gagn. ubi supra, p. 12, 13. <sup>1</sup>

a sent Mohammed, long before it was actually composed, as they undoubtedly were; so that no inference, to the prejudice of what is here advanced, can be drawn from the contrary supposition. Besides, this is in effect owned by Mr. Sale himself, when he declares, that Mohammed might, from the discourse of the Nestorian monk, gain some knowledge of Christianity, and of the Scriptures, which might be of use to him in the composition of the Korân. But the truth is, that learned man entertained such favourable sentiments of the Mohammedan writers, and was so extremely prejudiced against those who professed the Christian religion, that he could scarce prevail upon himself to believe the latter ever in the right, or the former ever in the wrong <sup>u</sup>.

b KHADIJAH having raised her husband Mohammed to an equality with the richest in Mecca, Mohammed he was enabled, by so advantageous a match, to live at his ease for the next fifteen years; <sup>followed the</sup> tho' it is probable he still followed the occupation of a merchant. For his countrymen, the <sup>occupation of</sup> tribe of Koreish, were much addicted to commerce, as the descendants of Ismael, whom <sup>a merchant,</sup> they imitated herein, had been, in almost the earliest ages. They, like those ancient Arabs, <sup>after he married Khadijah.</sup> from whom, indeed, they were descended, carried on a trade with the Syrians, Persians, and Egyptians, furnishing those nations with such commodities, which they carried on the backs of camels, as came to them from India, Ethiopia, and other southern parts. To this employment they were chiefly prompted by the sterility of the soil about Mecca, which scarce produced any fruits but what were common in the deserts, and the commodious port of Jodda, on the Red Sea, which, for such a branch of trade, had a most convenient situation. Nor are we to be surprised, that the city of Mecca should be obliged to have recourse to traffick, for the subsistence of its inhabitants, since it is seated in a stony and barren valley, c surrounded on all sides with mountains. Having, therefore, no corn or grain of their own growth, the citizens were, from the remotest times, obliged to fetch it from other places, and particularly from Syria and Egypt. For tho' Arabia, especially that part called formerly Arabia Felix, and now Yaman, was once very celebrated amongst the ancients for the happiness of its climate, its fertility, and riches; yet the soil of Hejâz, in which province both Mecca and Medina stand, as well as that of Najd, Tebâma, and Yemâma, is much more barren. Their territories are almost intirely covered with dry sands, or rise into rocks, as we learn from the oriental geographers, and the relations of modern travellers. Hence 'tis no wonder that the Koreish should be forced to apply themselves to merchandize, for their support; and that even the wealthiest of them should scarce have any other estate than their stocks, which consisted chiefly in cattle, wherewith they carried on a most lucrative trade d with several of the neighbouring nations. Whatever figure, therefore, Mohammed might make at Mecca, this could by no means be diminished or eclipsed by his attention to such an employment <sup>w</sup>.

BUT however our pretended prophet might have been employed, during the aforesaid Mohammed interval, he probably never lost sight of his grand design; tho' no proper opportunity, till <sup>formed a de-</sup> after the expiration of this term, did offer itself, of carrying it into execution. The dispo- <sup>sign to intro-</sup> sition of the Arabs would not permit him sooner to effectuate the scheme he had formed of <sup>duce a new re-</sup> establishing a new religion; or, as he expressed it, of replanting the only true and ancient <sup>ligion amongst</sup> one, professed by Adam, Noah, Abraham, Moses, Jesus, and all the prophets. This he pro- <sup>the Arabs;</sup> posed to do, by destroying the gross idolatry, into which the generality of his countrymen had fallen, and weeding out the corruptions and superstitions which the latter Jews and e Christians had, as he pretended, introduced into their religion, and reducing it to its original purity, which consisted chiefly, according to him, in the worship of the one only God. From whence it appears, that Mohammed, like his more absurd followers, the modern deists, and Socinians, under the pretence of asserting the unity of the Divine Nature, exploded the doctrine of the Trinity, and all the other mysteries of the Christian religion <sup>x</sup>.

It can scarce be doubted, but that, by the course of trade, which he carried on in <sup>and such an</sup> Egypt, Palestine, and Syria, he became acquainted with the tenets of the Jews, as well as <sup>one as might</sup> those of the different sects, into which the Christians of the East were then miserably <sup>tempt all na-</sup> divided; the effects of which clearly discover themselves in the Korân. Observing also with <sup>tions to become</sup> what an implacable fury the Jews, and all these several sects of Christians, persecuted one <sup>profelytes to it.</sup> another, he from thence concluded, that the most effectual way for him to aggrandize him- f self, would be, to introduce a new religion, formed upon such a plan, that the most abandoned part of the Jews, as well as Christians of all denominations, and even pagans themselves, limin. disc. p. 38, 39.

<sup>u</sup> ABU'LFED. ubi sup. ABU'L HASAN ALI AL MASUD. AHMED EBN YUSEF. sect. i. c. 39. ABU NAZAR, AL BECK, GREG. AB'UL-FARAJ. ubi sup. &c. Vide etiam HOTTINGER. hist. Orient. p. 207, & seq. LUDOVIC. MARRAC. prodrom. par. prim. p. 42. & seq. PRID. life of Mahomet, p. 35, &c. GAGN. ubi supra, p. 10, 11. SALE'S translation of the Korân, p. 223, 224. &c. in not.

<sup>w</sup> ABU'LFED. & ABU'L-FARAJ, ubi sup. SHARIF AL EDRISI, & SIONIT. in append. ad eund. Pocock. not. in. spec. hist. Arab. p. 127. GOLII not. ad Alfraganum, p. 98. & alibi. LA ROQUE voyage de l'Arab. heur. p. 121. 123. 153. & alibi. SALE'S prelim. discours. p. 2, 3, & alibi. Univers. Hist. vol. xviii. p. 356—367. Lond. 1748.

<sup>x</sup> AL. KOR. MOHAMMED. f. ii. SALE'S pre-

might be thereby tempted to become profelytes to it. And accordingly we find, that Islamism is intirely adapted to the taste of a sensualist; and that the belief of the unity of God, as also of the apostleship of Mohammed, the heterodox notions borrowed from various heretical sects, who yet stiled themselves Christians, together with some injunctions pressing an observance of the moral duties therein specified, besides the retention of certain Jewish and heathenish rites, make up the whole of that religion *.

Ambition and sensuality the chief motives of his undertaking.

HENCE it pretty plainly appears, that Mohammed's grand enterprize, which was conducted with great craft and success, ought to be considered not so much the effect of enthusiasm, as of a design to raise himself to the supreme government of his country, and to commence the legislator of the Arabs. For it is sufficiently apparent, from the substance of the Korân itself, and even from the very nature of Mohammedism, as well as the methods made use of by this impostor, and his followers, for the propagation of their religion, that ambition, and the desire of satisfying his sensuality, were the chief motives of his undertaking. Mr. Sale seems willing to think, “that his first views were perhaps not so intersted;” and “that the unity of God was what he chiefly attended to, all his other doctrines and institutions being rather accidental, and UNAVOIDABLE, than premeditated and designed.” The last of which assertions must be considered either as groundless, or as an absolute condemnation of the measures the impostor pursued. For, if all his other doctrines and institutions were in themselves unavoidable, or necessary consequences of the first article of faith he proposed to his followers, then they must be inseparably connected with what this author calls his grand point, to wit, the unity of God, and necessarily flow from it †. But as we cannot think so learned and judicious an author capable of advancing so wild and shocking a position as this; it seems more natural to suppose, that he intended to assert those doctrines and institutions to have been UNAVOIDABLE, with respect to the Arabs; or, in other words, that no other doctrines and institutions could be so well adapted to the sensual taste of the Arabs, at that time, as those here hinted at. Now, if this be admitted, it will evidently follow, that Mohammed had a greater regard to the genius and disposition of the Arabs, in the framing of his system of religion, than to truth; which is the very thing of which he is accused by the Christian writers. If he consulted only the taste of the Arabs, and rejected truth in his doctrines and institutions, it is plain he had not their eternal interest at heart, but was acted by a principle of ambition, and only wanted to make them subservient to the forwarding his ambitious views. And, indeed, this is sufficiently intimated by Mr. Sale himself, when he allows, “that it is scarce to be doubted, but that Mohammed had a violent desire of being reckoned an extraordinary person; which he could attain to by no means more effectually, than by pretending to be a messenger sent from God, to inform mankind of his will.”—The count de Boulainvilliers also, a zealous advocate for Mohammed, scruples not to admit, that his religion was calculated to please, and sympathize with, the constitutional bent of the Arabs: nor does he discover the least disapprobation of that legislator's decisions, or ever so much as hint at their inexpediency, on this account. So that both Mr. Sale and count Boulainvilliers, in effect, vindicate, however inconsistent they may be with themselves, by so doing, the character of that impostor, handed down to us by the Christian writers; tho' at the same time, the former of those gentlemen represents this as set in the most infamous light ‡.

He adapted his doctrines and institutions to the corrupt disposition of the Arabs.

Mr. Sale endeavours to palliate some of the worst of Mohammed's institutions.

NAY, it is farther acknowledged by Mr. Sale, that “Mohammed was, as the Arabs are by complexion, a great lover of women; that we are assured of this by his own confession; and that he is even constantly upbraided with it by the controversial writers, who fail not to urge the number of women with whom he had to do, as a demonstrative argument of his sensuality; which they think sufficiently proves him to have been a wicked man, and consequently an impostor.” After such an ample concession as this, is it not strange that this author should attempt to palliate his dissolute proceedings, if not directly to defend one of the most enormous of them. And yet this seems to be done by him, when he immediately subjoins—“But it must be considered, that polygamy, tho it be forbidden by the Christian religion, was, in Mohammed's time, frequently practised in Arabia, and other parts of the east, and was not accounted an immorality; nor was a man the worse esteemed on that account: for which reason, Mohammed permitted the plurality of wives, with certain limitations among his own followers; who argue for the lawfulness of it from several reasons, and particularly from the examples of persons allowed on all hands to have been good men; some of whom have been honoured with the divine correspondence. The several laws relating to marriages and divorces, and the peculiar privileges granted to Mohammed in his Korân, were almost all taken by him from the Jewish decisions, as will appear hereafter; and

* Al Kor. MOHAMMED. pass. PRIDEAUX's life of Mahomet, p. 14, 15. Lond. 1718. SALE's prelim. disc. and notes on the Kor. pass. Vide etiam LUDOVIC. MARRACCI refut. Alcor. pass. Patavii, 1698. MOHAMMED. & MARRACC. refut. ejusdem, pass. SALE's prelim. discours. p. 39. † Al Kor. 40. Monsi. le Comte de BOULAINVIL. vie de Mahom. pass. ‡ SALE, ubi sup. p.

“therefore

- a “ therefore he might think those institutions the more just and reasonable, as he found “ them practised or approved by the professors of a religion, which was confessedly of “ divine original.” In answer to all which fine reflections, it will be sufficient to observe, that however polygamy may have been tolerated, or rather connived at, as is intimated by our blessed Saviour, by the Jewish law, it was absolutely prohibited by the more perfect decisions of the Gospel, which brought life and immortality to light; that however polygamy might have prevailed in Arabia, when Mohammed assumed the character of a prophet and reformer there, many of the Arabs looked upon a plurality of wives as utterly unlawful; and, lastly, that Mohammed himself could not have been ignorant, that the Jewish dispensation was abrogated by the Christian; since he had been instructed b in the principles of the Christian faith by Sergius, or Boheira, the Nestorian monk, as has been above remarked, and as is allowed by even some of the Moslem writers themselves.
 Our readers, therefore, will not be surprised, that we should take the liberty to express our disapprobation of what is here advanced by Mr. Sale (S), notwithstanding his uncommon skill in the Arabic tongue, and most extensive reading; as it seems to countenance a notion inconsistent with the purity of that holy religion we profess, and think ourselves obliged on all occasions to defend<sup>a</sup>.

As Islamism, therefore, seems to have been calculated to sooth and indulge mens vicious How Islamism appetites in general, and the sensual depraved taste of the pagan Arabs in particular, 'tis no came to make wonder that, in so short a time, it should have made such an amazing progress. Men are so rapid a pro- c naturally prone to believe what they wish may be true, how absurd soever in itself this gress in so short may be. And considering the weakness of the human intellect, especially in the generality of mankind, and how incapable they for the most part are of listening to the dictates of reason and truth, or of meditating upon their last and most permanent stage of being with any attention, it can by no means appear strange, that, by mere dint of delusion, they should so frequently bring themselves to such a belief. To which we may add, that we have a spiritual enemy, who is perpetually endeavouring to impose upon us; to confound our ideas; to divert us from our pursuit after truth, especially that which will be of the utmost importance to us; and, in fine, to prevent us, by all possible methods, from attaining that supreme felicity, for which we were originally designed<sup>b</sup>.

- d But, notwithstanding the wickedness and absurdity of some of his tenets, several cir- Some of the cumstances concurred to render Mohammed powerful, and to forward the propagation of Arabs infected his imposture. The Koreish, his countrymen, were infected with Zendicism; an error sup- with Zendi- posed to have very near affinity with that of the Sadducees, among the Jews, who denied cism.
 the existence of angels and spirits. An error this, which if pursued through all its consequences, must terminate in absolute infidelity, or atheism itself; so that Mr. Sale pays the deists no great compliment, when he takes them not to be very different from this sect.
 Since therefore these Arabs rejected an over-ruling Providence, the resurrection, and a future state, they had, in reality, no religion at all; and therefore, as the learned Dr.
Prideaux rightly observes, were prepared to receive any impressions of God, and his e worship, that Mohammed should think fit to communicate to them. Mr. Sale, however, contents himself with describing them, “ as worshipping one God, being free from “ idolatry, and embracing none of the other religions of the country;” which certainly must be considered as too favourable a description of the impious opinions they entertained<sup>c</sup>.

THE dissensions also in the western church, as well as the gross corruptions and super- Great dissin- stitions that so deformed the eastern, greatly contributed to the establishment and exten- sions and cor- sion of Mohammedism. At the time of Mohammed's appearance, the contests amongst ruptions in the Christians, especially in the western church, ran so high, that, in consequence of them, Christian several violences, and even frequent murders, were committed. The eastern church like- church.
 wise, after the Nicene council, was engaged in perpetual controversies, and torn to pieces f by the disputes of the Arrians, Sabellians, Nestorians, Eutychians, &c. on which a most fatal corruption of doctrine and morals, in the princes and clergy, ensued; which was necessarily followed by an almost general depravity of the people. But we choose to

<sup>a</sup> SALE, ubi supra, 40, 41. MAT. C. xix. v. 4—9. GREG. ABU'L-FARAJ, p. 149. AL MOSTRATAF, AL JANNABI apud POCK. not. in spec. hist. Arab. p. 63. ut & ipse POCK. ibid. & p. 137. ABU'L HASAN ALI MASUD, &c. pass. EBN KHALECAN, in vit. Abu'l Ol. poet. ABU'LFED. AL JANNABI, AL FIRAUZARADI, SAFIODDIN. AL SHAHRESTANI, &c. <sup>b</sup> AL KOR. MOHAMMED. pass. <sup>c</sup> AL MOSTRATAF, POCK. not. in spec. hist. Arab. p. 136. AL KOR. MOHAM. f. vi. & alibi. HADR. RELAND. de relig. Moham- med. p. 270. MILIUS de Mohammedismo ante Moham. p. 311. SALE's preliminary discourse, p. 24.

(S) It may not be improper to remark here, that not a single passage is to be met with in that part of the Universal History written by Mr. Sale, which can give the least offence to any of our Christian readers; tho'

we must not take upon us to assert the same thing of his Preliminary Discourse, and some of his notes upon the Koran.

draw a veil over so melancholy a subject; tho' a deist would expatiate upon it with great a pleasure and delight <sup>d</sup>.

The Roman and Persian monarchies both now in a declining condition.

If the distracted state of religion favoured the designs of Mohammed on the one side, the weakness of the Roman and Persian monarchies might flatter him with no less hopes of succeeding in them, on the other. Had those once formidable empires, either of which in their vigour must have crushed Mohammedism in its birth, been not most strangely reduced, neither Mohammed, nor any of his followers, would have dared to have made an attempt upon the least province of either of them. But the Arabs having met with uncommon success in their enterprizes against those powers, they failed not to attribute it to their new religion, and the great interest the author of it had at the court of heaven. This inspired them with a resolution to propagate it by the most violent and unjustifiable b means, even by fire and sword, as, indeed, by their pretended prophet they had been strictly enjoined to do; which happy method of conversion has been most religiously observed, and made use of, by all their followers and descendents, even to this day <sup>e</sup>.

What made the Roman empire extremely weak at this time.

THE Roman empire declined apace after Constantine, whose successors, for the generality, bore but a very indifferent character. By Mohammed's time, the western half of it was over-run by the Goths; and the eastern so reduced by the Huns on the one side, and the Persians on the other, that it was not in a capacity of stemming the violence of a powerful invasion. The emperor Maurice paid tribute to the Khagân, or king of the Huns, who was a very potent prince; and, after Phocas usurped the throne, such lamentable havock was made among the soldiers, that, within the space of seven years, all the veterans were in c a manner destroyed, and scarce any regular troops left for the defence of the empire. And tho' Heraclius, who was a prince of admirable courage and conduct, restored the discipline of the army, and had great success against the Persians; yet still the very vitals of the empire seemed to have received a mortal wound. So that no time could have been more favourable to the designs of Mohammed, than that wherein he found means to impose his new religion, or rather his infamous imposture, upon the Arabs. Nor can it well be doubted, but that he was raised up by GOD HIMSELF to be a scourge to the Christian church, for having been divided, and subdivided, into endless schisms and contentions, about the abstrusest niceties, that had been drawn into controversy, tho' d of little moment to that which ought to be esteemed the chief end of religion, and destroyed, in a great measure, those Christian virtues which the Gospel was given to promote. In fine, the terrible destruction of the eastern churches, once so glorious and flourishing, by the sudden spreading of Mohammedism, was undoubtedly intended by providence as a punishment to the members of them, for not living up to the precepts of that most holy religion which they had received <sup>f</sup>.

The Persians almost ruined by their intestine broils and dissensions.

THE Persians had also been in a declining condition, for some time, before Mohammed, occasioned chiefly by their intestine broils and dissensions; a great part of which arose from the devilish doctrines of Manes and Mazdak. The opinions of the former are very well known; and those of the latter, who lived in the reign of Khosrû Kobâd, have been always expatiated upon in our ancient history of the Arabs and Persians. These sects had e certainly proved the immediate ruin of the Persian empire, had not Khosrû Anushirwân, or Nushirwân, as he is called by Mirkbond and Khondemir, the Persian historians, as soon as he succeeded his father Khosrû Kobâd, put Mazdak to death, with all his followers, and the Manicheans also, restoring the ancient Magian religion. However, Anushirwân, as the Arabs named him, tho' he was an excellent prince, and deservedly surnamed The Just, could not put the affairs of Persia in a flourishing condition. He joined the provinces of Cablestân and Zablestân to his hereditary dominions, and formed, by the conquests he had made, a most puissant empire, that extended from the city and territory of Fergâna to the borders of Arabia and Egypt, and from the maritime cities of Syria to the river Indus; notwithstanding which, the interior part of his government was not f settled upon a lasting foundation. Ebn Shohnah pretends, that Anushirwân obliged the Greek emperor himself to pay him homage, and to become a tributary unto him; but this must be a mistake. It has been before observed, that, in the reign of this prince, Mohammed was born <sup>g</sup>.

<sup>d</sup> PRIDEAUX's preface to the life of Mahomet, p. v—ix. Lond. 1718. SALE's prelim. discours. sect. ii. p. 33—35. Vide etiam SIMON, hist. crit. de la creance, &c. des nations du Levant. AMMIAN. MARCELLIN. lib. 21. 27, &c. EUSEB. hist. eccles. lib. viii. c. 1. SOZ. lib. i. c. 14, &c. HILAR. & SULPIC. SEVER. in hist. sacr. p. 112, &c. OCKLEY's hist. of the Sarac. vol. i. p. 239, &c. <sup>e</sup> SALE, ubi supra, p. 35, 36. AL KOR. MOHAMMED, &c. <sup>f</sup> PRID. & SALE, ubi sup. OCKLEY's history of the Saracens, vol. i. p. 19, &c. <sup>g</sup> Univ. Hist. vol. xviii. p. 432, 433. Lond. 1748. et vol. xi. p. 177. Vide etiam Poc. not. in spec. hist. Arab. p. 70. SALE, ubi supra, p. 37. MEGHDI in vit. Nushirwân. MIRKBOND, sect. 34. KHANDEMIR, SHAHRESTAN. de relig. Orient. D'HERBEL. bibl. Orient. p. 568, &c. HYD. hist. relig. vet. Persar. &c. EBN SHOHNAH, ISM. ABU'LFED. de vit. Mohammed. p. 2, 3. Oxon. 1723. D'HERBEL, ubi supra, p. 680.—683, et alibi.

a AFTER the death of Khošrū Anuširwān, the last king of Persia, who deserved the crown, his son Khošrū Hormūz, or, as the Persians sometimes called him, Hormozd (from whence came the Hormizdas of the Greeks), ascended the throne. He behaved at first with great prudence and moderation, distributing justice to his subjects in the most impartial manner; which gained him both their love and esteem. But afterwards a most cruel disposition discovered itself in him, insomuch that, according to some historians, he caused to be put to death thirteen thousand of his grandees; which vastly alienated his subjects from him. This encouraged the Khagān to invade his dominions with an army of 300,000 men: but his son, Shabeb Shāh, having passed the Gihon, at the head of those troops, was attacked upon his march, and intirely defeated, by a body of 12,000 Persians.

b only, under the command of Babarām Tchubīn, the best general then in Persia. However, Hormūz, having lost the love of his subjects, by his excessive cruelty, had his eyes put out by his wife's brothers, and was obliged to resign the crown to his son Khošrū Parvīz, who, at the instigation of Babarām, had rebelled against him, and was afterwards strangled. Parvīz was soon obliged to quit the throne to Babarām; but, obtaining succours of the Greek emperor Mauritius, he recovered the crown; yet, towards the latter end of a long reign, he grew so tyrannical and hateful to his subjects, that they held private correspondence with the Arabs; insomuch that he was at length deposed, imprisoned, and slain by his son Shirīyeh. He is said to have made himself master of a great part of Arabia, Syria, Egypt, Nubia, and some of the islands of the Mediterranean; nay, to have

c reduced Chalcedon, and penetrated almost to Constantinople itself. And yet he left his kingdom in a very declining condition <sup>h</sup>.

SHIRUYEH, called by the Greek writers Siroes, succeeded his father Khošrū Parvīz, or Apervīz, as the Persian historians sometimes call him, whom he caused to be put to death. He had a very short and unhappy reign. The kingdom of Persia being afflicted with a famine and pestilence at once, and his subjects generally disaffected to him, he abandoned himself to melancholy. This brought upon him a fever, which, with the plague, soon put a period to his days. Nor did his successor Ardshīr long enjoy the high dignity to which he was advanced; Scheheriah having cut him off, and all the nobility who were strictly attached to him, almost immediately after his accession. This put the usurper in d possession of the crown, which yet, according to Mirkbond, he did not wear above fifty days. Turan Docht, one of the princesses of the blood, who next ascended the throne, disappointed the Arabs in a vigorous effort they made to conquer Persia; but is supposed to have died a martyr to that love which he had shewn for the people; and, on her decease, the public affairs fell into the greatest confusion. Giban Shedad, who came next, was deposed in few days. Azurmi Docht, the youngest daughter of Khošrū Parvīz, being seated on the throne, after a short reign, was assassinated by one of her subjects. Nor did her nephew and successor Ferokhdaz, who was poisoned by one of his slaves, long survive her. Jezdegerd, or Yezdegerd, the last king, was overthrown in a great battle by the Khalīf Omar, who annexed the most considerable part of the Persian territories to his

e own dominions. In fine, the domestic broils of the Persians effectually brought ruin upon them; for tho', as has been observed, they did, rather by the weakness of the Greeks than their own force, ravage Syria, and sack Jerusalem and Damascus, under Khošrū Parvīz, and, while the Arabs were divided and independent, had some power in the province of Yaman, where they set up the four last kings before Mohammed; yet, when attacked by the Greeks under Heraclius, they not only lost their new conquests, but part of their own dominions; and no sooner were the Arabs united by Mohammedism, than they beat them in every battle, and, in a few years, totally subdued them <sup>i</sup>.

As the Greeks and Persians were in a weak and declining situation, so the Arabs were <sup>The Arabs</sup> strong and flourishing. Their country had been peopled at the expence of the <sup>now strong</sup> Grecian empire, whence the violent proceedings of the domineering sects forced many to seek <sup>and flourish-</sup> refuge in Arabia, where they, who could not enjoy tranquility and their conscience at home, found a secure retreat. The Arabs were not only a populous nation, but unacquainted with the luxury and delicacies of the Greeks and Persians, and inured to hardships of all sorts. They lived in a most parsimonious manner, seldom eating any flesh, drinking no wine, and sitting on the ground. Nor would the barren region they inhabited, and particular manner of life to which they were confined, permit them to taste those gratifications and amusements so common in politer parts of the world. Their a political government was also such as favoured the ambitious designs of Mohammed; for the division and independency of their tribes were so necessary to the first propagation of his religion, and the foundation of his power, that it would have been scarce possible for him to have effected either, had the Arabs been united in one society. But when they had embraced his religion, the consequent union of their tribes was no less necessary and conducive to their future conquests and grandeur. This is so obvious and apparent, that it cannot escape the notice of all our readers, who are capable of the least attention <sup>k</sup>.

<sup>h</sup> MIRKHOND, sect. 25. KHONDEMIR, ubi supra. LEBTARIKH, D'HERBEL. bibl. Orient. artic. Hormouz. SALE, ubi supra, p. 37. Univers. Hist. vol. xi. p. 185—193. Vide etiam MIRKHOND, sect. 36. D'HERBEL. bibl. Orient. art. Khošrū Parvīz, Schirin, &c. & Univers. Hist. vol. xi. p. 194.

<sup>i</sup> LEBTARIKH, KHONDEMIR, MIRKHOND, sect. 37, 38, 40, 43, 45, &c. SCHIKARD. Tarikh, p. 165, 169, 170, &c. GREG. ABU'L FARAJ. hist. dynast. dyn. ix. D'HERBEL. bibl. Orient. art. Schironich, Ardshīr Ben Schironich, Scheheriar, Touran Docht, &c. TEIXEIRA relaciones de los reyes de Persia, p. 195, &c. Univ. Hist. ubi supra, p. 196—206. SALE, ubi supra, p. 37, 38.

Which posture of affairs Mohammed was not unacquainted with. SUCH was the posture of public affairs in the eastern world, both as to its religious and political state, when Mohammed formed his design of subverting the Greek and Persian empires, and introducing a new system of religion amongst the Arabs. This, 'tis probable, b he was well enough acquainted with; having had sufficient opportunities of informing himself in all particulars relating to the genius and disposition of both the aforesaid nations, and even, in some respects, of the interior of their respective governments, during his travels as a merchant in his younger years. Nor can it be well doubted, but that the intelligence he then received, enabled him to form his plan, and to promise himself success in his first attempts; especially as he was a man of extraordinary parts and address, and knew how to make the best of every incident, at least if we will believe the Moslem writers, and his great admirers the count de Boulainvilliers and Mr. Sale <sup>l</sup>.

BUT to return to our history—Mohammed pretending, that his grand article of faith, viz. the unity of the Divine Nature, was violated by all the rest of the world; not only c by idolaters, but by Christians of all denominations, and the Jews also, who are accused in the Korân of taking Ezra for the son of God; he resolved to make an attempt to rescue the world from the ignorance and superstition that prevailed in it. But, before this could be effected, he rightly judged, that it would be necessary for him to convert his own household. Having therefore retired with his family, as he had done several times before, to a cave in mount (R) Hara, near Mecca, he there opened the secret of his (S) mission to his wife Khadijah; and acquainted her, that the angel Gabriel (T) had just before appeared to him, and told him, that he was appointed the apostle of God. He also repeated to her a passage, which he pretended had been revealed to him by the ministry of the angel, with those other circumstances of his first appearance which are related by the Mohammedan writers. d Our prophet was about forty years of age when he entered upon his office; for which he prepared himself by his usual residence in the cave abovementioned, in the month Ramadân. Here he continued till the night in which, as he pretended, the angel Gabriel was first sent to him. This night, which fell between the 23d and 24th of the month Ramadân, is called, in the Korân, the night of the Al Kadr (U) or the divine decree; because in

<sup>k</sup> BOULAINVILLIERS la vie de Mahom. pass. Sale, ubi supra, p. 38. Poc. not. in specim. hist. Arab. pass. Univers. Hist. ubi supra, b. iv. c. 21. <sup>l</sup> SALE, ubi supra, p. 38. BOULAINVIL. la vie de Mahom. pass.

(R) Hara, according to Abu'Isfeda, was about three miles distant from Mecca (17).

(S) The Arabs describe this mission in the following terms: "When the apostle of God was forty years of age, God sent him as an apostle to the swarthy people" (viz. the Arabs), "and the red" (viz. the Barbarians, or all other nations), "that, by his law, he might abolish all antecedent laws." The Arabs call themselves swarthy people, on account of their dark complexions; and the Romans, as well as several other nations in a northern direction from them, red, both because their faces approach nearer that colour than those of their countrymen, and because they believe them to be descended from Esau, or Edom; which last word denotes red. And this notion they seem to have borrowed from the Jews, who pretend that Edom was the great ancestor of the Romans (18).

(T) It appears from the Korân, and Jallalo'ddin, that Mohammed, and his more ancient followers, took the angel Gabriel to be the Holy Ghost. That he was a spirit of vast strength, as well as singular beauty, is intimated by Al Beidarwi; and, indeed, this is sufficiently implied by his name itself (גבריאל), which signifies the strength, or fortitude, of God. The Moslems believe, that he instructed Mohammed in all those points of faith and morality that their prophet required an assent to from them; which is, indeed, strongly insisted upon in several passages of the Korân (19).

(U) The word Al Kadr, according to Jallalo'ddin, signifies power, and honour, or dignity; or, as Al Zamakhshari will have it, the divine decree. The night here mentioned is so named, either from its excellence above all other nights in the year, or because, as the Mohammedans believe, the divine decrees for the ensuing year, with respect to life and death, and the other affairs of this world, are annually on this night fixed and settled, or taken from the preserved table by God's throne, and given to the angels to be executed. Hence those words of the Korân—"By the perspicuous book, verily we have sent down the same on a blessed night, wherein is distinctly set down the decree of every determined thing, as a command from us." Some, however, suppose, that these words refer only to that particular night on which the Korân, wherein are completely contained the divine determinations in respect to religion and morality, was sent down. On the night of Al Kadr, Mohammed received his first revelations: when the Korân, say the commentators, was sent down from the aforesaid table, intire and in one volume, to the lowest heaven, from whence Gabriel revealed it to

(17) Abu'Isfeda in geograph. (18) Gagn. not. ad Jos. Ben Gorion, c. 97. p. 453. ut et ipse Jos. Ben Gor. in cap. 2. Ebn Saïd Al Megreb. apud Ism. Abu'Isfeda. ut ipse Abu'Isfeda. in hist. general. cap. de nationib. quæ religion. Christian. profit. Vide etiam Cl. Gagn. not. ad Abu'Isfeda. vit. Mohammed. c. vii. p. 14. (19) Al Kor. Mohammed. f. ii. c. 87. f. lui. v. 5, &c. Jallalo'ddin, Al Beidarwi, Gagn. not. ad Abu'Isfeda. de vit. Mohammed. p. 15.

- a in it the Korân first descended intire from heaven; that book being afterwards vouchsafed the Moslems from the same place only in parts, and this during the space of twenty-three years. It is observed by Jallalo'ddin, that the angel Gabriel appeared at first, on this occasion, to Mohammed at a distance, and in his proper form; which was so glorious, that Mohammed fainted away at the first sight of him: upon which, he assumed a human shape, and drew nearer to the prophet. According to Abu'lfeda, Mohammed, immediately after his first interview with Gabriel, advanced to the middle of the mountain, where he heard a voice coming from heaven, and saying, O MOHAMMED, thou art the apostle of God, and I am GABRIEL. Immediately after which, the angel again discovered himself, and Mohammed fixed his eyes upon him, till he retired. Then, returning to Mecca, he communicated to
- b Khadijah a more particular account of this revelation, which she received with great joy; declaring herself quite charmed with such agreeable news, and swearing, by him in whose hands her soul was, that she was convinced he would be the prophet of the Arabian nation. Nay, being in a sort of extasy, she immediately imparted what she had heard to her cousin Waraka Ebn Nawfal, who, being a Christian, could write in the Hebrew character, and was tolerably well versed in the Scriptures both of the Old and New Testament. He very readily came into her opinion, concerning the certainty and reality of Mohammed's mission (W); swearing by him in whose hands was the soul of Waraka, that what she said was true; and that MOHAMMED was the great prophet foretold in the law by MOSES the son of AMRAN. This was soon after told by her to Mohammed; who thereupon repaired to the Caaba, walked seven
- c times round that sacred place, and, after he had performed his devotions there, retired to his own house. 'Tis pretended by the Moslem writers, that when Gabriel first appeared to Mohammed, he said to him, Read; and that when the prophet answered he could not read, being perfectly illiterate, he replied, that God, who had inspired man with the art of writing, would graciously remedy that defect in him. And with this perfectly correspond those words of the Korân, "Read, in the name of thy LORD, who hath created all things; who hath created man of congealed blood. Read, by thy most beneficent LORD, who taught the use of the pen; who teacheth man that which he knoweth not." From what has been already observed, it may be inferred, that Mohammed had in view the beginning of St. Luke's Gospel, when he framed the narrative of his first pretended revelation. As he began to
- d set up for a reformer, at the age above-mentioned, the fortieth year of his age is usually called the year of his mission. Many more particulars, relative to this remarkable event, we are supplied with by Ahmed Ebn Yusef, Al Jannabi, and others; which favour so strongly of the Arab, or rather Moslem, genius, that our curious readers will not expect of us an insertion of them in this place <sup>m</sup>.

THIS first step meeting with the approbation of so considerable a person as Waraka Ebn Mohammed's Nawfal Ebn Asad Ebn Abd'al Uzza Ebn Kosa, Khadijah's uncle, Mohammed entertained <sup>first steps justly</sup> great hopes of succeeding in the accomplishment of his design. Encouraged, therefore, <sup>etc. / sub.</sup> by so good a beginning, he resolved to proceed, and try, for some time, what he could do by private persuasion; not daring to hazard the whole affair, by exposing it too suddenly to the public. He soon made profelytes of those under his own roof, viz. his wife Khadijah, who was indisputably the first of those converts, his servant Zeid Ebn Hâretha (to

<sup>m</sup> AL KOR. MOHAMMED. f. ii. & alibi. SALE, ubi supra, p. 39, 42, &c. GREG. ABU'L-FARAJ. ubi supra, p. 162. ISM. ABU'LFED. de vit. Mohammed. p. 14—17. AL TABAR. apud Elmacin. ut & ipse ELMACIN. ibid. AL KODAI in cap. de numer. prophetar. & legator. JALLALO'DDIN, AL ZAMAKHSHARI, &c. Vide etiam AL KOR. MOHAM. f. iii. v. 66. f. xcvi, xcvi, & alibi pass. AL BOKHARI, AHMED BEN YUSEF hist. par. i. c. 9. AL JANNAB. GAGN. not. ad Abu'lfed. ubi sup. p. 14—17. & la vie de Mahom. tom. prem. p. 104—109. Poc. not. in spec. hist. Arab. p. 157. AL BEIDAWI, LUK. c. i. v. 26. & LUDOVIC. MARRACC. refut. Alcoran. p. 811. Patavii, 1698.

Mohammed by parcels, as occasion required; and this, according to Al Zamakhshari, during the space of twenty-three years only. The Moslem doctors are not agreed where to fix the night of Al Kadr: the greater part are of opinion, that it is one of the ten last nights of Ramadan, and, as is commonly believed, the seventh of those nights, reckoning backwards; by which means it will fall between the 23d and 24th days of that month. This is the opinion of Al Kodai, and the most intelligent of the above-mentioned doctors. The 97th surat, or chapter, of the Korân, is intituled Al Kadr; which, as it will throw some light upon what has been observed, we shall beg leave to insert here. "Verily we sent " down the Korân in the night of Al Kadr. And what " shall make thee understand how excellent the night of " Al Kadr is? The night of Al Kadr is better than a " thousand months. Therein do the angels descend, " and the spirit Gabriel also, by the permission of their " Lord, with his decrees concerning every matter. It " is peace until the rising of the morn (20).

(W) Mohammed's mission, according to the Moslems, was predicted by Mosis on mount Sinai, as also by all the prophets, whose spirits were assembled with him there. This notion, as they pretend, is countenanced by the Korân; tho' it must be owned too absurd to merit the attention of any of our sober intelligent readers (21).

(20) Jallalo'ddin, Al Zamakhshari. Al Shabli, Al Kodai, Al Beidawi, Al Kor. Mohamm. f. xlv, xcvi, &c. Ludovic. Marrac. not. ad Alcoran. f. xlv, xcvi, &c. Vide etiam Gagn. not. ad Abu'lfed. de vit. Mohammed. p. 14, 15. Sale's translat. and notes on the Kor. p. 401, 497, &c. Gagn. la vie de Mahom. tom. prem. p. 105. (21) Al Kor. Mohammed. f. iii. v. 80. Vide etiam Gagn. not. ad Abu'lfed. ubi supra, p. 15.

whom he gave his freedom on that occasion, which afterwards became a rule to his followers) and his cousin and pupil Ali, the son of Abu Táleb, tho' then not above nine or ten years of age, according to the greatest part of the Moslem doctors. But this last, making no account of the other two, used to stile himself the first of believers. The next person Mohammed applied to with success, was Abd'allah Ebn Abu Kohâfa, surnamed Abu Becr, and Al Seddik, or the faithful witness, a man of very considerable authority among the Koreish; and one whose interest he well knew would be of great service to him. Nor was he at all disappointed in his views; for Abu Becr, being gained over, prevailed on Othmân Ebn Affân, Abd'alrahmân Ebn Awf, Saad Ebn Abi Wakkas, Al Zobeir Ebn Al Awâm, and Telha Ebn Obeid'allah, all principal men in Mecca, to follow his example. Afterwards Abu Obeida, whose name was Amer Ebn Abd'allah Ebn Al Gjerrah, Obeida Ebn Al Hâreth, Said Ebn Zeid Ebn Amru Ebn Nofail Ebn Abd'al Uzza, Abd'allah Ebn Masûd, and Amer Ebn Yâser, at the solicitation of the preceding converts, embraced Islamism, and openly declared their intention to support Mohammed; so that the surprising success he now met with, was, in a great measure, if not solely, owing to the influence of Abu Becr, who, after the death of the prophet, was saluted Khalîfa, or Khalîf, that is, successor, or vicegerent, in exclusion of Ali, to whom that title, and the power annexed to it, of right belonged. We are informed by Al Kodai, that Abu Becr's name, in the time of ignorance, that is, before the introduction of Islamism, was Abd'al Caaba, or the servant of the Caaba; and that afterwards he was named by the prophet Abd'allah, or the servant of God. He was the son of Abu Kohâfa, or Othmân Ebn Amer, who was of the posterity of Tâim Ebn Morra. He was surnamed Abu Becr, that is, the father of the girl, or the virgin, to wit, Ayesha, who was a girl, or virgin, when Mohammed married her; all his other wives having had husbands before they were admitted to his bed. We must not omit observing, that Abd'alrahmân Ebn Awf, one of those Arabs that immediately followed Abu Becr, was of a very generous disposition; having, according to Al Beidawi, given no less than 4,000 dirhems, which was one half of what he had, towards defraying the charge of the expedition to Tabûc. But this will be more fully related in its proper place<sup>a</sup>.

He makes his mission no longer a secret. ABU BECR having thus, by his example and authority, gained Mohammed a considerable number of proselytes, the prophet gave him the surname of Al Seddik, which imports the faithful witness. He did not only vouch for his veracity, in every thing he related concerning the revelation vouchsafed him in the night of Al Kadr, and his nocturnal journey afterwards to heaven, but likewise greatly exerted himself to increase the number of his followers. Mohammed likewise complimented him with the appellation of Atik, or preserved, that is, one saved from hell-fire; intimating thereby, that this zealous Moslem was most certainly one of the elect. For the space of three years, during which term he pretended to have received frequent revelations, the apostle only instructed his votaries in private; being under some apprehensions of the resentment of the Koreish, the bulk of which tribe did by no means at first favour his undertaking. However, Abu Becr, persisting in his fidelity to him, and having, as he supposed, formed a sufficient party to support him, Mohammed made his mission no longer a secret; but, at the end of the above-mentioned period, gave out that God had commanded him to admonish his near relations; and, in order to do this with more convenience, and a better prospect of success, he directed Ali, whom he had from his infancy taken under his protection, as Al Abbâs had Jaafar, another of Abu Táleb's sons, to prepare an entertainment, and invite thereto the sons and descendents of Abd'al Motalleb, intending then to open his mind unto them. This was done, and about forty of them came; amongst whom were Hamza and Al Abbâs: but Abu Labeb, one of Mohammed's uncles, making the company break up before the prophet had an opportunity of speaking, he could not forbear expressing his uneasiness on that account to Ali, who thereupon found himself obliged to give them a second invitation the next day; and when they were come, Mohammed made them the following speech:—"I know no man in the whole peninsula of the Arabs, who can propose to his relations any thing more excellent than what I now do to you: I offer you the felicity both of this world and of that which is to come. God Almighty hath commanded me to call you unto him; who therefore among you will be my Wazir, or assistant herein, and become my brother, and my vicegerent?" All of them hesitated, and declining the matter, Ali at length rose up, and declared that he would assist him; and vehemently threatened those who should oppose him: "I," said he, "O prophet of God, will be thy (X) Wazir; I myself will beat out the teeth, pull out the eyes, a “ eyes, rip open the bellies, and cut off the legs, of all who shall dare to oppose thee.” Mohammed, upon this, embraced Ali with great demonstrations of affection, and desired all who were present to hearken to, and obey him, as his deputy. “ This,” said he, “ is my brother, my deputy, and my successor, or vicar; therefore shew yourselves submissive and obedient to him.” At which the whole company broke out into a great laughter, telling Abu Tâleb, that he must now pay obedience and submission to his own son °.

<sup>a</sup> ISM. ABU'LFED. vit. Mohammed. c. viii. p. 17, 18. Aut. lib. AL SEIRAT. GAGN. not. ad Abu'lfed. ubi supra, & la vie de Mahom. c. viii. p. 109—112. AL KODAI, AL BEIDAWI, ELMACIN. l. i. c. i. SALE's translation of the Korân, p. 159. SIONIT. in append. ad geogr. Nubien. c. 8.

(X) The word Wazir, or Viser, used here, properly denotes a porter, or carrier of burdens; but, in a more noble sense, it is taken for a private-counsellor, or rather a prime minister, who is the person that bears the whole burden

It ought here to be remarked, that the original word made use of by Abu'lfeda, which we have translated successor, or vicar, is Khalifa; which title, after the death of Mohammed, was common to all his successors. Abu Becr was the first who enjoyed it, as well as the power annexed to it; tho' afterwards it was applied to Omar, Othmân, and then to Ali himself, whom Mohammed, immediately after the public commencement of his mission, honoured with it. The Persians, however, in opposition to the Turks, maintain, that Ali Ebn Abu Tâleb was the first lawful Khalif and Imam; and that the supreme authority, both in spirituals and temporals, of right belongs to his descendants, notwithstanding they may be deprived of it by the injustice of others, or their own fear. The Turks, on the other hand, who stile themselves Sunnites, or orthodox, and the Persians Shiites, or schismatics, acknowledged Abu Becr, Omar, and Othmân, the three first Khalifs, and respect them as rightful Imams; tho' they are rejected by the Persians as intruders and usurpers. Hence the rivetted antipathy which has so long reigned between the Turks and the Persians; and which has long been come to such a pitch, that the former hold it more meritorious to kill one of the latter than seventy Christians. The Persians still retain so great a veneration for the memory of Ali, that some of them believe him to be still living; and that he will come at the end of the world with Elias, and fill the earth with justice; nay, several of them are so superstitiously mad, as to look upon him as God, or at least as something little inferior to the Divinity. So Abd'allah Ebn Saba directly called him God; and Alaba Ebn Darâ preferred him to Mohammed; thinking that the prophet was sent by Ali to draw all men to him; whereas he abused the trust reposed in him, and drew them over to himself. Others contended, that the angel Gabriel mistook Mohammed for Ali; being deceived by the resemblance they bore to one another; for they were as like one another as two crows, according to these sectaries; who were therefore called Al Ghorabites, or the crowish sect. But of this, and all the other principal sects among the Mohammedans, we shall give a minute and circumstantial account hereafter <sup>p</sup>.

MOHAMMED, notwithstanding the repulse he had received, was so far from being discouraged, that he began to preach in public to the people; who heard him with some patience, till he came to upbraid them with the idolatry, obstinacy, and perverseness of themselves and their fathers; which so highly provoked them, that they openly declared themselves his enemies; some few only excepted, who were converted to Islamism. Nor could he have escaped their resentment, had he not been protected by Abu Tâleb, his uncle, who was very active in his favour. However, the chief of the Koreish warmly solicited this person to desert his nephew; making frequent remonstrances against the innovations he was attempting. The principal of these were Otha and Sheiba, the sons of Rabia Ebn Abd' Menâf, Abu Sofiân Ebn Harb Ebn Ommiyah, Abu Al Bekhterah Ebn Heshâm Ebn Al Hâreth Ebn Asad, Al Aswad Ebn Al Motalleb Ebn Asad, Abu Jabl Ebn Heshâm Ebn Al Mogheira, Al Walid Ebn Al Mogheira, of the family of Makhezum, Bonia and Menba, the sons of Al Hejâj the Sahamite, and Al As Ebn Wayel the Sahamite. But all their pacific endeavours proving ineffectual, they at length threatened Abu Tâleb with an open rupture, if he did not pre-burden of the administration. It appears from Abu'lfeda here, that the institution of this post was originally owing to Mohammed; except we shall think proper to admit, with the Korân, that Haron was Moses's Wazir. Be that as it will, Ali was the first Moslem who was distinguished by this honourable title: nor had he any successors in the office annexed to it, before the year of the Hijra 132, or of CHRIST 749, when Merwân Ebn Mohammed Ebn Merwân, the last of the Ommiyahan Khalifs, constituted Abu Moslemah Ebn Al Hâlal his Vizir of religion, or master of the prophet's household; in which dignity he was confirmed by Abu'l Abbâs Al Saffah, the first Khalif of the house of Abbâs. He was succeeded in this post by Yabia Ebn Khâled, as Yabia was by others, till the commencement of the Turkish empire, in which the office of Vizir was finally established, and continues to this day. None of those authors, who have favoured the public with a history of Wazirs, seem to have traced this supereminent dignity to its original source (22).

° ABU'LFED, ubi supra. p. 18—20. AL KODAI, Al Kor. MOHAMMED, f. lxxiv. ELMACIN. ubi supra. AL BEIDAWI, AL ZAMAKHSHARI, JALLAL'OD. ELMACIN. & SIONIT. ubi supra. GAGN. not. ad Abu'lfed. ubi supra. SALE's transl. of the Kor. f. lxxiv. p. 472, 473. <sup>p</sup> AL SHAHRESTAN. apud Pocock. in not. ad spec. hist. Arab. p. 261. ut & ipse Pocock. ibid. GREG. ABU'L-FARAJ hist. dynast. dyn. ix. p. 169—170, &c. ELMACIN. ubi sup. ISM. ABU'LFED. in hist. general. cap. de gent. Moslemor. seu. Mohammedanor. D'HERBEL. biblioth. Orient. art. Schiab, & alibi passim. Vide etiam JOAN. GAGN. not. ad Abu'lfed. de vit. Mohammed. p. 20. SALE's preliminary discourse, sect. viii. p. 175—179, & HADR. RELAND. de relig. Mohammed. p. 36, 37, & alibi.

(22) ISM. ABU'LFED. ubi supra, p. 19. GREG. ABU'L-FARAJ. hist. compend. dynast. p. 213, 214. AL KOR. MOHAMMED. f. xxv. v. 36. Al Firauzabad. in Kam. Gol. lex. Arab. 3c.

vail on Mohammed to desist. At this Abu Táleb was so far moved, that he earnestly dis- a suaded his nephew from pursuing the affair any farther; representing the great danger he and his friends must otherwise run. But Mohammed was not to be intimidated; telling his uncle plainly, that if they set the sun against him on his right hand, and the moon on his left, he would not leave his enterprize. Abu Táleb, therefore, finding him so firmly resolved to proceed, used no further arguments, but promised to stand by him against all his enemies: so that, notwithstanding the people of his tribe came to a determination to expel both him and his followers, he found a powerful support in his uncle, against all their machinations <sup>1</sup>,

A short digression.

It must be remembered, that, during the three years in which Mohammed confined him- b self to private admonitions, he was, as his votaries pretend, honoured with frequent revelations. The first, which happened on the night of Al Kadr, and of which we have already given our readers a short account, was preceded, according to Al Jannabi, by several extraordinary communications of the divine will to the prophet, that, for the space of six months before this memorable event, in dreams, were vouchsafed him. The same author also informs us, that, for some time before Mohammed appeared in public as a reformer, a stop was put to his revelations; which so greatly afflicted him, that, one day as he was walking upon mount Hara, he found himself in so melancholy a disposition, that he was upon the point of throwing himself down headlong from off the top of the mountain: but, to his vast surprize, as he was advancing towards the summit for that purpose, he heard, all on a sudden, a voice from heaven, saying unto him, O Mohammed, thou art the apostle of c God! Upon which, lifting up his eyes on high, he saw the angel Gabriel descending towards him, clothed in red, and seated on a throne, which was suspended between heaven and earth. At this sight being much terrified, he ran to his relations, and particularly to Khadijah, whom he commanded to cover him; and then the following words of the Korân immediately descended from heaven: "O thou covered, arise and preach, and magnify thy " LORD. And cleanse thy garments: and fly every abomination: and be not liberal, in " hopes, &c." Some pretend, that the angel Gabriel himself addressed the new apostle in these words, which form the beginning of the seventy-fourth chapter of the Korân; and, from hence, think this chapter to have been the first which was revealed: but the more received opinion is, that it was the ninety-sixth. Others believe, that the prophet, having d been reviled by certain of the Koreish, was sitting in a melancholy and pensive posture, wrapped up in his mantle, when Gabriel accosted him. Others imagine, that he lay sleeping unconcernedly; or, according to others, praying, covered, with his wife Ayesha, by a large rug, when the angel Gabriel made his appearance to him. But however this may be, it is generally supposed by the Moslem writers, that, in the seventy-fourth chapter of the Korân, Mohammed was more especially commanded to warn his near relations, the Koreish; as he was expressly ordered to do it in a subsequent revelation. The epithets, wrapped up, and covered, used in the seventy-third and seventy-fourth chapters of the Korân, have been taken, by several learned men, pretty plainly to intimate, that Mohammed was subject to the falling-sickness; a malady generally attributed to him by the Christians, tho' not directly e mentioned by the principal Mohammedan writers. This does not please Mr. Sale, tho' he allows such an inference may be made; who is very unwilling to believe that the pretended prophet was ever visited with such a distemper. But, in opposition to this notion, Mr.
Gagnier has pretty clearly shewn, that the probability of Mohammed's having been troubled with such a disorder may be fairly collected from some of the very best Moslem historians <sup>1</sup>.

Mohammed
preaches, exhorts, &c. publicly.

THE revelations being thus re-commenced, and he having entered upon his prophetic or f apostolic function with success, notwithstanding the obstruction at first given him on the part of the Koreish, Mohammed continued to discharge it with uncommon diligence and application. 'Till this period, he had contented himself with calling and inviting men to the knowledge of the truth; but now finding himself, as he pretended, invested with full powers, and commissioned in form to undertake the office of a reformer, he preached, he exhorted publicly, he rendered his vocation manifest to all; and, in consequence of the character he had assumed, he propagated Islamism, with all his might, where-ever his authority prevailed <sup>2</sup>.

Hamza and Omar are converted.

IN the mean time, Abu Táleb remained inviolably attached to the interests of Mohammed, notwithstanding the repeated efforts of the Koreish to obstruct the progress of the new reli-

<sup>1</sup> ISM. ABU'LFED. ubi supra, p. 20, 21. GREG. ABU'L-FARAJ, ubi supra, p. 162. SALE's prelim. discours.
p. 44. Vide etiam ELMACIN. lib. i. c. 1. PRID. life of Mahomet, p. 10. Lond. 1718. <sup>2</sup> ISM ABU'LFED.
ubi sup. p. 16. AL JANNAB. p. 38. AL KOR. MOHAMMED. f. lxxiii, lxxiv, & alibi. AL ZAMAKHSHAR. AL BEIDAWI, HOTTINGER. hist. Orient. l. i. c. 2. LUDOVICUS MARRACCIUS in Alc. p. 763. See PRID. life of Mahom. p. 16. RODERIC. TOLETAN c. vi. RICARDI confutat c. xiii. THEOPHAN. ZONAR. Miscel-
l. histor. Fortalit. fidei, lib. iv. conf. 2. OCKLEY's hist. of the Saracens, vol. i. p. 300, &c. GAGN. not. ad Abu'l-fed. p. 9. & la vie de Mahom. tom. prem. p. 113. SALE's translation of the Korân, p. 469—473. <sup>3</sup> AL a gion. The tribe had come to a resolution to proscribe all who had embraced it. And finding they could neither silence the new converts by fair words, nor menaces, they were determined to try what could be done by force, and ill treatment. They therefore used Mohammed's followers so very injuriously, that it was not safe for them to continue any longer at Mecca; nay, Mohammed himself was insulted on mount Al Safâ by Abu Jahl Ebn Heshâm, a principal man among the Koreish, and one of his most inveterate enemies; which proved a great discouragement to some of his adherents: however, it had such an effect upon his uncle Hamza, who was not yet converted, that, upon his being acquainted with it by Abd'allah Ebn Jodhân's maid, he expostulated with Abu Jahl, struck him with his bow, and, after having grievously wounded him, professed himself a proselyte to Islamism. This induced the family of Makbûm, to which Abu Jahl belonged, to take up arms against Hamza, and the Hâshemites, in support of their relation; but not being able to carry their point, the Hâshemites at last prevailed. Mohammed had also the pleasure to see his party considerably strengthened soon after, by the conversion of Omar Ebn Al Khattâb, a person highly esteemed, and, before this remarkable event, a violent opposer of the prophet. The Moslems pretend, that Mohammed prayed for the conversion either of Omar or Abu Jahl, whom he took to be the most dangerous of his enemies; and that, hereupon, Omar was almost miraculously converted, by reading the twentieth chapter of the Korân: upon which, he retired immediately to mount Al Safâ, where he found Mohammed, and about forty of his followers; the principal of which were Hamza, Abu Becr Al Seddik, and Ali Ebn Abu Tâleb, assembled together; to whom he declared himself a Moslem. Al Jannabi relates, that Omar, at the request of the Koreish, had an intention to assassinate Mohammed; but was diverted from his bloody design by Saad Ebn Abi Wakkâs; tho' Abu'lfeda says, that he was persuaded to desist from so wicked an attempt by Naim Ebn Abd'allah Alkhâm. The Mohammedan writers assert him to have been surnamed Al Farûk, or the Divider; because, when a certain Moslem was condemned by Mohammed for his iniquitous treatment of a Jew, and appealed afterwards from the sentence of the prophet to Omar, he cut him in two with his scymitar, for not acquiescing in the decision of so upright a judge; which when Mohammed heard, he gave him the surname of Al Farûk, or the Divider; because, by this action, he had shewn himself capable of perfectly distinguishing between truth and falsehood. Al Kodai affirms, that thirty-nine of Omar's adherents followed his example the same day he professed himself a votary of Mohammed. For a minute and circumstantial account of this extraordinary change, we must beg leave to refer our readers to Abu'lfeda, Al Jannabi, Al Kodai, and others of the Mohammedan writers. The conversion of Hamza and Omar Ebn Al Khattâb happened in the year preceding the first flight of the Moslems into Ethiopia, or the fourth year of Mohammed's mission, according to Abu'lfeda; and not in the year following that flight, or the first Hejra, as Mr. Sale, in direct opposition to that celebrated historian, has been pleased to assert.
JANNAB. ubi sup. ABU'LFED. ubi sup. p. 18. GAGN. la vie de Mahomet, tom. prem. p. 113. &c. GREG.
ABU'L-FARAJ, ubi sup. ELMACIN. lib. i. c. 1. See also PRID. life of Mahomet, p. 10. Lond. 1718.

BUT notwithstanding these first instances of success, the Koreish raised such a persecution against the Moslems, that some of them, and particularly Othmân Ebn Affân, his wife Rakîah, the daughter of Mohammed, Othmân Ebn Matîn, Abd'allah Ebn Masûd, and Abd'alrahmân Ebn Awf, found themselves obliged to fly for refuge into Ethiopia. This was the first flight; but, afterwards, several others followed them, retiring one after another, to the number of eighty-three men and eighteen women, besides children. These refugees, the first of whom were only twelve men and four women, met with a kind reception at the court of the Najâshi, or king of Ethiopia; who refused to deliver them up to those whom the Koreish sent to demand them. Nay, the Arab writers seem unanimously to attest, that this prince even professed the Mohammedan religion; but as the absurdity of the relations of that affair, or at least the principal of them, has been already demonstrated in our ancient history of the Ethiopians, we shall beg leave to supersede all farther accounts of it here. It will be sufficient to observe at present, that notwithstanding what has been advanced concerning this affair by Mohammed Ebn Abd'al Baki, and Ebn Malkam, as the whole has manifestly the air of a fiction, and not the least traces of it are to be met with in any of the Christian historians, who have touched upon the origin and progress of Mohammedism, nor even in any of the ancient monuments of the Ethiopians, our more intelligent readers will probably allow it to have been deservedly exploded both by Ludolfus and Marracci.

<sup>1</sup> ISM. ABU'LFED. ubi sup. p. 21, 22, 23. EBN SHOHNAH. AL JANNAB. p. 42, 43, 44, 45, 46, &c. AL KODAI, in vit. Omar. AL TABAR. EBN SHEHAB apud Al Kodaium, ubi sup. Vide etiam JOAN. GAGN. not. ad Abu'lfed. ubi sup. p. 22. & la vie de Mahom. tom. prem. p. 123—131. ABUNAZAR, ELMACIN. ubi sup. JOAN-NEI ANDREAM, c. i. & PRID. life of Mahom. p. 14. <sup>2</sup> ISM. ABU'LFED. ubi sup. c. xi. p. 23—27. ELMACIN. & JOANNES ANDREAS, ubi sup. KAMUS, EBN SHOHNAH, AL JANNAB. ubi sup. EBN AL ATHIR, AL KODAI, MOHAMMED EBN ABD'AL BAKI, in lib. de excellent. Habessinor. par. i. cap. 2. EBN MALKAM apud Moham. Ebn Abd'al Bak. ubi supra. JOB LUDOLF. in comment. ad hist. Æthiop. p. 284, & alibi. LUDOVIC. MARRACCI. in prodrom. par. i. c. 2. p. 45. SELD. vox Ebraic. p. 533. Vide etiam Univ. Hist. vol. xviii. p. 331. Lond. 1748. GAGN. not. ad Abu'lfed. p. 24—27. & la vie de Mahom. tom. prem. p. 119—123.

They send to demand the Moslem fugitives of the Najāshi in vain.

ABD'ALLAH EBN ABU RABIA, and Amru Ebn Al As, whom the Koreish sent with presents, consisting of rich furs, to the Najāshi, to demand the fugitives above-mentioned, returned to Mecca, without having been able to succeed in their commission. That prince was determined to take them, and all their brethren, who should think proper to retire into Ethiopia, under his protection. This so incensed the Koreish, that they came to a resolution to suppress effectually, if possible, the new religion, that had now made so considerable a progress among the Arab tribes; and, in order to this, they entered into a solemn league, or covenant, against the Hāshemites (for so Mohammed's followers were called), and the family of Abd'al Motalleb; engaging themselves to contract no marriages with any of them, and to have no communication with them. To give this the greater sanction, they reduced it into writing, and laid it up in the Caaba. Upon this, the tribe became divided into two factions; and the family of Hāshem all, both Moslems and unbelievers, repaired to Abu Tāleb, as their head; except only Abd'al Uzza, surnamed Abu Labeb, the son of Abd'al Motalleb, who, out of his inveterate hatred to his nephew, and his doctrine, went over to the opposite party. This was likewise partly done at the instigation of Omm Jemil, his wife, who was sister to the great enemy of the Hāshemites, Abu Sofiān Ebn Harb, of the family of Ommiyah <sup>w</sup>.

Some of them return to Arabia.

IN the mean time, the Arab refugees, who had taken sanctuary in Ethiopia, received advice, that the citizens of Mecca had embraced Mohammedism. This induced thirty of them to return home; but, upon their arrival in the neighbourhood of Mecca, they found that idolatry still reigned in that city: wherefore only three of them, viz. Othmān Ebn Affān, Al Zobeir Ebn Al Awān, and Othmān Ebn Matūn, had the courage to visit their friends and relations there. It must not be forgot, that when the first of those refugees, viz. Othmān Ebn Affān, with his wife Rakiab, Al Zobeir Ebn Al Awām, Abd'allah Ebn Masūd, Abd'alrahmān Ebn Awf, Abu Hodheifa Ebn Otba, with his wife Sabala, the daughter of Soheil Ebn Omar, Ben Masaab Ebn Omeir, Abu Salmah Ebn Abd'al Ased, with his wife Salama, the daughter of Ommeya, Othmān Ebn Matūn, Amer Ebn Rabia, with his wife Lili, the daughter of Abu Hantama, Hateb Ebn Omar, who first set his foot in Ethiopia, and Soheil Ebn Babidha, had taken their rout on the sea-coast for Ethiopia, they embarked at Jodda, a maritime city about two days journey to the west of Mecca. Here they hired a vessel for half a dinār, and immediately set sail for Ethiopia. This event happened, according to Mohammed Ebn Abd'al Baki, in the fifth year of Mohammed's mission, and the month of Rajeb; which is a farther proof of Mr. Sale's error in the point above-mentioned <sup>x</sup>.

The Koreish grow extremely troublesome to Mohammed and his followers.

WE are told by Al Jannabi, that, soon after the arrival of the Moslems in Ethiopia, the fifty-third chapter of the Korān, intituled, THE STAR, came down from heaven, by the ministry of the angel Gabriel; and that, after the first reading of it, Mohammed prostrated himself, in a sense of the divine goodness; which being observed by some idolaters, who were present, they all of them did the like. The news of this event, according to the same author, being brought into Ethiopia, the Moslems there concluded that Islamism was established in Mecca; which induced some of them to cross the sea, and advance into the neighbourhood of that city, as has been already observed. During the residence of those Arabs there, Mohammed was protected by his uncle Abu Tāleb, tho' he found it extremely difficult to screen him from the fury and violence of the Koreish; who, according to the last-mentioned author, made frequent attempts upon him; sometimes endeavouring to destroy him by open force, and at others by secret wiles and machinations: nay, if that writer may be credited, in order to compass their end, they had recourse to the magic art, to enchantments, and diabolical illusions; they raised demons to harass him, and oblige him to desist at last from his undertaking. In fine, they gave him so much trouble, that he was obliged to change his habitation, and seek an asylum for himself, and his new companions. This he found in the house of one Orkam, which had on the hill of Safā an advantageous situation. Here he brought over to Islamism all the members of Orkam's family. The house he then dwelt in was afterwards held in high veneration among the Moslems. Orkam, the possessor of it at that time, made a present of it to his son, when he married an Arab lady. Al Mansūr, the second Khalif of the house of Abbās, purchased it of the heirs of Orkam for a large sum of money, and gave it to his son and successor Al Mobdi, surnamed Al Khaizorān; that is to say, the cane, or reed; from whom, says Al Jannabi, it retains the appellation of the house of the reed to this very day <sup>y</sup>.

Abu'lfeda's authority preferable to that of Al Jannabi.

IT has been already observed, that Abu'lfeda places the conversion of Hamza and Omar Al Farūk in the fourth year of Mohammed's mission; that is, he makes it to precede the first flight into Ethiopia only about one year. To which we must now beg leave to add,

<sup>w</sup> ISM. ABU'LFED. ubi supra. p. 25. EBN SHOHNAH. ABU'L MAALA ALAEDDIN MOHAMMED EBN ABD'AL BAKI, ubi supra. SIONIT. in append. ad geograph. Nubienf. c. 7. ELMACIN. & JOAN. ANDREAS, ubi supra. AL JANNABI, ubi supra, p. 41. Vide etiam GAGN. ubi supra, p. 122, 123. <sup>x</sup> ABU'L MAALA ALAEDDIN MOHAMMED EBN ABD'AL BAKI, ubi supra. ABU'LFED. ubi supra. p. 23—27. AL JANNABI, GAGN. la vic de Mahom. tom. prem. c. x. p. 119—123. <sup>y</sup> AL JANNAB. MOHAMMED EBN ABD'AL BAKI, in lib. de excellentiis Hāshimior. Vide etiam JOAN. GAGN. ubi supra.

- <sup>a</sup> that Al Jannabi is of a contrary opinion. According to that author, this conversion happened in the sixth of Mohammed's mission, and consequently the year after the first Hejra, or flight into Ethiopia; Al Kodai, Mohammed Ebn Abd'al Baki, and Al Jannabi, all agreeing (with Abu'lfeda), that Mohammed's adherents first sought for refuge at the court of the Najáshi, in the fifth year after the apostle entered upon his prophetic function. As we cannot therefore decide in favour of both these opinions, which are diametrically opposite to each other, the question here is, whether of them we are to chuse; or, in other words, whether we are to give the preference to Abu'lfeda's authority, or that of Al Jannabi? Mr. Gagnier and Mr. Sale have, to our very great surprize, followed the latter of these authors in the point before us. We say, to our very great surprize; since Abu'lfeda was not near so much tinctured with bigotry and superstition as Al Jannabi, does not discover so great a propensity to fable and romance, and lived near three hundred years before him. We cannot therefore but think, that he ought to be esteemed as an historian of much better reputation and authority. Besides, the conversion of Hamza, one of Mohammed's uncles, seems naturally connected with the protection given him by Abu Táleb, another of them, as it is represented by Abu'lfeda, in the body of his history. So that it being agreed on all hands, that Abu Táleb most powerfully supported Mohammed in the fourth year of his mission; and Al Jannabi, Al Kodai, Mohammed Ebn Abd'al Baki, &c. all asserting, that the first Hejra, or flight into Ethiopia, happened in the fifth; both the reason of the thing, and the testimony of those writers (even of Al Jannabi himself) jointly concur to establish, and, as we apprehend, render indisputable, the authority of Abu'lfeda. Nor can this be at all affected, in the present article, as Mr. Gagnier seems to imagine, by what we find, in another place, related by Al Jannabi; viz. that Mohammed lived upon the mountains of Al Safá, after the first retreat of the Moslems to the court of the Najáshi: for this ought either to be looked upon as a fresh mistake, or as a natural consequence of the former; which we are inclined to believe; or, lastly, as a proof that Mohammed lived twice upon that hill, once before, and once after, some of his first converts were obliged to fly into Ethiopia <sup>2</sup>.

- THE factions into which the tribe of the Koreish was divided, and which occasioned the solemn league above-mentioned, subsisted for five years; but, in the tenth year of his mission, Mohammed told his uncle Abu Táleb, that God had manifestly shewed his disapprobation of the covenant entered into by the Koreish against them, by sending a worm to eat out every word of the instrument, except the name of God. Of this accident Mohammed, says Mr. Sale, had probably some private notice; for Abu Táleb went immediately to the Koreish, and acquainted them with it; offering, if it proved false, to deliver his nephew up to them; but in case it were true, he insisted, that they ought to lay aside their animosity, and annul the league they had made against the Háshemites. To this they acquiesced, and going to inspect the writing, to their great astonishment, found it to be as Abu Táleb had said; and the league was thereupon declared void. The form, in which the name of God was written, according to Abu Zeid Abd'al Rahmán, was this, IN THY NAME, O GOD; which words, as the same author affirms, only remained untouched. He also adds, that the hand of Mansúr Ebn Akrema, the notary who drew up the writing, was dried up as soon as he had finished it. The Moslem writers, however, do not intirely agree amongst themselves, in their relations of this pretended miracle; for Abmed Ebn Abd'al Rakím, as he is cited by Marracci, asserts, that all the names of God only were eaten out of the instrument, every other part of it being perfectly visible: upon which, continues that author, Abu Táleb, addressing himself to the Koreish, observed, that as God had been averse to the drawing up of the instrument then before them, he had taken care that every thing relating to him in it should be defaced, and that every thing that was the effect of their wickedness should remain. Be this, however, as it will, upon so remarkable an event, according to Abu'lfeda, the rescission of the instrument immediately ensued. Our readers will here take notice, that this extraordinary affair, which proved of such signal service to Mohammed, was probably, even according to Mr. Sale himself, the effect of collusion; since the person who, as he insinuates, gave the impostor private notice of the destruction of so many words in the instrument, did, in all likelihood, by his directions, erase them. They will also farther remark, that what has been advanced here by Abu'lfeda, Abu Zeid Seid Abd'al Rahmán, and Abmed Ebn Abd'al Rakím, amounts to a good proof, that the Arabs had letters in use amongst them, when Mohammed made his first appearance upon the theatre of the world, and even before his birth, as we have already observed in our ancient history of that most wonderful and illustrious nation <sup>3</sup>.

<sup>2</sup> ISM. ABU'LFED. AL JANNAB. ABUL MAALA ALAZEDDIN MOHAMMED EBN ABD'AL BAKI, AL KODAI, ubi supra. Vide etiam JOAN. GAGN. la vie de Mahom. tom. prem. p. 119—130. & not. ad Abu'lfed. ubi supra, p. 21, 22. SALE's prelim. discours. p. 44, 45, &c. <sup>3</sup> ISM. ABU'LFED. de vit. Mohammed. c. xii. p. 27. ABU ZEID SEID ABD'AL RAHMÁN, in lib. de sign. seu mirac. prophet. AHMED EBN ABD'AL RAHIM apud Ludovic. Marraccium, in prodr. par. ii. p. 36. Patavii, 1698. Vide etiam JOAN. GAGN. not. ad Ism. Abu'lfed, ubi supra, & SALE's prelim. disc. p. 42.

Mohammed
loses his uncle
Abu Tâleb,
and his wife.

AFTER this memorable event, Mohammed remained with his uncle Abu Tâleb; who died <sup>a</sup> the same year, according to Abu'lfeda. The prophet had before been shut up, or rather closely besieged, in one of Abu Tâleb's castles, if we will believe Al Jannabi. The two parties, that is, the Hâshemites, and the opposite faction of the Koreish, were so exasperated against each other, that there was no manner of intercourse or communication kept up between them; at least before the rescission of the late decree. They never saw one another, except at the public solemnities of the pilgrimage, and then no kind of civilities or salutations passed between them. Abu Tâleb departed this life in the month of Shawâl, and the tenth year of Mohammed's mission; so that he did not long survive the late accommodation. At his death, he was above eighty years of age; and died, according to the general opinion, an unbeliever; tho' some pretend that he professed himself a Moslem just before he <sup>b</sup> expired. Abu'lfeda relates, that, as his death approached, Mohammed pressed him to declare his assent to the two fundamental article, THERE IS ONLY ONE GOD, AND MOHAMMED IS HIS PROPHET; but that he excused himself from making such a declaration, because the Koreish would, as he said, impute it to his being intimidated at that juncture, and consequently give out, that the fear of death had extorted it from him. However, continues the same author, Abd'allah Ebn Al Abbâs, who attended him in his last illness, Mohammed's cousin-german, asserted, that, with his last breath, he acknowledged his belief of those articles. Be that as it will, Mohammed sustained a great loss by the death of his uncle, who had supported him with no small success against all the efforts of his most powerful and inveterate enemies. It must be remembered here, that those who assert Abu Tâleb to <sup>c</sup> have embraced Mohammedism, when he was at the point of death, produce some passages out of his poetical compositions, to confirm their assertion; and that he lived only eight months and twenty-one days after all acts of hostility ceased between his friends and the Koreish, according to Al Jannabi. About a month, or, as some write, three days after the death of this great benefactor and patron, Mohammed had the additional mortification to lose his wife Khadîjah, who had so generously made his fortune. She died in the sixty-fifth year of her age, and not in the forty-ninth, as we find asserted by Marracci. Mohammed had all his children by her, except one called Ibrahim, if we will give credit to Al Kodai. Two such sinister events, coming as it were together, could not but prove extremely prejudicial to the prophet's affairs. For which reason, this year is called by the Mohammedans <sup>d</sup> the year of mourning <sup>b</sup>.

A short digression relating to a prophecy of Mohammed.

It has been remarked by Al Jannabi, that the year preceding the death of Abu Tâleb and Khadîjah, the Persians gave the Greeks, or subjects of the Constantinopolitan empire, a signal defeat in Syria, near Bosra and Adbraât; upon which, the Koreish made great rejoicings. The news of this victory reaching Mecca, the infidels became strangely elated, and began to abuse Mohammed, and his followers; imagining that this success of the Persians, who, like themselves, were idolaters, and supposed to have no Scriptures, against the Christians, who pretended, as well as Mohammed, to worship one God, and to have divine Scriptures, was an earnest of their own future successes against the prophet, and those of his religion. To check which vain hopes, it was foretold, in the thirtieth chapter of the Korân, intituled, AL RÛM, or THE GREEKS, which, the Moslems pretend, was revealed on occasion of this victory, that how improbable soever it might seem, yet the scale should be turned in a few years, and the vanquished Greeks prevail as remarkably over the Persians. Which prophecy, according to the commentators on the Korân, was exactly fulfilled, tho' they do not agree in their accounts of its completion; the number of years between the two actions being not precisely determined. Some place the victory gained by the Persians in the fifth year before the Hejra, and their defeat by the Greeks in the second year after it, when the battle of Bedr was fought: others place the former in the third or fourth year before the Hejra, and the latter in the end of the sixth, or beginning of the seventh year after it, when the expedition of Al Hodeibiyah was undertaken. The date of the victory <sup>e</sup> gained by the Greeks, in the first of these accounts, interferes with a story, which the commentators on the Korân tell us, of a wager laid by Abu Becr with Obba Ebn Khalf, who turned this prophecy into ridicule. Abu Becr at first laid ten young camels, that the Persians should receive an overthrow within three years; but, on his acquainting Mohammed with what he had done, that prophet told him, that the word bed', made use of in the prediction, signified no determinate number of years, but any number from three to nine (tho' some suppose the tenth year is included); and therefore advised him to prolong the time, and raise the wager; which he accordingly proposed to Obba, and they agreed that the time assigned should be nine years, and the wager an hundred camels. Before the time was <sup>f</sup>

<sup>b</sup> AL JANNAB. ubi sup. p. 47. ABD'ALLAH EBN AL ABBAS apud Ism. Abu'lfed. ubi sup. c. xiii. p. 28. ut & ipse ABU'LFED. ibid. Vide etiam carm. ABU TALEB apud Abu'lfed. ubi supra, & GAGN. la vie de Mahom. tom. prem. p. 132, 133. AHMED EBN YUSEF in hist. sect. i. c. 40. AL KODAI de uxerib. Mohammed. LUDOVICI MARRACCI vit. Mohammed. c. i. p. 15, &c.

elapsed,

- a elapsed, Obba died, of a wound he had received at Obod, in the third year of the Hejra; but the event afterwards shewing that Abu Becr had won, he received the camels of Obba's heirs, and brought them in triumph to Mohammed. The victory, mentioned in the Korân, seems, according to Mr. Salé, to have been obtained about the sixth year before the Hejra, when the Persians, after their conquest of Syria, made themselves masters of Palestine, and took Jerusalem, as agreeing best with the terms used in the thirtieth chapter of the Korân, and being the most likely to alarm the Arabs, by reason of their vicinity to the scene of action. And, in the year of Christ 625, in which the fourth year of the Hejra began, about ten years after the reduction of Jerusalem, the Greeks, in a great battle, overthrew the Persians, obliged them to quit the territories of the empire, drove them to the last extremity, and spoiled the capital city of Al Madâyen. But, for more exact information in these matters, our readers must have recourse to historians and chronologers. In the mean time, we shall beg leave farther to remark, that tho' Al Jannabi takes the battle, mentioned in the Korân, to have been fought in the neighbourhood of Bostra and Adbraât, as well as Al Beidawi and Ahmed Ebn Yahya, yet others place the scene of action in the land of Persia, and others in Mesopotamia, on the frontiers of that kingdom: but Ebn Abbâs differs from them all, when he thinks that the aforesaid general action happened in Palestine. Be this, however, as it will, the Persians were at that time in a declining condition, as well as the Greeks; and this Mohammed very well knew, as has been already observed, and is even allowed by Mr. Salé himself; so that the pretended apostle might, without the gift of prophecy, conjecture, that the Greeks would, within a few years, in their turn, overcome the Persians, and boldly offer such a conjecture as a prophecy, in order to animate and encourage his followers, who were then in a state of persecution. That such a procedure as this was, at that time, consonant to the Arab genius, appears from hence, that the infidel Koreish did foretel future successes to themselves from the victory of the Persians; and that this prediction also, as well as Mohammed's, was, in some measure, fulfilled. But there is nothing at all wonderful in this: sanguine persons will frequently utter such conjectures as these, with a prophetic air, either to animate their partisans, after some disaster has happened, or to express their hopes of better times. Instances enough of this kind might be produced from history, were they in any manner necessary; and thousands of such instances, we doubt not, have actually occurred to persons acquainted with the nature of mankind, since the creation of the world. Nothing, therefore, can be more ridiculous, or inconsistent with itself, than the conduct of Mr. Salé; who, in one part of his book, represents both the Persians and the Greeks as extremely weak, when Mohammed began to attempt a reformation amongst the Arabs; and, in another, insinuates, that the Persians were then so infinitely superior to the Greeks, that the latter were upon the point of being swallowed up by the former. With what view this is done, our intelligent readers will easily perceive. Mr. Gagnier also discovers a strong inclination to favour the Mohammedan cause; when, in our opinion, without reason, he carps at Father Marracci's refutation of the thirtieth chapter of the Korân. In fine, the two learned men now in view would perhaps have had a dislike to Islamism in those countries only where it at present prevails; and that because it is the established religion there<sup>c</sup>.

- BUT to return to our history—Before the expiration of the tenth year of the prophet's mission, a most wonderful fact was wrought by Mohammed, if we may depend upon Al Jannabi, for the conviction of unbelievers. The beginning of the fifty-fourth chapter of the Korân, according to some, refers to this famous miracle, supposed to have been performed by Mohammed: for it is said, that, on the infidels demanding a sign of him, the moon appeared cloven in two, one part vanishing, and the other remaining; and Ebn Masûd affirmed, that he saw mount Hara interpose between the two sections. The words of the Korân, hinted at in the chapter above-mentioned, intituled, THE MOON, are to the following effect:
 "The hour approacheth; and the moon hath been split in sunder: but if they see a sign, they turn aside, saying this is a powerful charm. And they accuse of imposture, and follow their own lusts: but every thing will be immutably fixed." Al Jannabi also relates, that Moslems, as well as unbelievers, and the people of the book, that is, both Jews and Christians, who were both favoured with Scriptures of divine original, saw this stupendous prodigy<sup>d</sup>.

HOWEVER, notwithstanding this, after the death of Abu Tâleb and Khadijah, the Koreish began to be more troublesome than ever to their prophet, and especially some who had formerly been his intimate friends. The principal of these were Abu Labeb Ebn Abd'allah, Al Hakam Ebn Al As, and Okba Ebn Abi Moait Ebn Ommeya, who persecuted him with great rancour and fury; insomuch that he found himself obliged to seek for shelter elsewhere, a and first pitched upon Tâyes, about sixty miles east from Mecca, for the place of his retreat. Thither, therefore, he went, accompanied by his servant Zeid, and applied himself to Masîd and Habîb, two of the chief of the tribe of Thakîf, who were the inhabitants of that place; but they received him very coldly, and even treated him with some contempt: however, he staid with them a month, and made some converts amongst them; some of the more considerate and better sort of the citizens shewing him a little respect. At last, the slaves, and inferior people rose against him, and, bringing him to the wall of the city, obliged him to depart, and return to Mecca. This he did the twenty-third day of the month Dbu'lkaada, in the tenth year of his mission, according to Al Jannabi, and put himself under the protection of Al Motâam Ebn Adi <sup>c</sup>.

<sup>c</sup> AL JANNAB. p. 43, 47, 48, &c. ELMACIN. p. 13, 17. DION. PETAV. rationar. tem. p. 506. JALLALO'DDIN, AL KOR. MOHAMMED. f. xxx. AL ZAMAKHSHAR. AL BEIDAWI, AHMED EBN YAHYA, ASEMAN. bibliothec. Oriental. tom. iii. par. 1. p. 411, &c. MOJAHED apud Al Zamakhshar. SALE's notes on the 30th chapter of the Kor. GAGN. la vie de Mahom. tom. prem. c. xii. p. 134, 135. <sup>d</sup> AL KOR. MOHAMMED. f. liv. v. 2, 3. AL ZAMAKHSHAR. AL BEIDAWI, GAGN. ubi supra, p. 134, 135, 136. Vide etiam lib. AL SHAIB. & LUD. MARRACC. refutat. Alcoran, c. xxx. p. 541, 542. Patavii, 1698.

The reason of Mohammed's retreat to Tâyes.

THE reason assigned by Golius for Mohammed's retreat to Tâyes, in preference to all other places, is, because his uncle Abbâs lived for the most part in that city: hence the Turks, at this day, give the district or territory belonging to it the name of Abbâs Beladi; that is, the country of Abbâs; and under that appellation it has chiefly gone even from the age of Mohammed to the present. To this place, therefore, he seems to have repaired, in order to secure to himself the protection of Abbâs; and afterwards, if a favourable opportunity offered, to subjugate the inhabitants of it. But he found himself disappointed in both those views, as sufficiently appears from what has been already observed. Tâyes is situated upon the back of mount Ghazwân, the coldest spot in Hejâz; insomuch that it pretty frequently freezes upon the top of this mountain. For which reason, it abounds with variety of fruits, c great quantities of which are continually sent to Mecca, and enjoys a most salubrious air. Hence the poet Temîris, when he celebrates the praises of Zeinab, sister to the prince of Hejâz, says, that she spent the winter at Mecca, and the summer at Tâyes. Its first name was Veja, which it derived from its founder. Ghazwân is commonly called by the Arabs Afwân, and looked upon to be famous, amongst them, for the excellent raisins it produces. Abu'lfeda says, the town now in view was originally called Tâyes, because it was separated from the continent of Syria by the waters of the deluge. But this seems to be a mistake, as it first went under the name of Veja; and, consequently, that of Tâyes must be perfectly modern, in comparison of the age of Noah. For other etymons of the word Tâyes, we must beg leave to refer the curious to Al Jannabi <sup>d</sup>.

Who the Al
Anfâr, or Ansârs, were.

THIS last repulse greatly discouraged the new converts; as they perceived from hence that their countrymen were more than ever incensed against them. However, Mohammed continued boldly to preach to the public assemblies at the pilgrimage, who resorted to Mecca, on that occasion, from all parts of Arabia, against idolatry, and particularly against the worship of Allât and Al Uzza, to which the tribes, especially the women of that of Thakîf, were much addicted; tho' he exposed his person to insults and affronts, and his life itself to no small danger, by so doing. Here he gained several proselytes, and amongst them six of the inhabitants of Yathreb, of the Jewish tribe of Khazraj; who, on their return home, failed not to speak much in commendation of their new religion, and exhorted their fellow citizens to embrace it. We are told, that this tribe, and that of Al Aws, were reconciled e immediately after their conversion to Mohammedism, tho' they had before been at variance an hundred and twenty years. The city of Yathreb was inhabited by those two tribes, who were descended from Azd, the son of Cablân, the son of Saba, the son of Yashbab, the son of Taarab, the son of Kabtân, the son of Eber. These converts of the tribe of Khazraj are called by the Arab writers Al Anfâr, Al Ansarii, or Ansârs; that is assistants, favourers, supporters, &c. because they assisted and supported the prophet, when he was pursued to the very brink of destruction, by the malice and contumelious rage of his enemies. They first met Mohammed upon the hill called Al Akaba, a little out of Mecca, where a temple stood, in which, according to Al Juzi, or Al Juzius, these Ansârs first took an oath to exert themselves in support of their new apostle, and his religion. An uninterrupted friendship and harmony long reigned f amongst the members of the Jewish tribes of Khazraj, Coreidba, and Nadîr, whose great progenitor, say the Arabs, was Harûn Ebn Amrân. Mohammed, therefore, insinuating himself into the good graces and affections of the Ansârs, they very readily embraced Islamism, and gladly received from him that part of the Korân which had been revealed. With regard to the Jews first seated at Yathreb, we are told by Abu'lfeda, that they deduced their origin from those Israelites that were sent by Moses to extirpate the Amalekites who occupied Yathreb, Khaibar, and other cities in the province of Hejâz. Having executed their orders, and killed the king of the Amalekites, they brought his son with them prisoner into Palestine; and, some time after, returning into Arabia, they took possession of those towns, whose inhabitants they had before put to the sword, and remained there, till the tribes of g a Aws and Khazraj, who were obliged to abandon Yaman, by the inundation of Al Arem, came and subdued them. Others say, that the Jews did not settle in Arabia till after the reduction of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar; and lastly, others believe, that they had no settlement in that country till after the destruction of the second temple by Titus. The tribe of Koreidha, tho' in league with Mohammed, at the incessant persuasion of Caab Ebn Asad, a principal man amongst them, went over to his enemies in the WAR OF THE DITCH; and were severely punished for it. But of this our curious readers may expect a full and ample account hereafter <sup>g</sup>.

<sup>c</sup> ISM. ABU'LFED. ubi supra, c. xv. p. 29. FBN SHOHNAH, ELMACIN. lib. i. c. 1. AL JANNAB <sup>f</sup> GOLII notæ ad Alfraganum, p. 100. TEMIRIS poet. Arab. apud Golium, ibid. SHARIF AL EDRISI, in provinc. Hej. Vide etiam JOAN. GAGN. not. ad Abu'lfed. ubi supra. p. 29.

THE next remarkable event, we find related of Mohammed, by Abu'lfeda, is the night-journey he made from Mecca to Jerusalem, and from thence to heaven, so much spoken of <sup>night-journey to heaven.</sup> by all that have written of him. This happened, according to the author of the book Al Seirat, before the decease of Abu Taleb, and consequently in or before the tenth year of his mission. But Al Juzi, or, as the Arabs call him, Ebn Al Juzi, and he seems to have reason on his side, takes it to have happened in the twelfth year of his prophetic function. Here, therefore, we shall beg leave to place it. Dr. Prideaux thinks he invented it either to answer the expectations of those who demanded some miracle as a proof of his mission; or else, by pretending to have conversed with God, to establish the authority of whatever he should think fit to leave behind him by way of oral tradition, and make his sayings to serve the same purpose as the oral law of the Jews. And this must be allowed extremely probable, notwithstanding what has been advanced to the contrary by Mr. Sale, which has no manner of weight in it. For he contents himself with barely asserting, "that he does not find, that Mohammed himself ever expected so great a regard should be paid to his sayings, as his followers have since done." Whereas from the whole tenor of his conduct, as described even by the Moslem writers themselves, the contrary seems most clearly to appear. Nor can any thing be more remote from truth than what the learned author now before us immediately subjoins, "and seeing he all along disclaimed any power of performing miracles," &c. since this bold assertion runs counter to the whole stream of Moslem antiquity, as well as to the express testimony of some good Christian writers, who have transmitted to posterity several particulars relating to the life and actions of Mohammed. In fine, the contrary to it may be demonstrated from the authors, both Christian and Mohammedan, so frequently cited in this work. However, he merits greater regard, when he presently adds, that "it seems rather to have been a fetch of policy, to raise his reputation, by pretending to have actually conversed with God in heaven, as Moses had heretofore done in the mount, and to have received several institutions immediately from him, whereas he before contented himself with persuading them that he had all by the ministry of Gabriel." This, we say, merits greater regard; tho', at the same time, it must be allowed, that it fixes upon the favourite prophet, in conformity to what has been related of him by all Christian writers, the imputation of having been one of the most abandoned wretches, and the most execrable impostors, however inconsistent he may be with himself by so doing, that ever appeared in the world. Nor can we deny but that, in our opinion, such a character he most richly deserved <sup>h</sup>.

BUT to resume the thread of our history—Mohammed lying in the open air between the mountains of Al Safa and Merwa, in the neighbourhood of Mecca, according to the tradition of Abu Horeira, was one night accosted by the angel Gabriel, and another heavenly spirit with him. Gabriel, if we will believe Al Farad, opened Mohammed's heart, wrung out the black drop, or seed of original sin, washed and cleansed the same, filled it with wisdom and faith, and then put it into its proper place, out of which he had taken it for the more expeditious and convenient performance of that operation. Afterwards Gabriel, with seventy pair of wings expanded from his sides, according to some, brought to our apostle the beast Al Borak, which, say the Mohammedans, was the beast the prophets used to ride, when they were carried from one place to another, upon the execution of any divine command. Mohammed describes this animal to have been as white as milk, to have resembled an ass as well as a mule, and to have been of a size something less than the latter, but larger than the former. According to the tradition of Abu Horeira, the face of Al Borak was like that of a man, and his jaws like those of a horse. His eyes shone with as great a lustre as the stars would do, were they enlightened by the solar rays, and he had a two wings resembling those of an eagle. The Moslems also pretend that he was endued with a rational soul, so that he could hear, reason, and understand, tho' he was destitute naturally of the faculty of speech. He could move with such surprising velocity, that he was able to pass from one place to another, as quick as lightning; from whence he received the name of Al Borák, which denotes lightning, or rather the author of lightning, the thunderer, in the Arabic tongue. At Mohammed's approach, he kicked with great force, and would not suffer the prophet to mount him. Upon which, Gabriel immediately interposed, and addressed himself to the beast in the following terms: "Stand still," said he, "O Borák, and be obedient to Mohammed, for a greater favourite of God than he is never got upon thy back." To which Al Borák replied, "Did not Ibrahim, O Gabriel, the friend of b God, ride upon me, when he went to pay a visit to his son Ismael? Perhaps, Gabriel, this is the mediator, intercessor, and the author of the new religion, whose fundamental article is THERE IS NO GOD BUT GOD." To this Gabriel answered—"Stand still, O Borák, stand still, this is Mohammed the son of Abd'allah, the chief of the sons of Adam, the first amongst the prophets and ambassadors, and the seal of them all; his tribe is settled in Yaman, and his religion orthodox; all men, through his intercession, hope to enter paradise; at his right hand is paradise, and at his left hell-fire; whoever professes his word to be true will enter paradise, but whoever accuses him of a lye will be thrust into hell." To this Al Borák returned, for God had enabled him to speak on this occasion, "O Gabriel, I adjure thee, by the friendship and alliance between thee and Mohammed, c to prevail upon him to admit me into paradise, by his intercession, in the day of the resurrection." The prophet hearing this, said to him;—"Stand still, Borák; through my intercession thou shalt be with me in paradise." Upon which the beast presently came to him, took him on his back, and carried him through the air to Jerusalem in the twinkling of an eye <sup>1</sup>.

<sup>g</sup> EBN SHOHNAH. ISM. ABU'LFED. ubi sup. c. xv, xvi, xvii. p. 29, 30, 31. AL JANNAB. AL TABAR. EBN AL JUZI. ELMACIN. ubi sup. AHMED EBN YUSEF, AL BEIDAWI, EBN ISHAK. Vid. etiam GAGN. not. ad Abu'lfed. ubi sup. p. 30, 31. La vie de Mahom. l. iv. c. 2 & alib. & SALE'S not. on the 33d chap. of the Kor.

<sup>h</sup> Aut. lib. AL SEIRAT apud Abu'lfed. ubi sup. c. xviii. p. 32. ut & ipse ABU'LFED. ibid. EBN AL JUZI, AHMED EBN YUSEF. PRIDEAUX'S life of Mahomet, p. 38. GREG. ABU'L-FARAJ. hist. dynast. p. 166. AL NODHAM EBN MASUD apud Al Shahrestan. ut & ipse AL SHAHRESTAN. ibid. POC. not. in spec. hist. Arab. p. 187, 188. HOTTING. hist. Orient. lib. ii. c. 6. GUADAGNOL. tract. ii. c. 2. sect. 2. AL KOR. MOHAMMED, f. liv. v. 2, 3. GAGN. la vie de Mahom. ubi sup. p. 134, 135, 136. AL ZAMAKHSHAR. AL BEIDAWI, AL BOKHARI. SALE'S prelim. discourse, p. 46, 47. See also SALE'S translat. of the 54th chap. of the Kor. and his notes on that chap. & lib. AL SAHIB, &c.

and afterwards at the first heaven;

HE no sooner arrived there than he went to the temple, where he found Ibrahim, Musa, and Isa, that is, Abraham, Moses, and Jesus, with a great number of the prophets and saints, who all saluted him, and immediately went to prayers with him. After which, Gabriel and he ascended a ladder of light, which they found ready fixed for them, and left Al Borák upon the sacred spot till their return. Then they proceeded directly to the first d heaven, where, upon their arrival, Gabriel knocked at the gate, and having informed the porter who he was, as also that he had brought Mohammed, the friend of God, with him, by the divine command, it was instantly opened. This gate he describes to be of a prodigious size. The first heaven, he likewise tells us, consisted intirely of pure silver, and that he there saw the stars hanging from it by chains of gold as large as mount Noko, near Mecca in Arabia; and that in these stars the angels keep guard, to hinder the devils from approaching too near, or prying into the actions, and overhearing the discourse, of the inhabitants of heaven, in order to tempt them. When Mohammed first entered this heaven, he saw an old decrepit man, according to the same tradition, who called him the best of sons, and the best of prophets. This venerable person, as he learned from Gabriel, was our first e father Adam, who then, say certain of the Moslems, recommended himself to his prayers. He also saw, as some pretend, an infinite number of angels of all manner of shapes; an amongst those who appeared in the forms of birds, a cock as white as snow, of so prodigious a size, that with his head he touched the second heaven, though this was five hundred years journey distant from the first, according to the usual computation of travellers in the East. Nay some affirm, that the head of this (Y) cock reached up, through all the

<sup>1</sup> AL BOKHARI, ABU'LFED. ubi sup. c. xix. p. 33. AL JARUD apud Abu'lfed. ibid. Aut. lib. AGAR. AL KOR. MOHAMMED. f. xvii. & xciv. v. 1. MOSLEM, AL BEIDAWI, AHMED EBN YAHYA, ABU HOREIRA. Vide etiam PHILIP. GUADAGNOL. Lat. vers. lib. AGAR. PRID. life of Mahom. p. 31, 32. RODERIC. TOLETAN. c. 5. JOAN. ANDRAM, c. 8. RICHARDI confutat. legis Saracenicæ, c. 1. 27. CANTACUZENI orat. 4. GUADAGNOL. ubi sup. tract. ii. c. 2. sect. 2. BELLONIUS, lib. iii. c. 7. BOCHART. hierozoic. par. ii. lib. 6. c. 13. FORTAL. FID. lib. iv. confid. 4. JOAN. GAGN. not. ad Abu'lfed. ubi sup. p. 8, 9, 33, 34. & la vie de Mahom. tom. prem. liv. ii. p. 195—207. SALE's prelimin. discours. p. 46. & translat. & not. on the Kor. f. xvii, xciv, &c.

(Y) This fable of the cock Mohammed has been supplied with by the Talmudists, as has been rightly observed by Dr. Prideaux. The Babylonish Talmud mentions a bird called Ziz, that standeth with his feet upon the earth, reacheth up unto the heavens with his head, and with the expansion of his wings totally obscures the solar orb. The Chaldee paraphrast on the psalms likewise describes this bird as a cock of the same immense size, and tells us that he crows before the LORD. He also in his paraphrase on the book of Job informs us, that he crows every morning before the LORD, and that God gives him wisdom for this purpose. Al Termedi relates that this cock's wings are adorned with an infinite number of emeralds, carbuncles, and pearls, of inestimable value; and that, at the approach of the day of judgment, he will pronounce the words PRAISE, SANCTITY, &c. with a very loud and sonorous voice. For a more particular account of him, we must beg leave to refer our curious readers to the authors here cited in the margin (23).

(23) Buxtorfii lexicon Rabbinicum, in voce זיז Chald. paraphr. ad Psal. l. 11. & lxxx. 14. & ad Job iii. 7. xxxviii. 36. xxxix. 16, &c. Abu Horeir. in major. tradit. ascension. Al Termedi. in lib. de wit. animal. PRID. life of Mahom. p. 32, 33, 34.

- a seven heavens, as far as the throne of God, which is above seven times higher. His wings are represented as adorned with carbuncles and pearls, and as extended, when he pleases, towards the East and West, at a distance proportionable to his height. The angels appearing in the shapes of animals, as Gabriel informed the prophet, intercede with God for all those living creatures on earth that they resemble; those in the form of men for men, those in the form of beasts for beasts, and those in a shape similar to that of birds for birds. The angel above mentioned, according to Mohammed, is the representative of the cocks, and every morning joins with God in singing an holy hymn by his crowing, which is so loud that all the inhabitants of heaven and earth, except men and fairies, can hear it, and then all the other cocks, both material and immaterial, crow also. We likewise learn from Al Termedi, that, at the approach of the day of judgment, the great white cock in the first heaven shall be commanded to draw in his wings, and cease crowing, which shall be a sign that that day is at hand, to all beings, but men and fairies, who having been before deaf to his crowing, shall not then be sensible of his silence. The Mohammedans believe, that there are three voices which God always hears; the voice of him that is constant in reading the Korân, the voice of him that prayeth early every morning for the pardon of his sins, and the voice of this great cock, which they think is ever most acceptable to him. Some pretend, that, according to a tradition derived originally from Mohammed, the first heaven consists of a thin subtle vapour, called the firmament, and that the celestial space occupied by this vapour, throughout the vast extent of it, is full of angels and superior intelligent beings, some of whom profoundly inclined themselves, and other prostrated themselves, by way of adoration, before Mohammed. The chief of these were, as is hinted by the same tradition, Michael and Asmael, who treated Gabriel and Mohammed with the highest marks of distinction<sup>k</sup>.

- FROM the first heaven they advanced to the second, into which they were admitted, and then at the second met with the same salutation as before. We are not informed of what happened to them during the course of their ascent; but only that this heaven is about five hundred years journey distant from the former, according to the celerity and method of travelling here on earth. The second heaven consists of a sort of iron, says the tradition, called Maun. Here Mohammed is said first to have met with Noah, who rejoiced much at the sight of him, recommended himself to his prayers, and afterwards with Isa and Yahya, that is Jesus and John, who both welcomed him to that place, and stiled him the best of men, and the best of prophets. But the author of the book called Agar differs from the tradition, or narration, of Abu Horeira, in the point before us. For he places John in the sixth heaven, and Jesus in the seventh, or the highest of all. Here Ibrahim, or Abraham, has by the same author a place likewise assigned him. It may not be improper to observe, that this writer, though a Moslem, seems to intimate, that Mohammed acknowledged himself to be inferior to CHRIST; which he did, as Mr. Gagnier justly remarks, in order to flatter the Christians. For the true, or orthodox, Moslems consider our Saviour as a creature, and Mohammed at the same time as scarce inferior to God himself, and derive the word Mohammed from the divine name MAHMUD. Some authors relate, that the substance of the second heaven was pure gold; and that the prophet saw twice as many angels there as in the first, and, amongst them, one of so prodigious a size that his head reached even to the third heaven. Al Bokhârî agrees with Abu Horeira in assigning Jesus and John a place in the second heaven, and Abraham one in the seventh<sup>l</sup>.

- GABRIEL and Mohammed being arrived at the third heaven, met with the same reception afterwards at there as before. This heaven, say some of the Mohammedan writers, was almost intirely the third; formed of precious stones; though others make it to have consisted of a sort of iron called Zaitun. Amongst the wonderful creatures of God that Mohammed saw here, there was a great angel, called The faithful of God, who had an hundred thousand other angels under his command. Some pretend that this angel was of so prodigious a size, that the distance between his eyes was equal to seventy thousand days journey, according to our rate of travelling here on earth. But here, as Dr. Prideaux observes, Mohammed was inconsistent with himself, since the distance between a man's eyes is, in proportion to his height, as one to seventy-two; so that, according to this computation, the angel's height must have been near fourteen thousand years journey, which is almost four times as much as the distance between the highest heaven and the earth: wherefore this angel could not have stood within any one of the heavens. He had a large table before him, in which he was continually writing some words, and blotting out others. Besides the former appellation, as Mohammed learned from Gabriel, he had another, viz, The angel of death. On the table here mentioned he is constantly employed, according to Gabriel, in writing the names of all that are to be born, computing the days of their lives, and blotting out those names, as he finds the persons to whom they belong to have completed the number of days assigned them. And, added Gabriel, whenever any name is erased, the person to whom it belongs immediately dies. Then Mohammed and his guide were saluted, continues the tradition, in a most friendly manner, by David and Solomon. To these Abu'lfeda and Al Bokbâri add Joseph; but tell us not whether he was the patriarch of that name, or the husband of the Virgin Mary, the mother of our LORD. At last having performed their devotions amongst the angels, after the manner of Abraham, the well-beloved of God, with two inclinations, they retired, and without delay set out for the fourth heaven. It must be remembered here, that the third heaven is about five hundred years journey, if we will give any credit to Abu Horeira's narration, from the second; as also that Gabriel and Mohammed traversed this immense quantity of space in about an hour's time <sup>m</sup>.

<sup>k</sup> ABU HOREIRA, AL BOKHAR. apud Abu'lfed. ubi sup. ut & ipse ABU'LFED. ibid. p. 34, 35. Lib. AGAR. PRID. & GUADAGNOL. ubi sup. AL TERMED. in lib. de vit. animal. AL KOR. MOHAMMED. f. xv. AL BEIDAWI, GAGN. ubi sup. p. 207—210.

<sup>l</sup> AL BOKHARI & ABU'LFED. ubi sup. Lib. AGAR. GUADAG. & PRID. ubi sup. ABU HOREIRA. GAGN. not. ad Abu'lfed. ubi sup. p. 35, 36. Vide etiam GAGN. la vie de Mahom. tom. prem. c. iii. p. 210, 211.

then he reaches the fourth.

Upon their arrival at the fourth heaven, they were admitted and received as before. Here Gabriel introduced Mohammed to Edris, or Enoch, according to Abu'lfeda; or, as others will have it, to Joseph, the son of Jacob. This person felicitated the two travellers, after their entrance, in the same manner that others had done before. The fourth heaven, if some of the Moslem writers may be credited, was made of a kind of silver, called Zohari; or, as others say, of emeralds. In this heaven he saw a vastly larger number of angels than in the former, and, amongst them, one so very tall that he reached from the third heaven to the fourth, which was also five hundred years journey. This angel, as the apostle learned from Gabriel, spent his time in weeping, and making great lamentations; which was occasioned by the sins of men, and the destruction which they thereby voluntarily bring upon themselves. Some Moslems also pretend, that Mohammed saw here another angel, seated on a throne of light, with a vast number of inferior spirits attending him on his right hand and on his left, and always ready to execute his orders, whose head reached to the seventh heaven, and his feet to the seventh earth. For the Mohammedans believe, that the number of earths corresponds with that of the heavens. After having performed their devotions with the number of inclinations used by Abraham, Gabriel and Mohammed took their leave, and made the proper dispositions for proceeding on their journey to the fifth heaven <sup>n</sup>.

From thence he proceeds to the fifth;

HERE they were admitted, as soon as they made themselves known to the porter, without any difficulty at all; and after their admission, met with Aaron, according to Abu'lfeda, who congratulated them on their arrival. This heaven also is about five hundred years journey distant from the preceding, and consists, as the tradition says, of an extremely pure sort of gold, called, from its fineness and purity, Al Safia; or, as others will have it, of adamant. Some pretend, that Moses found Mohammed here, and recommended himself to his prayers; as also Edris, or Enoch, who paid him uncommon honours. They also relate, that the fire of God's wrath is reserved for obdurate offenders, and particularly the wicked Arabs, in this place; and mention other particulars relating to it, that merit not the least attention <sup>o</sup>.

and afterwards to the sixth;

In the sixth heaven, if we will believe Abu'lfeda, Mohammed met with Moses, who called him his brother, but wept at the sight of him. The reason he gave for which was, because a boy, as he said, was sent after him, that would be instrumental in bringing more individuals of the nation to which he belonged to paradise, than there were Israelites or Jews in that happy region. This the Arabs interpret of their prophet and themselves. Some assert, that Gabriel and Mohammed found John the Baptist in the sixth heaven; and that he recommended himself to the prayers of the Arab prophet. We are also told, that this prophet saw many more angels in the sixth heaven than in the fifth, and in the fifth than the fourth. The matter of the sixth heaven, according to Mohammed's description of it, say some of the Moslems, was a precious stone, called Al Hâfala, that is, the clear and transparent. It ought to be remarked, that Al Bokbâri agrees with Abu Horeira in his relation of some of the circumstances attending the interview between Moses and Mohammed <sup>p</sup>.

then to the seventh.

FROM the sixth heaven Gabriel and the pretended apostle of the Arabs ascended into the seventh, which, say some of the Moslem traditions, was composed intirely of divine light; or, as others assert, of a red hyacinth, called Al La'ama. Some affirm, that Mohammed observed here an angel that was the largest of all God's creatures, and had seventy thousand heads, every one of which had seventy thousand faces, every one of which had seventy thousand mouths, every one of which had seventy thousand tongues, every one of which spoke seventy thousand languages, with all which he was continually celebrating the praises of the Almighty. Here Mohammed had an interview, according to Al Bokbâri, and some traditions of great authority amongst the Moslems, with a venerable old man, seated on a

<sup>m</sup> Ibidem ibid. & alibi

<sup>n</sup> Ibidem ibid.

<sup>o</sup> Ibidem ibid.

<sup>p</sup> Ibidem ibid.

- a throne of light, fixed to the house Al Ma'mûr, who, as Gabriel informed him, was Abraham, the father of the faithful, and the friend of God. Abraham treated him with the same respect that he had met with in every one of the inferior heavens; after which, he was elevated to the lote-tree, beyond which there was no passing. This tree, say the commentators, stands in the seventh heaven, on the right hand of the throne of God; and is the utmost limit, beyond which the angels themselves must not pass; or, as some rather imagine, beyond which no creature's knowledge can extend. The Korân seems to intimate, that what was under this tree, when Mohammed saw it, exceeded all number and description. Some suppose the whole host of angels worshipping beneath it, and others the birds sitting on its branches, to be intended in the passage of that book here referred to.
- b This tree, called by the Arabs Sedra, or Sedrat, as Abu'lfeda from the narration of Al Bokhârî relates, bears fruit that resemble the water-pots of Hajr, and leaves like the ears of elephants. The fruits are sweeter than either milk or honey, and one of them, according to the tradition of Ebn Abbâs, who received it immediately from Mohammed himself, is sufficient to sustain all God's creatures, if they were assembled in the seventh heaven. Here the pretended apostle saw four rivers, says Al Bokhârî; the two interior of which run in paradise with great rapidity, and the two exterior are the Nile and the Euphrates. The source of these, or the fountain from whence they spring, is under the tree Sedrat, and named in the Korân Salsabil. At this fountain the angel Gabriel left Mohammed, and was succeeded in his post of guide to the apostle by another angel, who went under the name of
- c Israfil, and informed the Arab prophet, according to Abu Horeira, that the four rivers here mentioned were called Al Cawthar, the Nile of Egypt, Sihân, and Jihân; and that they all ran from the aforesaid fountain, situated under the throne of God. With regard to the house Ma'mour, or Ma'mûr, that is, visited, it was visited daily, says the foregoing tradition, by seventy thousand angels; from which circumstance it seems to have received its name. The form of it was in all respects similar to the Al Harâm, or sacred temple at Mecca; and should it any time fall from the seventh heaven, it would, as some of the Moslems believe, fall perpendicularly upon this temple. Mohammed related, that it was built of red hyacinths, and adorned with an innumerable company of lamps, that were continually burning. The angels there informed him, as we find intimated in Abu Horeira's narrative, that they began to perform pilgrimages to this house, which sometimes in heaven was called Al Dhorâb, that is, placed at a great distance, as well as Al Ma'mûr, a thousand years before the creation of Adam. Mr. Gagnier observes, that the primitive Christians seem to have entertained the same opinion of the situation of the heavenly Jerusalem, in respect of the earthly one, that the Mohammedans do of that of the house Al Ma'mûr, in respect of the Harâm, or temple of Mecca; from whence we may infer the probability of Mohammed's receiving some hints in the narration now before us from several ancient Christian pieces, and particularly the apocryphal book, intitled, The Revelation of St. PETER, an Arabic version of which is preserved in the Bodleian library at Oxford. In proof of this opinion, our curious readers may find an extract from that book in those learned notes of Mr. Gagnier upon Abu'lfeda, that have been so often cited in this work <sup>a</sup>.
- e WE must not omit observing here, that the sixth heaven, according to the book Agar, was five hundred years journey distant from the fifth; as the seventh heaven was from the sixth. The author of that book likewise informs us, that Mohammed in the seventh heaven found JESUS CHRIST, and recommended himself to his prayers; which amounts to a clear acknowledgment in the Arab prophet of our Saviour's superiority. But Mr. Gagnier takes this to have been done, in order to flatter the Christians, by this writer himself; or else he thinks the passage in the original may have been misunderstood, and mistranslated, by Guadagnolus, who has not produced the Arabic text. For the staunch and orthodox Mohammedans entertain higher sentiments of their prophet, as has been already remarked. After
- f the apostle had been elevated to the house Al Ma'mûr, Gabriel brought to him three cups, one full of wine, another of milk, and the third of honey; upon which, he took the milk, and drank it, as the most proper of the three; and the angel approved of his choice. But, according to another tradition, he had only two cups offered him, one filled with milk, and the other with wine; and that upon his preferring the former to the latter, he heard a voice, saying, "Thou hast made a lucky choice, Mohammed; since, hadst thou drank of " the wine, thy nation would have deviated from the right path, and consequently in their " enterprizes have proved unsuccessful."

<sup>a</sup> Lib. AGAR, ABU HOREIRA, AL BOKHARI, ABU'LFED. ubi sup. AL JUZI in lib. de rit. peregrinat. Meccan. c. 77. ABD'ALLAH EBN AL ABBAS apud Abu Horeir. HADRIAN. RELAND. de relig. Mohammed. p. 38. Trajecti ad Rhenum, 1717. AL KOR. MOHAMMED f. liii. v. 14. JALLALO'DDIN. AL KOR. MOHAMMED. f. lxxvi. v. 18. AL BEIDAWI. Vide etiam JOAN. GAGN. not. in Abu'lfed. de vit. Mohammed. p. 37, 38. & la vie de Mahom. tom. prem. p. 223—234. <sup>r</sup> Lib. AGAR, & PHIL. GUADAGNOL. ubi supra. ALI EBN HAMZA ABU HASAN AL KASSAI in vit. prophet. PRID. ubi sup. ABU HOREIR. de ascension. Mohammed. AL BOKHAR. & ABU'LFED. ubi sup. Vide etiam JOAN. GAGN. not. in lfm. Abu'lfed. ubi sup. p. 35, 36, &c.

What happened to him after he approached the throne of God.

THE angel Gabriel not being permitted to advance any farther than the house Al Ma'mûr,<sup>a</sup> and the lote-tree above mentioned, there took his leave of Mohammed, who, by his direction, or that of the angel Israfil, ascended up the rest of the way to the throne of God by himself. Before he reached that glorious throne, says the tradition, he passed two seas of light, and one of a black colour, of an immense extent; he passed also through an infinity of angels, called Al Sâjedun, or adorers prostrating themselves, Mahalelun, or those who praise God, Carubun, or Cherubim, and Robanun, or spirituals. Some of the Mohammedans pretend, that he did not meet with Israfil, who supported the throne of God, till he approached that throne; tho' others believe, that this angel took Mohammed under his care as soon as Gabriel left him. Be that as it will, we are told, that Israfil has a million of heads, every every one of which has a million of mouths, to every one of which there is a million of b tongues; and that every one of these tongues speaks a million of different languages, in which this angel is day and night incessantly praising God. At last Mohammed, after having traversed almost infinite tracts of space, continues the relation, approached the immediate presence of God himself, when he heard a voice saying unto him, "O MOHAMMED, advance, and approach the glorious and powerful God;" upon which ascending higher, he saw a luminous appearance of a most transcendent brightness, and, at the divine command, drew so near to the Almighty, that he was scarce two (Z) bows length distant from him. On the right side of the throne, according to the prophet's relation, the names of God and Mohammed were written in the following Arabic words; LA ALLAH ILLA ALLAH, WA-MOHAMMED RASOUL ALLAH; i. e. THERE IS NO GOD BUT GOD, AND MOHAMMED IS HIS APOSTLE: which words, containing the two fundamental articles of faith of the Moslems, he also pretends to have found inscribed on all the gates of the seven heavens, through which he passed. Being thus introduced into the divine presence, as he tells us, he saw God sitting on his throne, who, as a mark of his favour, put one of his hands upon the prophet's breast, and the other upon his shoulder, the coldness of which was so intense that it pierced through every part; tho' immediately afterwards an ineffable sweetness and complacency, flowing from the divine presence, diffused itself over his soul, and filled him with a most perfect pleasure. After which, says the tradition, he had a long and familiar conference with God, who revealed many hidden mysteries to him, and instructed him in the knowledge of his law, gave him some rules for the better regulation of his conduct, and the more effectual communication of this knowledge to the people over whom he was to preside, and conferred many singular privileges upon him. Some of these were, that he should be the most perfect of all creatures; that he should be honoured and advanced above the rest of mankind; that he should be the redeemer of all believing in him; that he should be able to speak all languages; and that the spoils of all he conquered in war should belong to him alone. Lastly, he received a command from God to injoin his followers to pray fifty times a day; but afterwards meeting with Moses, who represented to him the impossibility of performing so tedious and fatiguing a duty, at his persuasion, he returned to the immediate presence of God, and prevailed upon him to oblige the Moslems to pray only five times in every twenty-four hours, and that at certain stated times. These, which seem to have been left to the determination of Mohammed and his successors, were the following: First, the prayer in the morning, before sun-rise; secondly, the prayer after noon, when the sun begins to decline from the meridian; thirdly, that in the afternoon, before sun-set; fourthly, that in the evening, after sun-set, and before the day be shut in; and fifthly, that after the day is shut in, and before the first watch of the night: to which some add a sixth, not as a prayer enjoined, but as a work of supererogation, called the singular prayer, which begins at the first watch of the night, and continues till day-break, or rather may be performed in any part of that space. As Mohammed, therefore, pretended to have received the divine command for this institution, from the throne of God himself, the observance of the stated times of prayer is frequently insisted on in the Korân, though they be f not therein particularly prescribed.

He returns to Mecca.

THE prophet having thus received full instructions immediately from the Almighty himself, thought now of descending into the lower regions, and visiting once more his friends up-

<sup>a</sup> Lib. AGAR, & ABU HOREIRA, ubi sup. Al Kor. MOHAMMED. ubi sup. & f. liii. v. 9. JALLALO'DDIN, AL BEIDAWI, ABU'LFED. ubi sup. p. 38, 39. Al Kor. MOHAMMED. f. v. ver. 7, 8. HADRIAN. RELAND. de relig. Mohammed. cap. viii, ix. p. 86, &c. PRIDEAUX's life of Mahomet, p. 39, 37. SALE's prelimin. disc. sect. 4v. Vid. etiam GAGN. not. in Abu'lfed. ubi sup. HOTTING. hist. ecclesiast. tom. vii. p. 470—529. BOBOV. in liturg. Turcic. post itiner. Abr. Peritfol, edit. p. 1, & seq. GRELOTIUS in itinerar. Constantinopolit. p. 253—264. LUDOVIC. MARRACC. in prodrom. Al Kor. CHARDIN. itinerar. tom. vii. p. 245—329. aliosque plurim. scriptor.

(Z) Dr. Prideaux, or rather Guadagnol, whose Latin version of the book of Agar he has followed, translates the Arabic word here two bow-shots; whereas it properly signifies two bows lengths, or two cubits length; however the Doctor might have met with the original word in the fifty-third chapter of the Korân (24).

(24) Prid. life of Moham. p. 36. Lond. 1718. Al Kor. Mohammed. f. liii. v. 9, & seq.

- a on earth. At a proper place, therefore, Gabriel met him again, and conducted him through various descents, and the seven heavens, to Jerusalem, where Al Borák waited for them. In their passage, they met with vast numbers of angels, all the way, who saluted them with the greatest demonstrations joy, and the most friendly felicitations. When they drew near to the earth, it was still extremely dark; but descending a little lower, they had just light enough to discover part of the kingdom of Armenia, and the province of Adkerbijan, which appeared to them like two small green garden-spots under them. At Jerusalem the prophet mounted Al Borák, and was attended by the angel Gabriel all the way to Mecca. Upon his arrival there, he said to Gabriel, "My people will, I apprehend, accuse me of telling them lies, and refuse to believe me, if I communicate to them the particulars of my night-journey to heaven." To which Gabriel replied, "Abu Becr, O Mohammed, the faithful witness, in that case, will sufficiently justify all the particulars of that wonderful event you shall please to enumerate to them."

- Thus have we obliged our curious readers with a circumstantial relation of Mohammed's night-journey to heaven, extracted from Abu'lfeda, Al Bokhâri, and the tradition ascribed to Abu Horeira, intitled, The history of the ascension; a MS. copy of which was presented by archbishop Marsh, late lord primate of Ireland, to the Bodleian library at Oxford. Mr. Gagnier has obliged the learned world with a French version of that piece; but of all this we could not pretend to give our readers here an English translation, as it would have swelled us beyond the bounds which we have been necessitated to prescribe to ourselves in this work. Besides, tho' we have not had time to compare Mr. Gagnier's version with the original Arabic, nor is this to our present purpose, we have some reason to believe, that this version is far from being faithful and exact. However, as that history, or narration, abounds with the most monstrous absurdities, and the most palpable fictions, that have nothing entertaining in them, our readers will not be sensible of any loss in, and consequently by no means regret, such an omission. As this history is a part of the Sonna, which contains not only all the juridical and ceremonial laws, supposed to have been derived from their prophet, in force amongst the Mohammedans, but also the histories and narrations attributed to Mohammed, which are either wholly omitted, or but just touched upon, in the Korân, tho' looked upon to be of equal authority with that book; 'tis plain, that all the Sonnites, or orthodox Mohammedans, hold their prophet's nocturnal journey to heaven to have been a real event. Since, therefore, this journey was one of the most eminent of Mohammed's miracles, as has been rightly observed by Mr. Gagnier, and the traditional account of it believed to be true, nay as true as the Korân, by all the Moslems, who receive the Sonna, or book of traditions of their prophet, as of canonical authority; we may fairly infer from thence, that Mohammed, in the opinion of the greatest part of his followers, at least, did not disclaim all along any power of performing miracles, or, which is the same thing, did not deny several extraordinary interpositions of the Supreme Being in his favour. And with these Mohammedans, in the point before us, concur many very authentick and reputable Christian writers. 'Tis true, Dr. Prideaux takes upon him to affirm, that Mohammed disclaimed all miracles; but in this that learned gentleman seems not altogether consistent with himself; since he elsewhere more than barely insinuates, that Mohammed invented the story of his journey to heaven, in order to answer the expectations of those who demanded some miracle as a proof of his mission, and consequently that he did not absolutely disclaim the power of performing miracles. Nay, he immediately subjoins, "that his journey to heaven must be acknowledged to have miracle enough in it, by all those who have faith to believe it;" that is, by all the Sonnites, who comprehend the greatest part, or rather the bulk, of the Mohammedans; from whence it appears, that, at least in their opinion, Mohammed did not only pretend to the power of working miracles, or, which is the same thing, gave out, that God was pleased to favour him with an extraordinary interposition, in order to forward the propagation of his religion, but likewise that he succeeded in his intention of convincing his followers of the truth of it. But that he arrogated to himself, on certain occasions, the power of suspending the common laws of nature, or, at least, that he pretended they were sometimes suspended on his account, seems to have been clearly implied, if not put beyond all doubt, by the Korân. We flatter ourselves, therefore, that what has been already advanced on his head, will be admitted by all our intelligent readers.

We must beg leave farther to observe, before we dismiss the point at present before us, that it is a dispute among the Mohammedan divines, whether their prophet's night-journey was really performed by him corporally, or whether it was only a dream or vision. Some think that the whole was no more than a vision; and allege an express tradition of Mohammed performed corporally.

* ABU HOREIR. ubi. sup. Lib. AGAR, & GUADAGNOL. ubi sup. PRID. life of Mahomet. p. 37. Lond. 1718. GAGN. la vie de Mahom. tom. prem. c. xii. p. 249—251. " Poc. not. in spec. hist. Arab. p. 298, &c. PRID. life of Mahomet, p. 31, &c. HADR. RELAND. de relig. Mahom. p. 68, &c. MILLIUS de Mohammedismo ante Mohammed. p. 368, 369. Vide etiam PRID. ubi sup. p. 28, 29. Al KOR. MOHAMMED. f. xvii. liv. v. 2, 3, & alib. & Al JANNAB. pass.

wiyah, one of Mohammed's successors, to that purpose. Others suppose he was carried bodily to Jerusalem, but no farther; and that he ascended thence to heaven in spirit only. But the received opinion is, that it was no vision, but that he was actually transported in the body to his journey's end; and if any impossibility be objected, they think it a sufficient answer to say, that it might be easily effected by an omnipotent agent. And that he was disposed to persuade them, that his body was actually conveyed to Jerusalem, at least, is a notion strongly countenanced, if not absolutely confirmed, by the authority of the Korân. But were the history of this memorable transaction only a part of the Sonna, or the collection of authentick traditions attested by Ayesha, the daughter of Abu Becr, whom Mohammed married after the death of Khadîjah, and who survived her husband about fifty years, Abu Horeira, the prophet's friend and most intimate companion, Ebn Abbâs, Ebn Omar, Jâber Ebn Abd'allah, and Anas Ebn Mâlec, it would amount to the same thing, as being of equal validity. The last of these handed down those traditions, and the relation of Mohammed's nocturnal journey amongst the rest, to Al Shâfi'i and Kottada, who delivered them to Abmed Ebn Hanbal (A), from whom Al Zobari, who first began to collect them, and commit them to writing, in the year of the Hejra 124, received them. After him, Al Bokhâri, the famous author, or rather compiler, of the Sonna, reduced all those traditions to one complete and entire body of pandects, in a book titled Al Sabih, that is, the sincere, because in it the author has distinguished the genuine from the spurious traditions, in the year of the Hejra 224. As to the night, in which Mohammed's journey to heaven was performed, the Moslem doctors are not perfectly agreed: some make it the night of the seventeenth day of the month of Ramadân; others place it in the former Rabi'a; and others, lastly, in the month of Rajeb. Which last seems to be the most prevailing opinion. For the Turks, at this day, celebrate the twentieth night of Rajeb as a grand festival, in commemoration of Mohammed's nocturnal journey to heaven; which they pretend happened on that night, as we are informed by a modern traveller, who was himself at Constantinople an eye-witness of it. It must be remembered here, that the aforesaid journey was performed, according to a certain author, notwithstanding the immense tract of space traversed in it, within the tenth part of a night; tho' this circumstance, it must be owned, has been omitted in the narrations of Abu Horeira and Al Bokhâri, as well as by the best Moslem commentators and historians <sup>w</sup>.

Abu Becr
vouches for his veracity.

WHEN Mohammed first told this story to his uncle Al Abbâs, and Om Hâna, the daughter of Abu Tâleb, it seemed so absurd and incredible to both of them, that they endeavoured by all means to dissuade him from communicating it to the Koreish. But being resolved to push the point in view, he was imprudent enough to relate the whole affair to Abu Jahl, one of the most active and inveterate of his enemies, who ridiculed him for it. Nay, he placed his relation in so ridiculous a light to the Koreish, that they were upon the point of insulting him; inasmuch that several of his followers left him upon it; and it had probably ruined the whole design, had not Abu Becr vouched for his veracity, and declared, that if Mohammed affirmed it to be true, he verily believed the whole. Which happy incident not only retrieved the prophet's credit, but increased it to such a decree, that he was secure of being able to make his disciples swallow whatever he pleased to impose on them for the future. Mr. Sale, therefore, thinks this fiction, notwithstanding its extravagance, was one of the most artful contrivances Mohammed ever put in practice, and what chiefly contributed to the raising his reputation to that great height to which it afterwards arrived. But this seems to be only judging by the event; since nothing could have a more direct and natural tendency, with submission to that ingenious gentleman's opinion, than such a series of the most gross and palpable absurdities, to overturn Mohammed's scheme, even had the Arabs not been so acute and discerning a nation as Mr. Sale himself is pleased to represent them <sup>x</sup>.

Many notwithstanding disbelieved Mo-hammed's relition.

ABU BECR's fidelity, and signal service, to Mohammed, so raised his character with that impostor, that, according to Al Kodai, he had the title of the faithful witness conferred upon him, tho' some believe he had before been distinguished by that appellation. And, indeed,

<sup>w</sup> ISM. ABU'LFED. de vit. Moham. xviii. p. 32. AL BEIDAWI, ATA, ABU HOREIRA, AL JANNAB. p. 54, &c. See also SALE's translat. and notes on the Kor. f. xvii. p. 227. AL KOR. MOHAMMED, f. xvii. & alibi. POC. RELAND. MILL. ubi supra. AL BOKHAR. GAGN. not. in Abu'lfed. ubi supra, p. 32, 33. AL SEIRAT. EBN AL JUZ apud ISM. Abu'lfed. ubi supra, p. 32. THO. SMITH, de morib. & institut. Turcar. p. 49. EBN KHALECAN, D'HERBEL. bibl. Orient. art. Zohari. SALE's prelim. disc. p. 156, 157, &c. PRID. life of Mahom. p. 37. Lib. AGAR, GUADAGNOL. &c. <sup>x</sup> ABU HOREIRA, AL KOR. MOHAMMED, f. xvii. HOTTING. hist. Orient. l. ii. c. 6. GAGN. la vie de Mahom. c. xiii. SALE's prelim. disc. p. 47.

(A) This Abmed Ebn Hanbal and Mohammed Ebn Edris Al Shafi'i, who was born either at Gaza or Ascalon in Palestine, the year of the Hejra 150, were contemporaries; but it appears from D'Herbelot, that Al Zobari, who died in the year of Hijra 124, lived near an hundred years before them. Mr. Gagnier, therefore, whom we have followed here, must be egregiously mistaken, when he asserts, that Al Zobari received the collection of traditions here mentioned from Al Shafi'i, Al Kottada, and Abmed Ebn Hanbal; which mistake our learned readers would do well to expunge out of that author's notes upon Abu'lfida (25).

(25) Ebn Khalecân, D'Herbel. biblioth. Orient. art. Zohari, &c. Joan. Gagn. not. in ISM Abu'lfed. de vit. Moham. c. xix. p. 33.

- a the extraordinary merit of his faith in the above-mentioned particular, highly deserved such an honourable mark of distinction. However, Mohammed found himself still obliged to combat several difficulties, before he could gain from his countrymen an intire assent to the preceding relation; and hence it is, that, in order to support the credit of it, he introduces God himself, in two passages of the Korân, to attest it. In one of which God is made to swear, that, in the whole story, Mohammed related nothing but what he had seen, and consequently what he knew to be strictly true. And even notwithstanding this, many of his countrymen, who had embraced Islamism, apostatized, according to Abu Horeira; whilst others of them, at the same time, most vigorously opposed him, out of a spirit of debate and contention. Nor has the story of Mohammed's night-journey to heaven, taken in the literal
- b sense, failed proving a stumbling-block to many Moslems in every age, since that famous journey is supposed to have happened; tho' it must be owned, that the generality of them have always most firmly believed the truth of it. Nay, from their adherence to such traditions as these, they have derived the name of Sonnites, or Traditionists; because they acknowledge the authority of the Sonna, or the collection of moral traditions of the sayings and actions of their prophet; which is a sort of supplement to the Korân, directing the observance of several things omitted in that book, and in name, as well as design, answering to the Mishna of the Jews<sup>7</sup>.

- As, therefore, the aforesaid traditions, together with what the orthodox Mohammedans call the constitutions of the Seniors (that is, of the Khalifs, who immediately succeeded the pretended prophet, and especially the four first) concerning them, collected, explained, and digested under proper heads, by the compilers of them, make up the sum of the Mohammedan theology, and contained so considerable a part of the Moslem religion; our curious readers will by no means think the account inserted here of Mohammed's journey to heaven too prolix, especially as that journey is to be considered as the foundation of those traditions; he pretending to have received, at least, many of them from God himself, as an invaluable collection of divine truths. Nor, indeed, can we enter into the true spirit and genius of Mohammedism, without such a description of that fictitious event; nor so clearly discover the immense difference between the monstrous lyes of the Korân, which sometimes alludes to it, and the sublime truths of the Gospel; nor consequently form an adequate idea of the unaccountable absurdity, as well as the most shocking impiety, of those favourers of the Korân,
- c or rather of deism itself, who have been educated in the principles of the Christian religion<sup>8</sup>.

- THE Socinians, as has been justly observed by Dr. Prideaux, seem to have had the Sonna before them, when they suppose, that our blessed Saviour was carried into heaven, and instructed there in the doctrines he was to teach, a little before he entered upon his prophetic function. This they do, in order to elude the force of those texts of Scripture, which, by asserting his descent from heaven, do clearly intimate his existence there as God, and consequently evince his real and proper divinity, before he took our nature upon him. But we must beg leave to observe, that tho' Mohammed, supposing him to have acknowledged the canonical authority of the holy Scriptures, and Socinus, were much upon a level; yet the present Socinians are more inexcusable, in the point before us, than the followers of that impostor. For
- e the latter are countenanced in their absurd notion of Mohammed's ascension by the Korân itself, and even fully persuaded of the truth of it, from what they find delivered in the Sonna, a book with them of the same authority; whereas the former have framed their impious fiction in direct opposition to Scripture, if not with a certain intention of invalidating the express testimony of those Sacred writings. Which is a plain demonstration of the difficulties to which they are reduced, in order to defend their antiscriptural and erroneous opinion<sup>9</sup>.

- To conclude this head, the Moslem doctors are not quite agreed, as to the manner in which their prophet saw God. Some maintain, that he saw his Creator with his real natural eyes; and others, that he viewed him with the eyes of the mind. The former notion is espoused upon the authority of Ata and Abu Horeira; but the latter is the most prevailing
- f opinion, as we learn from Al Jannâbi. In some sense or other, however, Mohammed's journey to heaven must be acknowledged by every orthodox Moslem; it being reputed by all the doctors of the law as heinous a crime, and as damnable an error, to deny the traditional history of that famous event, as to disbelieve any point insisted on in the Korân. On this occasion, it may not be improper to produce the words of the Khalif Omar, as they have been preserved by Al Jannâbi, on this subject. Being one day preaching in a mosque, and pushed by his zeal, he cried aloud: To deny the ascension of the prophet into heaven, is to open a gate to incredulity, and to deny the reality of one of the greatest miracles and the most wonderful works of the ALMIGHTY<sup>10</sup>.

The sum of the Mohammedan theology contained in the Sonna.

The Socinians more absurd than the Moslems.

The Moslems not agreed in their opinion of Mohammed's vision of God.

<sup>7</sup> ELMACIN, ubi sup. AL KOR. MOHAM. f. liii, & alibi. HOTTING. ubi sup. ABU HOREIRA, ATA, AL JANNAB. GAGN. ubi sup. c. xiv. ABU'LFED. ubi sup. c. xviii. p. 32. PRID. life of Mahom. p. 37, 38. Lond. 1718. POC. not. in spec. hist. Arab. p. 298. RELAND. de relig. Moham. p. 68, &c. MILLIUS de Mohammedismo ante Moham. p. 368, 369. SALE's prelim. discours. p. 154. <sup>8</sup> Ibidem ibid. EBN AL ATHIR, EBN AL KHASSAI, POCOC. ubi sup. PRID. life of Mahom. p. 39, 40. <sup>9</sup> PRID. ubi sup. p. 40, 41. AL KOR. MOHAM. f. xvii, liii, & alibi. AL BOKHAR. & ABU HOREIRA, ubi sup. <sup>10</sup> ATA, ABU HOREIRA, AL JANNAB. p. 54, 56. GAGN. ubi sup. c. xiv. p. 263, 264.

Twelve men of Medina take an oath to Mohammed.

IN this year, that is, the twelfth of Mohammed's mission, called by the Moslems the accepted year, twelve men of Yathreb, or Medina, of whom ten were of the tribe of Khazraj: and the other two of that of Aws, came to Mecca, and took an oath of fidelity to Mohammed at Al Akaba, a hill on the north of that city. Six of those of the tribe of Khazraj, according to Ebn Ishâk, had before resorted to Mohammed at the same place, on a similar occasion; viz. Saad Ebn Zarâra, Awf Ebn Al Hâreth, Rabe' Ebn Melk, Kotba Ebn Amâm, Okba Ebn Amer, and Jâbr Ebn Abd'allah. This oath was called the womens oath; not that any women were present at this time, but because a man was not thereby obliged to take up arms in defence of Mohammed, or his religion; it being the same oath that was afterwards exacted of the women, the form of which we have in the Korân, and is to this effect; viz. That they should renounce all idolatry; that they should not steal, nor commit fornication, nor kill their children (as the pagan Arabs used to do, when they apprehended they should not be able to maintain them) nor forge calumnies; and that they should obey the prophet in all things that were reasonable. And, as a reward for the due observance of this oath, he promised them paradise; but, on failure of such observance, he doomed them to eternal misery on the day of the resurrection. "In the mean time," added he, "whether you are to be punished or forgiven, I recommend you to the divine protection." When they had solemnly engaged to do all required of them, Mohammed sent one of his disciples, named Masâb Ebn Omair, home with them, to instruct them more fully in the grounds and ceremonies of his new religion. Masâb, being arrived at Medina, by the assistance of those who had been formerly converted, gained several proselytes, particularly Osaid Ebn Hodeira, a chief man of the city, and Saad Ebn Moâdh, prince of the tribe of Aws; Mohammedism spreading so fast, that there was scarce a house wherein there were not some who had embraced it. The principal of these were the Banu Abd'al Asbal and Asad Ebn Hosein, tho' the Banu Ommiya Ebn Zeid persisted still in their infidelity. Upon this, Masâb immediately wrote to Mohammed, giving him a full account of the happy success of his mission, and at the same time desiring of him leave to form a congregation of all those who professed Islamism at Medina. To this the prophet readily agreed; in consequence of which, the new Moslems assembled regularly, to the number of forty persons, in the house of Saad Ebn Khaithama. This missionary, therefore, by his diligence and activity, extended Mohammed's interest in Medina, before his arrival there; which not a little facilitated the execution of his grand scheme. The form used by Masâb, as we are told by Ebn Ishâk, of the initiation of the new converts, was conceived in the following terms: Wash yourself with water, purify your two garments, repeat the confession of your faith (THERE IS NO GOD BUT GOD, AND MOHAMMED IS HIS APOSTLE); and, lastly, say your prayers with two incurvations. The year we are now upon was stiled the accepted year, because in it the prophet's party was strengthened by the accession of Al Ansâr, the Ansârs, or his coadjutors and confederates of the tribes of Khazraj, who had before sworn obedience to him. And let this suffice for an account of the principal transactions of that most remarkable year <sup>c</sup>.

Several of that city swear fidelity to Mohammed.

THE next year, being the thirteenth of Mohammed's mission, Masâb returned to Mecca, accompanied by seventy-three men and two women of Medina, who had professed Islamism, besides some others who were as yet unbelievers. Of these several belonged to the tribe of Aws, and the rest to that of Khazraj. On their arrival, they immediately sent to Mohammed, and offered him their assistance, of which he was now in great need; for his adversaries were by this time grown so powerful in Mecca, that he could not stay there much longer without imminent danger: wherefore he accepted their proposal, and met them one night, by appointment, at Al Akaba, the hill above-mentioned, which then was in the occupation of the Banu Tafri; whom therefore we may suppose to have been some of Mohammed's adherents. At this interview he was attended by his uncle Al Abbâs, who, tho' he was not then a believer, wished his nephew well, and made a speech to those of Medina; wherein he told them, that as Mohammed was obliged to quit his native city, and to seek an asylum elsewhere; and as they had offered him their protection, they would do well not to deceive him; and that if they were not firmly resolved to defend and not betray him, they had better declare their minds, and let him provide for his safety in some other manner. Upon their protesting their sincerity, Mohammed swore to be faithful to them, a part of the Korân being before read to all present; on condition that they should protect him against all insults, as heartily as they would their own wives and families. After which, he permitted them to speak, and composed some differences between them. They then asked him what recompence they were to expect, if they should happen to be killed in his quarrel; he answered, Paradise. Whereupon they pledged their faith to him, and so returned home; after Mohammed had chosen twelve out of their number, who were to have the same authority amongst them as the twelve apostles of CHRIST had among his disciples. The form used by the Ansârs, or confederates, when they agreed to the prophet's proposal, or rather that

<sup>c</sup> ISM. ABU'LFED. ubi. sup. c. xx. p. 40, 41, 42. AL KODAI. ubi sup. EBN ISHAK. AL JANNAB. ABU ZEID. AL KOR. MOHAM. f. vi. v. 151. lx. v. 12.

- a of his uncle Al Abbās, was, WE HAVE HEARD IT WELL; which is taken notice of in the Korān. It must here be observed, that the oath taken on this occasion to defend Mohammed, amounted to a sort of declaration of war against both the Blacks and the Reds, that is, against all nations that should dare to oppose the establishment of the new religion. The promise of paradise, here mentioned, is supposed to be founded on those express words of the Korān—"And as to those who fight in defence of God's true religion, God will not suffer their works to perish: He will guide them, and dispose their heart aright; and he will lead them into paradise, of which HE hath told them." Nay, in order to inspire them with a superior degree of fortitude and resolution, he supported the promises of the Korān with the authority of THE LAW and THE GOSPEL, as is manifestly implied in the following words of the Korān: "Verily God hath purchased of the true believers their souls, and their substance, promising them the enjoyment of paradise; on condition that they fight for the cause of God: whether they slay, or be slain, the promise for the same is assuredly due by THE LAW and THE GOSPEL, and THE KORAN. And who performeth his contract more faithfully than God? Rejoice, therefore, in the contract which ye have made. This shall be great and unspeakable happiness." Having brought this important point to bear, Mohammed made the proper dispositions, in conjunction with his friends, for retiring from the city of Mecca <sup>d</sup>.

- As the declaration of the Anṣārs in his favour secured him a proper retreat, and for the present screened him effectually from the fury of his enemies, this may be considered as the foundation of his future greatness; it may therefore not be improper here to insert the names of the chief of them, whom he had dignified with the name, as well as authority, of apostles. 1. Abu Amama, or Aṣa'ad Ebn Zarāra. 2. Sa'ad Ebn Al Raba'. 3. Abd'allah Ebn Rawāba. 4. Rabe' Ebn Malec. 5. Al Bera Ebn Ma'rūr. 6. Abd'allah Ebn Omar Ebn Harām. 7. Abāda Ebn Al Sāma. 8. Sa'ad Ebn Abāda. 9. Al Mondar Ebn Omar. 10. Oṣaid Ebn Hodhair. 11. Sa'ad Ebn Khaithama. 12. Rafā'a Ebn Abd'al Mondar. The nine first of these belonged to the tribe of Khāzraj, and the other three to that of Aws. Some of the learned, however, in the room of the last of them, substitute Abu Haitham Ebn Al Yothān. According to a tradition of Abu Becr, preserved by Ebn Ishāk, when Mohammed elected them, he said, You are invested with the same power and authority that the apostles of Isa (JESUS) were, and I am the GREAT APOSTLE of all my people; to which they replied, It is undoubtedly so. If we will believe the same author, who pretends to have received his intelligence from Caab Ebn Malk, one of the Anṣārs then present, who himself heard it, when the confederates of Medina had taken the oath of fidelity to Mohammed, and were upon the point of returning home, the devil cried out with an exceeding loud voice, from the top of Al Akaba, O ye inhabitants of Al Jehājeb, why do you concern yourselves with Mohammed, the Sabian; for those with him are Sabians, and intend to make war upon you. Upon which, the prophet immediately said to them, This is the little fellow of the hill Al Akaba, the son of the disparager; and then directing his discourse to that malevolent spirit, O thou enemy of God, said he, thou canst do no mischief here; thou canst draw no prey into thy net; and then turning to his friends, Depart, said he, go and take your rest; which they accordingly did. That Mohammed was frequently by his enemies called a Sabian, we learn from Ebn Al Athir, as well as the Korān, where he endeavours to clear himself of that imputation, by declaring, that he only taught and professed the religion of Abraham, as has been already observed. For a full and ample account of the Sabians, who are mentioned in the Korān, we must beg leave to refer our readers to Hottinger, Abraham Ecchellensis, Euty chius, D'Herbelot, Hyde, Prideaux, Sale, and to what has been advanced concerning them in our ancient history of the Arabs <sup>e</sup>.

- MOHAMMED* finding now a confederacy formed in his favour, began to pull off the mask, Mohammed and to discover his true sentiments in relation to the means of reformation. Hitherto he had propagated his religion by fair means; so that the whole success of his enterprize, before the flight to Medina, must be attributed to persuasion only, and not to compulsion. For before the second oath of fealty, or inauguration, at Al Akaba, he had no permission to use any force at all; and in several places (B) of the Korān, which he pretended were revealed

<sup>d</sup> ISM. ABU'LFED. ubi sup. c. xxi. p. 42, 43, 44. AL KOR. MOHAM. f. v. v. 8. f. viii. v. 39. EBN ISHAK. AL JANNAB. Vide etiam AL KOR. MOHAM. f. xlvii. v. 5. f. ix. v. 113. GAGN. not. ad Abu'lfed. ubi sup. p. 43, 44. GREG. ABU'L-FAR. hist. dynast. p. 162. ELMACIN. lib. i. c. 1. PRID. life of Mahom. p. 42. <sup>e</sup> ISM. ABU'LFED. ubi sup. p. 40—44. EBN ISHAK, EBN HESHAM, EBN AL ATHIR, AL KOR. MOHAM. f. ii. v. 62. HOTTING. hist. Orient. lib. i. c. 8. ABR. ECHELLENS. Euty ch. vindic. par. ii. c. 7. Vide etiam D'HERBEL. PRID. POC. GOL. HYD. & Univ. Hist. vol. xviii. p. 381—384.

(B) Hence it very clearly appears, that the Korān is inconsistent with itself, and consequently can never be considered as a book of divine authority. For, in some places of it, Mohammed declares, that he had no permission to force or compel any person to embrace his religion; whereas, in others, he commands his followers to set up the true faith by the sword, and propagate it by persecution. But instances of this kind occur not seldom in that book; so that perhaps we may have an opportunity of inserting more of them in the sequel of this history (26).

(26) Sale's prelim. discours. p. 48, 49.

during his stay at Mecca, he declares his business was only to preach and admonish; that he had no authority to compel any person to embrace his religion; and that whether people believed, or not, was none of his concern, but belonged solely unto God. And he was so far from allowing his followers to use force, that he exhorted them to bear patiently those injuries which were offered them on account of their faith; and, when persecuted himself, chose rather to quit the place of his birth, says Mr. Sale, and retire to Medina, than to make any resistance. In which, however (as Mr. Sale himself is pleased to allow) there was no great virtue, as his adherents were in no-wise able to make head against their numerous and powerful enemies. This wonderful passiveness and moderation, therefore, seems intirely owing to his want of power, and the great superiority of his opposers, for the first twelve years of his mission; for no sooner was he enabled, by the assistance of those of Medina, to resist his enemies, than he gave out, that God had allowed him and his followers to defend themselves against the infidels; and at length, as his forces increased, he pretended to have the divine leave to attack them, to destroy idolatry, and set up the true faith by the sword. To this he was excited by an apprehension that his designs would proceed very slowly, if they were not utterly overthrown, by pacific measures; which determined him to have recourse to the most violent methods, even utter excision, for the more effectual conversion of the pagan Arabs, or rather the extension of his power, and the advancement of his authority. Nor do his followers at this day fail making use of the same means of conviction, on many occasions; being sufficiently authorized thereto by the example of their prophet, as well as the injunctions he has left them. The first passage of the Korân, which gave Mohammed the permission of defending himself by arms, is said to have been that in the twenty-second chapter; after which, a great number to the same purpose were pretended to be revealed<sup>f</sup>.

Mr. Sale
censured.

WE are told by Mr. Sale, who by citing, on this occasion, a passage in Machiavel with approbation, and even inserting it, makes it his own; "that innovators, when they depend solely upon their own strength, and can compel, seldom run any risque; that from hence it follows, that all the armed prophets have succeeded, and that the unarmed ones have failed, and therefore that Moses, Cyrus, Theseus, and Romulus, would not have been able to establish the observance of their institutions for any length of time, had they not been armed." Upon which most remarkable words, we shall only at present beg leave to make the following short reflection: Moses, according to what is here suggested, was as much an innovator as Cyrus, Theseus, and Romulus; in the establishment of his institutions, he depended solely on his own strength, and consequently no miracles, or extraordinary interpositions, of the Supreme Being, contributed any thing thereto; and therefore those books, which assert such interpositions, can be no means be deemed of divine authority. This must necessarily fix the imputation of imposture upon the writings of the sacred historian; and will of course induce us to entertain very unfavourable sentiments of the tenets adopted by those authors from whom such a suggestion comes<sup>g</sup>.

The Koreish
conspire to kill
Mohammed.

THE chief of the Koreish finding that Mohammed, notwithstanding the opposition they had given him, by his diligence, activity, and address, had considerably extended his influence; and having moreover received intelligence, that he had provided for the security of his companions, as well as his own, by the league offensive and defensive which he had now concluded with the Ansârs, began to be greatly alarmed. Fearing, therefore, the consequence of this new alliance, they began to think it absolutely necessary to prevent Mohammed's escape to Medina; and having held a council thereupon, after several milder expedients had been rejected, they came to a resolution that he should be killed. In order to effect this, they agreed that a man should be chosen out of every tribe for the execution of this design; and that each man should have a blow at him with his sword, that the guilt of his blood might fall equally on all the tribes, to whose united power the Hashemites were much inferior, and therefore durst not attempt to revenge their kinsman's death. Nor did they doubt but that they should effectually secure themselves from the fatal effects of his ambition by a salutary precaution. We are told by Al Jamâbi, that the council (C) above-mentioned was held in the palace of Kofa Ebn Kelâh, the wisest man among the Koreish; and that

<sup>f</sup> ISM. ABU'LFED. & GAGN. ubi sup. Al Kor. MOHAM. f. xxii. SALE's prelim. disc. p. 49. <sup>g</sup> MACHIAVELLI princ. c. 6. SALE, ubi sup.

(C) The following account of this affair is given by Al Beidawi. When the Meccans heard of the league entered into by Mohammed with those of Medina, being apprehensive of the consequence, they held a council, whereat, they say, the devil assisted, in the likeness of an old man of Najd. The point under consideration being what they should do with Mohammed, Abu'lakhtari was of opinion that he should be imprisoned, and the room walled up, except a little hole, through which he should have necessities given him, till he died. This the devil opposed, saying, that he might probably be released by some of his own party. Heshâm Ebn Amru was for banishing him: but this advice also the devil rejected; insisting, that Mohammed might engage some other tribes to his interest, and make war on them. At length Abu Jabl gave his opinion for putting him to death;

a that the devil himself, Mohammed's most inveterate enemy, in the shape of an old man, assisted at their deliberations. He intimated to them, that Mohammed, being crafty and eloquent, would easily insinuate himself into the good graces and affections of the people of Medina, and the neighbouring Arabs; insomuch that, after he had seduced them, he would soon be able to form a considerable army, and make himself master of Mecca. These suggestions of the ancient person of Najd, for that the evil spirit pretended to be, had such an effect upon the Koreish, that they produced the foregoing resolution. Abu Jahl also, Mohammed's implacable foe, who then made a considerable figure amongst the Koreish, and proposed the opinion that prevailed, greatly exerted himself on this occasion <sup>b</sup>.

In the mean time Mohammed directed his companions to repair to Medina, where, in con-
 b sequence of the late treaty, they might be assured of protection, which they accordingly did. But himself, with Abu Becr and Ali, staid behind, having not yet received the divine permission, as he pretended, to leave Mecca. Here he narrowly watched the motions of the Koreish, and was soon apprized of their machinations. For the foregoing conspiracy was scarce formed, when, by some means or other, it came to Mohammed's knowledge; and he gave out that it was revealed to him by the angel Gabriel, who had now ordered him to retire to Mecca. Whereupon, to amuse his enemies, he directed Ali to lie down in his place, and wrap himself up in his green cloak; which he did, and Mohammed, as the Moslems believe, escaped miraculously to Abu Becr's house, unperceived by the conspirators, who had already assembled at the prophet's door. The extreme danger Ali was in produced in his c mind an infinity of movements and agitations, which continued the whole night. For the conspirators looking through the crevice, and seeing Ali, whom they took to be Mohammed himself, asleep, remained watching there till morning, when Ali awoke, and they found themselves deceived. The Moslem historians and panegyrists bestow the highest encomiums upon Ali, for so generous and heroic an action. Abu'l-feda pretends, that when Mohammed, in his passage to Abu Becr's house, met some of the assassins, he repeated the nine first verses of the thirty-sixth chapter of the Korân, and immediately threw a handful of dust upon their heads; and that they thereupon were instantly stricken with blindness, so that they could not see him. The words supposed to be more particularly efficacious on this occasion, are the following: "And we have set a bar before them, and a bar behind them;
 d "and we have covered them with darkness; wherefore they shall not see." Ebn Ishâk relates, that of this plot the following passage of the eighth chapter of the Korân is to be primarily understood: "And call to mind when the unbelievers plotted against thee, that they "might either detain thee in bonds, or put thee to death, or expel thee the city; and they "plotted against thee: but God laid a plot against them, and God is the best layer of "plots." In fine, Mohammed, being thus pressed on all sides, found himself obliged at last to retire; which he did in company with Abu Becr, who could not forbear shedding tears at the deplorable situation of the prophet's affairs, and, by the direction of one Abd'allah Ebn Oraikat, an unbeliever, arrived at a cave (D) in mount Thûr, a hill a little to the south of Mecca <sup>i</sup>.

e It seems to be intimated by the Korân, that Abu Becr was so extremely dejected during his and the prophet's residence in the cave of Thûr, that Mohammed could not without great difficulty preserve his spirits from sinking. With regard to mount Thûr, it seems to be about an hour's journey to the south, or rather south-west, of Mecca. Mohammed, in his flight from Mecca to Medina, probably took a compass about the mountains and the maritime coast, described by Sharîf Al Edrisi, commonly called the Nubian geographer; so that he first reached Batn-Mar, and afterwards Osfân, Kodaïd, &c. This may be inferred from death; and proposed the manner; which was unanimously approved (27).

<sup>b</sup> ISM. ABU'LFED. ubi sup. c. xxiv. p. 50. AL JANNAB. p. 61, 62. EBN ISHAK, GAGN. la vie de Mahom. tom. prem. c. xvii. p. 280—283.

<sup>i</sup> ISM. ABU'LED. ubi sup. EBN ISHAK, AL JANNAB. ubi sup. AL KOR. MOHAM. f. xxxvi. v. 9. & f. viii. v. 26. AL BEIDAWI in comment. ad Al Kor. HOTTINGER, hist. Orient. lib. ii. c. 5. AL GHAZALI, PRID. life of Mahomet, p. 42.

(D) The Moslems have a tradition, that a party of the Koreish, being detached from Mecca to reconnoitre the mouth of the cave, when they came thither, found it covered by a spider's web, and a nest built by two pigeons at the entrance, which they saw, and which had laid two eggs therein. At which sight, they reasoned with themselves in this manner: "If any person had lately entered this cavern, the eggs now before us "would infallibly have been broke, and the spider's "web demolished; there can, therefore, be no body in

"it." After which, they immediately retired. As the prophet, therefore, and his friend, were now saved so miraculously, by means of the pigeons eggs, and the interposition of the spider's web, he afterwards enjoined his followers, in memory of so remarkable an event, to look upon pigeons as a sort of sacred animals, and never to kill a spider. Which veneration for pigeons, Mr. Gagnier thinks, might occasion the story of the pigeon, taught by Mohammed to come to his ears, in order to persuade the Arabs, that the Holy Ghost conversed with him. But as this is only a bare conjecture, our readers may allow what degree of credit to it they please (28).

(27) Al Beidawi. (28) Gagn. la vie de Mahomet, tom. prem. p. 289, 290, 291. Por. not. in spec. hist. Arab. p. 186. Hadr. Reland. de relig. Moham. p. 259—262.

Ebn Ishák. Abu Becr, before he left Mecca, had commanded his son Abd'allah to watch the motions of the Koreish, and bring him intelligence of what passed there; he had also taken care to give his servant Amer Ebn Fohêrah orders to carry a supply of provisions to the afore-said cavern. He and the prophet were frequently visited by his daughter Ajama, who brought them a considerable variety of refreshments. Al Damiri, in his history of animals, relates, that the pigeon is an animal held sacred among the Moslems, because God was pleased to deliver Mohammed miraculously, by means of two of them, from the infidel Arabs, who had surrounded that cavern, when he was there, in order to take him. We are told by Al Jannabi, and other Moslem historians, that Mohammed performed many miracles in the cave of Thûr, which produced a very good effect; tho' Abu'lfeda has not taken the least notice of them <sup>k</sup>.

He arrives safe at Medina.

HERE the prophet and Abu Becr took refuge for three days, and recovered themselves a little out of the consternation into which they had been thrown by the late bloody attempt of the Koreish. But the latter being informed of the route they had taken, sent a party after them, under the command of Sorâka Ebn Malec, the Madbehite, who coming up with them between Thûr and Medina, and offering to seize Mohammed, his horse fell down. Upon which, Sorâka desired the prophet to pray to God for him, that he might be screened from all impending dangers; and, in this case, promised to leave off pursuing him. This Mohammed did, and Sorâka mounted his horse again without receiving any hurt; but as, notwithstanding his promise, he still continued the pursuit, his horse fell down with him a second time, when he was remounted without the least contusion, upon the prophet's repeating his prayers to God for him. Upon this, the prophet looking at him, said, How will you behave yourself, O Sorâka, when you (E) shall have put on the bracelet of KERSA, or KHOSRU PARVIZ? Sorâka, therefore, returned to Mecca, without offering him any violence; and Mohammed, with Abu Becr and Abd'allah Ebn Oraikat, being thus delivered from his pursuers, arrived safe at Medina, where he met with a very favourable reception <sup>l</sup>.

Makes several proselytes before his entry into Medina.

HOWEVER, before he entered that city, he thought proper to stop at Kobâ, a village about two miles north-west of Medina, where he lodged four days at the house of one Calthum Ebn Al Hadam. Here he laid the foundation of a mosque, and called it Al Takwa, or the temple of piety; which was afterwards, according to some, built by the Banu Amru Ebn Awf. Before Mohammed reached Kobâ, he was met by one Boreida Ebn Al Hoseib, the Sabamite, at the head of the Banu Sabam, amounting to about seventy persons, who immediately embraced Islamism, after having taken an oath of fidelity and allegiance to the prophet. During his abode at Kobâ, he also received another proselyte of great note amongst the Mohammedans, and sufficiently known likewise amongst the Christians. This was the famous Salmân Al Farfi, or Salmân the Persian, who was of a good family at Ispahan, and, in his younger years, left the religion of his country to embrace Christianity; but travelling afterwards into Syria, he was advised by a certain monk of Amûria to go into Arabia, where a prophet was expected to arise about that time, who should establish the religion of Abraham; and whom he should know, among other things, by the seal of prophecy between his shoulders. Salmân, whose father was Dekan, or governor, of Ispahan, performed the journey, and meeting with Mohammed at Kobâ, where he rested in his flight to Medina, soon found him to be the person he sought, and professed Islam. The commentators on the Korân suppose this Salmân to have been the person mentioned in the sixteenth chapter of that book, and whom Dr. Prideaux confounds with Abd'allah Ebn Salam, the Jew, who was so intimate with Mohammed, and, according to some Christian writers, assisted him in the compiling his pretended revelations. It is said he died in the city of Al Madâyen, then the capital of Persia, of which he had been appointed governor by the Khalif Omar, in the thirty-fifth year of the Hejra <sup>m</sup>.

<sup>k</sup> AL KOR. MOHAM. f. ix. v. 42. ABU'LFED. ubi sup. p. 51. SHARIF. AL EDRISI, EBN ISHAK, AL JANNAB. AL DAMIRI, GAGN. la vie de Mahom. ubi sup. & not. ad Abu'lfed. c. xxiv. <sup>l</sup> ABU'LFED. ubi sup. p. 51, 52. ASSOHAÏLI, SHARIF AL EDRISI, AL JANNAB. GAGN. la vie de Mahom. tom. prem. liv. ii. c. xvii. p. 291—295. <sup>m</sup> ABU'LFED. ubi sup. p. 52. EBN ISHAK. Aut. lib. AL MOSHTAREK, apud Ism. Abu'lfed. in descript. Arab. p. 14. AL KOR. MOHAM. f. xvi. RICARD. confutat. legis Saracenicae, c. xiii. JOAN. ANDREAS, de confus. sect. Mahometan. c. ii. AL BEIDAWI, PRID. life of Mahom. p. 24, 25. GAGN. not. ad Abu'lfed. de vit. Mahom. p. 74, & la vie de Mahom. ubi sup. p. 296, 297, 298.

(E) The Moslems say, that these remarkable words are to be considered as a prophecy, or prediction, that was fulfilled in the fifteenth year of the Hejra, when the Khalif Omar gained a signal victory over Yezdegerd, the last king of the Persians, of the Sassanidae, at Kadesia. When the action was over, the bracelets, belt, and diadem, of the fugitive prince, which had formerly belonged to Khosrû Parviz, were brought to Omar, who calling Sorâka, then become a good Moslem, to him, caused him to put on those insignia of Yezdegerd. This he did, at the Khalif's command; but his hair being grey, and his arms very hairy, he exhibited a very odd and grotesque appearance. However, the Moslems urge this as a full proof of the completion of Mohammed's prophecy here, and consequently of his having had the knowledge of future events communicated to him (29).

- a MOHAMMED having left Kobâ the sixteenth of the former Rabî, early in the morning, arrived the same day, after he had fortunately, or, as the Moslems tell us, miraculously, escaped all the dangers that threatened him, at Medina. He was met at a small distance from the town by about five hundred of the inhabitants, who had notice given them of his approach by a Jew posted upon one of the highest towers of the city. He had no sooner entered the place than he was received with all possible demonstrations of joy, and conducted with Abu Becr, amidst the universal acclamations of the people, to the house of Abu Ayub Ebn Zeid, the Ansar, who carried the prophet's baggage upon his own shoulders to the apartment fitted up for him. Here he remained till he had built himself an house; which he immediately set about, and, adjoining thereto, also erected a mosque at the same time, for the exercise of his new religion. Hither his faithful friend Ali, in about three days time, repaired to him, after he had settled some affairs at Mecca. Abu Becr now was extremely chearful, seeing the prophet in so flourishing a situation; tho' he had before been so dejected, at the prospect of the imminent dangers which threatened him, that Mohammed found it necessary to raise his drooping spirits with those words recorded in the Korân, Be not grieved, for God is with us. In fine, the new converts became every day more and more numerous; insomuch that he doubted not but, in a short time, he should be able to carry the vast design he had formed into execution. It is intimated by Zonaras, that Mohammed, before he fled to Medina, which city that author calls Æthrib, a manifest corruption of Yathreb, the ancient name of this place, desired the emperor Heraclius to grant him a tract of ground to settle upon, with his followers, as they were obliged to leave Mecca, by the violence of the Koreish. Which request, according to the same writer, the emperor complied with; and the impostor, by way of return, pillaged the neighbouring part of Syria. But as this article is unsupported by any good Arab author, we shall not insist upon the truth of it here; and therefore our learned readers may allow it what degree of credit they please<sup>n</sup>.

- THE first thing Mohammed did, as has been just observed, after his arrival at Medina, was to build a temple, or mosque, for his religious worship, and an house for himself; which he did on a parcel of ground that had before served to put camels in, or, as others tell us, for a burying-ground, and belonged to Sabal and Soheil, the sons of Amru, who were orphans, and under the tutelage of Moâd Ebn Ofra. But others say, that the site of the temple belonged to Banu Al Najjâr, one of the most considerable tribes amongst the Arabs. Be that as it will, this action Dr. Prideaux exclaims against, representing it as a flagrant instance of injustice; since, as he affirms, Mohammed violently dispossessed these poor orphans, the sons of an inferior artificer (whom the author he quotes calls a carpenter) of this ground, and so founded the first fabric of his worship with the like wickedness as he did his religion. But, in answer to this, Mr. Sale thinks it sufficient to reply, "that, besides the improbability of Mohammed's acting in so impolitic a manner at his first coming, the Mohammedan writers set this affair in a quite different light. For one," continues he, "tells us, that the prophet treated with the lads about the price of the ground, but they desired he would accept it as a present; however," he goes on, "as historians of good credit assure us, he actually bought it, and the money was paid by Abu Becr. Besides," says the same author, "had Mohammed accepted it as a present, the orphans were in circumstances sufficient to have afforded it; for they were of a very good family of the tribe of Najjâr, and not the sons of a carpenter, as Dr. Prideaux's author writes, who took the word Najjâr, which signifies a carpenter, for an appellative; whereas it is a proper name." Mr. Gagnier also, from whom indeed Mr. Sale has borrowed his whole answer to what has been advanced by Dr. Prideaux, endeavours to overthrow the same notion, by citing Al Bokhârî, Al Jannâbi, Ahmed Ebn Yusef, and even the Korân itself, in support of the contrary opinion. This we thought ourselves obliged to take notice of, that our readers may be convinced of our strict impartiality in all dubious points, and the present one in particular; since, by laying before them what has been offered on both sides here, we put it in their power the more easily to determine to whose sentiments they will adhere<sup>o</sup>.

OUR readers will here observe, that Mohammed (F) made his grand entry into Medina on the sixteenth of the former Rabî, as has been just remarked, and not on the twelfth, as we find

<sup>n</sup> ISM. ABU'LFED. ubi sup. p. 50, 51, 52. AL MOSHTAREK, ubi sup. EBN SHOHNAH, AL KOR. MOHAM. f. ix. v. 42. GAGN. la vie de Mahom. tom. prem. liv. iii. c. 1. JOAN. ZONAR. annal tom. ii. p. 86. Parisiis, 1687. <sup>o</sup> ISM. ABU'LFED. & EBN SHOHNAH, ubi sup. AL BOKHAR. in Sonna. AHMED EBN YUSEF, AL KOR. MOHAM. f. iv. v. 126. f. vi. v. 152. f. xciii. v. 6. & alib. pass. PRID. life of Mahom. p. 44. Disputat. Christian. c. iv. SALE's prelm. discours. p. 51, 52. JOAN. GAGN. not. in Ism. Abu'lfed. de vit. Moham. p. 52, 53.

(F) Abu'lfeda gives a confused and indistinct account of this affair; but it is set in a clear light by Mr. Gagnier, from the best Moslem writers. But farther, that and the Arabian method of computing time.

Mohammed entered Mecca on the sixteenth, rather than the twelfth, of the former Rabî, appears from hence, that Medina is ten good days journey distant from Mecca; which

find intimated by Dr. Prideaux. The Doctor, in that point, runs counter to the best Mohammedan writers, and even to the whole stream of Moslem antiquity, for it appears from Abu'lfeda, and the other writers already cited, that the prophet and Abu Becr arrived at Khobâ on the twelfth of the former Rabî, and reached Medina four days after; that is, on the sixteenth of the aforesaid month. However, the Hejra, or flight of Mohammed from Mecca, happened on the first of the former Rabî; and that day afterwards became very famous among the Mohammedans. This remarkable event has supplied the Moslems with an era, called the Hejra, even to this very day, tho' it did not take place till the reign of the Khalif Omar, by whom it was first appointed, on the following occasion. A dispute arising between two of his subjects about the payment of a sum of money, which one of them pretended was due to him, the Khalif himself was applied to by the creditor, for his assistance in this affair. But the debtor alleging, that the month mentioned in the bill did not belong to the current year, but to the following, and consequently that the money was not then due; and there not appearing any date as to the year on the bill, the Khalif found it impossible to decide this controversy. In order, therefore, to remedy such defects, and prevent such inconveniencies, for the future, it was ordained, by the advice of his privy council, that all bills and other instruments should ever after have inserted in them the date both of the day of the month, and also of the year, in which they were signed. And as to the year, he was persuaded by Harmuzan, or Hormuz, a learned Persian, whom he consulted on this head, to order all computations to be made for the future from the flight of Mohammed from Mecca to Medina; for which reason this era was called the Hejra, that word, in the Arabic language, signifying a flight. However, the Arabs, after the example of the Romans and the Egyptians, on a similar occasion, made no alteration in the ancient form of their proper year. For it still consists of only three hundred fifty-four days, eight hours, and forty-eight minutes, as formerly; the Arabs still, as they always have done, computing by lunar months. As for the Khalif Omar, tho' he introduced a new era, yet he anticipated the computation from the event that gave rise to it fifty-nine days; beginning the year, as before, from the Neomenia, or first, of the month Al Mobarram, which precedes the first of the former Rabî fifty-nine days. The flight, therefore, or migration, of Mohammed from Mecca, in the Moslem computation of time, is supposed to have fallen upon the sixteenth of July, which answered to the first of Al Mobarram; tho', in reality, it happened on the first of the former Rabî, in the year of our LORD 622. However, in this, the present Arabs differ from their ancestors, that whereas the former, by intercalating seven months in nineteen years, after the manner of the Jews, reduced their lunar to solar years, and consequently had their months always fixed to the same season of the year, the latter, from the time of Mohammed, have intercalated a day on the second, fifth, seventh, tenth, thirteenth, fifteenth, eighteenth, twenty-first, twenty-fourth, twenty-sixth, and twenty-ninth years of the period formed by the odd hours and minutes exceeding the annual complement of three hundred fifty-four days, which consists of thirty years. The present Arabian year, therefore, in those parts of that period, has three hundred fifty-five days, by reason of the aforesaid intercalation. Which form of the year the Mohammedans strictly observe, they being confined to such a usage by a passage in the Korân; according to which, the intercalation of a month every third or second year, which the Arabs had learned of the Jews, in order to reduce their lunar to solar years, is absolutely unlawful. For, by this means, they fixed the time of the pilgrimage, and of the fast of Ramadân, to certain seasons of the year, which ought to be ambulatory. Hence it appears, that the beginning of the year, amongst the Moslems, is ambulatory and unfixed, the succeeding year always beginning eleven days sooner than the preceding; so that, in the period of thirty-three years, the first day of the Mohammedan year passes through summer, spring, winter, and autumn, and arrives again at the same time of the solar year, tho' not precisely at the same day. The decree of Omar, here mentioned, began to be in force about the eighteenth year of the Hejra, and the manner of computation enjoined therein has ever since prevailed amongst the Mohammedans. It has been already observed, in the ancient history of the Arabs, that it was usual with them, before the appointment of the Hejra, to compute from the last great war they were engaged in; whence it happened, that the war of the elephant, the impious war, &c. supplied them with eras at Mecca; so which place the prophet left on the first of the aforesaid month. For, as, in his journey from thence to Medina, he took a compass round about the maritime coast and the mountains, as has been already observed, and staid four days at Khobâ, besides three in the cave at Thûr, he could not possibly have reached Medina before the sixteenth day of the former Rabî, as even Abu'lfeda himself seems to intimate, tho' in apparent contradiction to what he had just before advanced. But this point is so exceeding clear, that at present we shall insist no farther upon it (30).

(30) Abu'lfed. de vit. Moham. c. xxiv. p. 52. Gagn. la vie de Mahom. tom. prem. liv. iii. c. 1. p. 300.

a that it would be intirely superfluous and unnecessary to give a farther account of every æra that preceded the Hejra here <sup>p</sup>.

BEFORE we dismiss this point, however, it may not be improper to inform our curious The ancient and modern names of the Arabian months. readers, that the names of the Arabian months are, Al Moharram, Safar, the former Rabî, the latter Rabî, the former Jomâda, the latter Jomâda, Rajeb, Shaabân, Ramadân, Shawâl, Dhu'lkaada, and Dhu'lhajja, the first, seventh, eleventh, and twelfth of which were held sacred by the Arabs. The first of these months consists of thirty days, and the second of twenty-nine; and so they go on alternately to the end of the year; only, in the intercalary years, the month Dhu'lhajja has thirty days, on account of the day added; but in all the other years only twenty-nine. The descendents of Kabtân, or Joëlan, the son of Ebr, who are called Al Arab Al Ariba, i. e. the genuine or pure Arabs, denominated their months Mutemer, Najir, Khavan, Savan, Ritma, Ida, Asam, Adil, Natil, Vaïl, Varna, and Burec; which words have not the least affinity with the present names. But the former were gradually lost, after Kelab, the son of Morrah, one of Mohammed's progenitors, imposed the latter, from certain accidents that happened in the months to which they were applied; and these having received a sanction from Mohammed's authority, who made the use of them one of the distinguishing marks of his followers, they have ever since prevailed. We might here give an account of another æra, of a later date, by which the Mohammedans of Persia computed in all civil affairs, called by them the æra of Yezdegerd, as it commenced ten years after the Hejra, in the very beginning of the reign of that prince, had this not been already done in our ancient history of the Persians <sup>a</sup>.

S E C T. II.

MOHAMMED finding the people of Medina intirely at his devotion, soon thoroughly established his new system of religion in that place. The city of Medina, which we have already described, was about ten days journey distant from Mecca, and stood in the northern part of Hejâz. At the time of Mohammed's retreat thither, it was inhabited partly by Jews, and partly by heretical Christians, who formed two different factions, that persecuted each other with no small fury and violence. This gave Mohammed as good an opportunity as could be desired of making new converts among them; and to this must be attributed the great and rapid success he met with in the execution of his favourite design. He had espoused Ayesha, the daughter of Abu Becr Al Seddik, above a year before he found himself obliged to abandon Mecca, tho' she was then not above seven years of age; but did not consummate his marriage with her till eight months after his retreat to Medina. She accompanied her husband in an expedition he undertook against the tribe of Mostalek, in the sixth year of the Hejra, when she was accused of disloyalty to his bed, as we shall relate more fully hereafter. According to Abu'lfeida and Al Bokhâri, she was not above nine years old when Mohammed began to cohabit with her, nor above eighteen at the time of that impostor's death. Some authors say, that, about this time also, he gave in marriage to Ali his daughter Fâtema, whom he considered as one of the most perfect of women, and who was the only one of his children that survived him <sup>r</sup>.

THE next point the pretended prophet had in view, was the union of the Mohâjerîn and the Ansârs. The Mohâjerîn, or refugees, were those of Mecca, who fled thence on account of their religion; and the Ansârs, or auxiliaries, were those of Medina, who received Mohammed, and his followers, into their protection, and assisted them against their enemies. After his new mosque and house, therefore, were finished, in order to facilitate this, and to attach both those bodies of Moslems more closely to his interests, he established a fraternity among them; the principal statute or maxim of which society was, "that they should not only treat one another like brethren, but likewise most cordially love and mutually cherish one another, to the utmost of their power." But lest even this should prove insufficient, and absolutely to effect what he proposed, he coupled the individuals of those two bodies; the principal pairs resulting from which particular union were the following: Abu Becr and Hareja Ebn Zeid, Abu Obeidab Ebn Al Jarab and Saad Ebn Moad, Omar Ebn Al Khattâb and <sup>p</sup> ABU'LFED. ubi sup. p. 52. EBN SHOHNAH, GOLII notæ ad Alfragan. p. 52, 53, 55. PRID. life of Mahom. p. 43. ABR. ECHELLENS. hist. Arab. p. i. c. 10. ALFRAGAN. element. astron. c. i. p. 67. Amstelodami, 1669. ELMACIN. ubi sup. c. i, & iii. EUTYCHIUS, GREG. ABU'L-FAR. Poc. not. in spec. hist. Arab. p. 172, 173. AL KOR. MOHAM. f. ix. AL KODAI de ritib. peregrinat. Meccan. PRID. ubi sup. p. 44, 45. SALE's prelim. disc. sect. iv, & vii. Univ. Hist. vol. xviii. p. 44. Lond. 1748. <sup>a</sup> GOLII notæ ad Alfragan. p. 3—9. R. SAAD. in vers. Arab. Pentat. Gen. c. x. v. 25. MOHAM. ALFRAGAN. element. astron. c. i. p. 1, EBN MASUD. SALE's prelim. disc. p. 8, 9. GREG. ABU'L-FAR. hist. dynast. p. 177, & p. 183. EUTYCHIUS. par. ii. p. 256, & p. 296. ELMACIN. lib. i. c. 2, & 4. ULUGH BEIGH, de cognitione epoch. c. 3. Univers. Hist. vol. xi. p. 206. <sup>r</sup> GOLII notæ ad Alfragan. p. 98. AL SHAHRESTAN. JOAN. ANDREAS, c. i. Poc. not. in spec. hist. Arab. p. 137. ISM. ABU'LFED. ubi sup. c. xxv. p. 53. AL JANNAB. AL BOKHARI, GAGN. la vie de Mahom. ubi sup. p. 302, 303. Vide etiam AL KOR. MOHAM. f. xxiv. GREG. ABU'L-FAR. hist. dynast. p. 165. Poc. not. in spec. hist. Arab. p. 183, & alibi.

Otbân Ebn Mâlec, Abda'l-Rahmân Ebn Awf and Saad Ebn Al Rabi', Othmân Ebn Affân and Aws Ebn Thâbet, Telha Ebn Obeid'allah and Caab Ebn Mâlec, Said Ebn Zeid and Obba Ebn Caab. Which institution, according to Abu'lfeda, was the last transaction of the first year of the Hejra <sup>a</sup>.

Changes the Kebla, and appoints the month of Ramadân for a fast.

THE second year of the Hejra, if we will believe the same author, was ushered in by a change of the Kebla (G), or the part to which the Mohammedans are to turn their faces in prayer. At first, Mohammed, and his followers, observed no particular rite in turning their faces towards any certain place, or quarter of the world, when they prayed; it being declared to be perfectly indifferent. Afterwards, when the prophet fled to Medina, he directed them to turn towards the temple of Jerusalem (probably to ingratiate himself with the Jews); which continued to be their Kebla for seventeen or eighteen months; but either finding the Jews too intractable, or despairing otherwise to gain the pagan Arabs, who could not forget their respect to the temple of Mecca, he ordered that prayers for the future should be towards the East. This change was made in the second year of the Hejra; and, as Jallalo'ddin relates, occasioned many to fall from him, taking offence at his inconstancy. This year also he appointed the month of Ramadân (H) for a fast, according to the same author; which fast likewise we find expressly enjoined in the second chapter of the Korân <sup>b</sup>.

ABOUT

<sup>a</sup> ABU'LFED. ubi sup. c. xxvi. p. 53. AL KOR. MOHAM. f. ix. AL JANNAB. p. 75. AL BEIDAWI. Vide etiam GAGN. la vie de Mahom. ubi sup. p. 303, 304. <sup>b</sup> ABU'LFED. ubi sup. p. 54. AL KOR. MOHAM. f. ii. v. 146. JALLALO'DDIN, AHMED EBN YAHHYA, GREG. ABU'L-FAR. p. 163. AL KODAI, JOANNES ANDREAS, c. vi. v. 10. BUXTORF. synagog. Judaic. c. x. MAIMONID. in Halachoth Tephillah, c. i. sect. 3.

(G) The Jews constantly pray with their faces turned towards Jerusalem, which has been their Kebla from the time it was first dedicated by Solomon; for which reason Daniel, praying in Chaldea, had the windows of his chamber open towards that city; and the same was the Kebla of Mohammed, and his followers, for seventeen or eighteen months, and till he found himself obliged to change it for the Caaba. The Arabs had directed their prayers towards that place from very remote antiquity, as the Sabians had theirs towards the North-star, and the Persians, who considered fire and light as their chief deities, towards the East; because in that quarter the sun first appeared, which they held to be the fountain of both; and therefore Mohammed, in order to gain them, found himself obliged to alter his original plan, in relation to the Kebla. Hence it came to pass, that Al Kebla was sometimes used among the Arabs to denote the Caaba itself; and the Mohammedans in general were called Ahlol KEBLA, or the people of the KEBLA, as we learn from some good authors. It may not be improper here to observe, that Mohammed seems to have copied most of the particulars comprised in his institution of prayer from the Jews, tho' he exceeded them in the number of his prayers. For they were directed to pray only three times a day, in the morning, in the evening, and within night, in imitation of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob; which practice was, at least, as early as the time of Daniel. The several postures used by the Mohammedans in their prayers are also the same with those prescribed by the Jewish Rabbins, and particularly the most solemn act of adoration, by prostrating themselves so as to touch the ground with their forehead; notwithstanding the latter pretend the practice of the former, in this respect, to be a relic of their ancient manner of paying their devotions to Baal-Peor. The Moslem precepts also relating to the cleanness of the place of prayer, and the garments wore during the performance of that duty, as well as the separation of the men from the women, at the same time, seem to have been derived from the Jews. Many other conformities between the Jewish and Mohammedan public worship might be here remarked, would the limits of the work we are at present engaged in permit. Our readers will observe, that Mohammed used the Jewish Kebla at least seventeen or eighteen months, as may be inferred from Abu'lfeda and Al Kodai, and not only six or seven, as we find advanced, without any manner of foundation, by Mr. Sale (31).

(H) The Mohammedans are obliged, by the express command of the Korân, to fast the whole month of Ramadân, from the time the new moon first appears till the appearance of the next new moon; during which time they must abstain from eating, drinking, and women, from day-break till night, or sun-set. This injunction the Moslems at present observe so strictly, that, while they fast, they suffer nothing to enter their mouths, or other parts of their body, esteeming the fast broken and null, if they smell perfumes, take a clyster or injection, bathe, or even purposely swallow their spittle; some being so cautious that they will not open their mouths to speak, lest they should breathe the air too freely. The fast is also deemed void, if a man kiss or touch a woman, or if he vomit designedly. But after sun-set they are allowed to refresh themselves, to eat and drink, and enjoy the company of their wives till day break; tho' the more rigid begin the fast again at midnight. This fast is extremely rigorous, when the month of Ramadân happens to fall in summer, on account of the length and heat of the days. The reason given by Mohammed why this month was pitched on for so solemn a fast is, that the Korân was then sent down from heaven. None of the Moslems are excused from it, except only travellers, sick persons, women with child, and giving suck, ancient people, and young children, who are all upon the same foot with those that are sick. But then all such are obliged to fast an equal number of days, as soon as they are capable of so doing; and, in the mean time, are ordered to expiate their breaking the fast by giving alms to the poor. Mohammed is reported to have said, that a fast of one day in a sacred month was better than a fast of thirty days in another month; and that a fast of one day in Ramadân was more meritorious than a fast of thirty days in a sacred month. Among the more commendable days is that of Asbûra, the tenth of Mohurram; which, according to some authors, was observed by the tribe of Koreish before the birth of Mohammed; tho' others maintain, that the prophet borrowed both the name and the fast from the a ABOUT this time, the prophet receiving advice, that a rich caravan of the Koreish was on the road from Shâm, or Syria, to Mecca, he detached his uncle Hamza, at the head of thirty horse, to seize upon it; who accordingly posted himself in one of the woods of Yamâma, through which it was to pass, for that purpose. But being informed, that the caravan was guarded by three hundred men, he thought fit to retire at their approach, as being too weak to attack them. He, therefore, returned to Medina, without making any attempt. We are also told, that, after this, some small parties were sent out to harass the Koreish, who found themselves not strong enough to annoy them. However the prophet made the proper dispositions for acting against them with success <sup>a</sup>.

(31) Gemâr. Bava Bathra, & Berachoth. 1 Kings, viii. 29, &c. Dan. vi. 10. Isr. Abu'lfed. ubi sup. p. 54. Al Kodai. Greg. Abu'l-Far. ubi sup. p. 163, & 281. Poc. not. in spec. hist. Arab. p. 147, 148. Al Shabrestan. Al Kor. Moham. f. ii. v. 143. f. iii. v. 96. Al Juzi, in lib. de peregrinat. Meccan. c. 67. Poc. ubi sup. p. 175. Lib. Mogreb. apud Al Khassai, apud Al Shabrestan. & apud Autor. Sharho'l-Mawakef. Al Firnuzabad. in Kam. Gen. xix. 27. xxiv. 63. xxviii. 11, &c. Dan. vi. 10. Millius de Mohammedismo ante Moham. p. 427, &c. Hyde, de rel. vet. Pers. p. 5, &c. Maimonid. in epist. ad profelyt. relig. Poc. ubi sup. p. 306. Maimon. in Halachoth Tephilla, c. ix. sect. 8, 9. Menura Hammur, fol. 28. 2. Sale's prelim. disc. p. 109.

Hamza not strong enough to attack one of the enemies caravans.

b WE have taken the liberty here to differ from Dr. Prideaux, who believes this attempt of Hamza to have been made in the first year of the Hejra. For such a notion is intirely unsupported by Abu'lfeda, whose authority is by no means inferior to that of Al Makîn, and the other author here cited; in the point before us. Besides, 'tis highly improbable, that Mohammed should have thought of committing any hostilities against the Koreish, before he had united the Mobâjerîn and the Ansâr, which did not happen till the first year of the Hejra was upon the point of expiring. For before he had effected that union, it would have been impossible for him to have drawn together any number of forces; which he must have done, before he could have thought of engaging in a war with the Koreish. Nor can it be inferred from Al Makîn, the principal author mentioned by Dr. Prideaux, on this occasion, that Hamza was sent out with a party against a caravan of the Koreish, in the first year of the Hejra, tho' he is pleased to intimate the contrary. We, therefore, hope our readers will not refuse concurring with us in so probable an opinion <sup>w</sup>.

c BUT farther, that Hamza's expedition was undertaken in the second, not the first, year of the Hejra, we learn from Al Jannâbi. That writer informs us, that, in the beginning of the latter Rabî, above a year after Mohammed's arrival at Mecca, the prophet sent Obeidah Ebn Al Hâreth, on whom he conferred the first pair of colours in his service, with a party of sixty or eighty horse, all Mobâjerîn, except one who was an Ansâr, to make reprisals on the Koreish. Obeidah, continues Al Jannâbi, in pursuance of his orders, set out from Medina, and, in his march, arrived at a well in Hejâz, called Khainat Al Haran, where he met with a party of the Koreish, who immediately prepared for an encounter. However, they parted without any effusion of blood, excepting only that Saad Ebn Abu Wakkâs, one of Obeidah's men, let fly an arrow that killed one of the Koreish; and this, says our author, was the first arrow that was shot after the introduction of Islamism into Arabia. Upon this, the infidels, believing that the Moslems were sustained by a larger body of troops, retired with great precipitation; and two Moslems, that were amongst them, took this opportunity to desert, and join Obeidah's detachment. The names of these were Al Makdâr Ebn Amru and Otha Ebn Ghazwân, the Mâzenite. A LITTLE WHILE AFTER, adds our author, the prophet dispatched his uncle Hamza at the head of thirty horse, all Mobâjerîn, towards the maritime coast of Hejaz; who, being arrived at a wood, met a party of eighty Meccan horse. Both sides prepared for action; but, by the interposition of Majda Ebn Amru, they parted without coming to blows. From this account, in conjunction with what we have already observed,

<sup>a</sup> ELMACIN. hist. Saracen. lib. i. c. 1. Disputat. Christian. c. 4. apud Vincent. Bellovac. in specul. histor. lib. xxiv. Par. 1531. & Theod. Bibliand. in Alcor. Latin. 1550. PRID. life of Mahom. p. 53. <sup>w</sup> Idem. ibid. ELMACIN. lib. i. c. 1. Disputat. Christian. c. 4. ABU'LFED. ubi sup. p. 53—55.

Jews. And this notion, it must be owned, is the most probable. For Mohammed seems to have followed the guidance of the Jews in his ordinances concerning fasting, no less than in the former particulars relating to prayer. Whence it came to pass, that the Moslems, as well as the Jews, abstain from meat, drink, women, and unctiion, from day-break until sun-set, and the stars begin to appear; spending the night in taking what refreshments they please, and excusing from the fast such persons as are not capable of observing it. Besides, this perfectly agrees with what we find related by Al Kazwîni, who informs us, that when Mohammed asked the Jews at Medina the reason why they fasted on the day of Ashûra, and they answered him, because Pharaoh and his people were on that day drowned in the Red Sea, Moses and the Israelites then escaping; he replied, that he bore a nearer relation to Moses than they, and ordered his followers likewise to fast on that day. However, if we will believe Ebn Al Athîr, having contracted afterwards an utter aversion to the Jews, he intended to have altered the fast and day of Ashûra, had he lived a year longer. Dr. Prideaux thinks that Mohammed instituted the fast of Ramadin, to answer Lent, in imitation of the Christians, with whom he was desirous of ingratiating himself, out of his hatred to the Jews, at the commencement of this institution. Ramadin is the ninth month; and, when the ancient Arabs reduced their lunar to solar years, by an intercalation of seven months in nineteen years, always fell in summer; from which circumstance it derived its name, which, in Arabic, denotes heat, or vehemency of heat. How the Turks at present observe this fast, our curious readers may be informed by a learned modern traveller, whom they will find cited in the margin (32).

(32) Al Kor. Moham. s. ii. xix. Al Beidawi, Poc. not. in carmen Tograi, p. 89, &c. Chardin, voy. de Perse, tom. ii. p. 421, 423, &c. Reland, de relig. Mohammed. p. 109, &c. Al Ghazâlî, Al Bârezi, in comment. aborat. ad Ebn Nobatæ, Siphra, fol. 252. 2. Josephoth ad Gemar. Yoma, fol. 34. Vide etiam Gemar. Yoma, fol. 40. & Maimon. in Halachoth Taniyth. c. v. s. 5. Gemar. Taniyth, fol. 12. & Yoma, fol. 83. & Es Hayim, Taniyth, c. i. Al Kazwîni; Ebn Al Athîr, Ebn Ahmed, Abu'lfed. Al Kodai, Al Makrizi, Poc. not. in spec. hist. Arab. p. 175. Al Jawhar. Golii not. ad Alfrâgan. p. 7. Sinith de morib. & institut. Turcar. p. 42, &c.

it indisputably appears, that Hamza's excursion was made, notwithstanding what has been advanced to the contrary by Dr. Prideaux, in the second year of the Hejra; and that no acts of hostility were committed the preceding year <sup>x</sup>.

Abd'allah
Ebn Hajash intercepts a caravan of
the Koreish.

MOHAMMED, having now provided for the safety of his companions as well as his own, being securely settled at Medina, and, by the prudent measures he had taken, consequential to the late offensive and defensive league, concluded with the Ansârs, finding himself in a condition not only to defend himself against the insults of his enemies, but even to attack them, began to send out, in earnest, parties to make reprisals on the Koreish. One of these, which he ordered to advance as far as Nakbla, under the command of Abd'allah Ebn Hajash, to get intelligence of the Koreish, consisting of no more than nine men, intercepted, and plundered, a caravan belonging to that tribe; and, after having killed one, took two of the escorte prisoners, in the action. One of these was called Nasir Ebn Waja. Nakbla is a valley, or place, situated between Al Tâyeef and Mecca, if Abu'lfeda's geographical description of Arabia in this point be exact. This small advantage animated the Moslems, and induced the prophet to think that he should gain as much reputation by his arms as his revelations <sup>y</sup>.

Gains the battle of Bedr.

BUT what the most established Mohammed's affairs, at this juncture, and was the foundation on which he built all his succeeding greatness, was the gaining of the battle of Bedr, which was fought in the second year of the Hejra, and is so famous in the Mohammedan history. Of this remarkable action, as well as some of the most material circumstances preceding and attending it, the Moslem writers have handed down to us the following particulars. The prophet having been informed by his spies, that Abu Sofiân Ebn Harb escorted a caravan of the Koreish, then on its return from Syria, with a guard of only thirty or forty men, resolved to advance at the head of a small detachment of his troops, to intercept it. To this he was excited by the riches of the caravan, which consisted of a large quantity of valuable merchandize, the produce of the country it came from, carried on the backs of a thousand camels. He first, therefore, sent out a party to reconnoitre it, with orders to post themselves in some place convenient for an ambuscade, where they might remain undiscovered by the enemy. But Abu Sofiân having notice of Mohammed's motions, immediately dispatched a courier to Mecca, with advice of his arrival on the frontiers of Hejâz, and of the designs of the Moslems; requesting his countrymen, at the same time, to send him speedy succours, that he might be able to defend the caravan. Upon which, Abu Jahl, and all the principal men of the city, except Abu Labeb, marched to his assistance, with a body of nine hundred and fifty men. Mohammed had no sooner received advice of this, than he drew together all his forces, which amounted to no more than three hundred and thirteen men, with which he advanced against the enemy. In the mean time he took care to leave a proper garrison in Medina, to defend it in case of any disaster, and made Omar Ebn Omm Ma'tum governor of the place, during his absence. In his army he had seventy-seven Mobâjerîn, on whom he seemed chiefly to depend; the rest being Ansârs, with whom he was supplied by the tribes of Khazraj and Aws. He first encamped at Safrâ, a port of the Red Sea above Al Jâr, another port about three days journey distant from Medina. Here he soon received intelligence, that the caravan he was in quest of, together with the escorte that attended it, was arrived at Bedr; and that the body of troops from Mecca was making forced marches to join Abu Sofiân. As he was encamped on the plain of Dâferân, to the right of Safrâ, and advantageously situated between two hills, the enemy could not easily have forced his camp, had they been disposed to attack him; and therefore here he could with safety, in conjunction with his officers, form a plan of the future operations. Which being done, he advanced into the neighbourhood of Bedr, and pitched his tents at a small distance from the enemy. But before this was done, he had had the precaution to choose a spot of ground to encamp on, which was nearer a well of water than that which had been before occupied for the same purpose by the forces of Abu Jahl and Abu Sofiân <sup>z</sup>.

THINGS had not been long in this situation before Mohammed ordered his men to march directly against the enemy; and, on the seventeenth of the month Ramadân, early in the morning, the army of the Koreish likewise appeared on the heights in the neighbourhood of Bedr. Before the beginning of the battle, Otha Ebn Rabîa, Shaïba Ebn Rabia, and Al Walid Ebn Otha, on the side of the Koreish, and Obeidab Ebn Al Hâreth, Hamza, and Ali, on the side of the Moslems, engaged in single combat; in which the three former were slain. This greatly animated the Moslems, and as much dejected the Koreish, who now seemed to a apprehend that victory would declare against them. In the mean time, Mohammed taking advantage of this lucky event, offered up his prayers to God with great fervency and vehemence; and then, feigning himself in a trance, pretended that God had promised him certain victory. After which, throwing a handful of dust towards the enemy, he said, May the faces of them be confounded; and then exhorting his men to behave valiantly, he commanded them to fall upon the Koreish. Upon which they charged them with such bravery, that they soon put them to flight; having killed seventy of the principal of them on the spot, and taken as many prisoners, with the loss of only fourteen men. Amongst the slain were Hântala Ebn Abu Sofiân, Obeidab Ebn Said, Zama'a Ebn Al Aswad, Abu'l Bakhtara Ebn Heshâm, Nawfal Ebn Khowailed, Omaïr Ebn Othmân, Masûd Ebn Ommiyah, b Abd'allah Ebn Al Mondar, Monba Ebn Al Habâj, Al As Ebn Monba, Bania Ebn Al Habâj, and Abu Jahl. Amongst the prisoners were Al Abbâs, the prophet's uncle, Okail Ebn Abu Tâleb, and Nawfal Ebn Al Hâreth Ebn Abd'al Motalléb. The dead bodies Mohammed ordered to be thrown into the well Bedr, which gave name to the place where the battle was fought, and originally belonged to an Arab so called. Having refreshed his troops, he quitted his camp on the sea-coast near mount Radwa, and returned to Safirâ, three days after the action<sup>a</sup>.

<sup>x</sup> AL JANNAB. & ABU'LFED. ubi sup. PRID. ubi sup. p. 53. <sup>y</sup> AL JANNAB. ISM. ABU'LFED. ubi sup. AL MASUDI, in lib. Al-Athârât, apud ISM. Abu'lfed. ibid. Vide etiam ejusdem Abu'lfed. descript. Arab. p. 55. <sup>z</sup> ELMACIN. p. 5. ISM. ABU'LFED de vit. Moham. c. xxvii. p. 56—51. AL KOR. MOHAM. f. ii, viii, xxxii, &c. AL BOKHARI in Sonna. AL JANNAB. p. 86, 87, 88, &c. EBN ISHAK, SHARIF AL EDRISI, HOTTINGER, hist. Oriental. lib. ii. c. 4.

AL BEIDAWI relates, that the Meccans, who marched to the assistance of the caravan, having advanced as far as Johfâ, were there met by a messenger from Abu Sofiân, to acquaint them that he thought himself out of danger, and therefore they might return
c home. Upon which, adds he, Abu Jahl, to give the greater opinion of the courage of himself and his companions, as well as of their readiness to assist their friends, swore that they would not return till they had been at Bedr, had there drank wine, entertained those who should be present, and diverted themselves with singing women. The event of which bravado proved fatal to them; several of the principal of the Koreish, as has been here observed, and Abu Jahl in particular, losing their lives in the expedition<sup>b</sup>.

WE are farther told by the Moslem writers, that Mohammed had no sooner received advice of Abu Jahl's approach, than Gabriel descended from heaven, with a promise that he should either take the caravan, or beat the succours; whereupon he consulted with his companions which of the two he should attack. Some of them were for setting upon the d caravan, saying, that they were not prepared to fight such a body of troops as Abu Jahl had with him: but this proposal was rejected by Mohammed, as the caravan was at a considerable distance, by the sea-side; whereas Abu Jahl was just upon them. This, however, did not satisfy the others, till, by the interposition of Abu Becr, Omar, Saad Ebn Obadah, and Mokdâd Ebn Amru, they acquiesced to the prophet's opinion. Mokdâd, in particular, assured the prophet, that they were all ready to obey his orders on all occasions. At which Mohammed smiled and applied himself to the Ansârs, who promised to follow him wherever he pleased, tho' it were into the sea. Upon which the prophet ordered them to attack the succours, assuring them of the victory; which, tho' it might seem not so considerable in itself, was of great advantage to him, and the foundation of all his future power and e success. Nay, it had such an immediate effect, that it caused both him and his followers to be treated with the highest respect by the Najâshi, who had received a particular account of it; and, in its consequences, was of vast importance to the Moslems. For it not only paved the way to the erection of the Moslem empire; then soon to commence, but may likewise be considered as a remote foundation of the present Ottoman power. It cannot, therefore, appear surprising, notwithstanding this has been treated with such contempt by Marracci, that the victory at Bedr should be so famous in the Arabian history, and more than once represented in the Korân as an effect of the divine assistance. The miracle, it is said by the Mohammedans, consisted in three things. 1. Mohammed, by the direction of the angel Gabriel, took a handful of gravel, and threw it towards the enemy in the attack;
f saying, May their faces be confounded; whereupon they immediately turned their backs; and fled. For the prophet pretends to be told in the Korân, that not he, but God, by the ministry of his angel, threw the gravel towards the unbelievers. 2. The Moslem troops seemed to the infidels to be twice as numerous as themselves, which greatly discouraged them. 3. God sent down to their assistance first a thousand, and afterwards three thousand, angels, led by Gabriel, mounted on his horse Haizûm; and, according to the Korân, these celestial auxiliaries did all the execution, tho' Mohammed's troops could not perceive them. They rode, say the commentators, on black and white horses, having on their heads white and yellow sashes, the ends of which hung down between their shoulders. In fine, according to these visionary writers, they first struck the Koreish with terror, throwing
g them into such a panic that they could never recover themselves, and then immediately dispatched them. This is the account given of the battle of Bedr, so fatal in its consequences to the Koreish, by the Moslem commentators and historians <sup>c</sup>.

<sup>a</sup> Idem Ibid. AL BEIDAWI, AL KOR. MOHAM. l. iii. GREGI AEU'L-FAR. hist. dynast. p. 163. PRID. life of Mahomet, p. 54.

<sup>b</sup> AL BEIDAWI.

Mohammed
settles the division of the spoils taken at Bedr;

NORWITHSTANDING this defeat, Abu Sofiân made a tolerable good retreat, and conducted the greatest part of the caravan safe to Mecca. This something chagrined the Moslems, tho' they found great spoils on the field of battle, part of the caravan falling into their hands. These, however, had like to have proved fatal to the victors themselves, as they could not agree about a division of them. The Ansârs, as having taking the Mobâjerîn into their protection, after they had been expelled their native city, insisted upon being rewarded with the largest share of them; which the Mobâjerîn, as they had been the prophet's original companions, and greatly distinguished themselves in the action, would by no means allow. This is Hottinger's representation of the case, but the commentators <sup>b</sup> on the Korân place the affair in another light: they relate, that the disputes about the division of the spoils taken at the battle of Bedr happened between the old men, who had staid under the ensigns, and the young men, who had fought; the latter insisting they ought to have the whole, and the former, that they deserved a share. Be this as it will, 'tis agreed on all hands, that these disputes ran so high, that Mohammed, in order to put an end to the contention, pretended to have received orders from heaven to divide the booty amongst them equally, having first taken therefrom a fifth part for the purposes mentioned in the eighth chapter of the Korân. Which chapter, say the Moslems, was revealed to compose matters between the contending parties, and conciliate the affections of both of them to the prophet, at this critical juncture. So that, to avoid all intestine broils and <sup>c</sup> dissensions, and every species of mutiny, the division of the spoils on all future similar occasions, is intirely settled, by Mohammed's decision after the battle of Bedr, which was founded upon the eighth chapter of the Korân, and is as follows: A fifth part is to be appropriated to the service of God, and the use of his prophet, his kindred, the orphans, the poor and the traveller; and the other four fifths are to be equally divided amongst those who shall be present at the action. But with regard to the distribution of the first fifth, the Mohammedan doctors are not absolutely agreed. Nor did, indeed, the pretended apostle, in his life time, always strictly adhere to the rule he himself had laid down, and which, with respect to his followers, he intended should be of perpetual force and obligation. For, by virtue of the divine commission, he pretended to have received, to distribute the spoil <sup>d</sup> among the soldiers at his own discretion, he took himself to be authorized, on extraordinary occasions, to distribute it as he thought fit, without observing an equality. Thus he did, for example, with the spoil of the tribe of Hawâzen, taken at the battle of Honein, which he bestowed by way of present on the Meccans only, passing by those of Medina, and highly distinguishing the principal Korashites, that he might ingratiate himself with them, after he had become master of their city. He was likewise allowed, in the expedition against those of Al Nadîr, to take the whole booty to himself, and to dispose thereof as he pleased, because no horses or camels were made use of in that expedition, but the whole army went on foot; and this became thenceforward a law: the reason of which seems to be, that the spoil taken by a party consisting of infantry only, should be considered as the more immediate gift of God, and <sup>e</sup> therefore properly left to the disposition of his apostle. But, for a farther account of this, and the other institutions of the Korân in civil affairs, we must beg leave to refer our curious readers to the learned Mr. Sale, who will give them full and ample satisfaction <sup>d</sup>.

and arrives
at Medina.

BUT to return to our history—On Monday, the 20th of Ramadân, the Moslem army decamped from Bedr, and returned to the port of Safrâ. Here the prophet took a review of his forces, and found that he had lost only six Mobâjerîn, and eight Ansârs, in the expedition. These the Moslems look upon as martyrs, and as such they are celebrated by Abu'lfeda. Soon after Mohammed's arrival at Safrâ, he ordered Ali to strike off the head of Al Nodar Ebn Al Hâreth, who seems to have been taken prisoner at the battle of Bedr, and was one of the prophet's most implacable enemies. Al Nodar, Abu Sofiân, Al Walîd, <sup>f</sup> Otha, Abu Jabl, and their comrades, who are all pointed at in the Korân, went one day to hear Mohammed repeat some of the verses of that book; and Nodar being afterwards asked what he said, answered, with an oath, that he knew not; only that he moved his tongue, and told a parcel of foolish stories, as he had done to them. The same person is likewise said to have brought with him from Persia the romance of Rostam and Isfandiyar, the two heroes of that country, recited it in the assemblies of the Koreish, and highly extolled the power and splendor of the ancient Persian kings, preferring their stories to those

<sup>c</sup> Al Kor. MOHAM. f. iii, viii, &c. AL BEIDAWI, AL WAKEDI, & AL NAISABURI, apud Abu Zeid Seid in lib. Splendor. ut & ipse ABU ZEID SEID, ibid. ASSOHAÏLI, LUDOVICUS MARRACCIUS in vit. Moham. p. 23. Vide etiam JOAN. GAGN. not. ad Abu'lfed. de vit. Moham. c. xxvii. p. 56—60. JALLALO'DDIN, AL ZAMAKHSHAR. &c. <sup>d</sup> Al Kor. MOHAM. f. viii. AL BEIDAWI, JALLALO'DDIN, HOTTINGER. ubi sup. AHMED EBN YAHYA, ABU'LFED. de vit. Moham. p. 99, 118, &c. PRID. life of Mahom. p. 54. SALE's prelim. discours. sect. vi. p. 144.

- a of Ad and Thamud, David and Solomon, and the rest which are told in the Korân. Such flights as these could not fail to render him extremely disagreeable to Mohammed, and were undoubtedly the cause of his death. Okba Ebn Abu Moait had likewise the same punishment inflicted upon him. This person, at the instigation of Obba Ebn Kbalf, set his foot on Mohammed's neck, and spit in his face in the public hall, where he found the prophet sitting; whereupon Mohammed told him, that if ever he met him out of Mecca, he would cut off his head. And he was as good as his word; for Okba, being now taken prisoner at the battle of Bedr, had his head struck off by Ali, at the prophet's command. After these executions, the army continued its march to Medina, where the prophet was received in triumph, amidst the universal acclamations of the people. But the public joy was not
- b a little interrupted by the death of Rakiab, the daughter of Mohammed, who was first married to Otha Ebn Abu Labeb, who repudiated her a little before he declared himself an enemy, in conjunction with his father, to the prophet; after which Othmân took her to wife, and had by her a son, named Abd'allab. Rakiab fled with her husband Othmân first into Ethiopia, and afterwards to Medina, where she died when her father Mohammed was at Bedr. Her son Abd'allab was destroyed by a cock, that put out one of his eyes, in the fourth year of the Hejra, when he was about six years of age. She was Mohammed's third daughter by Khadijah, as we learn from Al Kodai. The prophet, in nineteen days, the whole time he was absent from Medina, finished the Bedr expedition; which is the more to be wondered at, as he had not above two horses and seventy camels in his
- c army.

- THE Koreish, in order to be revenged of Mohammed for the late defeat at Bedr, resolved to send an embassy to the Najâshi, to desire him to put into their hands the Moslem refugees, who had taken sanctuary in Ethiopia. This we learn from Mohammed Ebn Abd'al Bâki; who likewise informs us, that the people of Mecca lost the whole caravan escorted to Bedr by Abu Sofiân. This loss, together with the bad success that attended their arms in the first engagement between their troops and those of the Moslems, made them despair of putting a stop to the progress of Islamism, without the assistance of some neighbouring power. In pursuance, therefore, of the resolution they had taken, they sent Amru Ebn Al As and Abd'allab Ebn Abu Rabia their ambassadors to the Najâshi, with skins or furs, the produce of their country, and other rich presents for that prince, and the lords of his court, to engage them the more effectually in their interest. Upon their arrival in Ethiopia, they distributed their presents to the best advantage, and obtained an audience of the Najâshi; but could not prevail upon him to deliver up the Moslem fugitives at his court into their hands, to be carried to Mecca, and punished there. The ambassadors, in order to carry their point, accused the Moslem refugees of speaking disrespectfully of Jesus, and his mother MARY; but the force of this accusation was eluded by Jaafar, the principal of them, when he produced the nineteenth chapter of the Korân, intitled, MARY, to the Najâshi, which, our author pretends, demonstrated the falsity of it. In fine, continues Ebn Abd'al Bâki, the Ethiopian monarch receiving at that time a courier from Mohammed, with advice of the great victory he had obtained over his enemies at Bedr, was so far from complying with the request of the Koreish, that he returned their presents, ordered their ambassadors to depart out of his dominions, and took Jaafar Ebn Abu Tâleb, with the other Moslems, who had been obliged to seek for shelter at his court, into his more immediate protection.
- d
- e

- f WE must beg leave to observe here, tho' it be by way of digression, that, according to Mohammed Ebn Abd'al Bâki, when the Najâshi received a formal relation from Mohammed of the defeat of the Koreish, he sent for Jaafar, and his companions, and told them that their prophet had gained a signal victory at Bedr; adding, that he had served one Saïd, of the Banu Dhamra, in the capacity of a shepherd, formerly there, and that he knew the place to abound with a plant called Erâk. From which curious particulars, in conjunction with the preceding paragraph, especially that part of it relating to Jesus, and his mother MARY, we may infer, that this prince had been formerly expelled his dominions, and obliged to follow the business of a shepherd, for a subsistence, in the province of Hejâz; that he had never intirely renounced the Christian religion, or embraced Islamism, notwithstanding what we find advanced to the contrary by Ebn Abd'al Bâki, and other Arabian authors; that the valley of Bedr was famous for a celebrated plant that it produced; and, finally, that the Moslem writers are justly to be suspected of partiality, and consequently not to be depended upon, when they assert so early an introduction of Islamism into Ethiopia.

<sup>c</sup> ISM. ABU'LFED. ubi sup. c. xxvii. p. 60. AL JANNAB. EBN. ISHAK, Al Kor. MOHAM. f. vi, viii, xxxi. &c. AL BEIDAWI, AL KODAI in hist. gen. GAGN. la vie de Mahom. p. 332—334, & p. 362. <sup>f</sup> ABU'L

MAALA ALAEDDIN MOHAMMED EBN ABD'AL BAKI in lib. de excellent. Habessinor. par. ii. c. 2. <sup>f</sup> Ibidem

ibid. ASSOHAILI. Vide etiam GAGN. not. in Abu'lfed. c. xxvii. p. 57. & la vie de Mahom. tom. prem. liv. iii.

c. 5. p. 334—341.

Mohammed
disperses the Banu Solaïm
and the Banu Ghatfan.

MOHAMMED having received advice, about seven days after his return to Medina, that the Banu Solaïm, and the Banu Ghatfan, had assembled a considerable body of troops near a well called Karkaret Al Codr, on the road frequented by the Arabs bordering upon Irak; in their pilgrimage to Mecca, where they committed some disorders, he was resolved to drive them from thence. For this purpose, he put himself at the head of two hundred men, and having constituted Ebn Omm Maclum governor of the town in his absence, advanced towards the said well; but the pagan Arabs, being apprized of his intention to surprise them, dispersed themselves at his approach. This happened in the beginning of the month Shawâl. However, he made himself master of several head of cattle, that they left behind them, and carried them off in triumph to Medina <sup>h</sup>.

The war of Al Sawik.

THE prophet spent the remainder of the month Shawâl, and all that of Dhu'l-kacda, with a youth he had taken prisoner in the last expedition, named Saïir; whom, after embracing Islamism, he had made his shepherd. But, in the following month, which was that of Dhu'l-hajja, Abu Sofân, who had sworn never to use either women or perfumes, till he had had another battle with Mohammed, set out from Mecca with a body of two hundred horse. He took his route through the country of the Nadrites, advanced to a post within three miles of Medina, and from thence sent a small party to a village called Oraïdb, which set fire to a barn, and burnt a man in it who was winnowing of wheat. From thence they made an excursion to the very walls of Medina, where they met with an Ansar, and another person with him, both of whom they put to the sword. Mohammed, being informed of this insult, moved immediately, with a detachment of horse, towards Abu Sofân; who, receiving intelligence of his march, fled with so much precipitation, that his men were obliged to leave behind them, on the road, all the sacks of meal, or flower, that they brought with them for their subsistence. He, therefore, contented himself with alarming the country through which he passed, and pillaging such as he suspected of favouring the designs of the prophet. From the preceding circumstance, this short expedition of Abu Sofân was stiled by the Arabs the war of AL SAWIK, or THE MEAL; alluding to the sacks abandoned by the Meccans at the approach of the Moslems <sup>i</sup>.

The Arabs
defeat the Persians.

WE are told by Abu'l-feda, that a great battle was fought this year, that is, the second of the Hejra, between the Arabs, under the conduct of Beqr Ebn Wâyel, and the Persians, commanded by Al Hâmeraz, Khosrû Parvîz's general, in the plain of Dhû Kâr; which, after an hour's dispute, ended in the defeat of the Persian army. Dhû Kâr is situated between Medina and Bosra, or Bostra, on the confines of Syria, at a small distance from Hira, the seat of the Arab kings surnamed Al Mondar; of whom we have already given a particular account in our ancient history of the Arabs. Khosrû having put one of these princes to death, commanded his successor to send him all the arms and military accoutrements of his predecessor Al Nooman. But Ayâs Ebn Kobaisa, for so was the reigning king of Hira called, or rather Hana Ebn Masûd, refusing to obey his orders, the Persian monarch sent an army against him; which was routed and put to flight by Ayâs's forces at the place above-mentioned. Mr. Gagnier endeavours to shew that Abu'l-feda is inconsistent with himself, when he places this action, in which Al Hâmeraz, the Persian general, was killed, and a great number of the Arab auxiliaries with him, in the second year of the Hejra <sup>k</sup>.

Ommeya Ebn
Abi'l-salt dies,

ABOUT this time died Ommeya Ebn Abi'l-salt, one of the principal of the infidel Koreish. The Mohammedans pretend, that, by reading the Scriptures, he found God would then send a prophet; and had the vanity to believe that he himself was the man. Mohammed's declaration, therefore, of his mission gave him great uneasiness; nor would he believe on him, as they affirm, through envy. Having undertaken a journey to Syria, he passed by Bedr; when, by Mohammed's order, the dead bodies, and, amongst the rest, those of Olba and Shaïba, his cousin-germans, were thrown into the pit above-mentioned. This so deeply affected him, that he is said to have cut off his camel's ears with his sword; and, through envy and grief, to have expired on the spot *.

as also Othmân Ebn Matûn.

THIS year also died Othmân Ebn Matûn, who was converted, say the commentators, to Moslemism by the following verse of the Korân: "Verily God commandeth justice, and the doing of good, and the giving up to kindred what shall be necessary; and he forbiddeth wickedness, iniquity, and oppression: he admonisheth you that you may remember." Which verse, according to them, contains the whole of our duty, with regard to what is either to be performed or avoided by us. This conversion rendered Othmân so famous, that his death is reckoned by Abu'l-feda amongst the remarkable events of the second year of the Hejra <sup>l</sup>.

<sup>h</sup> ABU'LFED. ubi sup. p. 62. AL JANNAB. p. 96.

Idem ibid.

<sup>k</sup> ISM. ABU'LFED.

de vit. Moham. c. xxx. p. 62. Vide etiam ABU'LFED. hist. general. sect. 4. & JOAN. GAGN. not. ad Abu'l-fed. ubi sup.

* ABU'LFED. de vit. Moham. p. 63. AL BEIDAWI, JALLALO'DDIN, AL ZAMAKHSHAR, &c.

<sup>l</sup> ISM. ABU'LFED. ubi sup. p. 62. AL BEIDAWI. AL KOR. MOHAM. f. xvi.

MOHAMMED,

- a MOHAMMED, soon after his establishment at Medina, entered into a treaty of alliance with the Jews of that place ; by which he granted them the enjoyment of all their privileges, and the free exercise of their religion. But a little above two years after the conclusion of this treaty, the Arab writers tell us, that the Jews violated it, on the following occasion. One of the Banu Kāinokā, a Jewish tribe settled at Medina, offering some indecency to an Arab woman, was killed by a Moslem, who was an eye-witness of the action. This so incensed the Jews, that they immediately surrounded the Moslem, and cut him in pieces ; upon which a great tumult ensued, the Moslems pouring in from all parts, to revenge their companion's death. However, the prophet himself interposing, for the present, prevented all disorders that might otherwise have been committed ; but refused to let the Jews
- b enjoy the advantages they were intitled to by the late treaty, unless they would renounce their religion, and embrace Islamism. This proposal they absolutely rejected ; and therefore he resolved to make war upon them in form. So that having trusted the government of the city of Medina with Bashir Ebn Abd'al Mondar, he besieged the Jews in their forts and retrenchments, during the space of fifteen days ; at the end of which they were obliged to surrender at discretion. The prophet being now master of their persons, ordered all the Jews, to the number of seven hundred men, among which were three hundred armed with cuirasses, to be put to the sword ; but Abd'allah Ebn Abu Solul, of the tribe of Khazraj, an infidel Arab, of great authority in Medina, interceded for them, as his confederates, and prevailed upon Mohammed to convert their destined punishment into perpetual
- c banishment. They were, therefore, immediately sent to the city of Adbraât in Syria, in consequence of this determination, there to remain in a perpetual state of exile ; by which means all their riches and valuable effects came into the hands of the Moslems. Amongst the beautiful arms they left behind them, there were three bows, three lances, two cuirasses and three swords, that the prophet took for his own use. One of the cuirasses, say some of the Moslems, David had on, when he slew the giant Goliath ; though the Scripture positively declares, that he was then unarmed, having laid aside the armour that Saul had given him. By changing the intended excision of the Jews into perpetual banishment, Mohammed gratified both his avarice and ambition. His avarice, as this made him master of all the properties of that people ; and his ambition, at the same time, as it enabled him
- d to oblige one of the most powerful infidel Arabs in Medina, and consequently not a little to extend his influence in that city. However, the bloody design he had formed, and from the execution of which he was, with no small difficulty, diverted by the interposition of Abd'allah Ebn Abu Solul, to omit an infinity of other instances to the same purpose that occur, is a sufficient proof of the barbarous and inhuman disposition of this most infamous impostor<sup>m</sup>.

OUR readers will here observe, that we have placed the war between Mohammed and the Banu Kāinokā in the third year of the Hejra, tho', according to Abu'lfeda, it happened in the second. But as Ebn Amīd, or Elmacinus, Al Tabari, Al Kodai, Al Jannūbi, and, in fine, almost all the other Moslem historians, have asserted that war to have been begun, carried e on, and concluded, in the month of Shawāl, and the third year of the Hejra, we have thought proper to prefer their united authority, in this point, to that of Abu'lfeda ; especially as so many remarkable events happened in the preceding year, that it seems more natural to refer this to that wherein it has been fixed by the former historians<sup>n</sup>.

- In the month of Sbaabān, this year, the prophet espoused Hafsa, the daughter of Omar, and espoused who was the widow of Hobeish Ebn Khodāfa, the Sahamite. She had for her dowry four hundred dirhems, and lived with her new husband eight years. Her death happened in the month of Sbaabān, and the year of the Hejra 45, in the Khalifat of Mou'wiyah, being then about sixty years of age. She was a woman of a fine shape, and has been greatly celebrated by the Moslem historians for her singular abstinence. It was to the custody of Hafsa that
- f Abu Becr, the first Khalif, or successor of Mohammed, committed the transcript of the Korān, which he had completed by the addition of a great number of passages, that were preserved by Mohammed's followers, and collected not only from the palm-leaves and skins on which they had been written, that they were kept between two boards, or covers, but also from the mouths of such as had gotten them by heart. Othmān, the third Khalif, caused a great number of copies to be taken from this transcript, and dispersed them over all the provinces of the empire ; suppressing, at the same time, by an order, the other transcripts that did not in all points agree with this of Hafsa. But of this we shall hereafter give a more particular account, when we come to treat of the general design, the peculiarities, and different editions, of the Korān<sup>o</sup>.

<sup>m</sup> ABU'LFED. ubi sup. p. 61. AL JANNAB. EBN ISHAK, ELMACIN. lib. i. c. 1. Vide etiam JOAN. GAGN. not. ad Abu'lfed. ubi sup. p. 61. <sup>n</sup> ISM. ABU'LFED. ubi sup. GEORG. EBN AMID, sive ELMACIN. ubi sup. AL TABAR. AL KODAI, AL JANNAB. &c. <sup>o</sup> EBN AMID in vit. Abu Bec. ISM. ABU'LFED. in vita Abu Bec.

The Moslems
plunder a rich caravan of the Koreish.

THE Koreish, after the late defeat, in order to avoid Mohammed's parties, resolved not to pass by Bedr, which had proved so fatal to them, but to take another route for the future with their caravans. In pursuance of this resolution, the famous Abu Sofiân, at the head of a Meccan caravan, took a compass, in his next journey to Syria, to the east of the province of Irâk. The merchants, at this time guarded by Abu Sofiân, carried with them a large sum of money, which rendered the caravan they formed more valuable than any of the preceding. Of this Mohammed was soon informed by his spies; and, upon his receiving the news, he immediately dispatched Zeid Ebn Hâretha, with 500 horse, to attack the Meccan troops under the command of Abu Sofiân. Zeid executed his orders so well, that he came up with the enemy at Al Karda, in the province of Najd; and, after defeating the escorte, made himself master of the caravan. With the riches of which he returned triumphantly to Medina; and the prophet, in conformity to his late injunction, took the fifth part of the money acquired on this occasion, consisting of 20,000, or, as others say, 25,000, dirhems, for his own use, and distributed the rest amongst the troops employed in the expedition <sup>p</sup>.

Caab Ebn Ashraf assasinated by Mo-hammed's order.

IN the third year of the Hejra, according to Abu'lfeda, Caab Ebn Al Ashraf, a Jew, was assassinated. This unhappy man was pointed at in the third chapter of the Korân. Being an inveterate enemy of Mohammed, after the battle of Bedr, he went to Mecca, and there, to excite the Koreish to revenge themselves, made and recited verses, lamenting the death of those who were slain in that battle, and reflecting very severely on Mohammed. Afterwards he returned to Medina, and had the boldness to repeat them publicly there also. This so exceedingly provoked Mohammed, that he proscribed him, and sent a party of men to kill him; and he was at last slain by Mohammed Ebn Moslema, the Ansar of the tribe of Aws, who circumvented him, in the year we are now upon. Salkân Ebn Salama, another Moslem, greatly contributed to the success of this enterprize, by amusing the Jew with some stories relating to the prophet, and afterwards insensibly drawing him to the place where Mohammed Ebn Moslema waited for him. Dr. Prideaux has confounded this Caab with another very different person of the same name, a famous poet, who was no Jew, but the son of Zohair, a pagan Arab. In consequence of this mistake, the Doctor wrongly affirms Caab the Jew to have prevented, by his future submission, the execution of Mohammed's bloody design. In the month of Ramadân, this same year, Mohammed's daughter Fâtima bore her husband Ali a son, to whom he gave the name of Al Hasan <sup>q</sup>.

The battle of Ohod.

THE Koreish, to revenge their loss at Bedr, the next year, being the third of the Hejra, assembled an army of 3,000 men, amongst whom there were 200 horse, and 700 armed with coats of mail. These forces marched under the conduct of Abu Sofiân Ebn Harb, attended by his wife Henda Bint Otba, and sat down at Dhû'lholeifa, a village about six miles from Medina. Mohammed being much inferior in number to the enemy, at first determined to keep himself within the town, and receive them there. This was also the sentiment of Abd'allah Ebn Abu Solûl, and some others. But afterwards the advice of the majority of his companions prevailing, he marched out against them at the head of 1,000 men, or, as some will have it, 1,050, or, according to others, 900 only, of whom 200 were cuirassiers; but he had no more than one horse, belonging to Abu Barda, besides his own, in his whole army. He distributed three standards amongst his troops, one of which was assigned to the soldiers of the tribe of Aws, another to those of the tribe of Khazraj, and the third to the Mohâjerîn. The grand standard was carried before the prophet by Mosaab Ebn Omaïr. With these forces Mohammed formed a camp in a village near Ohod, a mountain about four miles to the north of Medina, which he contrived to have on his back; and the better to secure his men from being surrounded, he placed 50 archers, the flower of his troops, in the rear, with strict orders not to quit their post. On the other hand, the army of the Koreish was drawn up in the form of a crescent, and made a tolerable good appearance. The right wing was commanded by Khâled Ebn Al Walid, the left by Acrema Ebn Abu Jabl, and the center by Abu Sofiân. The corps de reserve was headed by the heroine Henda Bint Otba, Abu Sofiân's wife, accompanied by fifteen other matrons, acting the part of drummers, and lamenting the fate of their countrymen slain at Bedr, in order to animate the troops that attended them. And Henda, in particular, cried out with all her might, Courage, you brave sons of Abd'al Dâr, Courage, fall on with all your swords. The Meccan forces consisted of some volunteers belonging to the tribe of Koreish, and a considerable body of Arabs, with which the people of Mecca were supplied by the tribe of Kenâna, and the inhabitants of the province of Tchama. Both armies now facing each other, expected the signal to be given in order to begin the attack <sup>r</sup>.

<sup>p</sup> AL JANNAB. ubi sup. p. 101.

<sup>q</sup> AL KOR. MOHAM. f. iii. ABU'LFED. ubi sup. p. 64. AL JANNAB. ubi sup. p. 102. AL BEIDAWI, PRID. life of Mahom. p. 59, 60.

<sup>r</sup> EBN AMID, lib. i. c. i. GREG. ABU'L-FAR. hist. dynast. p. 163. ABU'LFED. de vit. Moham. f. xxxi. p. 64—66. SHARIF AL EDRISI, vulg. geogr. Nubiens. clim. ii. par. 5. GOLII notæ ad Alfragan. p. 67. AL KOR. MOHAM. f. iii. AL BOKHARI, AL JANNAB. p. 106, 107, &c. JALLALO'DDIN, PRID. ubi sup.

a THE Moslems seeing things in this situation, by Mohammed's command, fell upon the enemy with such fury that they were not able to stand the shock, but immediately began to give way in the center. Ali, or, according to Abu'lfeda, Hamza, slew Arta, the enemies great standard-bearer; which struck them with such terror that they were thrown into confusion, and soon betook themselves to flight, falling foul upon their own corps de reserve. So that the Moslem troops had undoubtedly the advantage, notwithstanding their vast inferiority in point of number, in the beginning of the action<sup>a</sup>.

b BUT the Moslem archers posted in the rear, elated with this first instance of success, and carried away with the avidity of plunder, afterwards left their ranks for the sake of pillage, and quitted the post that had been assigned them. Seeing the enemy fly, contrary to Mohammed's express orders, they so dispersed themselves, that Abd'allah Ebn Jobair, their captain, tho' he made the utmost efforts to oblige them to keep their ranks, could not prevail upon ten men out of fifty to stand firm by him. Whereupon Khâled Ebn Al Walid, perceiving Mohammed's army to be greatly exposed, as being left intirely unsupported, and destitute of its principal defence, by the dispersion of the archers, immediately made a movement with his cavalry, and attacked the enemies rear with such bravery that he turned the fortune of the day. Not content with putting the troops posted there into disorder, he cried out with a loud voice, MOHAMMED is slain: which had such an effect upon the Moslems, that they soon took to their heels; nor could the prophet himself, notwithstanding all his endeavours, ever afterwards rally them. He therefore found himself obliged to abandon the field of battle, and was very near losing his life in the action; being struck down by a shower of stones, and wounded in the face with two arrows, which occasioned his two fore-teeth to drop out. He likewise received a contusion in his upper lip, and had even been killed upon the spot, had not Telba, one of his companions, Abu Becr's nephew, received a blow that was levelled at him. Telba received, on this occasion, a wound in his hand, which deprived him of the use of some of his fingers ever after. Of the Moslems 70 were slain, amongst whom were Hamza Ebn Abd'al Motaleb, Mohammed's uncle, and Mosaab Ebn Omair, his standard-bearer, who was mortally wounded by Ebn Kamia, the Laithite, and 22 of the Koreish. Amongst the wounded, on Mohammed's side, there were found Abu Becr, Omar, and Othmân; but as soon as they understood that the prophet was safe, for Ebn Kamia had given out, when he slew his standard-bearer, that he had killed him; they returned to the charge with a considerable body, and, after an obstinate dispute, carried off Mohammed to a neighbouring village. This battle, so fatal to the Mohammedans, was fought on Saturday, the seventh day of the month Sharwâl, in the third year of the Hejra<sup>b</sup>.

c THE good retreat made by Abu Becr, Omar, and Othmân, so intimidated the troops of Abu Sofiân, that they did not pursue the flying enemy, but contented themselves with remaining masters of the field of battle. Abu Sofiân made no farther advantage of his success, than to give Mohammed a challenge to meet him the next year at Bedr; which the prophet accepted. Some of the Moslem writers inform us, that as the Koreish were on their march home, they repented they had not utterly extirpated the Mohammedans, and began to think of going back to Medina for that purpose; but were prevented by a sudden consternation, or panic fear, which God sent upon them. In the mean time Mohammed, being informed of their intention, assembled all those who had stood by him in the field of battle, and advanced at the head of them to meet the enemy as far as Hamrâ Al Asad, about eight miles from Medina. But receiving advice afterwards that they had changed their resolution, he returned to Medina; and the Koreish continued their march home. However, they seem to have exulted not a little on the field of battle; Abu Sofiân, with part of Hamza's head fixed on the top or point of a lance, crying aloud, O HOBAL, thou art now exalted. It may not be improper here to remark, that there were no less than 360 idols, equalling in number the days of the Arabian year, in and about the Caab of Mecca; the chief of whom was this Hobal, brought from Belka in Syria into Arabia by Amru Ebn Lokai, who pretended it would procure them rain when they wanted it. It was the statue of a man made of red agate, which having by some accident lost a hand, the Koreish repaired it with one of gold. He held in his hand seven arrows, without heads or feathers, such as the Arabs used in divination. But for a full and ample account of the idolatry of the Arabs, we must beg leave to refer our readers to the ancient history of that nation, and to our future relation of the principal transactions of the eighth year of the Hejra<sup>c</sup>.

d AFTER Abu Sofiân's return to Mecca, he desired a truce with the Moslems; which was granted him by the prophet. In the mean time, Mohammed caused the body of Hamza Ebn

A truce between Mohammed and Abu Sofiân.

<sup>a</sup> Idem ibid. AL BERAI apud AL Bokhâr. GAGN. not. ad Abu'lfed ubi sup. p. 64—69.

<sup>b</sup> ABU'LFED.

Al Kor. MOHAM. AL JANNAB. GREG. ABUL-FAR. AL Bokhâr. ubi sup. AL BEIDAWI, GAGN. la vie de Mahom. tom. prem. lib. iii. c. 9. p. 359—363. Vide etiam EBN AMID, ubi sup. Disputat. Christian. c. 5. GREG. ABUL-FAR. hist. dynast. p. 185. <sup>c</sup> AL BEIDAWI, AL JANNAB. p. 111. ABU'LFED. ubi sup. p. 68. Poc. not. in spec. hist. Arab. p. 95. AL SHAHRESTAN. apud Pocockium, ubi sup. EBN AL ATHIR, SAPIO'DDIN. Vide etiam JOAN. GAGN. not. ad Abu'lfed. ubi sup. p. 63. & Universal. Hist. vol. xviii. c. xxi. p. 378—390. Lond. 1748.

Abd'al Motalleb to be interred, after having decently covered it with a black cloak. Some authors relate, that the Koreish abused the dead body of Hamza, by taking out his bowels, cutting off his ears and nose; which when Mohammed saw, he swore that if God granted him success, he would retaliate those cruelties on seventy of the Koreish; but he was afterwards, as the same writers infer from the Korân, expressly forbidden by God to put his design in execution. According to Abu'l feda, Mohammed prayed for the repose of every Moslem's soul who fell in the battle of Obod; which demonstrates, continues this author, that Abu Hanîfa was in the right, when he asserted the expediency of prayers for the martyrs; tho' the famous Al Shâfeï, a Moslem doctor celebrated for his knowledge in all parts of learning, was of a different opinion. The blow at Obod had liked to have proved the total ruin of Mohammed's affairs, and put an end to all his towering projects. For some of his followers pretended, that if he had been really a prophet sent by God, he could not have received such an overthrow from the infidel Koreish; and others were rendered furious by the loss of their friends and relations, who had been slain in the late engagement. But the more effectually to still the murmurs of the former, he attributed the defeat at Obod to the sins of some of the Moslems, who bore a share in that unfortunate action; and, to pacify the latter, he represented to them, that the time of every man's death is decreed and predetermined by God; and that those who fell in the battle could not have avoided their fate, had they staid at home; whereas they had now obtained the glorious advantage of dying martyrs for the faith, and were consequently translated to the regions of eternal bliss. Which last doctrine Mohammed made great use of in the Korân; the latter part of the third chapter of which book he pretended was communicated to him to raise the drooping courage of his followers, after the defeat at Obod, for the advancement of his designs. For by the assistance of this, he encouraged his adherents to fight without fear, and even desperately, for the propagation of their faith, by representing to them, that all their caution would not avert their inevitable destiny, or prolong their lives for a moment. By the same means he likewise deterred them from disobeying or rejecting him as an impostor, as setting before them the danger they might thereby incur of being, by the just judgment of God, abandoned to seduction, hardness of heart, and a reprobate mind, as a punishment for their obstinacy. Nor has this doctrine of God's absolute decree and predestination of both good and evil ceased generally to prevail among the Mohammedans ever since the time of their prophet; tho' it must be owned, that some of their most celebrated divines, looking upon the notion of such absolute election and reprobation as derogatory to the goodness and justice of God, and even as making him the author of sin, have not scrupled to maintain the contrary opinion *.

Mohammed
harraſſes the Aſadites;

Soon after the commencement of the fourth year of the Hejra, Mohammed, received intelligence, that Taliba and Salama, two chiefs of the Aſadites, had drawn together a body of men, in order to make an incursion upon the territory of Medina. He therefore detached fifty men, under the command of Abu Salama Ebn Abd'allah, the Makhzumite, to repress the courses of these robbers. Abu Salama taking Walid Ebn Nozeira, the Tayite, with him for his guide, soon entered the district of the Aſadites, where he committed great depredations; carrying off their shepherds, cattle, &c. without opposition. Some of the former, however, making their escape, informed their masters of what had happened; who thereupon immediately abandoned their habitations, of which the Moslems made themselves masters; and having thoroughly pillaged the country, returned loaded with spoil to Medina. This the prophet, after he had rewarded the guide for his fidelity, and reserved a fifth part for his own use, in conformity to what he had enjoined in the Korân, distributed amongst the persons concerned in the expedition; and it was so considerable, that seven camels, and a great number of sheep, fell to every man's share. This party was absent from Medina only ten days *.

and aſſaſſinates
Soſiân Ebn Khâled.

ABOUT the same time Mohammed was informed, that Soſiân Ebn Khâled, the Hodbeilite, was making preparations to attack him; he therefore gave Abd'allah Ebn Onaïs, surnamed Dhu'l Mahdbrat, that is, a man fit for any enterprize, a commission to assassinate him. This Abd'allah happily executed in the month of Al Moharram, at a place called Batu Arna, in the valley of Orsa; which so pleased Mohammed, that, when Abd'allah imparted the news of it to him, he gave him, in token of friendship, the cane he had in his hand; which Abd'allah ever afterwards carried about with him, and had it interred with him after his death *.

He ſends miſſionaries to the towns of Edhl and Al Kâra;

IN the month of Safar, the same year, deputies arrived at Medina from the towns of Edhl and Al Kâra; who, in the names of their principals, requested Mohammed to send some missionaries, to instruct them in the principles of the new religion. He therefore ordered the following six missionaries to attend him home: Thâbet Ebn Abu'l Aſlah, Khobaïb Ebn

* ABULFED. ubi sup. p. 68. AL BEIDAWI, JALLALO'DDIN, EBN KHALECAN. Vide etiam POC. not. in spec. hist. Arab. p. 294. 295, & alibi. AL KOR. MOHAM. f. iii. f. xcvi. et alibi. AL ZAMAKHSHAR. AL BEIDAWI, JALLALO'DDIN, RICAUT'S hist. of the present state of the Ottoman empire, book ii. c. 3. PRID. life of Mahom. p. 6:.

* AL JANNAB. ubi sup. p. 113. AL KOR. MOHAM. f. viii. AL JANNAB. ubi sup. p. 114.

a Ada, Morthad Ebn Abu Morthad, the Anwite, Khâled Al Bokeir, the Laiibite, Zeid Ebn Al Dathnata, and Abd'allah Ebn Târek. Out of these he selected Morthad Ebn Abu Morthad to preside over the rest, and consequently appointed him the superior of the mission <sup>2</sup>.

UPON their arrival at a place called Al Raji, a fountain belonging to the Hodheilites, the deputies fell upon the Moslems, whom Mohammed had sent with them; to instruct their countrymen, and killed three of them upon the spot, making at the same time the other three prisoners. One of these last they afterwards stoned to death; because he attempted to make his escape. The other two they sold to the Koreish, who put them to death soon after their arrival at Mecca <sup>a</sup>.

IN the same month of Safar, the prophet sent Al Mondar Ebn Omar, with seventy missionaries, amongst whom was Amer Ebn Fokeira, Abu Becr's servant, to the province of Najd. As soon as they arrived at Bir Ma'ûna, a place about four days journey distant from Medina, they sent the prophet's letter, directed to Amer Ebn Al Toseil, who presided over the Arabs of Najd, to that prince; who slew the messenger that brought it, and then marched with a body of troops against the missionaries. These he soon came up with, and put all of them to the sword, except Caab Ebn Zeid, who afterwards fell in the battle of the ditch. After this, Mohammed formed a design to assassinate his inveterate and most implacable enemy Abu Sofiân; but Anru Ebn Ommeya, the Dhamrite, the person employed on this occasion, was discovered before he could carry it into execution. By such barbarous and inhuman means did the pretended prophet, or rather the infamous impostor, attempt to propagate his religion; when he found that milder methods proved ineffectual <sup>b</sup>.

THE next expedition undertaken by Mohammed was that against the Jews of the tribe of Al Nadir, who dwelt in Medina, and when Mohammed fled thither from Mecca, promised him to stand neuter between him and his opponents, and concluded a treaty with him to that purpose. When he had gained the battle of Bedr, they confessed that he was the prophet described in the law: but, upon his receiving the disgrace at Obod, they changed their note; and Caab Ebn Al Ashraf, with forty horse, went and made a league with Abu Sofiân, which they confirmed by oath. Upon this, Mohammed got Caab dispatched, and, in the fourth year of the Hejra, set forward against Al Nadir, and besieged them in their fortrefs, which stood about three miles from Medina, for six days; at the end of which they capitulated, and were allowed to depart, on condition that they should intirely quit that place. They marched out accordingly with drums beating; &c. some of them retiring into Syria, and others to Kbaibar and Hira. The commentators on the Korân pretend that the fifty-ninth chapter of that book was revealed from heaven on occasion of this war. 'Tis remarkable, that Mohammed took the whole booty to himself, and disposed of it as he pleased after the Jews evacuated the territory of Medina, because no horses or camels were made use of in this expedition; the reason of which has been already assigned. It ought to be observed here, that the prophet divided the spoil amongst the Mohâjerîn almost solely, none of the Ansârs being allowed to partake of it, except Sahal Ebn Hasfa and Abu Dabana, who were persons of uncommon merit and integrity, tho' reduced to a necessitous condition. The Banu Nadir defended their fortrefs with great bravery, repulsing the besiegers in several attacks, in hopes that they should be succoured by the troops under the command of Abd'allah Ebn Obba Abu Solûl, of the tribe of Kbazraj; but he could not arrive soon enough with his forces to oblige the Moslems to raise the siege <sup>c</sup>.

ABOUT this time, according to Abu'lfeda, that passage of the Korân, prohibiting the use of wine, and all inebriating liquors, as well as all games of chance, was revealed to Mohammed. Both these practices seem to have been forbidden for the same reasons, viz. to prevent quarrels and disturbances; as also any neglect, or at least indecencies, in the performances of religious duties. And, indeed, these are assigned as the true reasons of the prohibition in the Korân. Had either an indifferency with regard to religion, or any animosities amongst the professors of Islamism, at that time, prevailed, the pretended prophet must then have infallibly fallen a sacrifice to the fury of his enraged and implacable enemies; or rather to his own avarice, barbarity, and insatiable ambition. Nay, we are told by some good authors, that several of the leaders of the Moslems, being heated with wine, and deeply engaged at play, did, at this time, actually quarrel amongst themselves; which was near proving fatal to the impostor. And this, in reality, seems to have been the immediate cause of the negative precept now before us; tho' Mr. Sale, in opposition to some good authors, with his usual candour, more than insinuates the contrary. So unwilling is he to see any thing crafty or self-interested in his hero's conduct, even tho' by this manifest partiality, in some respect, he seems to weaken the authority of the Korân <sup>d</sup>.

BE

<sup>a</sup> ABU'LFED. ubi sup. c. 33. p. 69. ABU HOREIRA, AL BOKHAR. in Son. ut et ipse AL BOKHAR. ibid.

<sup>b</sup> Idem ibid. <sup>c</sup> ABU'LFED. ubi sup. c. xxxiv. p. 70. AL BOKHAR. ubi sup. EBN ISHAK, AL JANNAB. ubi sup. Vide etiam JOAN. GAGN. not. ad Abu'lfed. ubi sup. p. 70. <sup>d</sup> ISM. ABU'LFED. ubi sup. c. xxxv. p. 71.

ABU SALID AL NAISABURIENS, AL WAKEDI, ABU ZEID. in lib. splendor. AL KOR. MOHAM. f. viii. & f. lix. AL JANNAB. JALLALO'DDIN, EBN AMID, AL EE.DAWI, GREG. ABU'L-FAR. ubi sup. p. 102. <sup>e</sup> ISM.

ABU'LFED.

The Mohammedans at present abstain from inebriating liquors.

BE this as it will, the drinking of wine, under which name all sorts of strong and inebriating liquors are comprehended, is more than once forbidden in the Korân. Some indeed have imagined that excess therein is only prohibited; and that the moderate use of wine is allowed by two passages in the same book. But the more received opinion is, that to drink any strong liquors, either in a lesser quantity or a greater, is absolutely unlawful. Nay, the more conscientious Mohammedans are so strict, especially if they have performed the pilgrimage to Mecca, that they hold it criminal not only to taste wine, but to press grapes for the making of it, to buy or to sell it, or even to maintain themselves with the money arising from the sale of that liquor. Spanheim and Reland have observed, from a MS. of Levinus Warnerus, formerly in the public library at Leyden, but now not to be met with there, that the ancient Arabs abstained from wine before the birth of Mohammed <sup>a</sup>.

Mohammed
surprises a party of the Ghatfânites.

IN the month called the former Jomâda, this year, Mohammed marched with a body of 400 men, or, as others say, 700, into the province of Najd. This expedition he undertook against the Banu Mohareb and Tha'alba, of the tribe of Ghatfân; a body of whom he surprised at a place called Dbât Al Rekâ, that is, the place of infatuation; because they fled at his approach with as much precipitation as if they had been infatuated. About the same time the prophet narrowly escaped being assassinated by one of the Banu Mohareb, according to Abu'lfeda and Al Jannâbi <sup>b</sup>.

The second expedition of Bedr.

IN the month of Sbaabân, Mohammed marched at the head of a body of infantry to Bedr, there to meet Abu Sofiân, and the Koreish, according to their challenge the preceding year. Ali Ebn Abu Tâleb carried the standard before him, and arrived with him at Bedr, where they staid eight days, in expectation of seeing Abu Sofiân. On the other hand, that commander advanced with the Koreish forces as far as Asha Al Tarîk, on the road to Bedr; but when he arrived there, his heart failed him, and he returned home without facing the prophet. Others say, that he reached Makhaba, in the territory of Thohrân and Osfân; but did not judge it proper to proceed to the place of appointment. Mohammed imputed the cowardice of the Koreish troops, on this occasion, to their being struck with a terror from God. This expedition the Arabian histories call the second, or lesser expedition of Bedr <sup>c</sup>.

A second son born to Ali.

ACCORDING to Al Kodai and Al Jannâbi, as cited by Mr. Gagnier, Mohammed contracted an engagement with Zeinab and Omm Salma this year; tho' others are of a different opinion. This year also Ali had a second son born, whom he named Al Hosein. With regard to the prophet's wives, our readers may expect a fuller account of them hereafter <sup>d</sup>.

Mohammed possesses himself of Dawmat
Al Jandal.

SOON after the commencement of the fifth year of the Hejra, Mohammed marched against a body of wild Arabs, seated on the confines of Syria, who infested the roads to such a degree, pillaging all the passengers they met with, and committing so many violences in the neighbouring parts of Arabia, that commerce suffered greatly from their depredations. Having formed a corps of 1,000 men, he advanced to Dawmat Al Jandal, a town belonging to these Arabs, which they abandoned at his approach. Having carried off many of their shepherds, and head of cattle, he possessed himself of the town; where he staid some days, to repose himself and his troops. Then he returned to Medina, enriched with the enemy's spoils, and extremely pleased with the success of the expedition <sup>e</sup>.

The war of the ditch.

BUT in the month of Shawâl, this same year, that is, the fifth of the Hejra, Mohammed and his followers were all threatened with utter destruction. The Koreish and the tribe of Ghatfân, in conjunction with the Jews of Al Nadîr and Koreidha, assembled an army of 12,000 men, with which they formed the siege of Medina. On the enemies approach, Mohammed, by the advice of Salmân the Persian, ordered a deep ditch or intrenchment to be dug round Medina, for the security of the city, and went out to defend it with 3,000 men. In the mean time, the pagan Arabs, under the command of Yusef, the brother of Abu Sofiân, drew near to the intrenchment with all their forces. The Ghatfânites pitched on the east side of the town, on the higher part of the valley; and the Koreish on the west side, on the lower part of the same valley. Both sides remained in their respective camps near a month, without any other acts of hostility than shooting of arrows, and slinging of stones; which produced no great effect. During this interval, many illustrious miracles were wrought, or, rather, many prodigies happened, according to the Moslem writers; all which Mohammed's adherents interpreted in favour of the prophet. The Koreish army, before they took post near the intrenchment that covered the town, incamped at Rawna, between Jarf <sup>f</sup>.

ABU'LFED. ubi sup. p. 72. AL KOR. MOHAM. f. ii. v. 219, & f. v. v. 99. JALLALO'DDIN, AL ZAMAKHSHAR. AL KODAI, POC. not. in spec. hist. Arab. p. 157. Fortalit. fidei, lib. vi. conf. 5. PRIDEAUX's life of Mahom p. 62—64. SALE's prelim. discours. sect. v. p. 122—127. Vide etiam AL KOR. MOHAM. ubi sup. f. v.

<sup>c</sup> AL KOR. MOHAM. ubi sup. f. ii. & f. v. D'HERBEL. biblioth. Orient. p. 696. SMITH. de morib. & instit. Turcar. ep. ii. p. 28, &c. CHARDIN, voy. de Perse. tom. ii. p. 212. SPANHEM. & LEVIN. WARNER, apud Hadr. Reland. de relig. Moham. p. 269, 270, 271, ut & ipse RELAND. ibid. Vide etiam JOAN. GAGN. not. ad Abu'lfed. de vit. Moham. p. 72.

<sup>d</sup> ABU'LFED. ubi sup. p. 72. AL JANNAB. ubi sup. p. 119.

<sup>e</sup> AL JANNAB. ubi sup. p. 121. AL BEIDAWI, ISM. ABU'LFED. de vit. Moham. c. xxxvii. p. 73.

<sup>f</sup> AL KODAI, AL JANNAB. ubi sup. p. 124. ISM. ABU'LFED. ubi sup. <sup>1</sup> AL JANNAB. ubi sup. p. 122.

a and Regaba, about two miles from Medina, where they formed a plan of the military operations; but performed nothing worth relating, either there or before Medina, during the time above-mentioned. But at last, say some of the Arab writers, God sent a piercing cold east wind, which benumbed the limbs of the confederates, blew the dust in their faces, extinguished their fires, overturned their tents, and put their horses in disorder. The angels at the same time, continue our authors, cried, ALLAH ACBAR, GOD IS GREAT, round about their camp; whereupon Toleiba Ebn Kbowailed, the Asadite, said aloud, Mohammed is going to attack you with incantments; wherefore provide for your safety by flight. This so affected the enemy, that the Koreish first, and afterwards the Ghatfimites, broke up the siege, and returned home. Which retreat was also not a little owing to the dissensions b among the confederate forces; the raising and fomenting whereof the Mohammedans also ascribe to God; but others, to the crafty conduct of the impostor, who found means to corrupt the leading men in the enemies camp. Immediately after which, Amru Ebn Abdül, one of the principal men of the Koreish, and an exceeding good horseman, say these last, rode up to Mohammed's trenches, and challenged the best man in the Moslem army to fight him in single combat. Ali, the prophet's nephew, accepted the challenge, and slew both him and another that came to his assistance. After which, those who had been corrupted by Mohammed's agents, so soured a considerable part of their forces, that they instantly deserted their camp, and put themselves in march for Mecca; which obliged all the rest to do the like. Thus was the pretended prophet happily extricated out of the greatest difficulties in which perhaps he had ever been involved<sup>k</sup>.

EARLY the next morning Hodeifa Ebn Yamîn, one of Mohammed's spies, arrived from the enemies camp with the news of their precipitate retreat; which so pleased the prophet, that he took him into his more particular confidence, and ever afterwards treated him with uncommon marks of distinction. To him, in conjunction with Ali Ebn Abu Tâleb, who was afterwards Khalîf, or, as Al Fannâbi styles him, the Emir, or emperor of the faithful, he communicated in secret the mysteries and heavenly revelations that were imparted to him; and particularly those that related to the true meaning of several passages in the Korân. It is related, that when Mohammed heard that his enemies were retired, he said, I have obtained success by means of the east wind, and Ad perished by the west wind. The Arab writers term
d this expedition the war Al Khandak, or Al Abzâb, that is, of the ditch, or of the nations; the former of which appellations alludes to the ditch or intrenchment Mohammed caused to be dug round Medina, for the security of the place, and the latter, to the number of Arab tribes, or petty nations, that entered into a confederacy against him<sup>l</sup>.

THE next morning, after the confederate forces had decamped, Mohammed and his troops quitting the intrenchment, returned to Medina, and, laying down their arms, began to refresh themselves after their fatigue. Upon which the angel Gabriel came to the prophet, as he pretended, having formed a resolution to extirpate the Koreidhites, and asked him whether he had suffered his people to lay down their arms, when the angels had not laid down theirs; ordering him, at the same time, to go immediately against the Koreidhites, and e assuring him that himself would lead the way. Mohammed, in obedience to the divine command, having caused public proclamation to be made, that every one should pray that afternoon for success against the sons of Koreidha, settled the plan of the military operations with Ali Ebn Abu Tâleb, and appointed Ebn Omm Maetum commandant of Medina, set forward on the expedition without loss of time. He first took post at a place called Dhâ Enâ, where he was joined by the remainder of his troops, and then continued his march to the fortress of the Koreidhites. This he besieged in form, and pushed on the siege with so much vigour, that, though the place seemed impregnable, he obliged the garison to capitulate at the end of twenty-five days; tho' some affirm that he spent the whole month of Dbu'kaada in carrying on his approaches. Be that as it will, the Koreidhites, not daring to trust to Mohammed's mercy, surrendered at the discretion of Saad Ebn Moâdh; hoping that he, being the prince of the tribe of Aws, their old friends and confederates, would have some regard for them. But they found themselves disappointed in their expectations. For, Saad being greatly incensed at their breach of faith, they having, at the incessant persuasion of Caab Ebn Asad, a principal man amongst them, perfidiously gone over to the Koreish in the war of the ditch, tho' they were then in league with Mohammed, had begged of God that he might not die of the wound he had received in that war, till he saw vengeance taken on the Koreidhites. He therefore adjudged, that the men should be put to the sword, the women and children made slaves, and their goods be divided amongst the Moslems. Which sentence when Mohammed heard, he cried out, that Saad had pronounced the sentence of God; and, in consequence of this decision, ordered the men, to the number of 6 or 700, amongst
f

News of the enemies retreat brought by Hodeifa Ebn Yamîn.

Mohammed cuts off the tribe of Koreidha.

<sup>k</sup> ABU'LEFD. ubi sup. c. xxxviii. p. 73. FEN AMID, & GREG. ABU'LE-FAR. ubi sup. AL JANNAB. ubi sup. p. 124, &c. AL KOR. MOHAM. c. xxxiii. AL BEIDAWI, EFN ISHAK. AL JANNAB. ubi sup. ISM ABU'LEFD. ubi sup. c. xxxix. p. 73. ABU ZEID SEID, in lib. Splendor.

whom were Hoyai Ebn Akbtah, a great enemy of Mohammed's, and Caab Ebn Asad, who had been the chief occasion of the revolt of their tribe, to be immediately massacred. The women and children also were carried into captivity. Their immoveable possessions Mohammed gave to the Mohajerin; saying, that the Ansars were in their own houses, but that the others were destitute of habitations. The moveables were divided amongst his followers; but he remitted the fifth part, which was usual to be taken in other cases. The Moslems attribute the good success they met with in this war to the assistance of the angel Gabriel, who, according to his promise, conducted Mohammed's army to the scene of action. They pretend, that Mohammed, a little before his arrival at the fortress of the Koreidbites, asking some of his men whether any body had passed by them, they answered, that Dohya Ebn Kholcifa, the Calbite, had just passed by them: to which he replied, that person was the angel Gabriel, who is sent to the sons of Koreidha, to shake their castles, and to strike their hearts with fear and consternation. We must not omit observing, that Saad's wound, which had been skinned over, opening again, he expired soon after judgment had been given against the Koreidbites; nor that the Moslems lost only six men in the war of the ditch, and no more than one in the expedition against the Banu Koreidha, which was undertaken in the month of Dhu'lkaada, and the fifth year of the Hejra<sup>m</sup>.

The great barbarity and impiety of Mohammed.

THE spoils of the Koreidbites consisted principally of 300 cuirasses, 1,000 lances, and 1,500 pikes, besides other moveables and utensils, which the prophet distributed amongst his troops. As for the prisoners, they were conducted into the province of Najd by Saad Ebn Zeid, the Ansar, who was ordered either to sell them, or change them for horses and arms. But before they were sent away, the prophet took out of them a young lady, called Rihana Bint Amru, the most charming and beautiful of all the female captives, whom, with some difficulty, he prevailed upon to become a Mohammedan, and retained her afterwards for his own use. About this time, Mohammed formed a design to assassinate a Jew, called Salim Ebn Abu'l Hakik, who, after the war of the ditch, retired to Khaibar; which, by the assistance of Abd'allah Ebn Atik, and four other ruffians of the tribe of Khazraj, he was enabled to carry into execution. By such horrid facts as this, and the inhuman butchery of the Banu Koreidha, which is most impiously celebrated in the Koran as the immediate effect of the divine omnipotence, did Mohammed endeavour to propagate amongst the Arabs his new religion; a religion worthy of the father of lies, who was himself from the beginning a murderer, of the barbarous means, and most shocking delusions, made use of to introduce it; and, lastly, of that infernal wretch, permitted by Providence, for the sins of the Christian world, to be the immediate instrument of the propagation and extension of it<sup>n</sup>!

Mohammed takes Zeinab to wife.

BEFORE we conclude our relation of the transactions of this remarkable year, our readers will expect a short account of Mohammed's marriage with Zeinab, which happened towards the close of it; especially as that affair shews the impostor, whose life we are now writing, to have been as much addicted to sensuality, on some occasions, as he was on others to cruelty. Zeinab, then, or Zenobia, was the daughter of Jabash, and wife of Zeid, Mohammed's freed-man, who was of the tribe of Calb, a branch of the Khodaites, descended from Hamyar, the son of Saba. The mother of Zeinab, it is said was Anima, the daughter of Abd'al Motaleb, and Mohammed's aunt. Zeid being taken in his childhood by a party of wild Arabs, of the Banu Al Ka'in, was bought by Mohammed, or, according to others, by his wife Khadijah, before she married him. Some years after, his father, Hareth Ebn Shorheil Ebn Abd'al Ozza Ebn Amru Al Ka'is, being informed that his son was at Mecca, took a journey thither, and offered a considerable sum of money for his ransom. But Zeid declaring that he would not leave his master, Mohammed took him by the hand, and led him to the black stone of the Caaba, where he publicly adopted him for his son, and constituted him his heir. From this time Zeid was called the son of Mohammed; with which his father acquiesced, and returned home well satisfied. After the publication of Islamism, the prophet gave him to wife Zeinab, the daughter of Jabash, with whom he lived happily several years. But Mohammed at last going to his house on some affair, and not finding him at home, accidentally cast his eyes on Zeinab, who was then in a dress which discovered her beauty to advantage, and was so smitten at the sight, that he could not forbear crying out, God be praised, who turneth the hearts of men as he pleaseth! He made no other discovery of his passion at that time, but immediately retired<sup>v</sup>.

HOWEVER, Zeinab did not want penetration enough to discover that she made a conquest of Mohammed. Nor did she fail to acquaint her husband with what had happened, on his return home. Whereupon Zeid, after mature reflection, resolved to part with her, in favour of his benefactor. He therefore gave out publicly, that he did not retain any manner of affection for Zeinab; he even endeavoured to conceive a sort of aversion for her,

<sup>m</sup> ABU'LFED, ubi sup. c. xxxix. p. 77—80. AL JANNAB. p. 130, 137, &c. AL BEIDAWI, AL KOR. MOHAM. ubi sup. EBN ISHAK, AL BOGHARI in Sonna.

<sup>n</sup> AL JANNAB. ubi sup. AL KOR. MOHAM. ubi sup.

<sup>v</sup> AL KOR. MOHAM. ubi sup. AL JANNAB. p. 194, &c. AL BEIDAWI. JALLALO'DDIN.

- a her, and to heighten this in proportion as he perceived the love of the prophet to increase. In fine, he informed Mohammed of the resolution he had taken; who, apprehending the scandal it might raise, offered to dissuade him from it, and endeavoured to stifle the flames which inwardly consumed him. But, at length, his love for her being authorized by a pretended revelation, which is contained in the thirty-third chapter of the Korân, he acquiesced; and, after the term of her divorce was expired, finding himself at full liberty to satisfy his passion, he affianced himself to her. This was soon succeeded by marriage, and that by enjoyment. Nothing could exceed the splendour and magnificence of the nuptial banquet given by the prophet on this happy occasion, to which an infinite number of both sexes were invited. All the most costly viands that could be procured, all the more rare and exquisite fruits that Arabia and the neighbouring countries produced, all the most elegant dainties that the Arabs were capable of furnishing him with, then made their appearance upon the prophet's table. Nor was there wanting either plenty, or variety, of the most delicious liquors. But, notwithstanding this superb festin, and the vast numbers of people who came to facilitate Mohammed on the day it was prepared, this marriage gave great offence to many of his followers. For the relation between him and Zeid, tho' only fictitious, created an impediment of marriage among the old Arabs within the prohibited degrees, in the same manner as if it had been real; and therefore Mohammed's taking his adopted son's wife, could not but give great uneasiness to many even of the Moslems themselves. However, in order to remove all ill impressions conceived against him on this account, c he took upon him to abolish an established custom, as he did on this occasion, by an express declaration in the Korân, and even to introduce God himself as authorizing an illegal action; than which a more profane and impious measure, for the gratification of a turbulent and unruly passion, could not well have been devised <sup>p</sup>.

THE next year, that is, the sixth of the Hejra, in the month of Al Moharram, the prophet sent Mohammed Ebn Salama with a party of 30 horse against a small detachment of the Banu Becr Ebn Kelâb, who had posted themselves at Al Dbaria, a place about seven days journey from Medina, on the road from Mecca to Bosra. Mohammed departed from Medina on the tenth day of the aforesaid month, and marched with so much diligence, that he surprised the enemy, before they had any notice of his approach. Some of them f he killed upon the spot, took Themâma their commander prisoner, and put the rest to flight. The booty he acquired on this occasion consisted of 50 camels, and 3,000 sheep, with which he returned in triumph to Medina. These the prophet distributed amongst the men concerned in the late action, after he had reserved a fifth part of them for himself. Mohammed Ebn Salama, with his men, spent only nine days in this expedition <sup>q</sup>.

UPON Themâma's declaring himself a Moslem, he had his liberty given him by the prophet, and immediately returned to the people over whom he presided. In return for Mohammed's kindness to him, he made incursions upon the Koreish, and frequently intercepted their convoys of corn that came from the province of Tamâma. These hostilities reduced the Koreish to such streights for want of provisions, that they sent a deputation to the prophet, to desire him to have pity upon them, and put a stop to Themâma's depredations. This, says Al Jannâbi, he generously did, by writing to that chief to this effect: Preserve my people, and let their convoys pass without interruption. Which order was punctually obeyed for the future by Themâma <sup>r</sup>.

IN the month of the former Jomâda this year, the prophet undertook an expedition against the Banu Labiân, to revenge the wrongs they had done to the inhabitants of Raji. In order the more effectually to surprise them, he made a feint as tho' he would have passed towards the borders of Syria; but immediately afterwards making a counter-march, he came suddenly upon them. However, he found them upon their guard, and intrenched upon the heights, to which they had fled upon the first rumour of his march. Finding that he d could not attack them, without too much exposing his troops, he advanced to Osfan at the head of 200 horse, to alarm the people of Mecca; which having done, he returned without any loss home to Medina <sup>s</sup>.

A Few days after his arrival at Medina, Osna Ebn Hesan, the Farârite, with a party of the Banu Ghatfân, chiefly horse, carried off some of the prophet's camels, that were passing through the territory of Ghâba. One of the Banu Ghatfân, that attended them, they also put to the sword. Of which Mohammed having notice given him by Amru Ebn Al Actwa, the Assamite, he immediately detached a party of horse in pursuit of the plunderers; who soon coming up with them, killed all that made any resistance, put the rest to flight, and brought off some of the camels that the Ghatfânites had seized <sup>t</sup>.

<sup>p</sup> Idem ibid. Vide etiam GAGN. la vie de Mahom. tom. prem. liv. iv. c. 3. p. 416—422.

JANNAB. ubi sup. p. 139.

<sup>q</sup> Idem ibid.

<sup>r</sup> ISM. ABU'LFED. ubi sup. c. xl. p. 80.

ubi sup. p. 140. EB AMID, GREG. ABU'L-FAR. ubi sup.

A. JANNAB. ubi sup.

<sup>s</sup> AL

AL JANNAB.

<sup>t</sup> ISM. ABU'LFED. ubi sup. c. xli. p. 80.

The expedition
of Dhu Kard.

SOME time after, the prophet set out from Medina, having before constituted Saad Ebn Abâda commandant of the place in his absence, at the head of 500 men, or, as others say, 700, and took post at Dhu Kard, about two days journey distant from Medina, on the road to Khaibar. Here he was joined by another body of the Moslem forces, which enabled him to make an incursion upon the enemies territory, to retake the remainder of his own camels, and to disperse a considerable party of the infidel Arabs, that pretended to oppose him. He also pillaged the adjacent country, and carried off such a number of camels, that he regaled his forces with them, killing one camel for every hundred men. After which he returned to Medina, having before left in it 300 men, under the command of Saad, for the defence of the place<sup>a</sup>.

Mohammed
makes an in-cursion into the country of the Banu Asad.

AFTERWARDS the prophet sent Acasba Ebn Mobasen, the Asadite, to make a course upon the territory of Ghemar Marzuk, a well or fountain belonging to the Banu Asad, two days journey from Keid, a station of the Moslem pilgrims who visit Mecca. Acasba had only with him 40 men; and yet the enemy fled at the first rumour of his march. However, the Moslems entered the infidels country, and carried off 200 camels. But this advantage was more than ballanced by the loss of a small detachment of ten men, under the conduct of Mohammed Ebn Salama, which was cut to pieces by 100 men of the Banu Thaalûa, who surrounded them at Dhu'l Kasa, about twenty-four miles from Medina. To revenge which affront, the prophet detached Abu Obeida Ebn Al Jarab, with forty men, to make an irruption into the enemies country; which he did with so much success, that he obliged a body of them, who waited his approach, to fly into the mountains. They fled with so much precipitation, that Abu Obeida could only make one prisoner, who regained his liberty, by declaring himself a Moslem<sup>b</sup>.

He seizes a rich caravan, and sends an agent to Constantinople.

IN the month of the former Jomâda, the same year, Mohammed being apprized that a rich caravan of the Koreish was on its return from Syria, he sent Zeid Ebn Hâretha with 70 men to attack it. Zeid, in pursuance of his orders, advanced to Al Ais, four days journey from Medina; where lying in ambuscade, as soon as the caravan came up, he rushed out upon it, and made himself master of it, without the loss of a man. He also seized upon a large sum of money, which belonged to Safwân Ebn Ommeyya, and made some of the escorte prisoners; amongst which was Abu'l As, whom he released, at the request of Zeinab, and restored all the effects taken from him. About the same time, the prophet likewise sent Dobya Ebn Kholeifa, the Calbite, his principal factor, in the quality of agent, to Constantinople, to obtain the emperor Heraclius's permission to trade with his subjects; which that prince immediately granted him. On his return home, he was plundered by Al Honeid Ebn Ardh, the Dobaite, and his son Udh, in the valley of Hesma, belonging to the Jodhamites. But the Dhobaibites, a considerable family, the issue of the Rafa'a Ebn Zeid, the Jodhamite, obliged Al Honeid to restore every thing he had taken from Dobya. After which, the latter continued his journey, without interruption, to Medina; and, upon his arrival there, acquainted the prophet with what had happened. This so incensed him, that he sent Zeid Ebn Hâretha with a detachment of 500 men against Al Honeid Ebn Ardh; who coming up with them early in the morning, defeated his troops, put Al Honeid and his son, together with several of their men, to the sword, and dispersed the rest. The Moslems also carried off the enemies wives and children, to the number of 200, and all their cattle. But Mohammed restored every thing that his men had taken, at the desire of the Râfaïtes, who had been extremely civil to Dobya, and likewise behaved with great generosity to the prophet's troops<sup>c</sup>.

Puts eight of the Orâinites to a cruel death.

SOON after this last expedition, eight of the Orâinites came to Medina, and embraced Islamism. Here they resided for some time; but finding that the air did not agree with them, they retired into the country where the prophet kept his cattle; and, by his prescription, drank the milk and the urine of his camels, for a disorder they laboured under, which restored them to their former health. In return for this kindness, they murdered his shepherd, and then seized upon the camels. The prophet being informed of this double crime, detached Carze Ebn Jâber, the Febrite, with a troop of horse, in pursuit of the robbers; who coming up with them before sun-set, brought them in chains to Medina. Upon which, Mohammed ordered their hands and their feet to be cut off, their eyes to be put out with a red hot iron, and their bodies to be fixed to a cross, where they miserably expired. A flagrant instance this of the savage and inhuman disposition of the pretended prophet, and consequently a demonstrative proof, exclusive of an infinity of others which might be produced, that his religion could not come from God<sup>d</sup>!

He attempts to convert some of the Christian Arabs.

IN this same year, that is, the sixth of the Hejra, the prophet resolved to make an attempt to bring some of the Christian Arabs over to the Mohammedan religion; however, in this attempt, he seemed determined at first not to employ force, but to have recourse only<sup>e</sup>

<sup>a</sup> Idem ibid.
p. 146.

<sup>b</sup> AL JANNAB. ubi sup.

<sup>c</sup> AL JANNAB. ubi sup. p. 144, &c.

<sup>d</sup> Idem ibid.

- a to methods of persuasion. For which purpose he appointed Abd'al Rahmán Ebn Awf superior of this pacific mission; and sent him in that quality to the Banu Calb, who inhabited the city of Dawmat Al Jandal, where Mohammed had been the preceding year. Here Abd'al Rahmán staid three days, and invited the citizens to embrace Islamism. His preaching had such an effect upon their prince, named Asbag Ebn Amru, the Calbite, who was a Christian, that he professed himself a Moslem; and the greatest part of his subjects followed his example. Those who chose to persevere in their old religion were excused, upon their paying a tribute, in conformity to the Mohammedan custom. Abd'al Rahmán espoused Asbag's daughter; who, after her husband's return to Medina, was brought to bed of a son, whom his father named Abd'allah Al Asgar. He became afterwards one of the great doctors of the Mohammedan law in the city of Medina, and was of the number of the Al Tabcites, or of those who immediately succeeded the first companions of the prophet. But of these we shall probably have occasion to speak more fully hereafter <sup>2</sup>.

In the mean time Mohammed received advice, that the Banu Saad, who inhabited the town and territory of Fadac, situated between Khaibar and Cúfa, had assembled a body of troops, in order to assist the Jews of Khaibar. He was no sooner apprized of this than he ordered Ali Ebn Abu Táleb to march at the head of 100 men, and disperse them. Ali executed his orders with great bravery; and, after he had put the enemy to flight, carried off 500 camels and 1,000 sheep. The flower of these he sent to the prophet, for his own use, and distributed the rest amongst his own troops. After which he returned to Medina, without meeting with a single enemy to impede his march <sup>2</sup>.

- In the month of Sbaabân, the same year, the Banu Al Mostalek, a powerful tribe of the Arabs, descended from Cablân, the son of Saba, the son of Yashhab, the son of Yârab, the son of Kabtân, the son of Eber, the son of Salab, the son of Arphaxad, the son of Shem, the son of Noah, formed a considerable corps, in order to make war upon the Moslems. They were commanded by their prince Al Hâreth Ebn Abu Dharâr, the father of the beautiful Joweira, who was afterwards married to the prophet. Of this Mohammed being informed, he assembled a body of infantry, composed of the pagan Arabs, and a troop of 30 horse, consisting of 10 Mohâjerîn and 20 Ansârs; with which, attended by his two wives, Ayesha and Omni Salma, he marched against the enemy. After several movements, and a formal declaration of war, that preceded them, on the part of the Moslems, the two armies faced each other in the plain of Al Moreisi, so called from a fountain or well of the same name, belonging to the district of Kodeid, about five miles from the sea, and twenty-four from Osfân. The prince Al Hâreth advancing, at the head of a detachment, to reconnoitre the Moslem army, was slain by an arrow, before the beginning of the action; which, however, did not discourage his troops. For they immediately, notwithstanding this disaster, ranged themselves in order of battle, and the prophet, on his part, did the same. For an hour, the two armies engaged only by discharges of arrows; but, at last, the prophet having given the signal for the Moslems to advance, they fell upon the enemy sword in hand with such bravery, that they killed ten upon the spot, and forced all the rest to cry out for quarter, and surrender themselves prisoners at discretion. This victory was so complete, that it would have appeared incredible, had it not been attested, as the Moslems pretend, by an ancient tradition; according to which, the angel Gabriel mounted on a bay horse, and dressed in white, greatly distinguished himself in the action. In the distribution of prisoners, Joweira fell to the lot of Thâbet Ebn Kais; of whom she was purchased by Mohammed, who took her to wife. This produced a sort of alliance between him and the Mostalekites, which was of considerable service to him. In consideration of that marriage, he released an hundred of the Mostalekite chiefs, who had been taken prisoners; and afterwards favoured that tribe on all occasions. The number of prisoners, including men, women, and children, taken in the battle of Al Moreisi, amounted to 200. Besides the captives, 5,000 sheep, and 1,000 camels, as also all the arms and baggage of the enemy, fell into the hands of the victors <sup>b</sup>.

THE loss the Moslems sustained in the late action was very inconsiderable; only Heshâm, of the Banu Leith Ebn Becr, falling in the field of battle; and he was killed by an Ansâr, who took him for an infidel, by mistake. However, his brother Mekîas, an idolater, coming from Mecca, pretended to embrace Islamism, that he might have an opportunity of revenging Heshâm's death; which, after he had done, by destroying the murderer, he returned home, and relapsed to his former idolatry. This so exasperated Mohammed, that, after the reduction of Mecca, he caused him to be put to death in cold blood. About this time, a dispute arose between Jahja, the Ghafârite, and Sonân, the Jabanite, which had like

<sup>2</sup> AL JANNAB. ubi sup. p. 147, &c.

<sup>2</sup> Idem ibid.

<sup>b</sup> ISM. ABU'LFED. ubi sup. c. xlii. p.

80—82. AL JANNAB. ubi sup. p. 150, &c. AL KOR. MOHAMMED. f. lxiii. v. 1—8, &c. GOL. lex. Arab. in Al Mortafi, &c. AL WAKEDI apud AL NAÏFABUR. ut & ipse NAÏFABUR. ibid. JALLALO'DDIN, BEN AMID. & GRIG. ABU'L-FAR. ubi sup. Poc. not. in spec. hist. Arab. p. 42.

to have produced fatal effects, as it was near involving in a quarrel the Anfârs and the Mohâjerîn. But Mohammed behaved with so much address to both parties, that he composed all differences between them, and prevented the effusion of blood that might otherwise have ensued <sup>c</sup>.

Gabriel assists
the Moslems.

ACCORDING to Al Wâkedi, the Moslem troops appeared to Joweira to be much more numerous than they really were, before the beginning of the action; which the Mohammedans consider as a miracle exhibited in favour of their prophet. The same author also relates, that the angel Gabriel appeared in a white habit, mounted upon such a horse as had never before been seen, the moment Mohammed gave the signal of battle to his troops <sup>d</sup>.

The prophet marries Joweira.

IMMEDIATELY after the prophet's arrival at Medina, he celebrated his nuptials with Joweira; who, according to Al Jannâbi, had before been married to one of her cousin-germans. She was a lady of such wit and beauty, that Mohammed, notwithstanding the number of wives he already enjoyed, found it impossible to resist her charms; and therefore he resolved to marry her. She lived with him five, and survived him forty-five years, dying in the fifty-sixth year of the Hejra. After her death, Merwân Ebn Al Hakem, who was commandant of Medina for the Khalîf Moawiyah, performed the funeral service at the time of her interment. She died at the age of sixty-three years; so that she must have been only thirteen years old at the battle of Moreisi, immediately after which the prophet espoused her. There are several traditions that go under her name in the pieces of Al Bokhârî, of Moslem, and others, which we have not time at present to touch upon <sup>e</sup>.

Ayesha accused of adultery.

DURING the preceding expedition an accident happened, that caused great inquietude to Mohammed, and no small uneasiness in his family. When the prophet entered upon any war, it was usual, before he began his march, for his wives to cast lots, to know which of them should attend him into the field. At this time the lot fell upon Ayesha; and she accordingly accompanied him in the expedition. The army being on its return home, and removing by night, Ayesha, on the road, not far from Medina, alighted from her camel, and stepped aside, on a private occasion. But, before she remounted her beast, perceiving she had dropped her necklace, which was of onyxes of Dbafâr, she went back to look for it. In the mean time, her attendants taking it for granted, that she was got into her pavilion, or little tent surrounded with curtains, wherein women are carried in the east, set it again on the camel, and carried it away. When she returned to the road, and found her camel gone, she walked to the next station of the army, but met with no living soul there. Upon which she resolved to take her repose in that place; imagining, that, when she was missed, some would be sent back to fetch her. In a little time, therefore, she fell asleep, and remained there all night. But early in the morning, Safwân Ebn Al Moattel, one of Mohammed's general officers, who had staid behind to rest himself, coming by, and perceiving some body asleep, went to see who it was, and immediately knew her to be Ayesha. Upon which, he waked her, by twice pronouncing with a low voice these words, We are God's, and unto him we must return. Ayesha then immediately covered herself with her veil; and Safwân, after he had dismounted his camel, set her thereon, walked on foot, and conducted her safely to the army, which they rejoined about noon, though greatly fatigued. This is the substance of Ayesha's relation of the whole affair, which has been transmitted down to us, amongst many other pretended authentic traditions in the Sonna, by Al Bokhârî <sup>f</sup>.

THIS accident made a great noise, and had like to have proved the ruin of Ayesha. For Mestab Ebn Athâtha, Hasân Ebn Thâbet, Abd'allah Ebn Obba Ebn Solûl, of the tribe of Khazraj, and Omm Hafsa Bint Hajash, being greatly surprised at the circumstances of the affair, loudly exclaimed against Ayesha, and directly accused her of adultery with Safwân. But the person Ayesha the most bitterly complained of, as he who the most cruelly pushed the accusation, gave it the most malicious turn, and coloured his story in the most artificial manner, in fine, who the most laboured the point, in order to chagrin the prophet, was Abd'allah. Nor did Mohammed himself know what to think of the affair, when he reflected upon all the circumstances of it, so suspicious and well-grounded did they appear to him. Neither could he get rid of his perplexity, nor stop the mouths of the censorious, notwithstanding his wife's protestations of her innocence. However, considering that if this accusation was generally believed, it might be looked upon by many of his enemies, who were then very numerous in Arabia, as an aspersion upon his own character, and contribute to the diminution of his authority; he took upon him, about a month after, to disculpate his wife, and intirely clear her reputation, by a pretended revelation from heaven, which is contained in the twenty-fourth chapter of the Korân. This effectually silenced all her accusers, by declaring the accusation to be unjust, and brought down infamy upon them. <sup>g</sup>

<sup>c</sup> ABU'LFED. & AL JANNAB. ubi sup.
NAISABUR. ibid.

<sup>d</sup> AL WAKEDI apud Al Naïfabur. ubi sup. ut & ipse AL

<sup>e</sup> AL JANNAB. ubi sup. p. 150.

<sup>f</sup> AL BOKHARI in Sonna. AL BEIDAWI,

JALLALO'DDIN, ABU'LFED. ubi sup. c. xliii. p. 82—84. AL KOR. MOHAM. f. xxiv.

- a For one of them, by Mohammed's order, was severely whipped, having had eighty stripes given him, in conformity to what we find enjoined in this very chapter of the Korân. But as for Abd'allah Ebn Obba, tho' more obnoxious than any of the rest, and more hated by Aysha, he had so much power and interest amongst the Arabs, that the pretended prophet did not at this time think fit to inflict any punishment upon him <sup>e</sup>.

- WE shall conclude what we have to say of the preceding war, with observing, that whilst the Moslems were engaged in it, Mohammed pretended to an order from heaven for the injunction of the Tayamom, or purification by rubbing, which is performed with dust, sand, or gravel, and supplies the place of the Wodû, called by the Persians Abdest, or ordinary ablution, in common cases, when no water is to be had. For the Moslem army b having been obliged to traverse dry sandy deserts, in this war, in order to keep up some appearance of cleanliness and decency amongst his troops, the prophet found it necessary to publish such an injunction. This Mohammed seems to have borrowed either of the Jews, or the pagan Arabs, who, long before his time, used such lustrations. But of this, and other positive precepts or institutions of the Korân, relating to faith and religious duties, we shall have occasion to speak more fully hereafter <sup>h</sup>.

- IN the sixth year of the Hejra, and the month of Dbu'lkaada, the prophet set out with 1,400 men to visit the temple of Mecca; not with any intent of committing hostilities, but in a peaceable manner. This is what we find given out by the Moslem writers; but that his views were not quite so pacific as they pretend, seems to appear from hence, that he summoned the tribes of Aslam, Jobeinab, Mozeinab, and Ghifâr, who, with the troops he commanded, would have formed a very considerable force, to attend him in this expedition. But they excusing themselves, by saying their families must suffer in their absence, and would be robbed of the little they had, staid behind; which probably induced the prophet to lay aside all outward appearances of an invasion; tho' even this might be with a view to attempt something by surprize. However, the Koreish were jealous, and not without good reason, as appears from the whole tenour of his conduct, of the prophet's designs; so that when he came to Al Hodeibiya, a place situated partly within, and partly without, the sacred territory, they sent to let him know, that they would not permit him to enter Mecca, unless he forced his way. Whereupon he called his troops about him, and they all d took a solemn oath of fealty or homage to him, and he resolved to attack the city. Of which the Koreish being informed by Arwa Ebn Masûd, whom they had dispatched to Mohammed, to acquaint him that they had put on their leopards skins, and sworn that he should never make a peaceable entry into Mecca; they began to alter their note, and even to sue for peace. Mohammed, therefore, sent Othman Ebn Affân to facilitate an accommodation; but, instead of listening to his proposals, they imprisoned him, and a report ran at first that he was slain. In the mean time, according to Jallalo'ddin, eighty Meccans came privately to Mohammed's camp, with an intent to surprize some of his men, or rather, as should seem, to reconnoitre the force he had with him; but they were taken and brought before the prophet, who pardoned them, and ordered them to be set at liberty. Hereupon the Koreish e sent Sobail Ebn Amru, and some others, to treat of peace; who were very stiff in wording the treaty that they afterwards concluded with Mohammed. For when the prophet ordered Ali to begin with the form, In the name of the most merciful God, they objected to it, and insisted, that he should begin with this, In thy name, O God; which Mohammed submitted to, and proceeded to dictate, These are the conditions on which Mohammed the apostle of God has made peace with those of Mecca: to this Sobail again objected, saying, If we had acknowledged thee to be the apostle of God, we had not given thee any opposition. Whereupon Mohammed commanded Ali to write, as Sobail desired, These are the conditions which Mohammed the son of Abd'allah, &c. This so disgusted the Moslems, that they were upon the point of breaking off the treaty. However, they at last acquiesced in what had been f done; being prevented, say the Arab writers, by God, from pursuing violent measures; who appeased and calmed their minds, as is intimated by the Korân. The terms of this pacification were, that there should be a truce for ten years; that any person might enter into a league with Mohammed, or with the Koreish, as he should think fit; and that Mohammed should have the liberty to visit the temple of Mecca the next year, for three days. After the signing of the treaty, the prophet remained about twenty days at Al Hodeibiya, and then the Moslem army decamped from that place, in order to begin its march for Medina; where it arrived in the month of Dbu'lhajja. We must not omit observing, that, according to Al Beidarwi, some hostilities were committed in this expedition; since this author assures us, that Khâled Ebn Al Walid, whom Mohammed sent with a detachment against the Koreish, drove a body of 500 men, under the conduct of Acerma <sup>a</sup> Ebn Abi Jabl, who had advanced to Al Hodeibiya, to surprize the Moslems, back into the interior part of Mecca. But as this action has been passed over in silence by Abu'lfeda, whom we consider as an Arab historian of the best authority, we leave our readers to believe as much, or as little, of it as they please <sup>i</sup>.

<sup>e</sup> Idem ibid. Vide etiam GAGN. la vie de Mahom. liv. iv. c. 7.

<sup>h</sup> ABU'LFED. ubi sup. p. 83. Al

Kor. MOHAM. f. v. v. 7, & alibi. COD. BERACHOTH. c. ii. in Gemar. fol. 15. 1. POC. not. miscel. ad portam Mosi, p. 356. 389, &c. HADR. RELAND. de relig. Moham. lib. i. c. 8. HERODOT. lib. iii. c. 198. AL JANNAB. ubi sup. p. 150.

The spontaneous inauguration. THE oath of fealty above-mentioned, or, as it is stiled by the Arabs, the spontaneous inauguration, is taken notice of in the Korân. During this ceremony the prophet sat under a tree, called by the Arabs Hodbâ, from whence the place where Mohammed encamped received its appellation, which some suppose to have been an Egyptian thorn, and others a kind of lote-tree. The word Hodbâ properly signifies, in Arabic, crooked, bent, vaulted, &c. and seems to have been applied to this tree, because its boughs were crooked, and extended <sup>b</sup> in the form of a bow, for the sake of a more convenient shade. Al Makin, or Elmacinus, remarks, that, after this event, it soon died, and was at last carried away by an inundation of waters <sup>k</sup>.

The expedition against Omm Forka ; BESIDES the expedition of Al Hodeibiya, several other transactions, less interesting and important, have been mentioned, as happening this year, by Al Jannâbi, tho' passed over in silence by Abu'lfeda ; some of which we shall beg leave here just to touch upon. Zeid Ebn Hâretha, one of Mohammed's generals, was attacked on his return from Syria, where he had been on affairs of commerce, and plundered of many valuable effects, by a party of the Banu Fazara, as he passed through the territory of Wadi'l Kora, a town about seven days journey from Medina. As this district belonged to Omm Forka, the wife of Malec <sup>c</sup> Ebn Hodeifa Ebn Bedr, who held her residence in a fortified castle near Wadi'l Kora, Zeid, after his arrival at Medina, obtained of the prophet a body of troops, with which he soon invested that castle, and carried it by assault ; killing part of the garison, and making the rest prisoners of war. Kais Ebn Mojasser, the commandant, he loaded with irons, put Omm Forka herself to a cruel death, carried off with him all that lady's riches, which were immense, together with her daughter, then very young, and such a vast quantity of booty, that for the loss he had before sustained he made himself ample amends in this expedition <sup>l</sup>.

and against the Banu Ghatfân. IN the month Shawâl, the prophet received advice, that the Banu Ghatfân, in conjunction with some Arab tribes, had assembled a body of troops, in order to commit hostilities <sup>d</sup> against him. His spies at the same time informed him, that the Jews of Khaibar had reinforced that body ; and that they had chosen for their chief one Osair Ebn Râzen, a turbulent and ambitious fellow, in the room of Salâm Ebn Abu'l Hakik, whom he had caused to be assassinated the year before by some of the tribe of Khazraj. In order to get rid of this dangerous enemy, as well as all apprehensions on the part of the Banu Ghatfân, Mohammed sent a party of 30 men, under the command of Abd'allah Ebn Rawâha, towards Khaibar, to draw him into an ambuscade, and then destroy him. This Abd'allah at last effected, after having cut to pieces the escorte, consisting of 30 men, that attended him. Osair himself was killed by Abd'allah Ebn Onais, with a sword that he had hid under his garment for that purpose. The action happened at Korka, a place not far from Khaibar ; <sup>e</sup> after which Ebn Rawâha returned to Medina, without the loss of a single man on this occasion <sup>m</sup>.

Zeid Ebn Hâretha makes an incursion upon the territory of Madian. AT the same time, the prophet sent Zeid Ebn Hâretha, with a detachment of his troops, to make an incursion upon the territory of Madian. This tract belongs to Syria, being posite to Gaza, and is mentioned both in the Mosaic history and the Korân. Abu'lfeda represents Madian, or Midian, as a ruined village on the coast of the Red Sea, about six days journey from Tabûc. It was formerly a city of Hejâz, and the habitation of a tribe of the same name. The ancient inhabitants were the descendants of Midian, the son of Abraham by Keturah, who afterwards, as it seems, coalesced with the Ismaelites ; Moses naming the same merchants who sold Joseph to Potiphar, in one place Ismaelites, and in <sup>f</sup> another Midianites. This city, which stood to the south-east of mount Sinai, is doubtless the same with the Modiana of Ptolemy. There are eight stations between it and the frontiers of Egypt. What was remaining of it in Mohammed's time, was soon after demolished in the succeeding wars, and it remains desolate to this day. The people of the country pretend to shew the well whence Moses watered Jethro's flocks. Zeid being arrived at this place, met with a body of Arabs, that came from Naba, a town situated on the sea Al Kolzom, whom he immediately attacked. His men behaved with so much bravery on this occasion, that they soon dispersed them, killed some, and brought many prisoners to

<sup>i</sup> ABU'LFED. ubi sup. p. 84—87. AL ZAMAKHSHARI, AL BEIDAWI, 'AL JANNAB. ubi sup. p. 155—164. AL TABAR. JALLALO'DDIN, AL KOR. MOHAM. f. xlvii. EBN AMID. <sup>k</sup> AL KOR. MOHAM. ubi sup. EBN AMID. five AL MAKIN, ubi sup. PRID. life of Mahom. p. 66. <sup>l</sup> AL JANNAB. ubi sup. p. 152. <sup>m</sup> Idem ibid. p. 153.

- a Medina. They also carried off a vast number of women and children, whom they sold for slaves, and a very considerable booty that they acquired in this expedition <sup>a</sup>.

BEFORE we conclude our account of the transactions in which Mohammed was concerned <sup>The great respect shown</sup> this year, it may not be improper, to shew the inconceivable veneration and respect the <sup>Mohammed</sup> Moslems by this time had for their prophet, to mention the relation which Arwa Ebn Mas'ud, the Thakifite, whom the Koreish sent with an actual defiance to Mohammed's camp at Al <sup>by his followers.</sup> Hodhibiya, gave the Meccans, at his return, of their behaviour. He said he had been at

- b the courts both of the Roman emperor and of the king of Persia, and never saw any prince so highly respected by his subjects as Mohammed was by his companions. For whenever he made the ablution, in order to say his prayers, they ran and caught the water that he had used; and whenever he spit, they immediately licked it up, and gathered up every hair that fell from him with great superstition. This account had probably a considerable effect upon the Koreish, as it gave them sufficiently to understand with what ardour the prophet's followers would fight for him; and therefore, in all likelihood, did not a little contribute to the pacification that ensued <sup>c</sup>.

- IN the seventh year of the Hejra, Mohammed began to think of propagating his religion <sup>Mohammed</sup> beyond the bounds of Arabia, and sent messengers to the neighbouring princes, with <sup>invites sovereign</sup> letters to invite them to Mohammedism. But before he wrote these letters, he ordered a <sup>princes</sup> silver seal to be made, on which were engraved, in three lines, the following words, MOHAM- <sup>to embrace</sup> MED THE APOSTLE OF GOD. This seal, he believed, would procure the letters to which <sup>his religion.</sup> it was affixed a more favourable and easy reception at the courts of those princes whose conversion he intended first to attempt. Nor was this project without some success. Khosrû Parvîz, then king of Persia, the first monarch to whom he wrote, received the prophet's letter from the prince of Babrein, to whom Abd'allah Ebn Hodhâfa had delivered it for that purpose. But when, upon the interpreter's reading it, he found that Mohammed had placed his own name before that of Khosrû, he fell into a violent passion, tore the letter to pieces, and sent away the messenger very abruptly; which when Mohammed heard, he said, God shall tear his kingdom, in the same manner that he has torn my letter. Soon after a messenger came to the prophet from Badhân, king of Yaman, who was a dependant on the Persians, to acquaint him, that he had orders to send him, an audacious slave, to Khosrû. Mohammed put off his answer till the next morning, and then told the messenger it had been revealed to him by Gabriel that night, that Khosrû was slain by his son Shirûyeh, about seven o'clock the evening before. To which he thought fit to add, "Go and carry this news to Badhân, your master." He also farther assured him, says Al Jannâbi, that he was not at all afraid of the Persians, as he was very well assured, that his new religion and empire should rise to as great a height as that of Khosrû; and therefore bid him advise his master to embrace Mohammedism. The messenger being returned, Badhân, in a few days, received a letter from Shirûyeh, informing him of his father's death, and ordering him to give the prophet no further disturbance. Whereupon Badhân turned Mohammedan, and all the Persians with him followed his example. Of this Badhân sent the prophet news by an express; and, in consideration of such eminent service, he was afterwards continued viceroy of Yaman to his death, which happened about four months before that of Mohammed <sup>d</sup>.

- THE messenger, or minister, the prophet sent to the emperor Heraclius, was Dohya Ebn Kholcifa, the Calbite; who found that prince at Hems, or Emesa, according to Abmed Ebn Yusef, in Syria. Dohya, being introduced by the governor of Bostra, presented the letter he had brought with him to the emperor, who, says the same author, treated it with great respect, laying it on his pillow, and dismissed the bearer honourably. Abu'lfeda relates, that Dohya carried with him many rich presents from Heraclius to his master at Medina; which, however is not extremely probable. Abmed Ebn Yusef has handed down to us a copy of the letter, said to be brought by Dohya to the emperor; but as it by no means <sup>e</sup> appears to be genuine, having been omitted by Abu'lfeda, our readers will not expect an insertion of it here <sup>f</sup>.

ANOTHER author, however, asserts, that Dohya only delivered the prophet's letter to the governor of Bostra, as Abd'allah Ebn Hodhâfa had the former to the prince of Babrein, who presented it to Heraclius. Al Jannâbi pretends, that the emperor would have professed the new faith, had he not been afraid of losing his crown <sup>g</sup>.

<sup>a</sup> AL JANNAB. ubi sup. p. 154. AL KOR. MOHAM. f. vii. v. 86, &c. ABU'LFED. geogr. Arab. p. 42, 47. GEN. xxv. 2. xxxvii. 36. xxxix. 1. GOLII. not. ad Alfragan. p. 143. SHARIF AL EDRISI, p. 109. <sup>o</sup> ISM. ABU'LFED. de vit. Moham. c. xlv. p. 85.

<sup>p</sup> ISM. ABU'LFED. ubi sup. c. xlv. p. 92—95. AL JANNAB. ubi sup. p. 165, 166. EBN AMID. GEORG. CEDREN. hist. comp. p. 419. AL BOKHAR. in Sonna. AL NAISABUR. Pocock. not. in spec. hist. Arab. p. 65. Vide etiam ABU'LFED. in vit. Parviz. & JOAN. GAGN. not. ad Abu'lfed. de vit. Moham. p. 93, 94.

<sup>q</sup> AHMED EBN YUSEF, in hist. gen. sect. liv. c. 9. ISM. ABU'LFED. ubi sup. p. 94. AL JANNAB. ubi sup. p. 154. <sup>r</sup> ABU SOFIAN apud Abu Zeid Seid Abd'al Rahmân, in lib. Splendor. ut & ipse ABU ZEID SEID ABD'AL RAHMÂN. ibid. AL JANNAB. ubi sup.

THE third person Mohammed invited to the profession of Islamism, was Mokawkas, governor of Egypt, or, as he styled himself, prince of the Copts. He had been sent to Egypt by the emperor Heraclius, in quality of intendant of the imposts there. He was of the Jacobite communion, and therefore hated the Greeks; but durst not declare this openly. From the time that the Persians had besieged Constantinople, he had stopped the revenues of Egypt, and for that reason was afraid of falling into the hands of Heraclius. Mohammed sent to him Hâteb Ebn Abu Balta'a, who delivered his letter, conceived in the same terms as that before dispatched to the emperor. Mokawkas received Hâteb with great respect; and, after he had read the prophet's letter, applied it with the utmost reverence to his breast, and then put it into an ivory box, where he kept his signet. He also ordered his secretary to write an answer to it in Greek, which was afterwards translated into Arabic. Of this Ebn Yusef b has likewise preserved a copy in his general history, which no one versed in Oriental literature will allow to be genuine. In the year of the Hegra 19, when Egypt was subdued by the Khalif Omar, he, with his Copts, perfidiously deserted the Greeks, and concluded a treaty with Amrû Ebn Al As, the Khalif's lieutenant; by virtue of which, upon payment of tribute, he was permitted to profess the Christian religion. He died in the Jacobite persuasion, and, before his death, desired that his body might be interred in the church of St. John at Alexandria. We are told by Abu'lfeda, that he gave Hâteb four gems of great value for Mohammed, and two Coptic girls, one of which brought the prophet a son, named Ibrahim; as also a mule called Daldal, and an ass, whose name was Le'fir <sup>a</sup>.

THE fourth prince invited by Mohammed to declare himself a Moslem, was the Najâshi, c or king, of Ethiopia, named Ashama, or Arzama, to whom he wrote a much longer epistle than any of the former. This prince, according to the Arab writers, received the prophet's letter with marks of the most profound reverence, submission, and humility. As soon as it was brought him, he put it to his eyes, descended from his throne, and sat down upon the bare ground. Then, say they, he professed Islamism a second time, put the letter up in an ivory box, and ordered an answer to be drawn up in the most obliging and submissive terms. But neither the copies of the letters here mentioned, preserved by Mohammed Ebn Abda'l Bâki, nor the relation of the Najâshi's pretended conversion, nor, in short, any accounts of the propagation of Mohammedism, in these early times of it, in Ethiopia, as has already been observed, can at all be depended upon <sup>d</sup>.

HE also wrote a letter of the like purport, in the fifth place, to Al Hâreth Ebn Abi Shamer, king of Ghassân, whose territories extended to the frontiers of Syria. The person employed by him on this occasion was Shajâ Ebn Wabeh, the Ajâdite. After the letter had been read to Al Hâreth, he returned for answer, that he would go to Mohammed himself; which when the prophet heard, he said, May his kingdom perish. As the prince here mentioned was surnamed Ebn Abi Shamer, as well as the first of his predecessors, we may infer from thence, that the surname applied to him here was common to all the kings of Ghassân <sup>e</sup>.

THE sixth prince to whom Mohammed applied was Hawdha Ebn Ali, king of Tamâma, who received the prophet's letter from his minister, Soleit Ebn Anra. Hawdha was a Christian, and having some time before professed Islamism, had lately returned to his former faith. He threatened to make war upon the prophet, and gave out, that he had associated with him in his pretended apostolic function the false prophet Moseilama. This so irritated Mohammed, that he cursed him; upon which, say the Moslem writers, he died soon after <sup>f</sup>.

THE seventh and last letter he wrote was carried to Al Mundar Ebn Sâwa, king of Babrein, by Al Ola, the Hadbramite. This prince, upon the receipt of it, embraced Mohammedism, and all the Arabs of that country followed his example. He afterwards gained a signal victory over the Persians. As to the embassy sent to Al Hâreth Ebn Abd Cshil, one of the kings of Hamyar, in which Al Mohâjer Ebn Abu Ommeyy was employed, and the answer returned by that prince to Mohammed, which some place here, these have likewise f been by others referred to the beginning of the tenth year of the Hegra <sup>g</sup>.

Mohammed bewitched.

SOME of the Moslem authors pretend, that, about this time, Mohammed was bewitched by Lobeid Ebn Al Asam, a Jew, with the assistance of his daughters, who were extremely well versed in the magic art, by tying eleven knots on a cord, which they hid in a well, called Dharwân. Whereupon Mohammed falling ill, God revealed the 113th and 114th chapters of the Korân; and Gabriel acquainted him with the use he was to make of them, and of the place where the cord was hidden. Then the prophet, according to the directions the angel gave him, sent Ali to fetch the cord; and the same being brought, he repeated the two chapters

<sup>a</sup> ISM. ABU'LFED. AHMED EEN YUSEF, & AL JANNAB. ubi sup. EBN BATHIK, aliàs EUTYCHIUS, hist. tom. ii. p. 302. edit. Pocock. <sup>b</sup> MOHAM. EBN ABD'AL BAKI in lib. de excellent. Nabesimor.

par. ii. c. 2. ISM. ABU'LFED. ubi sup. p. 95, 96. BAGRAWI, AL WAKADI. &c. apud Moham. Abd'ul Bak. ubi sup. <sup>c</sup> ISM. ABU'LFED. ubi sup. p. 97. <sup>d</sup> Idem ibid. <sup>e</sup> ISM. ABU'LFED.

ubi sup. Vid. etiam GAGN. la vie de Mahom. tom. sec. liv. v. c. 4. p. 42.

a over it, and at every verse (for they consist of eleven) a knot was loosed, till, on finishing the last words, he was entirely freed from the charm. 'Tis probable this fiction was invented by Mohammed, to render the Jews, who were then his most implacable enemies, the more odious to his followers. For he seems to have made this pretended conduct of Lolaid, as may be inferred from what Mr. Gagnier observes, a pretext for coming to an open rupture with the Jews of Khaibar <sup>1</sup>.

About the middle of the month Al Mobarram, in the seventh year of the Hijra, Mohammed having drawn together a body of 1,400 foot, and 200 horse, began his march for Khaibar. He was attended by his wife Omm Salma in this expedition. The Jews, notwithstanding the great losses they had lately sustained, were grown very numerous there. They had retrenched and fortified themselves in several castles or forts, that were rendered almost impregnable; and therefore thought themselves in no danger of being attacked by the Muslims. However, Mohammed had before so animated his troops, that they thought themselves certain of success. He gave out the preceding year, before he set out for Al Hodeibiya, that he seemed, in a dream, to enter Mecca at the head of his companions, with their heads shaven, and their hair cut. This dream being imparted by the prophet to his followers, it occasioned a great deal of joy amongst them; they supposing it would be fulfilled the same year. But when they saw the truce concluded, which frustrated their expectations for that time, they were deeply concerned. Whereupon a passage of the forty-eighth chapter of the Koran was pretended to be revealed for their consolation, confirming the vision, which was not to be fulfilled till the year after, when Mohammed performed the visitation distinguished in the Koran by the addition of Al Kadda, or completion, because he then completed the visitation of the former year. For the Koreish then did not permit him to enter Mecca; so that he was obliged to kill his victims, and to shave himself, at Al Hodeibiya; and it was then that his companions had the promise of their being made amends for their mis-
 b had retrenched and fortified themselves in several castles or forts, that were rendered almost impregnable; and therefore thought themselves in no danger of being attacked by the Muslims. However, Mohammed had before so animated his troops, that they thought themselves certain of success. He gave out the preceding year, before he set out for Al Hodeibiya, that he seemed, in a dream, to enter Mecca at the head of his companions, with their heads shaven, and their hair cut. This dream being imparted by the prophet to his followers, it occasioned a great deal of joy amongst them; they supposing it would be fulfilled the same year. But when they saw the truce concluded, which frustrated their expectations for that time, they were deeply concerned. Whereupon a passage of the forty-eighth chapter of the Koran was pretended to be revealed for their consolation, confirming the vision, which was not to be fulfilled till the year after, when Mohammed performed the visitation distinguished in the Koran by the addition of Al Kadda, or completion, because he then completed the visitation of the former year. For the Koreish then did not permit him to enter Mecca; so that he was obliged to kill his victims, and to shave himself, at Al Hodeibiya; and it was then that his companions had the promise of their being made amends for their misc sisting at that time of the plunder of Mecca, by giving them that of Khaibar in lieu thereof. 'Tis no wonder, therefore, that they should attend the prophet with so much courage and alacrity in this expedition <sup>2</sup>.

As Khaibar, according to Abu'lfeda, was but six stations, or, as Sharif Al Edrisi will have it, only four, from Medina, Mohammed soon arrived before the town with all his forces. The place itself was extremely strong, as the name sufficiently implies, קָבָר, Cabar, denoting, in Hebrew, great, strong, robust, &c. from whence it seems much more natural to deduce it, than from קָבֵר, Chaber, a companion, confederate, &c. as M. D'Herbelot supposes, on account of the emigration of the Nadirites and Koreidhites, who were confederates, to Khaibar. For to this notion two very material objections may be offered: in the first place, the remains of the Jewish tribe of Koreidha, almost extirpated by Mohammed, as has been already observed, did not retire to Khaibar, till after the war of the ditch; and, secondly, if Abu'lfeda may be credited, this was a town of great antiquity, and Khaibar its original name; since he assures us, that Moses took the city of Khaibar from the Amalekites immediately after his passage of the Red Sea. Which if we admit, it can by no means appear d probable, that the name of Khaibar, used so many ages before, was derived from an accident that happened in the time of Mohammed. Nor was the place only strong in itself, but likewise fortified with four or five castles, according to Abu'lfeda, or nine at least, if we will believe Al Jannabi, and others, that seemed to render it almost impregnable. Some part of the adjacent country abounds with palm-trees, and is capable of cultivation. Khaibar was the seat of the Banu Anzab, descended from Maad, or Moad, the son of Ainan, and stood to the north-east of Medina. As the language of the ancient Amalekites was very nearly related to the Hebrew, if not altogether the same with it, there can be no impropriety in deducing the name of this town from an Hebrew original. The Arabic word corresponding with the Hebrew name Cabar, or Khaibar, is Hesh, or Hish, bearing no manner of resemblance in sound to Khaibar; which is an additional proof in support of our e present opinion <sup>3</sup>.

MOHAMMED having taken post before the town, made the proper dispositions for laying Mohammed siege to the castles; the reduction of which he knew would make him absolute master of the place. The Jews of Khaibar, having not had the least intelligence of his march, were struck with terror, when they understood that his troops were advanced to Mansela, a post in a stony tract at a small distance from Khaibar; for till then they were absolute strangers to his motions. The first castle he attacked was called Naem, which he carried sword in hand, without meeting with any opposition. This first instance of success encouraged the prophet to besiege in form the citadel of Khaibar, named Al Kamus, a place so strong by its situation, being built upon a rock, that it was almost inaccessible. The Jewish garrison here was commanded by Kenâna Ebn al Rabi, the richest and most powerful person of the whole nation, who was dignified with the title of king of the Jews. As the greatest part of the treasure belonging to the people of Khaibar was deposited in this place, Kenâna had caused it lately to be strengthened by many additional works, which seemed to render it impregnable. Notwithstanding which, Mohammed opened trenches before it; and, after battering the wall some days with his rams, and other military engines, he made a breach therein, that enabled him to give several assaults to the place, in which he was vigorously repulsed by the besieged. Nay, tho' by reiterated attacks he endeavoured to carry the citadel, they were always attended with ill success. Since, therefore, the prophet often narrowly escaped being killed, by too much exposing his person, in order to animate his men, and the siege was drawn out to an unforeseen length, by the gallant behaviour of the besieged, he resolved to give a little relaxation to his troops, and therefore discontinued the attacks for one or two days <sup>b</sup>.
 f

<sup>1</sup> Al Kor. MOHAM. c. cxiii, cxiv. AL BEIDAWI, AL JALLALO'DDIN, AL JANNAB. ubi sup. p. 166, &c. GAGN. la vie de Mahom. ubi sup. c. v, p. 43—49. <sup>2</sup> ISM. ABU'LFED. ubi sup. p. 84—87. <sup>3</sup> AL JANNAB. ubi sup. GREG. ABU'L-FAR. ubi sup. p. 163. AL BEIDAWI, JALLALO'DDIN, ABU'L RABI, in lib. Splendor. ABU'LFED. in descript. Arab. p. 43, & in gen. hist. par. i. cap. de Amalecit. FEN AMID, ubi sup. D'HERBEL. biblioth. Orient in voc. Khaibar, p. 983. ABU'LFED. in vit. Moham. p. 8—92. AL JANNAB. ubi sup.

DURING this interval, Abu Becr, being desirous of distinguishing himself, mounted the breach, and was followed by some of his brave companions; but they were driven from thence with loss. Omar also made a more vigorous effort to storm the castle Al Kamus; but without effect, he likewise being constrained to retire. But the next morning Ali, who had laboured under a disorder in his eyes, of which he is said to have been cured by applying some of the prophet's spittle to them, advanced at the head of a choice detachment to the attack; and having, in single combat, slain Marhab, a giant of an enormous size, and the champion of Khaibar, notwithstanding the vigorous resistance of the besieged, carried the place by assault. Some of the Moslem authors pretend, that, in the heat of the pursuit, after he had driven the enemy from the breach, Ali tore one of the castle gates off the hinges, and used it for a shield, his own having before been struck out of his hand by a Jew that encountered him, tho' it was so heavy that eight lusty men could not lift it up from the ground. But this seems to be an Arab hyperbole, meriting little regard. Marhab, according to Abu'lfeda, was the lord of the castle Al Kamus; from whence we may infer, that it was either his proper seat, or else that he commanded the garrison in it. The last of which notions is repugnant to what we find advanced by all Al Jannâbi, who makes Marhab to have acted under the orders of Kenâna, as has been already observed. Be that as it will, we are assured, that Ali cleft his head in two with the famous sword Dbu'l-Fakâr, or the piercing, given him by Mohammed for this purpose, when scarce any other weapon would have done execution; his head being secured by a weighty helmet, lined with a double turbant. Amongst the female captives taken on this occasion, Abu'lfeda reckons the beautiful Safya Bint Hoyai Ebn Akhtab, whom the prophet took to wife, having presented her with her liberty for a dower. We are informed by Al Beidarwi, that this Safia Bint Hoyai Ebn Akhtab once came to her husband, and complained that the women said to her, O thou Jewess, the daughter of a Jew and a Jewess: to which he answered, Canst thou not say Aaron is my father, Moses is my uncle, and Mohammed is my husband? Part of the treasures, deposited in the citadel, fell into Mohammed's hands; tho', rather than discover the rest, Kenâna suffered the most exquisite torture, and at last death itself, with a most surprising constancy, or rather an obstinacy peculiar to that nation to which he belonged <sup>c</sup>.

and the castle
of Al Afab Ebn Moâd.

AFTER this, the prophet caused the castle of Al Afab Ebn Moâd, called Nata'a, to be first invested, and then formally besieged. The Moslem troops had scarce reached the place, when some workmen came out of the town with spades, pick-axes, baskets, and other instruments, in order to finish a certain part of the fortifications, who had like to have fallen into the hands of one of Mohammed's detachments. But as soon as they perceived the Moslems, they gave the alarm, by crying out, Mohammed is here with all his army; and then immediately retired within their retrenchments, leaving their tools behind them, that they might make the greater haste. Upon which, Mohammed, in his turn, said aloud, ALLAH ACBAR, GOD IS GREAT; adding, Khaibar shall be desolate; and since our enemies themselves have supplied us with tools, one of these mornings shall prove fatal to those who first gave the alarm. In short, he considered the acquisition of these tools as a sure presage of their ruining and destroying the city <sup>d</sup>.

HOWEVER, as the Jews of Khaibar had cut down 400 palm-trees, and ruined all the flat country for some miles round the fortress, the Moslems found themselves reduced to great straits for want of provisions. But at last they surmounted all difficulties, and entered the palace, where they met with a vast quantity of corn, dates, oil, honey, flesh, &

<sup>b</sup> ISM. ABU'LFED. ubi sup. p. 87, 88. AL JANNAB. ubi sup. p. 172. EBN ISHAK. <sup>c</sup> ISM. ABU'LFED. AL JANNAB. & EBN ISHAK, ubi sup. AL BOKHARI in SONNA. Aut. lib. dist. MO'ALEM AL TANZIL. GREG. ABU'L FAR. ubi sup. GAGN. la vie de Mahom. ubi sup. p. 53—56. <sup>d</sup> ISM. ABU'LFED. & AL JANNAB. ubi sup.

a &c. as also an infinite number of sheep, oxen, asses, military engines, and arms of all kinds. To which Al Wakedi adds a large camel's hide, or skin, filled with collars, necklaces, bracelets, ear-rings, buckles, &c. all of gold, besides emeralds and golden seals in great abundance. In fine, if Abu'lfeda merits any regard, this fort, or castle, of Al Asab Ebn Moâd was as well replenished with corn and other provisions, all which came into the possession of the Moslems, as any other in the district of Khaibar <sup>c</sup>.

We must not omit informing our readers, that, after the reduction of Al Kamus, during He is poisoned the prophet's residence there, he was poisoned by Zeinab Bint Al Hâreth, the sister of Mar- by Zeinab hab, who had been slain in single combat by Ali; which horrid fact she committed, in order Bint Hâreth. to revenge her brother's death. The manner of her effecting this was, by communicating b some poison to a shoulder of mutton, which, upon inquiry, she was told by his domestics, Mohammed loved better than any other part of the sheep; or, as Abu'lfeda seems to intimate, by dressing a shoulder of a sheep that had itself been poisoned. Having invited the prophet to supper, she set this joint roasted before him and his companions; one of whom, named Basbar Ebn Al Bara, eating heartily of it, was almost instantly seized with convulsions, and expired upon the spot. Nor did Mohammed himself, tho' he escaped for the present, by spitting some of the meat out of his mouth, survive this disaster much above three years. Some writers pretend, that the shoulder of mutton spoke to Mohammed, and discovered itself to be poisoned; but this is too absurd to merit any regard. The prophet having ordered the whole carcass to be burnt, demanded of Zeinab what could induce her to perpetrate so black a crime; to whom she is said to have made the following answer: "I c " thought if you had been really a prophet, you would have easily discovered the poison; and if not, that it would have delivered us from your tyranny." However, some relate, that Mohammed pardoned her; tho' others affirm, that he delivered her up to the parents of Basbar, who put her to death; which seems more agreeable to the bloody and vindictive disposition of the impostor. Be that as it will, we are told by some Moslem writers, that when Basbar's mother visited him in his last sickness, he said to her, O mother of Basbar, the poison of Khaibar, so fatal to your son, has not ceased to visit me from time to time ever since I received it; but now the veins of my heart are broke and dissolved by the violence of it <sup>d</sup>.

d AFTER the reduction of the preceding castles, Mohammed easily made himself master of The other castles of Khaibar all the rest; the principal of which were Kala'at Al Zobeir, Hesn Obba, Hesn Al Barâ, Al Watib, and Al Salâlem. The garisons of the two last of which finding themselves not surrender to him. in a condition to defend the places long, and being threatened with inevitable destruction, surrendered upon the first summons to Mohammed, at discretion <sup>e</sup>.

THE town of Khaibar itself being now destitute of its chief supports, was incapable of He makes himself master at last of the city itself. standing a long siege; and therefore, at the end of ten days, it was forced to capitulate; after which Ali took possession of it. The terms of the capitulation were, that the inhabitants of Khaibar should continue to cultivate their lands, as heretofore; that their present effects and the future produce of their lands should be divided between them and the Moslems; and e that the prophet should have the liberty of transplanting them whenever he pleased. By virtue of which capitulation, the Jews of Khaibar remained in the peaceable possession of their country several years; but at last they were expelled from thence in the Khalifat of Omar (I), who obliged them to depart out of Arabia, and assigned them, as an equivalent for their land, an equal extent of territory in Syria <sup>f</sup>.

AT the same time that Khaibar surrendered, the citizens of Fadac likewise opened their Fadac and Wadi'l Korâ gates, and made their submission to the prophet. In consideration of which submission, he allowed them a moiety both of their lands and effects. That moiety assigned the Moslems likewise submit to him. the prophet took to himself, in conformity to the law contained in the fifty-ninth chapter of the Korân, no cavalry having been made use of in the reduction of that place. As f for the spoils taken at Khaibar, Mohammed distributed part of them amongst the troops employed in the expedition; assigning to every foot-soldier a single portion, and to every horseman a double one. From Khaibar the prophet marched to Wâdi'l

<sup>c</sup> Idem ibid. EBN ISHAK, & AL WAKEDI, ubi sup. <sup>f</sup> ISM. ABU'LFED. ubi sup. p. 92. AL JANNAB. ubi sup. p. 174. EBN ISHAK, EBN AL ATHIR, EBN FARES, AL KODAI, Poc. not. in spec. hist. Arab. p. 189. <sup>e</sup> ABU'LFED. ubi sup. p. 91. AL JANNAB. ubi sup. p. 173. EBN AMID, hist. Sar. p. 8. <sup>d</sup> Idem ibid. GREG. ABU'L-FAR. hist. dynast. p. 163.

(I) The Khalif recollecting, that one of Mohammed's last orders to the Ansârs was, not to tolerate any false religion in Arabia, he came to a resolution to expel the Jews of Khaibar from that country, in compliance with that command. At least this was the pretext he made use of, for the vindication of his conduct, on that occasion; which undoubtedly had the desired effect, and satisfied the minds of all his Moslem subjects, as to the justice and legality of it (33).

Korâ, a Jewish town, about two days journey from thence, towards the borders of Syria; which he took after a few days siege, and then returned to Medina. Soon after his arrival there, he met with Jaafar Ebn Abu Tâleb, and his companions, who, in the fifth year of the prophet's mission, had fled into Ethiopia. As Mohammed had before wrote to the Najâshi to send them back to Medina, this interview was very agreeable to him; inasmuch, that, at the first sight of them, he said, I cannot determine whether I am better pleased with the return of Jaafar, or the expedition to Khaibar. That expedition was finished in a month's time, the town surrendering in the month of Safar, ten days of which were spent in the siege of the citadel. About this time, according to Mohammed Ebn Abda'l Bâki, and Abu'lfeda, the prophet espoused by proxy Omm Habîba, the daughter of Abu Sofiân, in Ethiopia, her cousin Khâled Ebn Seid Ebn Al As Ebn Ommeya personating Mohammed on this occasion. The Najâshi himself, if we will believe Ebn Abda'l Bâki, performed the ceremony of the espousals, and then pronounced an oration; the substance of which is given us by that author. He moreover made the lady a present of 400 dinêrs, for a dower, out of the profound esteem and veneration that he had long entertained for the prophet; the news of which being brought to Abu Sofiân, he could not forbear saying, This stallion, meaning Mohammed, will never be bridled. Omm Habîba was then about thirty years of age, and lived three years and some months with Mohammed. She died at Medina in the 42d, or the 43d, year of the Hejra, and the Khalifat of Moâwiyah; and, after her death, Merwân Ebn Al Hakem said the usual prayers for her at her interment. Some authors, however, relate, that she died in Syria. Sbarafeddin Ali, Timur Begh's historian, says he saw her tomb, together with that of Omm Salma, at Damascus; and, in his life of that prince, he has inserted a description of them. When Mohammed espoused her, she was a widow, having before been married to Abd'allah Ebn Jahash, who died at the court of the Najâshi. Before his death, he became a convert to the Christian faith; which is of itself a sufficient proof, exclusive of the arguments already offered, that Islamism was not then, notwithstanding what has been advanced to the contrary by the Moslem writers, the prevailing religion in Ethiopia<sup>h</sup>.

Mohammed divides the spoil taken at Khaibar;

THE Jewish war being thus happily terminated, Mohammed divided the spoils taken at Khaibar, and some of the neighbouring towns, into thirty-six equal portions; half of which he applied partly to his own use, and partly towards defraying the expence of the pilgrimage to Mecca, which he was to perform the approaching Dhu'lkaada, by virtue of the treaty concluded at Al Hodeibiya with the Koreish. The other half he distributed amongst the troops employed in the expedition, and the refugees lately arrived from Ethiopia. The latter he put upon the same foot with the former, out of regard to his new spouse Omm Habîba Bint Abu Sofiân. As for the spoils of Fadac, that is to say, half of the effects of the inhabitants, and half of the revenue of their possessions, of these he made no division at all, but considered them intirely as his own property; no Moslem horse having advanced against that city, the people of which he brought solely by his own address to a capitulation<sup>i</sup>.

and celebrates his nuptials with Safiya Bint Hoyai.

WE must not forget to acquaint our readers, that Mohammed celebrated his nuptials with Safiya Bint Hoyai at a place called Al Sabbâ, where he encamped in his march to Medina. This marriage he also consummated the following night in his pavilion, and the next day he provided a sumptuous entertainment; where, amongst other elegant dishes, was served up one called Al Hais, composed of dates, honey, and whipt cream, all mixed together. He invited none to this banquet but his most intimate friends, who then all had the honour to dine with him. Safiya lived with the prophet three years and some months; and at last died either in the fiftieth, or fifty-second, year of the Hejra<sup>k</sup>.

He reduces Yetama.

IT must be observed here, that, in the expedition to Khaibar, Mohammed made a considerable city, inhabited by Jews, tributary to him, that has not been mentioned by Abu'lfeda. The name of this city was Yetama. Its Inhabitants being struck with terror, when they were informed that Mohammed had defeated a considerable body of the Jewish forces near Wadi'l Korâ, and made himself master of that place in four days time after he had opened trenches before it, sent deputies to him to desire peace, offering at the same time to pay him an annual tribute. This offer the prophet accepted, and then began his march for Medina. The Moslems are said not to have lost above twenty men in the whole foregoing expedition<sup>l</sup>.

Omar makes an incursion upon the territory of the Hawanites.

Soon after the prophet's arrival at Medina, he sent Omar with a party of 30 men to make an incursion upon the territory of the Hawanites, who seem to have committed some hostilities against the Moslems. Omar, at the head of his men, advanced to Torba, a place

<sup>h</sup> ISM. ABU'LFED. & AL JANNAB. ubi supra. AL KOR. MOHAM. f. lix. EBN HAWKAL, SHARIF L EDRI, ABU'LFED. descript. Arab. p. 43. MOHAM. EBN ABD'AL BAKI, ubi sup. par. ii. c. 3. & alibi. SHARAFEDDIN ALI in vit. Timur Begh, lib. v. c. 26. p. 333. AL BEIDAWI, PRID. life of Mahom. p. 85. Univ. Hist. vol. xviii. p. 330, 331.

<sup>i</sup> ABU'LFED. & AL JANNAB. ubi supra. AL BEIDAWI, AL KOR. MOHAM. f. lix.

<sup>k</sup> AL JANNAB. ubi sup. p. 170. Disputat. Christian. c. 6.

<sup>l</sup> AL JANNAB. ubi sup. p. 177, 178.

a within the dependencies of Mecca, inhabited by the Banu Hawan. But the enemy fled with so much precipitation at his approach, that he could not come up with them <sup>m</sup>.

IN the month of Skaabân, Abu Becr marched with a detachment against the Banu Kelâb, <sup>marches against the Banu Kelâb, as does Bashar Ebn Saad against the Banu Morrah.</sup> seated in the district of Fazara; and took his measures so well, that he surprised a body of them. Of these he killed some, wounded others, and put the rest to flight <sup>n</sup>.

IN the same month, Bashar Ebn Saad, the Anjâr, set out from Medina with 30 men to attack the Banu Morrah, in the territory of Fadac; but falling into an ambuscade, he was forced to retire, with the loss of the greatest part of his men <sup>o</sup>.

b IN the month of Ramadân, the prophet sent Gâleb Ebn Abd'allah, the Leitbite, with 130 men, to Monia, in the territory of Najd, about thirty-six parasangs from Medina. This expedition was undertaken against the Banu Awâl, who had incurred the prophet's displeasure. Gâleb made an irruption into their habitations, killed some of the principal of them, carried off a great number of their camels and sheep, and then returned to Medina, without the loss of a single man on this occasion <sup>p</sup>. <sup>Gâleb Ebn Abd'allah undertakes an expedition against the Banu Awâl.</sup>

BASHAR EBN SAAD, the Anjâr, made another incursion, more lucky than his former, into the kingdom of Yaman, and the county of Jabâr, with 300 men. This happened in the month of Shawâl. Being informed, that a body of the enemy were upon the point of making an irruption into the territory of Medina, he advanced to attack them; but they retired at his approach. He, therefore, ravaged the country through which he moved, and seized upon many of their camels. He also took two prisoners, who both, at the prophet's request, embraced the Mohammedan religion <sup>q</sup>. <sup>Bashar Ebn Saad makes an incursion into the kingdom of Yaman.</sup>

c ABOUT this time, Mohammed wrote a letter to Jabalab Ebn Al Ayham, the last king of Ghassân, who reigned at Tadmor, and invited him to embrace Islamism. That prince, upon this invitation, became a Moslem; and, in answer to his letter, assured the prophet of the reality of his conversion. He persisted for some time in the profession of the new religion; but having struck a certain Fazarite at Mecca, whither he was come to perform the pilgrimage commanded in the Korân, who had affronted him, he was ordered by the Khalif Omar either to ask pardon of the Fazarite for the offence, or to suffer himself to be treated in the same manner; which so disgusted him, that he returned to his former faith, and retired to Constantinople. This year died Shirûyeh, or Syroes, king of Persia, who had massacred his father Khosrû Parvîz, as has been already observed, and sixteen brothers. He was a prince of most abandoned morals, and guilty of the most execrable crimes. Being attacked by various maladies, he expired in exquisite torture, after six months reign <sup>r</sup>. <sup>king of Ghassân, turns Mohammedan, and afterwards relapses to Christianity.</sup>

d WE are told by some of the Moslem writers, whose authority, therefore, in the point before us, is unexceptionable, that, before the conclusion of this year, their holy prophet was guilty of fornication; tho' this enormity has been palliated, if not indirectly vindicated, with his usual candour and piety, by Mr. Sale. Mohammed was so charmed with the beauty of Mary, a girl of Coptic extraction, who, together with three other female slaves, and an eunuch named Maîudh, had been sent him as a present by Al Mokawkas, governor of Egypt, that he was tempted to lie with her; tho' he had before expressly forbidden fornication in the twenty-fourth chapter of the Korân. As this was done on the day which was due to Ayesha, or to Hafsa, and, as some say, on Hafsa's own bed, while she was absent at her father Omar's; it soon came to both those ladies knowledge, notwithstanding all the precautions taken by Mohammed to keep it concealed. Nay, some relate, that Hafsa caught the prophet and his maid, if not in the fact, yet at least upon the bed together. This she took extremely ill, and reproached her husband so sharply, that, to pacify her, he promised, with an oath, never to touch Mary again; and, in order to sooth her vanity, and to induce her to keep the whole affair a secret, foretold to her, as a piece of news, that Abu Becr and Omar should succeed him in the government of his people. Hafsa, however, could not conceal this from Ayesha, with whom she lived in strict friendship, but acquainted her with the whole matter. Whereupon the prophet, perceiving probably by Ayesha's behaviour, or rather that of her father Abu Becr, to whom she had discovered her husband's incontinence, and of Omar, to whom his daughter Hafsa had made great complaints upon the same subject, that his secret had been discovered, upbraided the latter with her betraying him; telling her, that God had revealed it to him. He, therefore, for her indiscretion, not only divorced her, but separated himself from all his other wives for a whole month; which time he spent in amorous diversions with Mary; and this in direct contradiction to the Korân, and in open violation of the oath he had taken to Hafsa. However, dreading, as 'tis probable, the resentment of Omar, in a short time, he took Hafsa again, by the direction, as he gave out, of the angel Gabriel, who commended her for her frequent fasting, and other exercises of devotion; assuring him likewise, that she should be one of his wives in paradise. To free

<sup>m</sup> Idem ibid. p. 180.
JANNAB. ubi sup.

<sup>n</sup> Idem ibid.

<sup>o</sup> AL JANNAB. ubi sup.

<sup>p</sup> Idem ibid.

<sup>q</sup> AL

<sup>r</sup> Idem ibid. Vide etiam Poc. not. in spec. hist. Arab. p. 77, 78.

himself from the obligation of his promise and oath to Hafsa, he pretended, that the sixty-sixth chapter of the Korân was revealed, which allows the Moslems the dissolution of their oaths. In order, therefore, totally to abandon himself to his sensuality, the pretended prophet makes God to deliver a contradictory revelation, and to permit a practice than which nothing can be more inconsistent with the moral fitnesses of things, or more shocking and pernicious to human society; and consequently endeavours, as much as in him lies, notwithstanding his assertion of the unity of the Divine Nature, the great fundamental article of faith of the Moslems, to overturn the foundations of all natural as well as revealed religion <sup>a</sup>.

He performs the sacred visitation called Al Kadâ.

IN the month of Dbu'lkaada, this same year, Mohammed performed the sacred visitation called Al Kadâ, or the completion. This was distinguished by the addition of Al Kadâ, <sup>b</sup> because Mohammed then completed the visitation of the former year, when the Koreish not permitting him to enter Mecca, he was obliged to kill his victims, and to shave himself, in order to correspond with his dream, at Al Hedcibiya. All the people who had accompanied the prophet the last year, attended him on the present occasion, together with seventy camels, designed for victims upon their arrival at Caaba. They had also an hundred horses, and moreover carried with them a large quantity of arms. They came first to Dbu'lholeifa, six miles from Medina, where they solemnly vowed to observe all the rites and ceremonies of the sacred visitation. From thence they advanced to Batn Tajaj, some few miles distant from Mecca, where the prophet deposited all his baggage and arms, and left Aws Ebn Kbuf, with 200 men, to guard them. Before he reached that city, most of the Koreish retired to <sup>c</sup> the summits of the neighbouring mountains; so that it was in a manner deserted by its inhabitants; only some few of them remaining upon the top of the town-hall, or council-house, to observe the prophet's procession, and the motions of the Moslems <sup>d</sup>.

MOHAMMED having ascended the hill of Cadâ, which was part of the mountain called Al Hajun, where the heights of Mecca begin, and afterwards entered the plain of the little pebbles, mounted his camel, named Kafwa, and began his solemn march, or procession, towards the city. He was surrounded on all sides by the Moslems, and Abd'allah Ebn Rawâha marched before him on foot, holding the bridle of his camel. This Abd'allah and Omar insulted the Koreish, and menaced them, at their entry into the city, without the least provocation given; which shewed the ferity of their disposition. Mohammed, being arrived at Mecca, immediately visited the temple, and entered upon the prescribed ceremonies. After which, he came to the corner where the black stone is fixed, which he kissed with great devotion. From thence he and his companions proceeded to compass the Caaba; which they did seven times, using a short quick pace the three first, and a grave ordinary one on the four last. This, it is said, was ordered by Mohammed, that his followers might shew themselves strong and active, to cut off the hopes of the infidels, who gave out that the immoderate heats of Medina had rendered them weak; and, at the same time, to spare his men, who were already pretty much fatigued. Which custom, in some measure, prevails even at this day; tho' the pilgrims are not obliged to use the aforesaid quick pace every time they perform this piece of devotion, but only at certain particular seasons. So often as the Moslems passed by the black stone, they either kissed it, after the example of their prophet, or touched it with their hand, and kissed that; which is likewise the present practice of the Mohammedans. The seven circuits round the Caaba being finished, Mohammed ordered Belâl, his crier, to give notice of the time of prayer without the Caaba; which being likewise done, the prophet mounted his camel, and ran seven times between the mountains of Safâ and Merwâ, partly with a slow pace, and partly running, for the reasons above assigned. This ceremony his followers at first made a scruple of performing, because there were on those mountains two idols, named Asâf and Nayelab, to which the Koreish used to pay a superstitious veneration. But, in order to remove this scruple, the prophet pretended that, at this juncture, God revealed to him the following passage of the Korân: "Moreover, <sup>e</sup> Safa and Merwa are two of the monuments of God: whoever, therefore, goeth on <sup>f</sup> the pilgrimage to the temple of Mecca, or visiteth it, it shall be no crime in him, if he compass them both." This ceremony is said to be as ancient as the time of Hagar, the mother of Ishmael. Lastly, he sacrificed the camels, brought with him for that purpose, in the valley of Mina, and the Moslems shaved their heads, according to custom; which having done, the prophet sent some of his men to relieve the troops composing the <sup>a</sup> JALLALO'DDIN, AHMED EBN YAHYA, AL ZAMAKHSHARI, AHMED EBN YUSEF, AL KOR. MOHAM. f. xvii, xxiv, lxvi. GREG. ABU'L-FAR. ubi sup. p. 165. JOANNES ANDREAS, c. 8. BELLONIUS, l. iii. c. 8. RICHARDI confutat. c. 12. CANTACUZEN. orat. ii. f. 8. GUADAGN. tract. ii. c. 10. sect. 2. FORTALIT. FID. lib. iv. conf. 2. SALE's notes on the Kor. c. 66. p. 456, 457. <sup>b</sup> ISM. ABU'LFED. ubi sup. c. xlvii. p. 97, 98, 99. AL BOKHARI in Sonna. AL JANNAB. ubi sup. p. 182, &c. JALLALO'DDIN, EBN AL ATHIR, AL KOR. MOHAM. f. ii. v. 160. Vide etiam BOBOV. de peregr. Meccan, p. 11, &c. CHARDIN, voy. de Perse, tom. ii. p. 440, &c. PITT's account of the religion, &c. of the Mohammedans, p. 92, &c. HADR. RELAND. de rel. Moham. p. 113, &c.

- a detachment left at Batu Yajaj, to guard the arms and baggage. This gave them likewise an opportunity of coming to Mecca, and performing their devotions there. All which being finished, the prophet, after four days residence in Mecca, retired to Shorf. Here he consummated his marriage with Maimûna Bint Al Hâreth, the Helâlite, the widow of Raham Ebn Abda'l Ozza, whom he had before espoused at Mecca, when he was in the habit of a pilgrim there; God having granted him, as he pretended, the peculiar privilege of doing this, or, in other words, of breaking through those rules and customs held as sacred by the other Arabs, and even recommended as such by himself to all his followers. His uncle Al Abbâs performed the nuptial ceremony. This Maimûna was the last of Mohammed's wives, according to Al Jannâbi, and survived all the rest. When she was taken ill at Mecca, she was, at her own request, carried to Shorf, because the prophet had, as she said, foretold that she should not depart this life in the former place. Here, therefore, she died in a pavilion erected under that tree under which Mohammed first lay with her. Her tomb was still remaining in the sixteenth century, having been visited by Abu Mohammed Mostafa Ebn Al Sayyad Hasan Al Jannâbi, the Arab historian, in his return to Medina from Mecca, where he had been to pay his devotions at the tomb of the impostor, in the year of the Hejra 963, which answers nearly to the year of our LORD 1556<sup>a</sup>.

- THE eighth year of the Hejra was ushered in by the conversion of Khâled Ebn Walid, Three of the most considerable persons among the Koreish embrace Islamism. Amru Ebn Al As, the Sabamite, and Othmân Ebn Telha Ebn Abda'l Dâr, the three most considerable persons amongst the Koreish, who, soon after the prophet's departure from Mecca, left that place, and arrived at Medina, where they made public profession of Mohammedism. This proved a great accession of power to the impostor, and soon enabled him to make himself master of the whole peninsula of the Arabs. For Khâled Ebn Al Walid was one of the greatest warriors of his time; having put to flight Mohammed's rear, which occasioned the defeat of all his forces, at the battle of Obod; Amru was the ambassador sent by the Koreish to the Najâshi, to demand the Moslem fugitives who had taken refuge in Ethiopia, and a man of very considerable abilities; and as for Othmân Ebn Telha, he was the guardian, or intendant, of the Caaba, and consequently a person of the most extensive influence of any in Arabia. 'Tis no wonder, therefore, that, after these had declared themselves in his favour, he should soon find himself in a condition to give laws to the Koreish, and of course to raise himself to the supreme government of his country<sup>w</sup>.

- IN the month of Safar this year, the eighth of the Hejra, Gâleb Ebn Abd'allah, the Leithite, one of Mohammed's commanders, made two very successful incursions. In the first of which, he plundered the Banu Al Malah, a very considerable Arab family seated at Al Ca-dia; and, in the second, he took vengeance of the Banu Morrah at Fadac, for the massacre of Basbar's companions, in the month of Shaabân, the preceding year. He no sooner arrived at Fadac, with a body of 200 men, than the enemy made a vigorous sally upon him; but they were repulsed with so much bravery, that the greatest part of them were cut to pieces, and all the rest taken prisoners. After the action, the Moslems pillaged the adjacent district, and brought off with them a considerable number of camels to Medina<sup>x</sup>.

- WE are told by Al Jannâbi, that, about this time, the prophet caused a chair, or pulpit, to be built for him by a Greek carpenter, called Nakum, who was domestic to a Christian lady, named Ayesha. This he ascended by three steps, the highest of which he sat upon, and placed his feet upon the second, when he preached, as he constantly did, to the people. After his decease, Abu Becr sat on the second step, and put his feet upon the third. Afterwards Omar sat upon the lowest step, and placed his feet upon the ground. When Othmân was Khalif, he did the same, during the first years of his reign; but afterwards he thought fit to seat himself on the highest step, as Mohammed had done, to the end of his Khalifat. Moâwiyah raised this pulpit to six steps, and none of his successors ever altered it. Othmân was the first who covered it with tapestry; of which a certain woman having stripped it, she had her hands cut off, in conformity to an injunction of the Korân. In the fiftieth year of the Hejra, Moâwiyah had an intention to remove this pulpit to Damascus. But the very moment this was attempted, as some of the Moslems pretend, there happened a most surprising solar eclipse; which, together with the remonstrances made by Abu Horeira, induced the Khalif to desist from his design. Before the construction of this pulpit, the prophet, immediately after his arrival at Medina, officiated on a piece of a beam, or the trunk of a palm-tree driven into the ground, on the top of which he leaned, when he preached to the people. The first time Mohammed ascended the new machine, a dismal sound came from this trunk, that represented the lowing or bellowing of a camel, and seemed to express the grief of the beam for its being deserted by the prophet. This, says

<sup>a</sup> Idem ibid. Vide etiam GAGN. la vie de Mahom. tom. sec. liv. v. c. 10. p. 78—83. ABU'LFED. de vit. Moham. p. 97, 98, 99. & AL JANNAB. ubi sup. p. 184, &c.

<sup>w</sup> ISM. ABU'LFED. ubi sup. c. xlviii. p. 99, 100. EBN ISHAK in lib. Splendor. ABU'L RABI apud AL Wâked, in relat. ut & ipse AL WAKED. ibid.

<sup>x</sup> AL JANNAB. ubi sup. p. 188.

Al Ghazali, so affected him, that he immediately came down out of the pulpit, embraced a the trunk, caressing it, and giving it the most endearing language, till he had brought it to good humour <sup>y</sup>.

WE must not omit informing our readers, that Dr. Prideaux seems to be mistaken, when he asserts, that Mohammed ordered this pulpit to be made by the advice of one of his wives; that circumstance not being attested, or even mentioned, by any of the Eastern writers. But this mistake, if it be really such, may perhaps be accounted for, by observing, that the carpenter, who framed this machine, was a domestic of one Ayesha, a Christian lady, whom our author seems to have confounded with Ayesha, the wife of Mohammed. For had this domestic belonged to the latter lady, or been in any manner concerned with her, it would have been natural enough to suppose, that she persuaded the prophet to make b use of him on the preceding occasion, and even at first to have suggested the expediency of such a machine to him. The identity, therefore, of names here has probably introduced a confusion of two different persons, and consequently induced the Doctor to publish an assertion that has not the least shadow of authority, either Christian or Mohammedan, to support it <sup>z</sup>.

The Moslems
continue their incursions.

IN the month called the former Rabi, Shaja Ebn Wabab plundered the Banu Amer, and carried off many of their camels. But Caab Ebn Omar, the Ghafarite, did not meet with the same success, in that month, on a similar occasion. Having advanced, at the head of a small detachment, as far as Dhat Al Talâh, situate behind Dhat Al Kora, he was attacked by a superior force. However, he defended himself with so much bravery, that c he fought his way through the enemy, and at last made his escape, grievously wounded, tho' all his men were cut to pieces in the action <sup>a</sup>.

Mohammed's
ambassador assassinated.

BUT, notwithstanding this, the eighth year of the Hejra was a very fortunate one to Mohammed. In the beginning of it, Khâled Ebn Al Walid, and Amru Ebn Al As, both excellent soldiers, the first of whom afterwards conquered Syria, and other countries, and the latter Egypt, became converts to Islamism, as has been already observed. Soon after which remarkable event, the prophet received advice, that the ambassador he had sent to the governor of Bosra, on the same errand as those who went to the princes above-mentioned, was assassinated by Amru Ebn Shorheil, an Arab of the tribe of Ghassân, who was commandant of the place for the emperor Heraclius, at Mûta, a town in the territory of Balkâ, d in Syria, about three days journey eastward from Jerusalem. The prophet was sensibly touched with this tragical accident, and resolved to be revenged of the governor of Mûta, for the affront offered him, and the loss he had sustained, by the death of his ambassador. For this purpose, he assembled an army of 3,000 men, all chosen troops, and gave the command of it to Zeid Ebn Al Hâretha, his freed-man, with orders to advance to Mûta, the place where the murder of Al Hâreth Ebn Omair, the Azdite, Mohammed's ambassador, was committed, without delay. This brought on a general action between the Christian and Moslem forces, which ended in the defeat of the former, notwithstanding the vast disparity of numbers, as will soon more fully appear <sup>b</sup>.

Zeid, Mo-hammed's general, begins his march for Mûta ;

ZEID, having received his instructions, began his march for Mûta; but being apprized e that the emperor's army, composed of Greeks and auxiliary Arabs, amounting to 100,000 effective men, was likewise on its march to attack him, he thought proper to halt. In a council of war held on this occasion, it was at first proposed to send to the prophet for a reinforcement, to enable them to make head against so formidable a power, to which their diminutive forces bore no manner of proportion. But at last, by the persuasion of Abd'allah Ebn Rawâba, it was carried, that they should march directly against the enemy, and engage them, notwithstanding their inferiority in point of numbers. As they were to fight for their religion, and every thing dear to them lay now at stake, they were determined either to conquer or die <sup>c</sup>.

and advances
to that place.

IN the mean time the Greeks advanced to Amshâref, a town on the confines of the terri- f tory of Balka, with a full resolution to offer the Moslems battle. But the latter, in pursuance of the prophet's orders, pushed their march with so much vigour, that they penetrated to Mûta, before the enemy reached that place, and immediately made the proper dispositions for an engagement <sup>d</sup>.

The battle of Mûta.

THE imperial army being likewise arrived at Mûta, the battle immediately began. Zeid, who carried the standard of Islamism, and fought in the first ranks, was killed in the beginning of the action; as was also Jaafar Ebn Abu Tâleb, who succeeded him in his post. Abd'allah Ebn Rawâba, who took upon him the command of the Moslem forces after the

<sup>y</sup> Idem ibid. AL GHAZALI apud Pocockium in not. ad spec. hist. Arab. p. 188, ut & ipse Pocock, ibid. EEN AMID. hist. Saracen. lib. i. c. 7. EUTYCHIUS, tom. ii. p. 360. GREG. ABU'L FAR. p. 104. <sup>z</sup> PRID. life of Mahom. p. 70. AL JANNAB. ubi sup. p. 187. <sup>a</sup> AL JANNAB. ubi sup. p. 188. AL MOGHOLTAI. <sup>b</sup> ISM. ABU'LFED. ubi sup. p. 100, 101. AL JANNAB. ubi sup. p. 190. SHARIF AL EDRISI. <sup>c</sup> ABU'LFED. & AL JANNAB. ubi sup. <sup>d</sup> AL JANNAB. ubi sup.

- a death of Jaafar, fell next; which occasioned such a consternation amongst the Moslem troops, that they instantly betook themselves to flight. However, Kháled Ebn Al Walid, who succeeded to the command, rallying the fugitives, returned with the bravest of them to the charge, and fell with such fury upon a body of the enemy, that he broke them, and had cut them all to pieces, had not the approach of the night favoured their retreat. The next day, say the Mohammedan writers, Kháled, like a skilful warrior, made several movements with his army, in order to amuse the Greeks. He commanded the vanguard and the right wing to change places with the rear, and the left, at the same time contracting some of his ranks, and dilating others of them, in such a manner as to make his troops appear much more numerous to the enemy than they really were. This disposition, continue the
- b same authors, had the desired effect; insomuch that the Greeks, being persuaded that the Moslems had received a strong reinforcement the preceding night, could not be prevailed upon to stand their ground, but fled with so much precipitation that they could never afterwards be rallied. Kháled, therefore, pursuing them with his victorious troops, made a great carnage of them, possessed himself of their camp, and carried away with him abundance of rich spoil. When a particular account of this action, of the success of which Al Bokhári pretends he was apprized by revelation, was brought to Mohammed, he was so transported with joy, that he gave Kháled the honourable title of Seif Min Soyáf Allah, one of the swords of God<sup>c</sup>.

- THAT the advantage gained by the Moslems on this occasion has been greatly amplified The advantage gained in this action much amplified by the Arabs.
- c by their historians, we have little reason to doubt. The very genius of the Arabs, especially of the hot-headed enthusiasts amongst them, so inclinable to fiction and romance, particularly in relations of this nature, is of itself a sufficient proof of it. But this is likewise farther evinced by the testimony of Theophanes, a Christian chronographer of good authority, who represents the battle of Múta, or, according to him, Mothus, as an action of no great importance, neither in itself nor its consequences, either to the Moslems or the Greeks. He only intimates, that the former lost three Emirs in it; and that Kháled, the fourth, made his escape; that the Christian army consisted only of a body of troops, drawn together in haste, solely with a view to make a sudden incursion upon the Arab territories. Nor is it in any degree probable, that 3,000 undisciplined barbarians should overthrow an
- d army of 100,000 men, a considerable part of which, at least, must have consisted of regular troops. However, that the Arabs, in their own opinion, if not in fact and reality, had the advantage in this action, seems to be allowed by Theophanes, when he tells us, that Kháled, the surviving Emir, was honoured with the appellation of the Sword of God, in agreement with what has been advanced by the Moslem writers; and that the Arabs, when inured to war, and improved by military discipline, were more than a match for the Greeks, will hereafter appear, in our history of the empire of that people, under Abu Becr, Omar, and Othmán, the three first Khalífs, or immediate successors of Mohammed<sup>e</sup>.

- WITH regard to the Moslem worthies who fell in the battle of Múta, we shall only beg Character of the worthies killed in the preceding battle.
- e leave to observe, that the loss of them more than balanced the advantage gained in that action. Jaafar Ebn Abu Táleb had always persisted, without the least variation, in his fidelity to the prophet, and had been very instrumental in bringing the Najáshi into his measures, during his residence in Ethiopia. Zeid Ebn Háretha, Mohammed's freed-man, and adopted son, had an uncommon affection for him, and was a person of great conduct and bravery, as appeared from his behaviour in the preceding memorable battle. And as for Abd'allah Ebn Rawába, that he was a man of determined courage and resolution, besides an excellent military genius, and consequently such a one as Mohammed could not at that time very well spare, may be inferred from the advice he gave the Moslems before they advanced to Múta. That town stood opposite to Al Carac, or, as it was afterwards called by the Christian historians, Crac de Montréal, one of the strongest fortresses in those parts,
- f and not a little celebrated in the times of the Crusades. The battle, that rendered Múta famous to succeeding ages, was fought, according to Abu'lfeda, in the month of the former Jomáda, and the eighth year of the Hejra<sup>f</sup>.

In the following month, the prophet received advice, that the Kodaites, having assembled Mohammed's a considerable body of troops, were upon the point of making an irruption into the territory troops obtain an advantage over the Kodaites. of Medina. Against these robbers he sent Amru Ebn Al As with a detachment of 430 men, 400 of whom were foot, and 30 horse; but being informed that they were not strong enough to face the enemy, he sent them a reinforcement of 200 men, under the command of Abu Obeidab. This enabled Amru to go in quest of the Kodaites, and to attack them at Dhat Al Soláfel; where, after a very brisk action, he intirely defeated them, and put several of them to the sword. In the month of Rajeb, the prophet perceiving that the Koreish were inclinable to come to a rupture with him, in defiance of the treaty lately concluded with them, ordered Abu Obediah Ebn Jarab to march towards the sea-coast, with a body of 300 men, to observe their motions. Here Abu Obediah staid so long, without being able to undertake any thing, that his provisions failed him; insomuch that he was forced to live upon the leaves of trees, which proved very pernicious and destructive to his men. But, at last, they seized upon a sea-monster, that had been thrown upon the shore by the tide, called Anbur, and fed upon it fifteen days; by which means they were cured of the ulcers and scorbutic eruptions they had been afflicted with, and had their health perfectly restored <sup>a</sup>.

<sup>c</sup> ABU'LFED. & AL JANNAB. ubi sup. AL BOKHARI in Sonna.

<sup>e</sup> THEOPHAN. chronograph. p. 278, 279. Parisiis, 1655. GEORG. CEDREN. historiar. compend. p. 429. AL BOKHARI in Sonna.

<sup>f</sup> ISM. ABU'LFED. ubi sup. AL BOKHARI in Sonna, EBN AMID in continuat. historiar. ejus inedit.

Another of his parties plunders Kofra, a town of Najd. THE following month, Abu Kottâda Ebn Rabi, the Anfâr, advanced, at the head of a party of only 15 men, to Kofra, a town of the province of Najd. Having entered the place without opposition, he slew some of the principal inhabitants, took others of them prisoners, and brought away with him 100 camels, and 1,000 sheep, after having spent fifteen days in the expedition <sup>b</sup>.

The Koreish violate the treaty. ON the twenty-first day of the month Ramadân, this year, Mohammed took the city of Mecca; the citizens whereof had broken the truce concluded on two years before. For the tribe of Becr, who were confederates of the Koreish, attacking those of Khozûab, seated at Al Wathir in the plain of Mecca, who were allies of Mohammed, massacred twenty of them, and afterwards retired, being supported in the action by a party of the Koreish themselves. The consequence of this violation was soon apprehended; and Abu Sofian himself made a journey to Medina, on purpose to heal the breach, and renew the truce; but in vain. For Mohammed, glad of this opportunity, refused to see him. Whereupon he applied to Abu Becr, Ali, Omar, and Fâtema, to intercede for their countrymen with the prophet; but some of these giving him rough answers, and others none at all, he was obliged to remount his camel, and return to Mecca as he came <sup>c</sup>.

Mohammed makes preparations to attack them. MOHAMMED immediately gave orders for preparations to be made, that he might surprise the Meccans while they were unprovided to receive him. But Hâteb Ebn Abu Baltaa, one of his hitherto faithful servants, having been bribed by the Koreish, attempted to give the people of Mecca notice of the impending danger, tho' without effect. For the letter he would have sent to them, on this occasion, by one Sarah, a maid servant of the Hâshemites, having been intercepted at Rawdat Al Khâb, about twelve miles from Medina, was brought to Mohammed, to whom, as he pretended, the angel Gabriel had discovered the whole affair. Mohammed afterwards sending for Hâteb, asked him how he came to be guilty of such an action? To which he replied, that it was not out of infidelity, or a desire to return to idolatry, but merely to induce the Koreish to treat his family, which was still at Mecca, with some kindness; adding, that he was well assured his intelligence would be of no service at all to the Meccans, because he was well assured God would take vengeance on them. Whereupon Omar, who was present, desired the prophet's leave to strike off his head, as a proper reward for his hypocrisy and infidelity. But Mohammed received his excuse, and pardoned him, as he greatly distinguished himself at the battle of Bedr; however, the prophet thought fit to forbid any such practices for the future. Which having done, he made all the necessary dispositions for immediately entering upon the intended expedition <sup>d</sup>.

Mohammed begins his march for Mecca. ON the tenth day of the month of Ramadân, according to Al Jannâbi, Mohammed began his march for Mecca, attended by an army composed of Mohâjerîn, Anfârs, and other Arabs, who had lately become converts to Islamism. These last were drawn principally out of the tribes of Solaim, Ghâfar, Aflam, Mabzen, Tamim, Khozûa, and Asad, which supplied the prophet with a very formidable body of troops. The Moslems, in their march, observed the fast of Ramadân till they arrived at Candîd, between Kodaid and Osfân, a place about 70 miles from Mecca, and five from the sea, according to Sharîf Al Edrisî. But here they were allowed to refresh themselves, that they might be in a better condition to sustain the fatigues of their march, and to look the enemy in the face when they drew near to Mecca. At Kodaid the prophet also set up his standards, assigning to each tribe its particular colours, and from thence advanced in order of battle to Mar Al Dhahrân, four parasangs from Mecca, where the whole army encamped. Here the prophet ordered 10,000 fires to be lighted, and committed the defence of the camp to Omar Ebn Al Khattâb, who cut off all communication with the town, insomuch that the Koreish could receive no certain advice of their approach. Amongst others, that came from Mecca to reconnoitre the Moslem camp, Abu Sofian Ebn Harb, Hakim Ebn Hezâm, and Bodail Ebn Warka, fell into Omar's hands, and, being conducted to Mohammed, were obliged to embrace Islamism, in order to save their lives. Upon a review of his army at this place, the prophet found it to consist of 10,000 effective men <sup>e</sup>.

Makes the proper dispositions. THE first rumour of this expedition had not a little terrified the Koreish, though they were not then apprized that the prophet had resolved upon a war; but perceiving now, by <sup>f</sup>

<sup>a</sup> AL JANNAB. ubi sup. ubi sup. p. 200.

<sup>i</sup> Idem ibid.

<sup>h</sup> ISM. ABU'LFED. ubi sup. c. l. p. 102, AL JANNAB.

<sup>i</sup> ABU'LFED. ubi sup. c. li. p. 102, 103. AL JANNAB. ubi sup. p. 201. AL ZAMAKH-SHAR.

<sup>m</sup> ABU'LFED. & AL JANNAB. ubi sup. SHARIF AL EDRISSI.

a the report of Abu Sofián, who had been sent back to them, that the enemy was at their <sup>for attacking</sup> gates, they were thrown into the utmost consternation. Of this Mohammed being informed, <sup>that place,</sup> he was determined to take immediate advantage of the confusion that then reigned amongst them. He, therefore, first dispatched Hakim and Bodail to the Meccans, to invite them to take an oath of allegiance to him, and to become converts to his religion; and then made the following disposition of his forces. Al Zobeir Ebn Al Awám he ordered to advance with a detachment towards the town, on the side of mount Cadú. Saad Ebn Obad, prince of the tribe of Khazraj, marched, by his order, with another detachment, towards the height of Coda, which commands the plain of Mecca. Ali conducted the left wing of the army, composed of the Ansárs and Mohájerín. The prophet put into his hands the great standard b of Islamism, with orders to post himself upon mount Al Hajun, and to plant the standard there; strictly enjoining him not to stir from thence till he himself arrived, and till a proper signal from Saad Ebn Obad should be given him for that purpose. Kháled led the right wing, consisting of the Arabs lately converted to Islamism, with which he was to possess himself of the plain of Mecca. Abu Obeidab Ebn Al Jarab commanded in the centre, that was occupied by the corps de bataille, consisting intirely of infantry. As for the prophet, he placed himself in the rear, from whence he could the most easily dispatch his orders to all the general officers, as occasion should require. He expressly prohibited Kháled, and all his other generals, to act offensively, except they were first attacked<sup>a</sup>.

THINGS being in this situation, the army, upon a signal given, immediately put itself <sup>and takes it.</sup> in motion. The prophet mounted his camel with great alacrity, and was that day clothed in red. He stopped at Dhu Tava, in order to perform his devotions, and was surrounded by an infinite number of people, who crowded in from all parts to see him. In the mean time, Al Zobeir pursued the route assigned him, without meeting with the least opposition; nor did Saad Ebn Obad, in his march, discover the faintest traces of an enemy. As for Ali, he took possession of the post assigned him without the least effusion of blood; and Abu Obeidab seized upon the suburbs, without the loss of a single man. But Kháled, in his march to the plain of Mecca, met with a large body of the Koreish, sustained by the Banu Becr and the Ababishites, their confederates, whom he immediately attacked; and, after a sharp dispute, dispersed them, putting 28 of them to the sword. Not content with this,
d he pursued them into the town, and massacred a great number of the inhabitants; which so terrified the rest, that some of them shut themselves up in their houses; others fled to the mountains, others to the sea-coast, and others, lastly, made their escape to Yaman, to avoid the fury of that most impious and merciless barbarian, who had now made himself master of their city<sup>b</sup>.

MECCA being thus reduced, Mohammed made his public entry into that town, exactly <sup>He makes his</sup> at the time the sun first appeared upon the horizon. He was mounted on his camel <sup>Al public entry</sup> Kafwa, having on his right hand Abu Becr, on his left Osaid Ebn Hodhair, and Osama Ebn <sup>into Mecca.</sup> Zeid walked behind him. 'Tis said, that, on this occasion, he repeated aloud the whole forty-eighth chapter of the Korán, intituled, THE VICTORY, which, as he pretended, was
e revealed to him two years before the commencement of this expedition<sup>c</sup>.

ACCORDING to one of the Moslem doctors, the Meccans, at Mohammed's approach, thought Mohammed fit to surrender at discretion; so that he possessed himself of their city without any effusion <sup>lost only two</sup> of blood; tho' another, of equal authority, asserts, that he took the town by force, and <sup>men in the ex-</sup> exercised great cruelties upon the inhabitants. But neither of these accounts seems to be <sup>pedition of</sup> strictly true, as appears from the preceding narrative. For the Koreish seem to have made their submission to him, before they were rendered absolutely incapable of resisting him, tho' Kháled put a considerable number of them to the sword. Be that, however, as it will, according to Abu'lfeda, he lost only two men on this occasion<sup>d</sup>.

ALL tumults being now appeased, and the public tranquillity restored, Mohammed went <sup>Destroys the</sup> seven times in procession round the Caaba, touching the corner of the black stone with the <sup>idols of the</sup> staff in his hand, as often as he passed by it, with great devotion. Then he entered the <sup>Koreish:</sup> Caaba, where observing several idols in the form of angels, and the statues of Abraham and Ishmael, with the arrows of divination in their hands, he caused them all to be destroyed. He also broke to pieces, with his own hands, a wooden pigeon, that had long been esteemed as one of their deities by the idolatrous Koreish. Afterwards entering into the interior part of the Caaba, he repeated, with a loud voice, the form used at this day by the Mohammedans, ALLAH ACBAR, GOD IS GREAT, &c. turning towards every part of the temple. Then he prayed between the two pillars there, with two inclinations, as well as without the Caaba; saying to those that attended him, This is your Kebla, or the place towards which you are to turn your faces in prayer; and then entering the temple a second time, he preached to the people. He likewise, at this time, purged the Caaba of 360 idols, equalling in number the days of the Arabian year; the chief of which was that of Habal, brought originally out of Syria; whose name seems to have been deduced from חבל, Habal, country. After which, the prophet compassed the Caaba again seven times, and then visited the well Zemzem, so celebrated among the Mohammedans. He also performed the Wadd, or ordinary ablution used in common cases, with all the proper ceremonies, and all his followers did the like; which not a little excited the admiration of the idolaters. Then Ali, by his order, broke to pieces the great idol of the Khozaites, who held the angels to be the daughters of God, placed on the top of the Caaba, which was a composition of glass and melted or cast brass. It may not be improper to remark, on this occasion, that Mohammed entered the Caaba four times after the Hejra: first, when he performed the visitation of Al Kedd, or the completion; secondly, the day he took Mecca; thirdly, the day after that exploit; and, lastly, when he performed the peregrination, or pilgrimage, of validation. But the most solemn entry of all was that here described, which happened immediately after the reduction of Mecca.

<sup>a</sup> ABU'LFED. ubi sup. p. 104, 105. AL JANNAB. ubi sup. p. 207, 208, &c. AL FIRAUZABAD. in AL Kam.

<sup>b</sup> ISM. ABU'LFED. ubi sup. p. 106, 107. AL JANNAB. ubi sup. p. 208, 209. MOSLEM, EBN AMID, lib. i. c. i. AL TABAR. GREG. ABU'LFAR. hist. dynast. p. 164. <sup>c</sup> ABU'LFED. & AL JANNAB. ubi sup.

<sup>d</sup> AL SHAFEI & ABU HANIFA apud ISM. ABU'LFED. ubi sup. c. li. p. 107. ut & ipse ABU'LFED. ibid.

and afterwards endeavours to ingratiate himself with them.

THE prophet having thus subdued the Koreish, in order to prevent effectually all future commotions, and consequently to render them the more subservient to the accomplishment of his designs, he resolved now to ingratiate himself with them. Sending, therefore, for some of the principal of them, he said, What treatment do you expect to meet with from me, now I have subdued you? To which they replied, None but what is favourable, O generous brother! O son of a generous brother! Then he dismissed them with these words, Go your way, you are from this moment a free people. After this, to preserve peace and tranquility amongst his followers, he pretended, that a passage in the fourth chapter of the Korán had been revealed to him, the primary design of which was, to direct him to return the keys of the Caaba to Othmán Ebn Telha, who had then the honour to be keeper of that holy place, and not to deliver them to his uncle Al Abbás, who, having already the custody of the well Zemzem, would fain have had also that of the Caaba. The prophet obeying the pretended divine order, Othmán was so affected with the justice of the action, notwithstanding he had at first refused him entrance, that he immediately professed a second time Mohammedism; whereupon the guardianship of the Caaba was confirmed to this Othmán and his heirs for ever. The day the prophet took Mecca, when he entered the temple, he ordered Belál, his crier, to get upon the top of the Caaba at noon, and to call the people to prayer, from thence, for the first time; which custom has ever since been religiously observed, the criers giving the people notice of prayer from the Minarets, or steeples, of the mosques, as well as the top of the Caaba, in the same manner, and the very same form of words, at this day.

Some pretended proofs of his mission.

AT this time, as some of the Moslem writers pretend, Mohammed gave two or three signal proofs of the reality of his mission, and intercourse with the Supreme Being, by discovering, though at a considerable distance, several secret reflections, thrown out by Atáb Ebn H'said, Al Háreth Ebn Heshám, Jameiretka Bint Abu Jabl, and some of the Ansárs, assembled on the hill Al Safá, against him. But this being to be considered only as a low and groveling imitation of two or three particulars related of our Saviour in the Gospels, and favouring perfectly of the Arab genius, so extremely addicted to fable, romance, and rhodomontade, it is sufficient just to have mentioned it here; especially as, like a thousand other chimæras of the Mohammedans, believed by no body but the most bigotted and ignorant part of themselves, it merits not the least attention.

He proscribes several of the Arabs.

THE day after the taking of Mecca, the Khozaites, elated with the prophet's success, massacred one Al Anza, of the tribe of Hodhail, an idolater. Nor did their insolence stop here; one of them, named Khorash Ebn Ommeya, killing Abmar, a Moslem, and a man of great bravery and resolution. This induced Mohammed to declare Mecca an asylum, and to give out publicly, that he would maintain, to the utmost of his power, the inviolable security of that place. However, after he had been solemnly inaugurated on the hill Al Safá, by the people assembled for that purpose, and they all, and particularly Henda Bint Otba, the wife of Abu Sufián, had taken the oath of allegiance to him, he thought fit to proscribe several persons who had rendered themselves the most obnoxious by their former conduct. The persons so proscribed amounted to no more than six men and four women, according to Abu'lfeda; tho', if we will believe Al Bokhári, in the Sonna, eleven men and six women a were excluded out of the general amnesty. As the source is of the highest authority, and the account is so full, we shall beg leave to follow it in this particular, and insert a short account of those unhappy wretches here; tho' only three men and one woman were put to death, the rest obtaining pardon on their embracing Islamism, and one of the women making her choice.

* ABU'LFED. ubi sup. p. 107, 108. EBN ABBAS apud Al Bokhar. in Son. ut & ipse AL BOKHAR. ibid. Lib. SHAFAR' L GARAM, i. e. Medicin. Morbor. AL JANNAB. ubi sup. p. 211, 212. ABD'ALLAH EBN OMAR apud Al Bokhar. in Son. AL SHAHRESTAN. apud Pocock. not. in spec. hist. Arab. p. 95, ut & ipse Poc. ibid. EBN AL ATHIR. See also SALE's prelim. disc. p. 20. * ISM. ABU'LFED. ubi sup. p. 107. Autor. lib. dict. AL ECTEFA, AL BEIDAWI. Vide etiam D'HERBEL. biblioth. Orient. p. 220, 221. * AL JANNAB. ubi sup. p. 213. MATT. c. ix. v. 4. LUK. c. ix. v. 46, 47. JOH. c. xvi. v. 30. xxi. 17.

1. THE first man, solemnly proscribed by the prophet, was Arenas Ebn Al-Jahel, who fled to the sea-shore, the day Mohammed made his public entry into Mecca. But Omar Hekim Ebn Al-Murrah Ebn Hekim, to whom he had been newly married, procured him his pardon. After which, Mohammed conferred upon him, as a mark of his favour, the post of colonel of a regiment of Hawāzmites; and he always behaved extremely well in the service. He b was at last killed, fighting valiantly, at the battle of Yermuk, in the Khalifat of Omar, after he had received no less than seventy wounds.

2. THE second was Hebār Ebn Al-Afwād, who, by repeated ill treatment, had grievously offended the prophet. He had, conscious of his crimes, concealed himself in such a manner, the day Mecca was taken, that none of the Moslems could find him. However, he afterwards obtained a pardon, by discovering all the marks of a sincere penitent, embracing Islamism, and making a double profession of it.

3. THE third person who had incurred the prophet's highest displeasure, was Abd'allah Ebn Saad Ebn Abu Sarab, foster brother to Othmān Ebn Affān, who, with great difficulty, procured him a pardon. His crimes were of a very heinous nature. He was, for some c time, the prophet's amanuensis; and, when these words were dictated to him as revealed, viz. We created man of a purer kind of clay, &c. cried out, by way of admiration, Blessed be God, the best Creator! and being ordered by Mohammed to write these words down also, as part of the inspired passage, he began to think himself as great a prophet as his master. Whereupon he took upon himself to corrupt and alter the Korān, according to his own fancy, and even to ridicule Mohammed, by declaring every-where, that he knew not what he said. Nay, retiring afterwards to Mecca, he associated with the Koreish, and even at length absolutely apostatized. He had rendered himself so extremely disagreeable to Mohammed, that a passage in the sixth chapter of the Korān is thought by the commentators to be levelled at him. However, Othmān, by his reiterated instances, at last prevailed upon d the prophet to lay aside his resentment, and pardon him; and he was afterwards looked upon as one of the most considerable, the most prudent, and the most honourable, of the Koreish. He was a most excellent horseman, and, so extremely fond of horses, that, when he was at the point of death, he repeated the 100th chapter of the Korān, intitled, THE WAR-HORSES WHICH RUN SWIFTLY. He died at Ascalon, or, as others will have it, at Ramla, in Palestine, whither he was sent by the Khalif Othmān, who had made him governor of Egypt, in the 36th or the 37th year of the Hejra.

4. THE fourth man proscribed was Mekās Ebn Sabāba, the Kendite, who had killed an Anṣār, that had slain his brother, by mistake. He also apostatized, associated with the idolaters, and drank wine. He was at last cut off by Tamīla Ebn Abd'allah, the Leithite, e one of his companions.

5. THE fifth person doomed to destruction, was Abd'allah Ebn Khatal, descended from the Banu Taim. He had killed a Moslem, associated with two comedians, named Fariata and Koriba, who had sung satirical verses upon Mohammed. For all which crimes the prophet thought fit to proscribe him. Being found in a private part of the Caaba, where he lay concealed, on the day Mecca was taken, the prophet ordered him to be slain there, in contempt and violation of the privileges of that sacred place. But finding afterwards that this barbarous, as well as impious, action shocked even his own most bloody and abandoned followers, he gave out, that he had a peculiar licence from heaven to violate the immunities of the Caaba for one hour only. In this manner did the impostor trample upon f every thing held sacred by the other Arabs, and even acknowledged to be so by himself, when it stood in the way of his insatiable ambition; and this, to use his own expression, by forging a lie concerning God, than which nothing can be more superlatively wicked, as he has himself expressly allowed in the sixth chapter of the Korān.

6. THE sixth man proscribed, was Al Howaireth Ebn Nokaid Ebn Wahab Ebn Abd Ebn Kosa, and consequently a member of the most illustrious tribe of Koreish. He had reviled the prophet, and insulted his daughters Fātema and Omm Calthūm, or, as others will have it, Zeinab, who happened at that time to be with child, in the rudest and most outrageous

<sup>u</sup> AL JANNAB. ubi sup. p. 215. ABU'LFED. ubi sup. c. lii. p. 108—111. AL BOKHAR. in Sonna.

<sup>w</sup> ABU'LFED. ubi sup. p. 109. et & Lib. SHARFAO'L GARAM, Aut. lib. SAFWA, AL BOKHAR, ubi sup.

<sup>x</sup> ABU'LFED. & AL BOKHAR. ubi sup. <sup>y</sup> Idem ibid. AL JANNAB. ubi sup. p. 217. AL KOR. MOHAM.

f. vi. AL BEIDAWI. <sup>z</sup> ABU'LFED. & AL BOKHAR. ubi sup. Aut. Lib. MOALEMO'L TANZIL, AL JAN-

NAB. ubi sup. p. 219. <sup>a</sup> ABU'LFED. & AL BOKHARI, ubi sup. Aut. Lib. SHARFAO'L GARAM, AL JAN-manner. This was a most atrocious and even unpardonable crime; so that Mohammed first a proscribed him, and afterwards ordered Ali Ebn Abu Talib to slay him<sup>2</sup>.

NAB. ubi sup. p. 216. AL KOR. MOHAM. f. vi.

7. THE seventh, according to Al Jaunân, was Safwan Ebn Ommeia, a very rich man, and one who had maltreated the prophet. He was at Jodda, when Mecca was taken, and, with his valet Tesar, upon the point of making his escape to Tamam, when Omar Ebn Wabar arrived with his pardon from Mohammed. Being a person of great influence and authority, he had his liberty given him, and was even not obliged to turn Mohammedan<sup>3</sup>.

8. THE eighth was Hareth Ebn Talâta, who had used Mohammed ill on several occasions. He was dispatched by Ali, who cut off his head at the prophet's command<sup>4</sup>.

9. THE ninth was Caab Ebn Zohair Ebn Abu Salama, the Mazenite, who had been very satirical upon the prophet. The day Mecca was taken, he retired, and returned the next year. We shall speak farther of him hereafter<sup>5</sup>.

10. THE tenth was Wabsha Ebn Harb, an Ethiopian, who had killed Hamza, the prophet's uncle, at the battle of Obod. He was mortally hated by the Moslems for that action. He likewise fled, when Mecca was taken, but returned the next year. We shall see what became of him hereafter<sup>6</sup>.

11. THE eleventh man proscribed by Mohammed was Abd'allah Ebn Zuhara, one of the most celebrated poets of the Arabs. He had ridiculed the prophet, and his companions, in his verses, and excited the idolaters to fall upon them. He also fled, when Mecca was taken, apprehending that he should be proscribed. But returning afterwards, and professing Islamism, he easily obtained his pardon<sup>7</sup>.

1. OF the women proscribed by Mohammed, the first was Henda Bint Otba, the wife of Abu Sofian. She had frequently used the prophet ill, and treated the body of Hamza, after the above-mentioned Ethiopian had dispatched him, with great inhumanity. She was disguised, and covered with a veil, when she appeared before Mohammed; who, notwithstanding her former savage and iniquitous conduct, was prevailed upon to pardon her<sup>8</sup>.

2. THE second was Parjata, one of the comedians above-mentioned, who, in their songs and verses, had been very satirical upon the prophet. She was the maid-servant of Abd'allah Ebn Khatal, who had been butchered by Mohammed for the same affront. However, she obtained her pardon, by becoming a proselyte to Islamism<sup>9</sup>.

3. THE third was Kariba, or, as others call her, Kainata, the other comedian, employed by Abd'allah Ebn Khatal. She was taken, and fixed to a cross, upon which she expired in exquisite torture<sup>10</sup>.

4. THE fourth was another maid-servant of the aforesaid Abd'allah, who likewise suffered death<sup>11</sup>.

5. THE fifth was Sarah, the maid-servant belonging to the family of Hâsham, who had been employed by Hâteb Ebn Abu Baltaa, to carry the letter he wrote to the Koreish, to inform them of Mohammed's intention to besiege Mecca. She was pardoned, and died in the Khalifat of Omar<sup>12</sup>.

6. THE sixth and last was one Omm Saad Arnab, of whom we know nothing more than that she was butchered, for some ill offices done the prophet, that have not been specified by any of the Moslem historians<sup>13</sup>.

Mohammed remains fifteen days at Mecca after the surrender of that place.

Mohammed remained at Mecca, after the surrender of that place, which happened on Friday the 21st of Ramadân, only fifteen days. This short time was spent in regulating the affairs of the government, and sending his generals upon several military expeditions, whose chief objects were the destruction of idolatry, and the extension of his new conquests. As he was wholly taken up with affairs of the highest consequence, he curtailed his prayers, and instead of four formerly in vogue, used now only two inclinations. Having settled every thing to his satisfaction at Mecca, he set out from thence on the sixth of the month of Shawâl, at the head of his forces, for Honein, where he arrived the same day<sup>14</sup>.

He sends Khalid to destroy the idol Al Uzza.

HOWEVER, before his departure from Mecca, he detached his most famous general, Khalid Ebn Walid, with a body of troops to Nakbla, a city about a day's journey from Mecca, in the neighbourhood of Al Tayef, with orders to destroy the idol Al Uzza, made of the trunk of a tree, and adored by the Bani Kenânah. Khalid executed his orders so effectually, that, after he had pierced Al Uzza, or Al Uzza, with an arrow discharged at her, as a mark of his respect, for that purpose, he slew two ugly she-demons, or rather two of Al Uzza's priestesses, that appeared. The first of these fell out after the arrow

<sup>2</sup> Abu'l-Fero. & Al Bokhari, c. 10. Pax Hassan apud Aut. Lib. S. 101. C. 12. Al Jassaz, c. 10. Idem, p. 219.

<sup>3</sup> Al Bokhari, c. 10. Idem, p. 220. Abu'l-Fero, geogr. Arab. p. 50.

<sup>4</sup> Al Bokhari, & Al Jassaz, c. 10. Idem, p. 220. Abu'l-Fero, c. 10. Idem, p. 63. Al Bokhari, c. 10. Idem, p. 52. Al Bokhari, in Bonar.

<sup>5</sup> Abu'l-Fero, geogr. Arab. p. 52. Al Bokhari, in Bonar. <sup>6</sup> Abu'l-Fero, c. 10. Idem, p. 110. Al Bokhari, & Al Jassaz, c. 10.

<sup>7</sup> Idem, c. 10. Idem, p. 103. Al Bokhari, c. 10. Idem, p. 215.

<sup>8</sup> Abu'l-Fero, c. 10. Idem, p. 103. Al Bokhari, c. 10. Idem, p. 215.

a was discharged, and the other after the idol was burnt, and the temple belonging to it demolished. The adoration of Al Uzza was not confined to the Bani Kendaab, that goddess having been also worshipped by the Bani Salim and the Kereja <sup>and Amra</sup>.

At the same time that Khalid destroyed the idol Al Uzza, Amru bin Al As broke to pieces the idol Sakra, belonging to the tribe of Hadhail, at Kebat, about three miles distant from Mecca; and Saad bin Zaid did the same to Al Nakh, an idol of the tribes of Aws and Khazraj, and the other inhabitants of the district of Madina. The former of these idols was supposed to have been older than the deluge, to have been discovered by the devil, and to have had pilgrimages instituted to it; and the latter, that was a large stone, was placed on the top of an eminence not far from the sea, by the foot of which ran the river Cedra.
 b Here the tribes of Hadhail, Khazaab, Tbakif, Aws, and Khazraj, frequently assembled, and offered their sacrifices. We are told by some of the Moslem writers, that Saad killed a she-fiend, or an ugly black priestess, as well as Khalid, that seemed by no means inclinable to survive the idol with which she had so long had a most close and inseparable connexion.

In order to give our readers some idea of the origin of this sort of idols amongst the Arabs, we must beg leave to observe, that, according to the Moslem doctors, the Caaba was held in the highest veneration by that people from the remotest antiquity. They pretend, that this temple was built by Abraham; tho' 'tis more probable, that either Ishmael, or some of his descendents, erected it. The city of Mecca itself, which is extremely ancient, had at first, according to Golius, the name of Caba, or Caaba; tho' afterwards it was called Mecca, or Becca, which words are synonymous, and signify a place of great concourse, from the infinity of strangers that resorted to it, in the months of Al Moharram and Dhu'l-hajja, from all parts of the Mohammedan dominions. The posterity of Ishmael, according to the Moslem writers, remained in the worship of the true God, as long as they confined themselves to this place. But the inhabitants of Mecca, in process of time, multiplied to such a degree, that they were obliged to seek for new habitations, and plant colonies, in the neighbouring parts; when, in order to preserve the veneration and respect they had always for the Caaba, they carried with them some stones taken from thence, and fixed them in the places of their residence, compassing them, when they performed their devotions, in the same manner as they formerly had done the Caaba. This religious ceremony insensibly
 c degenerated into the worst kind of superstition, by the Arabs converting these stones into idols, and adorning them with a great variety of decorations. So that the religion and primitive institutions of their great ancestors Abraham and Ishmael being at last totally forgotten, they became gross and multifarious idolaters. However, there were always some amongst them who adhered to the religion of Abraham, in its ancient purity, and regularly performed the pilgrimage to the Caaba, going in procession round that sacred place with the most fervent devotion. For a more particular account of the idols destroyed by Mohammed's order in Arabia, and the religion, or rather superstition, of the ancient Arabs, we must beg leave to refer our curious readers to our history of that people before the time of Mohammed, to which it more properly belongs.

In the month of Shawwal, after Khalid had finished his expedition against Al-Uzza, he was d dispatched with a body of 350 men to propagate Islamism; but was ordered by the prophet not to act offensively any where, except he should be first attacked. Having received his instructions, he marched directly against the Jadhimites, a tribe who, before the establishment of the new religion, had assassinated Auf Abd'al Rahman's father, and Khalid's uncle, when those two persons were on their return from Taman, and carried off all their effects, Khalid, therefore, was resolved to take vengeance on them for so inhuman and impious an action. In order to which, having incamped near a water, or well, that belonged to them, he waited their approach; and, upon their appearing armed, he ordered them to lay down their arms, and profess Islamism. This, according to Abul-feda, they readily complied with. But Khalid, far from being satisfied with so prompt and quick a submission, commanded their hands to be tied behind their backs, and then, in a most brutal manner, put the greatest part of them to the sword. Which cruel, as well as cowardly, action was highly disapproved of by Mohammed. However, Al Bokhari, in order to palliate Khalid's conduct, tells us, that the Jadhimites would not cry out, We embrace Islamism, as Khalid ordered them to do; but, on the contrary, loudly declared, that they professed Schism; upon which, Khalid fell upon them, killed many of them, and took the rest prisoners. To which he adds, that Khalid could not prevail upon his men to massacre their captives; and that the prophet himself afterwards applauded their conduct on this occasion. But we must e beg leave to observe, that Abul-feda, for the most part a fair and candid writer, seems to have given us the most dispassionate and impartial relation of this affair, and without such

<sup>a</sup> Al Jazayer, vol. 1. p. 226.

<sup>b</sup> Ibid. Al Fatawa in Arabic, Al Ham.

<sup>c</sup> Al Jazayer, vol. 1. p. 226.

<sup>d</sup> Al Jazayer, vol. 1. p. 226. Al Jazayer, vol. 1. p. 226. Al Jazayer, vol. 1. p. 226.

a and as much as allowed perfectly agreeable to Khaled's character. Nay, that historian positively affirms, that Mohammed sent Ali to distribute a sum of money amongst the surviving Jabinites, to make them some amends for the blood Khaled had spilt; as also, that Abd'al Rahman, whose father's death Khaled pretended to revenge, upbraided him with his cruelty. In fine, if this author may be depended upon, Mohammed, with great indignation, said to this butcher, O Khaled, cease to molest my followers. If you possessed a heap of gold as large as mount Othel, and expended it all in God's cause, your merit would not be equal to that of one of those persons whom you have so inhumanly destroyed'.

Mohammed's
expedition against the tribes of Ha-waraz and Thakif.

The prophet having received advice, that his enemies were making great warlike preparations, resolved to march against them with all his forces. Before his departure, he constituted Otub Ebn Osaid Ebn Abu'l Ais Ebn Ommeya Ebn Abd Shems commandant of Mecca, b and nominated Moadh Ebn Jabal, Imam, or supreme director of every thing relating to religion. The Arabs, that opposed him in this war, were the tribes of Hawāzen and Thakif, who were joined by the Saadites, a branch of the Banu Becri. The generals, who commanded the troops formed out of these tribes, amounting to about 4,000 men, were Mālec Ebn Awf, the Nadirite, Deraid Ebn Al Semma, the Jashmīte, at that time above an hundred years of age, whose body was reduced to a mere skeleton, and Kenānah Abd Yāhil, the Thakifite. These infidels, says Al Jannābi, being closely attached to their idols, could not bring themselves to submit to Mohammed's institutions; and therefore resolved to make a vigorous effort to re-establish their idolatrous worship. In order to this, the aforesaid Arab c generals, having assembled all their forces, advanced to the plain of Arwās, between Dhāt Irk and Amra, and at a small distance from the valley of Honein, situated between Mecca and Tāyef, about three miles from the former city. Here they incamped, with a resolution to wait for the Moslem army, and made all the necessary dispositions for entering immediately upon action.

The battle of Honein.

In the mean time, Mohammed being informed by Abd'allah Ebn Abu Jardad, the Aslamite, one of his spies, who had penetrated Mālec's designs, of all the enemy's motions, set out from Mecca on the sixth day of the month Sharwāl, with an army of 12,000 men, in order to attack the infidel Arabs. The Moslems arrived at Honein in the evening, and found the enemy drawn up in order of battle, having chosen a spot of ground very commodious for their horse. To the advantageous situation of the place Mālec, the enemy's general, added d a stratagem, which proved of considerable service to him. By favour of the night, he extended his army on two eminences that commanded the plain, and posted a body of troops at the streights of the valley, ordering them to form an ambuscade, and in the morning, immediately after break of day, to discharge their arrows from all parts upon the enemy, to throw them into confusion, and then to fall upon them sword in hand with the greatest impetuosity, without giving them time to recover themselves. In the mean time, Mohammed having put his army in battle-array, and mounted his white mule Daldal, gave the signal to his troops to advance, and begin the attack.

The Moslems seeing themselves so greatly superior to the enemy, whom they held in the utmost contempt, made themselves sure of the victory; insomuch that a certain person, e whom some suppose to have been Abu Becri, others Salema Ebn Salāma, others Al Abbās, and, lastly, others the prophet himself, cried out, 'Tis impossible these should be overcome by so few. But God, say some of the Moslem writers, was so highly displeased with this confidence, that he suffered the apostle and his followers to be not a little mortified on this occasion. For the Mohammedan troops were scarce entered the valley, when they found themselves overwhelmed by a shower of arrows, discharged from all parts, in pursuance of Mālec's orders, by the idolaters, who occupied the heights both on the right hand and on the left. This, with the brisk attack that followed, as Mālec had foreseen, threw the Moslems into such confusion, that they immediately betook themselves to flight, some of f them running away quite to Mecca. In the mean time, the prophet did his utmost, both by words and actions, to animate his troops, and persuade them to return to the charge; but, for some time, without effect, scarce any of them standing by him, except Abu Becri, Omar, Ali Ebn Abu Tāleb, Al Abbās, Abu Sofiān Ebn Al Hāreth, with his son Jaasar, Al Fodhl Ebn Al Abbās, Rabla Ebn Al Hāreth, and Osāma Ebn Zeid. Nay, for some time, the prophet himself was in extreme danger, Aiman Ebn Obaid dropping down dead at his feet. However, according to some of the Arab writers, Mohammed distinguished himself on this occasion, his courage being so great, that his uncle Al Abbās, and his cousin Abu Sofiān Ebn Al Hāreth, had much ado to prevent his spurring his mule into the midst of the enemy, by laying hold on the bridle and stirrup. In this extremity, he had recourse to stratagem,

<sup>1</sup> ISM. ABU'LFED. ubi sup. c. liii. p. 111, 112. SALEM & AL ZOHAR, apud Al Bokhār. in Sonna, ut & ipse AL BOKHAR. ibid. AL JANNAB. ubi sup. p. 227. <sup>2</sup> ABU'LFED. ubi sup. c. liv. p. 112—115. AL JANNAB. ubi sup. p. 227. AL BEIDAWI, JALLALO'DDIN, FER-I-HAK, EBN AMID lib. i. c. i. <sup>3</sup> Ibidem ibid.

which

a which did him signal service; addressing himself to his mule Dalal, Lie down on the ground, said he, lie down on the ground; which the mule accordingly did, and thereby infused fresh vigour into his troops. Then he ordered Al Abûs, who had the voice of a Striter, to recall his flying battalions; upon which they rallied, and the prophet throwing a handful of dust against the enemy, they attacked them a second time, and, by the divine assistance, gained a complete victory <sup>1</sup>.

At the beginning of the action, when the Moslems deserted their prophet, some of the new converts, particularly Abu Sufûn Ebn Harb, Calda, and Safwân Ebn Ommeya, could not conceal their joy for the disaster that had befallen him. They openly discovered their abhorrence both of him and his religion, tho' they had so lately declared themselves profelytes to it, at this juncture. And in the same manner will all future new converts to any religion, party, or political scheme, who become so purely out of a mercenary motive, or solely with a view to forward their own interest, probably act upon all future similar occasions <sup>2</sup>.

AFTER the Hawâzenites gave ground, the Thakîstes defended themselves with so much bravery, that they chose to be cut in pieces rather than turn their backs. Seventy of them were found dead under their colours, after the end of the action. However, at last the defeat was general, and all the plain was covered with dead bodies <sup>3</sup>.

MALEC, the enemy's general, with his principal officers, retired to the castle of Al Tayef; Mâlec retires to the castle of Al Tayef. and most of the others that escaped fled to Nakbla. But Doraid Ebn Al Semma, by reason of his great age and infirmities, was obliged to stay at Awtâs. This occasioned another general action, of which we shall soon give our readers a particular account <sup>4</sup>.

THE principal of the prisoners taken at the battle of Honein was Al Shîma Bint Al Hâreth, Al Shîma taken prisoner. whose mother was Halîma, of the tribe of Saad. She had been foster-sister to the apostle, who had formerly bit her in the back, and the scar of the wound still remained. Upon her shewing him this, he gave her her liberty, and sent her back to her friends, as she desired <sup>5</sup>.

MOHAMMED, after the preceding engagement, receiving advice, that Doraid Ebn Al Semma was at Awtâs, with the Joshmite troops, sent Obaid, surnamed Abu Amer, with a large detachment to reduce him. Obaid coming up with the enemy in the plain of Awtâs, fell upon them with such fury, that, after a sharp dispute, he intirely defeated them; tho' he himself lost his life in the action. However, Abu Musa, who succeeded Obaid in the command of the detachment, pursued the flying enemy, who had taken the route of Nakbla; and Rabia Ebn Rafî, one of Abu Musa's men, put Doraid Ebn Al Semma himself to the sword in the pursuit. Obaid's death greatly affected Mohammed, who, in compliance with his dying request, after having purified himself with the ablution called Wodû, offered up his prayers both for Obaid and his successor Abu Musa. Whence it appears, that the Moslems considered their prophet as capable of performing the function of a mediator or intercessor. As some of Mohammed's men had a scruple of conscience relating to their enjoyment of the female captives taken at Honein and Awtâs, in order to remove this, the prophet had recourse to his usual impious artifice, of pretending to have had a divine revelation, by which the matter was ultimately settled. It was therefore declared, by a passage of the Korân, that it is lawful to marry those who are slaves, or taken in war, after they shall have gone through the proper purifications, tho' their husbands be living. Yet, according to the decision of Abu Hanîsa, it is not lawful to marry such whose husbands shall be taken, or in actual slavery with them. We are moreover assured by the Korân, that the Moslems were assisted by troops of angels at the battle of Honein, tho' neither Mohammed, nor any of his men, perceived them. As to the precise number of these celestial auxiliaries, the commentators differ: some say they were 5,000, some 8,000, and others 16,000. A great number of profelytes were gained by that battle, and the action at Awtâs. After which, Mohammed, at their desire, was so generous as to restore the captives to their friends, and offered to make amends himself to any of his men who should not be willing to part with his prisoners; but they all conformed to the will of their prophet in this, as well as every other particular <sup>6</sup>.

THE prophet being informed, that Mâlec, with the shatter'd remains of his army, was fled to Al Tayef, resolved to put an end to this bloody and expensive war, by the reduction of that place. As he knew the importance of the city, that was fortified with a castle, and had foreseen all the difficulties that would attend the siege of so strong a fortress, he had provided himself with battering rams, catapults, and all other military machines employed in such operations, together with the most skilful engineers to play them, with which he was supplied by the tribe of Daws, the most famous of all the Arabs for such arti-

* ABU'LFED. AL JANNAB. AL BEIDAWI, JALLALO'DDIN, EBN ISH. ubi sup. AL ZAMAKHSHAR. in f. ix. Al Kor. Moham. ut & ipse Al Kor. MOHAM. ibid. <sup>1</sup> ISM. ABU'LFED. ubi sup. p. 114. <sup>2</sup> AL JANNAB. ubi sup. p. 231. <sup>3</sup> Idem ibid. <sup>4</sup> ABU'LFED. ubi sup. p. 115. <sup>5</sup> ABU'LFED. in descript. Arab p. 15. ABU MUSA & ABU BORDA apud Al Bokhâr. in Sonna, ut & ipse AL BOKHARI ibid. AL BEIDAWI, Al Kor. MOHAM. f. ix.

suers, and, in fine, with every thing requisite to bring so hazardous an enterprize to a happy conclusion. For this purpose, he dispatched Al Tefail Ebn Amru, the Dawlat, to invite his brethren to embrace Islamism, and to furnish the prophet with a body of troops. He also at the same time commanded him, in his way, to destroy the idol called Dbu'l-Cassain, or the two-handed idol, made of wood, and belonging to one Amru Ebn Jamca. After the execution of which commissions, he was ordered to rejoin the army before Al Tayef, of which place the prophet proposed immediately to form the siege<sup>a</sup>.

and forms the siege of that place.

AL TAFAIL having reduced the idol Dbu'l-Cassain to ashes, and brought the tribe of Daws over to Islamism, in pursuance of his orders, returned to Mohammed, with a body of Dawlat auxiliaries, amounting to 400 men, together with a great number of military machines, spades, pick-axes, and other instruments proper for removing the earth, and b sapping the walls of cities. He arrived in the camp before Al Tayef four days after the commencement of the siege<sup>c</sup>.

Description of Al Tayef.

AL TAYEF was a city of no very large extent, about sixty miles, or three stations, to the east of Mecca. It was situated, says Abu'lfeda, in a fruitful territory, to the east of mount Ghazwân, which the Arabs commonly pronounce Afwân. The mountain is the coldest spot in the province of Hejâz, the water there being frozen in the clefts of the rocks. It produces excellent raisins, and is blessed with a very salubrious air. Al Jannâbi adds, that its territory is spacious, capable of cultivation, and abounding with fountains. The word Tâyes signifies turning in a round, and was applied to this city, according to Abu'lfeda, because, at the time of the deluge, the spot on which it stands was detached from Syria, and, c after having been continually turned in a round, by the violence of the waters, was at last fixed in the place where it still remains. But the inhabitants, if we will believe Al Jannâbi, relate, that Gabriel transported the ground, on which it now is seated, as well as the city itself, from the neighbourhood of Sanaa, the capital of Yaman, to the place where it at present stands. From whence comes the name Al Tayef. It was anciently, whilst distant only two parasangs from Sanaa, says the same author, called Veja, or Waj<sup>d</sup>.

The siege of that place.

MOHAMMED departed from Honein on the tenth of Shawâl, to form the siege of Al Tayef; having sent Khâled Ebn Al Walid before with the van-guard of the army, to invest the place. With the rest of the troops he marched directly to Nakbla, and made himself master of that town. From thence he advanced to Karne, afterwards to Al Malib, and then to the d tree called Roga, belonging to Labba, where he erected a mosque. After this, leaving the great road, he ruined a castle belonging to Mâlec; from whence turning to the left, he encamped at Alisier, which is likewise called Sadera. Afterwards he pillaged and destroyed several castles of the Thakîfites; and last of all sat down before Al Tayef, taking his quarters on a spot directly opposite to the castle. But as his camp was so near the fortifications, being within bow-shot of them, the garrison discharged a shower of arrows upon his men, by which several of them were slain. This obliged him to change his post, and retire to a farm, called at this day Salama, at a greater distance from the town, where he encamped. Here he caused two tents to be pitched, one for his wife Omm Salma, and the other for Zeinab, who attended him in this expedition. As long as the siege continued, he constantly e said his prayers between these two tents; and after the Thakîfites embraced Islamism, Amru Ebn Ommeya Ebn Wahab Ebn Mateb Ebn Mâlec built a mosque upon the place where Mohammed had prayed. This mosque was so enlarged by the Khalif Al Mo'tassem Billah, that it was rendered capable of containing a very numerous congregation. He also erected a magnificent mausoleum upon the tomb of Abd'allah Ebn Al Abbâs, his uncle, and two stately domes of fine cut stone on the places where Omm Salma's and Zeinab's tents had stood. This mosque was also repaired and beautified by Al Nâser Ledinî'llah and Al Mostanjed Billah, two of the later Khalifs. The Moslem historian Abu Mohammed Mostafa Ebn Al Sayyad Hasan Al Hoscini Al Hashemi Al Korasbi said his prayers in this mosque, and saw the two domes, in the year of the Hejra 973, or of CHRIST 1565, when they were all in f good condition<sup>e</sup>.

Mohammed forced to abandon the siege.

THE prophet having thus secured himself from the insults of the garrison, he besieged the place in form. He opened the trenches regularly before it, planted his rams, and disposed all his other engines of battery in such a manner, that they might play incessantly upon the town. This he continued to do without intermission; and, at last, with the assistance of forty military machines, opened such large breaches in the wall, as enabled the Moslems to make a general assault; which they did with surprising courage and resolution, but were vigorously repulsed by the besieged, who terribly galled them with their arrows. This great resistance so shocked the prophet, that he began to doubt of the success of the siege; and therefore, in order to intimidate the garrison, he ordered all the vines belonging g

<sup>a</sup> ABU'LFED. ubi sup. c. lvi. p. 117. AL JANNAB. ubi sup. p. 233.

<sup>c</sup> AL JANNAB. ubi sup. p. 234.

<sup>d</sup> AL JANNAB. ubi sup. p. 234. ABU'LFED. geogr. Arab. p. 56. GOLII notæ ad Alfragan. p. 99, 100.

<sup>e</sup> ABU'LFED. & AL JANNAB. ubi sup.

a to the town to be destroyed. He also offered a public manumission to all the slaves that made up part of the garrison, to induce them to desert. But neither of these expedients produced the desired effect, the Thakifites still defending themselves with unparalleled bravery. So that having spent twenty days in fruitless attacks, and seeing not the least probability of carrying the place by force, he found himself obliged, tho' with the greatest reluctance and concern, at last to abandon the siege <sup>h</sup>.

In the last attack, Abu Sofiân Ebn Harb lost one of his eyes, as he did the other in the battle of Yermouk. In his return, the prophet took his route by Waba. That town was filled with riches that belonged to the inhabitants of Al Tâyes. All which Mohammed seized upon, and carried off, besides a vast number of camels, oxen, sheep, &c. that he found also in the place. The treasure he gave all to Safwân, who had presented him with a very considerable quantity of arms, and attended him in the expeditions of Honein, Awtâs, and the siege of Al Tâyes. From Waba the prophet marched to Karn Al Manzal, repassed by Nakbla, from whence he arrived with his army at Al Jarâna, on the fifth of the month Dhu'lkaada. Here he had left all the spoils and slaves taken from the Hawâzenites after the battles of Honein and Awtâs. This town is situated between Al Tâyes and Mecca, tho' nearer the latter of those cities, on the road to Irâk and Baghdâd. Having halted here thirteen days, the prophet took an inventory of the spoils, pillage, slaves, &c. that had fallen into his hands during the siege of Al Tâyes, and the course of his excursions in the territory of that city. Whereupon he found that he had made 6,000 men, women, and children, prisoners; and had moreover brought away with him 24,000 camels, 40,000 sheep, and above 4,000 ounces of silver <sup>i</sup>.

d During the prophet's residence at Al Jarâna, the deputies from the tribe of Hawâzen arrived in his camp, where they met with a most gracious reception. This so exceedingly pleased them, that they immediately declared themselves converts to Mohammedism. After which, they desired Mohammed to restore them their families, that had been made slaves, and all their most valuable effects. But the prophet assuring them, that he could not comply with both their requests, offered them a restitution either of the prisoners, or the spoils he had acquired; and they choosing the former, their wives and children were instantly delivered up into their hands <sup>k</sup>.

d This grand affair being terminated to the mutual satisfaction of both parties, Mohammed offered Mâlec not only a restitution of his effects, as well as his family; but likewise a present of an hundred camels, if he would forsake his idolatrous worship. Mâlec, not able to withstand such advantageous conditions, immediately turned Mohammedan. This induced the prophet to constitute him commandant of all his brethren that should embrace the new religion. At the head of these he afterwards committed frequent hostilities against the Thakifites, plundering their territory, and carrying off their beasts in such numbers, that he is said to have reduced them to the last extremity <sup>l</sup>.

In order the more effectually to conciliate the affections of the new converts to him, Mohammed divided the remaining part of the spoils amongst them. The principal of these were Abu Sofiân Ebn Harb, with his two sons Yezîd and Moâwiyah, the latter of which afterwards Khalîf, Sobail Ebn Amru, Acrema Ebn Abu Jabl, Safwân Ebn Ommeya, Al Hârith Ebn Heshâm, all of the tribe of Koreish. Abu Sofiân received, for his share, 300 camels and 20 ounces of silver, and all the others in proportion. By this means he hoped to attach them more closely to his interests; at least, to prevent their caballing against him, and, in some measure, to bridle their licentious tongues. But, besides these, several strangers belonging to other Arab tribes likewise partook of his liberality; of whom the most considerable were Al Akra' Ebn Hâbes, the Tamîmite, Oiaina Ebn Hasan Ebn Hadna' Ebn Bedr, the Dhaibanite, and Mâlec Ebn Awf, the Hawâzenite general. Al Abbâs Ebn Mardâs, the Salemite, taking offence at Mohammed's superabundant kindness to Oiaina and Al Akra', at first made great complaints; but he was soon pacified by the prophet's uncommon generosity to him. The Ansârs also expressed some uneasiness at Mohammed's conduct on this occasion, as he had intirely forgotten them in the distribution of the spoils; but, by his address and winning behaviour, he soon likewise calmed the minds of that faithful body. As for Dhu'l Khowaisara, one of the Banu Tamîm, he reviled Mohammed to his face, for the division he had made; which so incensed Omar, that he would have struck off his head, had he not been expressly prohibited by the prophet. From this Dhu'l Khowaisara, according to Abu'l-feda, descended Harkudh Ebn Zohair, the Nahalite, surnamed Dhu'l Madma, that is, the author of rebuke, because he was the author of the heretical sect of the Khârejites, who revolted from Ali in the 37th year of the Hejra. These Khârejites maintained heterodox

<sup>h</sup> ABU'LFED. & AL JANNAB. ubi sup. ECTEPA; ABU'LFED. ubi sup. p. 118.

<sup>i</sup> AL JANNAB. & AL BOKHAR. ubi sup.

<sup>l</sup> AL JANNAB. ubi sup. p. 237, 238. Aut. lib. diſt. AL

<sup>k</sup> ABU'LFED. & AL JANNAB. ubi sup. AL BOKHAR. in Sonna.

opinions concerning predestination, and the ascribing of good and evil unto God; as also concerning the power and authority of the Imâm, or supreme director of ecclesiastical affairs. Dhu'l Madma's defection from Ali is said to have been predicted by Mohammed at this juncture. Dhu'l Kbowaisara, that is, the author of detraction, was only a surname, or rather a nick-name, applied to the person who bore it, either by the prophet himself, or some of his followers, at the same time. For a further account of the heretics here mentioned, we must beg leave to refer our curious readers to our future history of the Khalifs, or great successors of Mohammed <sup>m</sup>.

and arrives at Medina. On the 18th of the month Dhu'lkaada, after the division of the spoils, Mohammed left the camp at Al Jarâna, with a few attendants, in order to visit the sacred places before his return to Medina. For this purpose, he entered Mecca in a pilgrim's habit, made seven circuits round the Caaba, performed the running between Safâ and Merwâ seven times, and shaved his head, according to custom, on such solemn occasions. Then he continued Osâb and Mââdh in their respective posts of governor and Imâm, and at night returned to Al Jarâna. The next morning he decamped from thence, and began his march for Medina. He had not moved far before he met with Scrâka Ebn Mâlec, a principal person of the tribe of Koreish, who had so closely pursued him in his flight from Mecca to Medina, and who was now become a zealous Moslem. This did not retard his march; so that he arrived at Medina towards the latter end of the month of Dhu'lkaada, and made his public entry into that place amidst the acclamations of all the people. The public joy was the greater on this occasion, as the inhabitants of Medina had been apprehensive, that, after the reduction of Mecca, the prophet would make that city the seat of his empire <sup>c</sup>.

The Sadâites submit to him. SOME days after his arrival at Mecca, Mohammed received a letter from Mondar Ebn Sâwa, king of Babrein, to whom he had sent Al Ola, the Hadramite, to invite him to Islamism, with advice of his having embraced Mohammedism, together with a good part of his subjects. He also farther informed him, that many people in his dominions still professed the Magian religion; desiring, at the same time, the prophet to direct him how he was to behave to them. To which Mohammed replied in terms to this effect: Those who are attached to the Magian superstition must pay tribute; but the Moslems must neither contract alliances with them by marriage, nor eat of their sacrifices. Soon after this, Mohammed detached a body of 400 men, under the command of Kais Ebn Saad, to attack the Sadâites, on the side of Naman. Of which Zyad Ebn Al Hâreth, the Sadâite, being apprized, he submitted, in the name of his countrymen to the prophet, desiring him to revoke the orders he had given. Mohammed, therefore, recalled his troops, that had already advanced to Kanât, fifteen days after the Sadâites had made their submission <sup>d</sup>.

His son Ibrahim born. TOWARDS the close of the eighth year of the Hejra, the prophet's daughter Zeinab, the wife of Abu'l As, departed this life; and in the month of Dhu'lhajja, the same year, Mary the Copt, that Mohammed had been so fond of, bare him a son, whom he named Ibrahim. The birth of this son gave him so much pleasure, that he caused two lambs to be killed, when the child was seven days old, for an entertainment that he prepared on the occasion; distributing at the same time as much silver amongst the poor as the hair of the infant, that was then shaved, weighed. Omm Borda Bint Al Mondar Ebn Zeid, Al Bara's wife, he appointed nurse to the child, sometimes eating and drinking with her, that he might have an opportunity of seeing it; which caused no small jealousy amongst his wives. About the same time died the famous Hâtem Ebn Abd'allah Ebn Saad, of the posterity of Tay. He had always professed the Christian faith, in which he persevered to the end of his life. The Tayites, in general, were of the same persuasion, tho' they had some few idolaters amongst them. Hâtem resided in the province of Najd, at a place called Khâdher, situated between the mountains Ajâ and Salma, named by some the mountains of Tay. He was the most generous and hospitable man in the whole peninsula of the Arabs, killing ten camels every day through the month of Rajeb, for the refreshment of strangers. Hence the Arab proverb, More liberal than Hâtem. He was likewise a most celebrated poet, as also a person of superior strength and bravery. His countrymen sometimes called him Abu Sofâna, that is, the father of Sofâna, which surname he derived from his daughter's name Sofâna, in conformity to a custom that prevailed amongst the Arabs. Sofâna Bint Hâtem and Adî Ebn Hâtem, the only children he is supposed to have left behind him, became proselytes to Islamism, after their father's death. We are told, that Adî lived to be 120 years of age, and died in the 68th of the Hejra <sup>e</sup>.

<sup>m</sup> ABU'LFED. ubi sup. p. 118, 119. AL JANNAB. ubi sup. p. 239, 240. AL BOKHAR. ubi sup. " ABU'LFED. ubi sup. p. 120. AL JANNAB. ubi sup. p. 240. <sup>d</sup> AL JANNAB. ubi sup. p. 241. EBN AMID, sive ELMACIN. ubi sup. GAGN. la vie de Mahom. tom. ii. p. 193. <sup>e</sup> AL JANNAB. ubi sup. p. 242, 243. AL MEIDAN, in proverb. Arab. ABU ISHAK & EBN AL HOBAR, poet. Arab. apud Pocockium, in not. ad carmen 'Tograi, p. 107. ut & ipse Pocock. ibid. ISM. ABU'LFED. ubi sup. p. 120. Pocock. not. in spec. hist. Arab. p. 72, 73. EBN ISHAK.

- THE next year, being the ninth of the Hejra, the Mohammedans call the year of embassies, or legations. For the Arabs had been hitherto expecting the issue of the war between Mohammed and the Korish. But so soon as that tribe, the principal of the whole nation, the Arab and the genuine descendents of Ishmael, whose prerogative none offered to dispute, had submitted, they were satisfied that it was not in their power to oppose Mohammed; and therefore they began to come in to him in great numbers, and to send embassies to make their submissions to him, both to Mecca while he staid there, and also to Medina, whither he returned the preceding year. Amongst the rest, Arwa Ebn Masūd, chief of the tribe of Tbakif, who was not at Al Tayef when the prophet formed the siege of that place, came and professed Mohammedism; but was afterwards slain by an arrow shot from the walls of that city, when he went thither with a design to draw the inhabitants from their idolatrous worship. We are likewise told, that Al Hāretb Ebn Abd Colāl, Nāim Ebn Abd Colāl, Al Nccmān, surnamed Dhu Roain, Hamdūn, and Moāser, five kings of Hamyar, about this time sent ambassadors to Mohammed, to notify their conversion to Islamism. Ebn Ishāk relates, that the first of those princes, to whom Mohammed had before sent a minister, named Al Mohājer Ebn Abu Ommeya, wrote to the prophet, after the expedition of Tābuc, intimating, that he and his subjects were become converts to the true religion; and that Mohammed sent him an answer to that letter, in which he congratulated him upon his conversion, and explained to him several passages of the Korān. However, according to Abu'lfeda, the afore-said kings of Tamar did not embrace Islamism, or at least did not openly profess it, before the beginning of the tenth year of the Hejra <sup>1</sup>.

- ABOUT this time, Mohammed sent Bashir Ebn Sasiān to the Caabites, a branch of the Kho- He punishes zāites, to receive the legal contribution of alms, or duty, required of them in common the Caabites. with the other Mohammedans. But so far were they from obeying the prophet's order in this particular, that, at the instigation of the Tamīmites, they had immediately recourse to arms, and obliged the collector employed by Bashir to take to his heels. This so exasperated Mohammed, that he sent Oiana Ebn Hasan, at the head of five hundred horse, all new converts, to chastize the Tamīmites; who coming up with a body of them at Sobera, soon dispersed them, taking eleven men, as many women, and thirty children, prisoners; whom they conducted to Medina. Whereupon ten of the principal Tamīmites, among whom were d Kais Ebn Afem, Otāred Ebn Hāgheb, Al Zerbekān Ebn Bedr, and Al Akrā Ebn Hābes, four great orators and excellent poets, came to make satisfaction for the late affront, and to demand a restitution of the prisoners. Mohammed, as the afore-said Tamīmites produced some excellent compositions both in prose and verse, tho' the prophet's orator and poet exhibited others that excelled them, did not only comply with their request, but likewise distributed amongst them rich presents, and even such as are usually made to the ambassadors of crowned heads <sup>2</sup>.

- A LITTLE after, Mohammed sent Al Walid Ebn Okba, in quality of collector of the alms; to the Banu Al Mostalek, another branch of the Khozaites, who received him with great marks of affection, congratulated him upon the happy situation of the prophet's affairs, e and brought him in great abundance of all kinds of refreshments. Notwithstanding which, Al Walid, taking it into his head that they had a design to assassinate him, was seized with a sudden panic, and returned very precipitately, without executing his commission, to Medina, where he gave them to the prophet a very ill character. This induced Mohammed, who was greatly incensed at the supposed disaffection of the Banu Al Mostalek, to send Khāled Ebn Al Walid with a body of troops, to punish them. But that general, upon his arrival among them, finding that Al Walid, who had been intirely governed by his fears, had entertained wrong sentiments of this people, made quite a different report of their disposition to the prophet. Obāda Ebn Bashar, therefore, was dispatched to receive the contributions they had raised, to instruct them more fully in the law, and f the rites of Islamism, and to explain to them in the clearest manner the most difficult passages of the Korān <sup>3</sup>.

ABOUT this time, Kotba Ebn Amer made an incursion, with a small detachment; upon the territory of the Khathāamites; and falling in with one of the enemy's parties, after a sharp dispute, defeated it. Then he made himself master of so many sheep and camels, that every one of his soldiers, which were about twenty in number, had twenty sheep and four camels assigned him for his share <sup>4</sup>.

AFTERWARDS the prophet detached Dhobak Ebn Sasiān to invite the Banu Kelāb to Islamism. But they shut themselves up in the town of Al Dhabina, and would come to no interview with him. The Moslems, therefore, dislodged them from thence, and carried Dhohak Ebn Sasiān invites the Banu Kelāb to Islamism.

<sup>1</sup> ABU'LFED. ubi sup. p. 121, 122, 128, &c. ABU ZEID SEID, in lib. Splendor. EBN ISHAK, EBN HESHAM, Ant. Lib. AL ECTEFA. Vide etiam GAGN. not. ad Abu'lfed. ubi sup. p. 128. <sup>2</sup> AL JANNAB. ubi sup. p. 243- <sup>3</sup> Idem ibid. <sup>4</sup> Idem ibid.

off all their effects. At the same time, Mohammed receiving advice, that the Bedouins had made a descent near Jodda, a maritime city, where they committed great depredations, he sent Olkam Ebn Mabraz, with a body of 300 men to oppose them. But they retiring at his approach, Olkam returned to Medina, without having been able to come up with them <sup>u</sup>.

Ali destroys the idol Al Fatas.

MOHAMMED, acted by his zeal for the extirpation of idolatry, sent Ali to destroy the idol Al Fatas, that belonged to the tribe of Tay. But foreseeing that this tribe, which was very powerful, might give Ali great obstruction in the execution of his orders, he assigned him a detachment of 150 foot, all Ansârs, together with 100 camels and 50 horses, to support him in the enterprize. With this force he attacked the enemy, defeated them, destroyed the idol, and took a considerable number of prisoners, among whom was Sefina Bint Hâtem, her brother Adi Ebn Hâtem, chief of the tribe, being then in Syria. This lady was conducted, with the other captives, to Medina, where she met with so gracious a reception from the prophet, that she turned Mohammedan; and her brother Adi, charmed likewise with his polite and generous behaviour, soon after followed her example. As for Ali, he acquired immense riches in this expedition, and particularly three swords of great value, named Al Rosoub, Al Mokhazzem, and Al Yamâni, that belonged to the idol Al Fatas. The two best of the swords he made a present of to the prophet, and kept the third for himself. He also distributed the plunder amongst his troops that had attended him in the expedition <sup>w</sup>.

Mohammed
receives the foreign ministers with great civility.

THE prophet received all the ambassadors sent to him this year with great marks of affection and benevolence; and treated every one of them in a manner suitable to his rank and dignity. The Moslem historians have given us a long detail of these embassies and legations. Besides those already mentioned, there were many others; one of the most remarkable of which was the deputation of the Banu Honeifa, who inhabited two famous cities, called Al Yamâna and Al Hajr; from the former of which, the province in which they stood derived its name. These deputies had at their head the famous Moseilame, Mohammed's competitor, the prince and lord of Al Yamâna, who at that time made public profession of Islamism, tho' he afterwards apostatized. By a piece of impudence not to be paralleled, says a Moslem writer, he arrogated to himself the prophetic function, and pretended to partake of that honour with Mohammed. We shall give a larger account of this impostor, and the miserable end he came to, in our history of the Khalifat of Abu Becr <sup>x</sup>.

The poet Caab
Ebn Zobair Ebn Abu Salama pardoned by Mohammed.

ABOUT this time, Caab Ebn Zobair Ebn Abu Salama, the famous poet, who had been proscribed by Mohammed the preceding year, returned to Mecca, and afterwards waited upon the prophet at Medina. He took the opportunity of repeating aloud the profession of faith, and the declaration of his being a Moslem, when Mohammed was in the mosque. In order to soften him, he also celebrated his praises in a fine Arabic poem, that he had lately composed, before the whole congregation; of which a full and ample account has been handed down to us by Al Jannâbi. This so pleased the prophet, that he not only pardoned him, but likewise made him a present of his cloak, which the Khalif Moâwiyah purchased afterwards of his family for the sum of (K) 40,000 dirhems. This, by a sort of hereditary right, descended to all the succeeding Khalifs, who never failed wearing it on festivals, in public processions, and, in fine, upon all the most solemn occasions. Al Mosta'sem Billah, the last Khalif of the house of Abbâs, had this cloak on, as also the prophet's staff in his hand, when he made his appearance before Holagu, the Tartar, after the loss of Baghdâd. But that conqueror took them from him, burnt them both, and threw their ashes into the Tigris. This happened on the 28th day of the month Al Moharram, and the 656th year of the Hejra <sup>y</sup>.

The expedition
of Tabûc.

ON the sixth day of the month Rajeb, this year, Mohammed signified his intention of coming to a rupture with the Greeks, who looked with a jealous eye upon his conquests, and seemed determined to attack him. As their forces grew very numerous on the frontiers, and they had a strong camp at Balka, the prophet assembled an army of 30,000 men, in order to undertake an expedition against them. The Moslems set out

<sup>u</sup> AL JANNAB. ubi sup. p. 246.

<sup>w</sup> AL JANNAB. ubi sup. p. 246, 247.

<sup>x</sup> ABU'LFED. in descript.

Arab. p. 60. & vit. Moham. p. 160. Vide etiam GAGN. la vie de Mahom. tom. ii. p. 206.

<sup>y</sup> ABU'LFED.

ubi sup. p. 112. D'HERBEL. biblioth. Orient. p. 219. AHMED EBN YUSEF, in hist. gen. sect. 40. ELMACIN. in hist. suæ part. inedit.

(K) These dirhems were a small silver coin of the Arabs, about the same weight, though much broader and thinner, as the Greek drachms; from whence they apparently derived their name. Several of them are still preserved in the cabinets of the curious, and particularly a pretty ancient one in the Bodleian collection of medals at Oxford (34.)

(34) Vid. nummer. antiquor. scriin. Bodleian. recondit. catal. &c. p. 311—315. Oxon. 1750.

- a on this expedition with great reluctance, as they were to march in the midst of the summer-heats, and at a time of great drought and scarcity. As the soldiers, therefore, suffered extremely this campaign, the body of troops now destined to act against the Greeks was called the distressed army. Besides, their fruits were just ripe, which increased their unwillingness to move from home at this juncture. However in pursuance of the prophet's orders, they began their march, and, after sustaining great fatigues, arrived at Al Hejr, a territory in the province of Hejâz, between Medina and Syria, where the tribe of Thamûd had formerly dwelt. From Al Hejr they advanced to Wadi'l-Kora, and from thence to Tabûc, the conquest of which place was one of the objects of this expedition. As the Greeks were a very formidable enemy, to carry it on with success, the prophet was obliged to make extraordinary
- b preparations, and consequently to draw vast sums from his followers, to defray the expence of it. Abu Becr presented Mohammed with all he was worth, to enable him to carry on this war. Al Abbâs advanced a large sum of money, on the same occasion; and the other officers, who were rich, likewise contributed to the military chest, in proportion to the wealth they possessed. But Othmân Ebn Affân exerted himself almost beyond his abilities, to assist the prophet in setting on foot a powerful army. He supplied the troops with 300 camels for slaughter, and 1,000 (L) dinârs of gold: nay, he is said to have raised, and maintained at his own expence, three whole regiments, furnishing them with provisions, arms, and all sorts of necessary munitions. This extremely pleased Mohammed, who is reported to have observed, that what Othmân then had done would not be of any future disadvantage to him <sup>2</sup>.
- c THE Moslems having surmounted all difficulties, and formed a camp at Tabûc, Mohammed continued about three weeks at that place. Al Ghazâli, Al Ispahâni, Al Kodai, and other Mohammedan writers, pretend, that, soon after his arrival there, he caused such a vast quantity of water to issue out of a very small fountain near the town; that there was not only enough to quench the thirst of the whole army, and to water all the beasts that attended it, but likewise to enable all the soldiers to perform the sacred ablutions. Which miracle has been undoubtedly trumped up, in order to draw a sort of parallel between Moses, who, by the divine assistance, caused water to gush out of a rock in the wilderness, sufficient to supply the wants of the whole body of the Israelites, that he was conducting to the borders of the land of Canaan, and Mohammed. But the misfortune here is, that this, and all
- d other relations of the like nature, are intirely void of evidence to support them, the authors from whom they come having lived long after the facts therein inserted are supposed to have happened. Which observation will likewise hold true of the prophecies ascribed to this impostor; all of which, even the famous one mentioned in the thirtieth chapter of the Korân itself, which has met with no unfavourable reception from Mr. Gagnier and Mr. Sale (the first transcript of that book having not been completed by Abu Becr before the thirteenth year of the Hejra, that is, eight years after the event therein foretold really happened) as transmitted down to us, are later than the facts they predict. And let this suffice for an answer to all the insinuations of the aforesaid gentlemen in favour of those pretended prophecies, some of which we have already animadverted upon <sup>2</sup>.
- e THE troops being plentifully supplied with all sorts of provisions at Tabûc, soon forgot the fatigues they had sustained in their march, and began to think of subduing some of the neighbouring princes. Tabûc was a town situated about half-way between Medina and Damascus, having a fountain, and a considerable number of palm trees, in its neighbourhood. The people called in the Korân the inhabitants of the wood anciently occupied this place. Shoaib, or Jethro, the father-in-law of Moses, according to Abu'lfeda, lived also some time here; tho' he allows him to have been a native of Midian, or Madian, a city of Hejâz, the habitation of a tribe of the same name, and distant from Tabuc about six stations. Tabûc stands between Al Hejr and Al Shâm, and is, according to Sharif Al Edrisi, four days journey distant from the borders of Syria <sup>b</sup>.

<sup>2</sup> ABU'LFED. ubi sup. p. 123, & in descript. Arab. p. 43. EBN ISHAK, AL JANNAB. ubi sup. p. 247. SHARIF AL EDRISI, EBN HAWKAL apud Abu'lfed. in Arab. p. 43. Poc. not. spec. hist. Arab. p. 37. JALLALO'DDIN. <sup>a</sup> Idem ibid. AL BOKHARI, MOSLEM, AL JANNAB. ubi sup. p. 249. AL GHAZALI, AL ISPAHANI, AL KODAI, SALE'S notes on the thirtieth chapter of the Korân, GAGN. la vie de Mahom. tom. ii. p. 220. <sup>b</sup> ABU'LFED. ubi sup. p. 124, 125, 126. AL JANNAB. ubi sup. p. 261. ABU'LFED. in Arab. p. 43. SHARIF AL EDRISI. AL KOR. MOHAM. f. xv. v. 77. xxxviii. v. 14. GREG. ABU'L FAR. ubi sup. EBN AMID, lib. v. c. i.

(L) The dinârs were a gold Arabian coin, that seemed to have weighed about as much as the gold denarii of the Romans, though they are much thinner and broader; from whence they undoubtedly took their name. There are nine very fine ones preserved in the Bodlcian collection, and another in that of the reverend Mr. Brown, fellow of Trinity College, whose value, according to weight, amounts to about thirteen shillings and six pence, English money. This last is pretty ancient, well preserved, and a real curiosity (35).

(35) Vide Nummor. antiquor. serin. Bodlcian. recondit. catal. &c. ubi sup. p. 311.

The neighbouring princes conclude a treaty of peace with
Mohammed

THE Moslem army had not been long encamped at Tabûc, before ambassadors came from different parts to make their submission, in their principals names, to the prophet; and even some of the neighbouring princes themselves, in person, paid their duty to him. Amongst the rest appeared Yohanna, or John, Ebn Rawba, lord of Ailab, a maritime town on the sea Al Kolzom, mentioned both in sacred and profane history. By his name as well as the tribute imposed upon him, he must have been a Christian. He concluded a treaty with Mohammed, by virtue of which he and his subjects were intitled to the prophet's protection, upon the annual payment of 3,000 pieces of gold. The instrument of this treaty, which included the trading inhabitants of the interior part of Syria and Arabia Felix, as well as those of the maritime provinces, that he might be consider'd as Yohanna's allies, is said to have been preserved by the people of Ailab to this very day. Be that as it will, the substance of it has been given us by some of the Moslem writers. The prophet was so well pleased with it, as well as with Yohanna's prompt and ready submission to him, that he made him a present of a rich cloak, or mantle, that some believe became afterwards the property of the Khalifs, having been purchased by Abu'l Abbâs Al Saffab for 3,000 dinârs. But, according to Ahmed Ebn Yusef, who flourished towards the close of the 16th century, it fell into the hands of the Turkish emperors, or Othmân Soltâns, and was the very same cloak for which a golden chest was made, by order of the Soltân Morâd Khân, the son of Soltân Selim Khân, who mounted the Othmân throne in the year of the Hejra 982, or of CHRIST 1574<sup>c</sup>.

By the tribute imposed upon Yohanna, as has been observed, it appears, that both he and the people of Ailab persevered in the Christian faith, during the life of Mohammed. Ailab was a little town on the sea Al Kolzom, situated in a barren country, that formerly belonged to the Jews; some of whom, according to the Korân, were turned into hogs and apes, for having violated the Sabbath, and worshipped the idol Tâgût. It stands on the road frequented by the Egyptian pilgrims, who pass from their own country to Mecca; and has a tower, or castle, where the governor, who is a dependent on the Pasha of Egypt, resides; though, if some modern writers may be believed, that castle being ruined, he lives in the town, close by the sea-side. According to Sharif Al Edrisi, Ailab is distant from Madian, another maritime city, only five stations<sup>d</sup>.

Mohammed
gives the emperor Hera-clius a second invitation to Islamism.

WE are informed by Abu'lfeda and Al Fannâbi, that Jarba and Adrah, two cities of Syria, about three days journey distant from one another, at this time likewise sent deputies to the prophet; who engaged to protect them, on condition that each of them paid him annually, by way of tribute, 200 dinârs. He treated all the other cities and towns, that sent deputies to him, in the same manner, imposing smaller or larger tributes upon them, in proportion to the extent of territory they possessed. Being informed, that the Greeks were so far from being able to make an irruption into Arabia, that, upon the first news of his approach, they retired farther from the frontiers, and withdrew into the interior part of their own dominions, he made the necessary dispositions for returning home. However, as he had taken post on a spot of ground belonging to the emperor Heraclius, before his departure, he thought proper to write a letter to that prince, couched in very civil terms; wherein he gave him a second invitation to Islamism. This, the Moslem writers tell us, the emperor received with marks of respect, but did not think fit to answer it. About this time died Abd'allah, surnamed Dbu'l Najâdain, the Mâzenite, one of the most illustrious companions of Mohammed, and was interred by night with great funeral pomp; the prophet himself, Abu Becr, Omar, Belâl the crier, and Abd'allah Ebn Mas'ûd, attending the corps to the grave. Before the Moslems began their march, Khâled Ebn Al Walîd, whom Mohammed sent to Dawmat Al Fandal, took Ocaider Ebn Mâlec, the prince of that place, of the tribe of Kendab, and a Christian, prisoner. He also put his brother Hasân to the sword, and stripped him of a silk vest that he wore, all embroidered with gold. As he had been detached from the camp at Tabûc with a body of 420 men, and had got Ocaider Ebn Mâlec into his hands, by that prince's assistance, Khâled not only possessed himself of the castle of Mâdhen, situated at the foot of mount Tay, the place of his residence, but likewise of the city of Dawmat Al Fandal, over which Ocaider presided. At the same time, by that prince's consent, Khâled carried off with him 1,000 camels, 800 horses, and 400 cuirasses; and then conducted Ocaider, with his brother Mas'ûd Ebn Mâlec, to Mohammed. The prophet took them under his protection, and restored to Ocaider his dominions; but exacted a certain annual tribute from him. When Khâled was unwilling to undertake the conquest of Dawmat Al Fandal with so small a force, according to Al Fannâbi, Mohammed did not only assure him of success, but likewise predicted all the material circumstances that should attend the expedition; which prediction, if we will believe this author, was verified in every particular. But as Al Fannâbi lived near a thousand years after Mohammed, and, like the other Moslems,

<sup>c</sup> ABU'LFED. ubi sup. ABU ZEID SEID in Lib. Splendor. ABU'LFED. in descript. Arab. p. 41. SHARIF AL EDRISEI, AHMED EBN YUSEF, RELAND. descript. Palæstin. lib. iii. p. 554. <sup>d</sup> lidem ibid. Al Kor. MOHAM. f. v. v. 69.

a was unreasonably prejudiced in favour of this pretended prophet, in this point, this testimony is of very little weight. Dawmat Al Jandal is a town on the confines of Syria, about five days journey from Damascus, and fifteen or sixteen from Medina. According to Abu'lfeda and Al Jannibi, it was occupied, as well as Tabûc, and other places on that side, before the birth of Mohammed, and even when he undertook this expedition, by the Banu Calb <sup>c</sup>.

WITH regard to Abd'allah Ebn Obba, and his hypocritical adherents, as also Merâra Ebn He <sup>He reprehends</sup> Rabî, Helâi Ebn Omeyya, and Caab Ebn Mâlec, three of the Ansîrs, whom Mohammed <sup>some of his fol-</sup> excused, on their request, from going with him to Tabûc, he forbade the other Moslems <sup>lowers for not</sup> to have any converse or correspondence with them for the space of fifty days. At the end <sup>attending him</sup> of which interval, being assured, as he pretended, of their penitence, by a passage in the ninth chapter of the Korân, that was revealed to him on this occasion, they were received again into favour. However, he declared to his followers, that he had been reprehended for excusing them, in another passage of the same chapter. By such artifices as these, in conjunction with a few crafty friends, and the great success that attended his arms, did he at last subdue the whole peninsula of the Arabs, and laid the foundations of an empire, more extensive than any of those formidable ones that preceded it, as will be shewn at large in the sequel of our history <sup>f</sup>.

WHILST the prophet was on his march to Medina, he was applied to by the Banu <sup>The prophet</sup> Gânem Ebn Awf, to consecrate a mosque they had lately built, by praying in it. He accord- <sup>returns to</sup> ingly prepared himself to go with them; but being afterwards informed, that the Banu <sup>Medina.</sup> Gânem Ebn Awf were Christians, had erected the aforesaid mosque in opposition to that founded at Koba by their brethren, the Banu Amru Ebn Awf, and intended to permit a Christian priest, or Imâm, to officiate there, he all of a sudden refused to comply with their request. Nay, being, as he pretended, forbidden to do this by the immediate revelation of a passage in the ninth chapter of the Korân, which discovered the hypocrisy and ill design of the Banu Gânem Ebn Awf to him, he sent Mâlec Ebn Al Dokhshom, Maan Ebn Addi, Amer Ebn Al Sacan, and Al Wahsha, the Ethiopian, to demolish and burn the mosque he was to consecrate; which they performed, and converted it into a dunghill. After which, he pursued his march without interruption to Medina; tho' he was once in great danger of being assassinated, d and would probably have lost his life, had he not been preserved by the vigilance of Hodheifa and Ammâr Ebn Yâser, who attended him, according to one of the commentators on the Korân <sup>e</sup>.

Soon after the prophet's arrival at Medina, which happened in the month of Ramadân, <sup>The people of</sup> he was congratulated upon the success that had attended his arms in the late expedition to Tabûc, by a deputation from the tribe of Thakîf, the inhabitants of Al Tâyesf, who insisted on <sup>Al Tâyesf jub-</sup> his granting them several very extraordinary privileges, as the terms of their submission to <sup>mit to him,</sup> him. For they demanded, that they might be free from the legal contribution of alms, and for observing the appointed times of prayer; that they might be allowed to keep their idol Allât for a certain time; and that their territory might be declared a place of security, <sup>and embrace</sup> and not to be violated, like that of Mecca, &c. To which they added, that, if the other Arabs asked him the reason of these concessions, he should say, that God had commanded him so to do. At first, they desired, that the worship of Allât might be indulged them for three years; and not obtaining that, they asked for their favourite idol only a month's respite. But Mohammed absolutely refusing to comply with their demands, and they being reduced to the last extremity by a body of Moslem troops, which had formed the blockade of their city, the people of Al Tâyesf found themselves obliged to surrender at discretion, and embrace Islamism. Whereupon the prophet sent home with the deputies Al Mogheirab Ebn Shaba and Abu Sofiân Ebn Harb, to destroy the aforesaid idol; who executed their commission, to the great grief of the inhabitants of Al Tâyesf, especially the women, who f bitterly lamented the loss of this their deity. Allât was a statue of stone, revered in a singular manner by the Thakîfites, and had a temple consecrated to her in a place called Nakblah. There are several derivations of the word Allât, which the curious may learn from Dr. Pocock. It seems most probably to be derived from the same root with Allah, to which it may be a feminine, and will then signify the goddess <sup>h</sup>.

IN the month of Shawâl, this year, Mohammed sent Abu Becr to preside over the rites <sup>Ali promul-</sup> and ceremonies of the pilgrimage at Mecca, the following month of Dhu'lhajja, with 300 <sup>gates the ninth</sup> men, and 20 camels, to be sacrificed in the name of the prophet. In the mean time, <sup>chapter of the</sup> immediately after the departure of Abu Becr, the prophet, as he pretended, received from Mecca.

<sup>e</sup> ABU'LFED. in vit. Moham. p. 125 AL JANNAB. ubi sup. SAAD AL YAMANI, SHARIF AL EDRISI, ABU'LFED. in Arab. EBN ISHAK, GAGN. ubi sup. tom. ii. 209—228. <sup>f</sup> AL KOR. MOHAM. f. ix. AL BEIDAWI.

<sup>g</sup> JALLALO'DDIN in Al Kor. Moham. f. ix. ABU'LFED. ubi sup. p. 126. AL JANNAB. ubi sup. p. 265.

<sup>h</sup> ABU'LFED. ubi sup. p. c. lvii. 126, 127. AL JANNAB. ubi sup. p. 266. AL BEIDAWI, JALLALO'DDIN, Poc. not. in spec. hist. Arab. p. 90.

heaven the ninth chapter of the Korân, intituled BARAT, that is, IMMUNITY, LIBERTY, a EXEMPTION, or a declaration revoking all the edicts published in favour of idolaters, or, as the Korân expresses it, ASSOCIATORS, and a cassation of all former treaties concluded with them. The word ASSOCIATORS here includes Sabians, Christians, and Jews, because Mohammed affirmed, that all these associated with God beings that by nature were not God. The prophet then dispatched Ali Ebn Abu Tâleb, with all possible diligence, after Abu Becr, injoining him to read this declaration in form, during the solemnity of the pilgrimage at Mecca, to all the Arab tribes assembled there. Ali overtook Abu Becr at Dhu'lholeifa, a town about six miles from Medina, on the road to Mecca, where he signified the purport of his commission to him. After which, they continued their journey together to Mecca; and, upon their arrival there, Ali, to whom the promulgation of the preceding chapter b was committed by Mohammed, and who rode for that purpose on the prophet's slit-eared camel, called Al Adhbâ, from Medina, standing up before the whole assembly at Al Akaba, told them, that he was the messenger of the apostle of God unto them. Whereupon they asking him what was his errand, he read twenty or thirty verses of that chapter to them, and then said, I am commanded to acquaint you with four things, 1. That no idolater is to come near the temple of Mecca after this year; 2. That no man is to presume to compass the Caaba naked for the future; 3. That none but true believers shall enter paradise; and, 4. That public faith is to be kept. The aforesaid chapter was published, and the prophet's intentions signified to the people, on the tenth of Dhu'lhajja, when they slew the victims at Mina; which day is the great feast, and completes the ceremonies of the pilgrimage. Ali c having executed his commission, returned with Abu Becr to Medina towards the close of that month <sup>i</sup>.

Abd'allah
Ebn Obba
Ebn Al Hâ-reth dies at Medina.

ABOUT the same time died at Medina Abd'allah Ebn Obba Ebn Al Hâreth Ebn Obeid. He was commonly called Ebn Solûl, his father Obba having been surnamed Solûl. A little before the introduction of Islamism, the tribe of Khazraj put the crown upon his head, and declared him their prince. He fell ill twenty days after Mohammed's return from Tabûc, and died in the month of Dhu'lkaada. In his last illness he desired to see Mohammed; and, when he was come, asked him to beg forgiveness of God for him; requesting that his corps might be wrapt up in the garment that was next to the prophet's body; and that he would pray over him, when dead. Part of this request was complied with by Mohammed, d who sent his shirt, or inner vestment, to shroud the corps, and was going to pray over it; but was forbidden by an express passage in the Korân, which has been urged as a direct proof of his hypocrisy and infidelity. Some of the Moslem writers, however, maintain, that he died a staunch believer; and that Mohammed offered up prayers at his tomb, for the repose of his soul. Al Jannâbi relates, that Omm Colthum, Mohammed's third daughter, the wife of Othmân Ebn Affân, who was afterwards Khalîf, died also before the conclusion of the ninth year of the Hejra <sup>k</sup>.

The death of the Najâshi revealed to
Mohammed

WE are likewise told, that when this year was upon the point of expiring, the angel Gabriel brought Mohammed the news of the death of Asfâma Ebn Abbar, the Najâshi, or king of Ethiopia, the very instant that monarch died. This he immediately communicated e to all his companions then at Medina; after which, they marched in procession to the mosque they usually frequented there, repeating four times the form ALLAH ACBAR, &c. The tradition likewise adds, that, at the same time, they clearly saw from thence the corps of the Najâshi, lying in state at his palace <sup>l</sup>.

The prophet
sends two lieutenants to Yaman.

THE tenth year of the Hejra proved as fortunate and successful to the prophet as any of the preceding. After the return of the ambassadors sent by the five kings of Hamyar above-mentioned, Mohammed dispatched two of his companions, whom he could most confide in, to Yaman, in quality of his lieutenants, to govern that great province. One of these was Abu Musa, the Ashtarite, who was appointed to command in the country called Mekblaf, at Zabid and at Aden; and the other, Moadb Ebn Jabal, the prophet's most f intimate friend, who had Al Janad assigned him for the place of his residence. Moadb was escorted by a body of Ansârs and Mobâjerîn, and even attended a considerable part of the way by the prophet himself, who walked on foot, and took a final leave of him; telling him, that they should not meet again till the day of resurrection; which remarkable prophecy had, as Mr. Gagnier has most acutely and judiciously observed, in due time its proper completion. About the same time, that is in the month of Al Moharram, Khâled Ebn Al Walid converted the Abd'al Modânites, a tribe of Najrân, probably with fire and sword, to Islamism; and Joreir Ebn Abd'allah, the Bajalite, destroyed Dhu'l-Khalasa, an idol of the a Khatbâmites, seated in a district about four days journey from Mecca. This idol, with many others, was placed in a temple called the Caaba of Al Yamâma, and the house of idols. This temple Joreir rased from the very foundations <sup>m</sup>.

<sup>i</sup> AL KOR. MOHAM. f. ix. AL JANNAB. ubi sup. p. 272. AL MASUDI apud Ism. Abu'lfed. ubi sup. c. lviii. p. 127, 128. ut & ipse ABU'LFED ibid. AL BOKHARI in SONNA, AL BEIDAWI. Vide etiam ALBERTUM BOBOVIUM de peregrinat. Meccan. p. 15. <sup>k</sup> ISM. ABU'LFED. ubi sup. p. 128. AL JANNAB. ubi sup. p. 269. AL BEIDAWI, JABER, alique scriptor. Arab. <sup>l</sup> AL JANNAB. ubi sup. AL BAGAWI, AL DHABABI, OMM SALMA.

Soon after Joreir's return to Medina, the prophet sent him to Dhu'l Cola' Ebn Tâcur Joreir sent to convert Dhu'l Cola' Ebn Tâcur. Ebn Habib Ebn Mâlec Ebn Hasân Ebn Toba', a citizen of Al Tâyes, of such immense wealth, that he affected a sort of empire over his fellow-citizens; and even demanded regal honours, as should seem, to complete his conversion. For both he and his wife, Soreima Bint Al Sabab, had before professed Islamism; but most people suspected the sincerity of their profession, and believed that they still persisted in their infidelity. Nor was this suspicion quite removed before the reign of Omar, in whose Khalifat, Dhu'l Cola', as a mark of his sincerity, set at liberty 18,000 slaves. This fully convinced Omar of the reality of his conversion. He was afterwards killed, or, to use the stile of the Mohammedans, had the honour to die a martyr, at the battle of Seffein, that was fought the 37th year of the Hejra <sup>n</sup>.

At this time the Moslems of Najrân desired the prophet to send them a person to conduct their caravan of pilgrims to Mecca. Whereupon he recommended to them Amer Ebn Al Jarah Amer Jarah sent to conduct the people of Najrân's caravan to Mecca. for that service; saying, that he would be a faithful conductor to the whole nation <sup>o</sup>.

On the tenth day of the former Rabî, this year, Mohammed's son Ibrahim departed this life at Medina, in the second year of his age. We are told, that an eclipse of the sun happened on the day that he died; which induced the vulgar to think, that this eclipse was occasioned by his death. But Mohammed failed not to assure them, that they were greatly mistaken in this particular. Others say, that the eclipse happened on the twenty-eighth day of the month, and Ibrahim's death on the tenth. Be that as it will, the prophet was sensibly afflicted with the loss of his son, he being by this accident deprived of male issue, that might have transmitted his name down to posterity; which afforded matter of raillery to his enemies, as the death of his former son Al Kasem had done before. On that occasion he had the nick-name of Al Abtar given him by Al As Ebn Wayel; which either signifies one who has no children, or one who has his tail clean cut off. This injurious reflection so affected the prophet, that the angel Gabriel, according to Jallalo'ddin, revealed to him the 108th chapter of the Korân, intituled, AL CAWTHAR, for his consolation. Some time after, if we will believe Al Jannâbi, that angel appeared to a numerous assembly of Moslems who surrounded Mohammed, and, after catechizing the prophet before them all in a very particular manner, pronounced him better versed in divine matters than the angel that examined him <sup>p</sup>.

At this time, Firûz the Persian, a native of the province of Dailem, came to Medina, and declared himself a Moslem. It was this person who slew the false prophet Al Aswad Al Ansi, in the eleventh year of the Hejra, as will be seen in its proper place <sup>q</sup>. Firûz, the Persian, declares himself a Moslem;

ABOUT this time, says Al Jannâbi, Mohammed received a letter from Farwa Ebn Omar, of the tribe of Jodhâm, the emperor Heraclius's lieutenant in Syria, and governor of the city of Ammán, or Ammon, the ancient capital of the Ammonites, who derived their name from Ammon, the son of Lot, according to Scripture. This city, in holy writ, is called Ammon Rabbat, and was afterwards known by the name of Philadelphia. The purport of this letter was to acquaint the prophet, that Farwa was become a Moslem, and had sent him a vest of fine muslin, a superb bed of state, a beautiful white mule called Fadba, a horse named Dhâreb, an afs called Ya'far, and other magnificent presents. The same writer adds, that this Farwa was first imprisoned, and afterwards crucified, by the emperor's order, because he would not renounce Islamism; as also, that he reproached his master for acting the part of a hypocrite, in order to keep on his head the crown that he wore <sup>r</sup>. as also Farwa Ebn Omar.

IN the month of Ramadân, this year, the prophet sent Ali Ebn Abu Tâleb into Yaman, to bring over to Islamism the infidels that still remained there; which, partly by methods of persuasion, and partly by those of compulsion, he at last in a great measure effected. For he converted the whole tribe of Hambdân, as it is said, in one day; and their example according to Abu'lfeda, was quickly followed by all the inhabitants of that province, except only some of those of Najrân, who, being Christians, chose rather to pay tribute. It must be observed here, that Mr. Sale deviates from truth, when he intimates, that all the citizens of Najrân paid tribute, and consequently were Christians, at this juncture; since the con- Islamism makes a farther progress in Arabia.

<sup>m</sup> AL JANNAB. ubi sup. p. 273—276. GAGN. la vie de Mahom. tom. ii. p. 247, 248. <sup>n</sup> AL JANNAB. ubi sup. p. 276. AL ASSAMAI. <sup>o</sup> AL JANNAB. ubi sup. <sup>p</sup> AL BOKHAR. in lib. Al Sahih, AL MASUD. apud Ism. Abu'lfed. ubi sup. c. lxvii. p. 146, 147. ut & ipse ABU'LFED. ibid. MOSLEM, in alt. lib. Al Sahih, AL KOR. MOHAM. f. cviii. AL BEIDAWI, JALLALO'DDIN, AL JANNAB. ubi sup. p. 277. <sup>q</sup> AL JANNAB. ubi sup. <sup>r</sup> Idem ibid.

trary (M) is not only asserted by Al Jannâbi, but even by Abu'lfeda himself, the author cited, <sup>a</sup> in support of his notion, by that writer, on this occasion. However, that the greatest part of the people of Najrân, at this juncture, professed the Christian faith, seems most clearly to appear from Barhebræus, a Syriac author cited by Assemanus, who informs us, that Said, the prince of Najrân, was a Christian of the Jacobite sect; and that this prince, with Jesujab the Jacobite bishop of Arzun, waited upon Mohammed, and concluded a treaty of alliance with him. The principal articles of which treaty were, that Mohammed should take the Christians of Najrân, and their prince, under his protection; that they should not be forced to go to war against their inclination; that they should be allowed the free exercise of their religion; that all their monks and ecclesiastics should be exempted from tribute; that, amongst the laity, every one of the richer sort should pay twelve pieces of money annually, and <sup>b</sup> the others four only, by way of tribute; that they should be permitted to build and repair churches, and even be assisted in such work by the other Arabs; and that, lastly, the poorer sort of them should be employed as servants in the houses of those Arabs who professed another religion. To which the Syriac author adds, that Said made the prophet magnificent presents on this occasion <sup>c</sup>.

Badhân the Persian dies.

ALI, having acquitted himself on all his commissions to his master's intire satisfaction, was received by him with marks of great affection, upon his arrival at Mecca; whither the prophet was come, in order to perform the pilgrimage of valediction. Towards the end of the month Shawâl, died Badhân, the Persian, who was first viceroy of Yaman for Khostrû, and afterwards for Mohammed; who, having received the news of his death, divided the govern- <sup>a</sup>ment of Yaman between Shahr, the son of Badhân, and six of his own companions; assigning to every one of the latter a particular district in that province <sup>d</sup>.

Mohammed
sets out for Mecca, to perform the pilgrimage of valediction.

THE prophet, having washed and anointed himself, set out from Medina on Saturday the twenty-fifth of the month Dhu'lkaada for Mecca, where he now intended to perform the pilgrimage of valediction. He was attended, on this occasion, by 90,000 men, or, as some say, 114,000, or, as others will have it, a still greater number. Nor is this to be wondered at, when it is considered, that the people came in vast crouds from all parts of Arabia, of which he now was absolute master, to accompany him in this peregrination; especially as he had before commanded it to be proclaimed in the most public manner. He took all his wives, inclosed in their pavilions on the backs of camels, with him; together <sup>d</sup> with an infinite number of camels, intended for victims, that were crowned with garlands. He lay at Dhu'lholeifa the first night, where he said the vespers, or evening-prayers, with two inclinations. From this place, the next day, he advanced to the plain of Baida; where he again, with great solemnity, proclaimed, according to a tradition derived from Ayesha, the pilgrimage of valediction, but not any visitation, as we find asserted by Abu'lfeda. A visitation differs from a pilgrimage in this, that the former is not attended with such a train of ceremonies as the latter. Besides, a visitation may be performed at any time of the year; whereas a pilgrimage is absolutely confined to the month of Dhu'lhajja, as the very name of that month itself seems sufficiently to imply <sup>e</sup>.

As to the rites and ceremonies observed by the prophet in this famous pilgrimage, which <sup>e</sup> served for a model to the Moslems of all succeeding ages, Jâber Ebn Abd'allah has handed down to us an exact description of them, such as he found in the Sonna, or collection of moral traditions of the sayings and actions of the prophet. But before we speak of this pilgrimage, or, which is the same thing, of the time and manner of performing that which answers to it at this day amongst the Mohammedans; it will be proper to give a short account here, once for all, of the temple of Mecca, the chief scene of the Mohammedan worship; in which we shall be the less prolix, as the form and antiquity of that edifice has been already touched upon <sup>f</sup>.

Description of the temple of Mecca.

THE city of Mecca is situated in a valley, surrounded by mountains, from whence the stone of which it is built was taken. It is twice as big as Medina, and about ten days <sup>f</sup> journey south of that city. The temple stands in the midst of the town, and is honoured with the title of Masjad Al Harâm, i. e. the sacred or inviolable temple. What is principally

<sup>a</sup> ISM. ABU'LFED. ubi sup. c. lix. p. 129. AL JANNAB. ubi sup. p. 275. SALE's prelim. discours. p. 56. JOSEPH. SIMON. ASSEMAN. bibliothec. Oriental. &c. tom. ii. p. 418. Romæ, 1721. <sup>b</sup> ISM. ABU'LFED. ubi sup. p. 129. AL JANNAB. ubi sup. p. 248. <sup>c</sup> ABU'LFED. ubi sup. c. lx. p. 129, 130. AL SHAHRESTAN. apud Pococ. in not. ad spec. hist. Arab. ut & ipse Pocock. ibid. EBN ABBAS, AL JUZI, in lib. de peregrinat. Meccan. c. 121. AL JANNAB. ubi sup. p. 279. AL BEIHAKI, AL BOKHAR de peregrinat. valedict. <sup>d</sup> MOSLEM, ex trad. Jâber Ebn Abd'allah, in lib. dict. Al Sahib. Vide etiam GAGN. not. ad Abu'lfed. ubi sup. p. 130.

(M) This may be certainly inferred from the text of Abu'lfeda, cited by Mr. Sale on this occasion; who there informs us, that Ali received both alms and tribute from the people of Najrân; which manifestly implies, that some of them were Moslems, and others Christians. For alms were only collected among the Mohammedans, by the prophet's order, and tribute paid only by those who professed a different religion (36).

(36) Abu'lfed. ubi sup. p. 129.

- a revered in this place, and gives sanctity to the whole, is a square stone-building, called the Caaba, as some fancy, from its height, which surpasses that of the other buildings in Mecca, but more probably from its quadrangular form, and Beit Allah, i. e. the house of God, being peculiarly hallowed and set apart for his worship. This seems to have been erected by some of the patriarchs descended from Ishmael, and was held in the highest veneration by the Arabs of succeeding ages, even long before the birth of Mohammed. It was probably at first only a house, or habitation, made use of by the founder, which, in after-ages, attracted the regard of the people of Mecca, either on account of its antiquity, or the person who built it, and at last came to be considered as a building appropriated to the service of the pagan Arab divinities. For, that it was not originally a temple, seems to appear from
- b hence, that the door was not placed in the middle of the structure; and that, for many ages, there was no divine worship performed in it, tho' the pagan Arabs frequently went in procession round it. So the tent, or pavilion, Jacob lived in remained at Edeffa, according to Syncellus, till the time of Elagabalus; and the house that first belonged to Cadmus, was afterwards converted into the temple of Ceres, as we find asserted by Pausanias. The length of the Caaba, from north to south, is twenty-four cubits, its breadth, from east to west, twenty-three cubits, and its height twenty-seven cubits. The door, which is on the east-side, stands about four cubits from the ground; the floor being level with the bottom of the door. In the corner next this door is the black stone, so celebrated amongst the Mohammedans. On the north-side of the Caaba, within a semicircular inclosure fifty cubits
- c long, lies the white stone, said to be the sepulchre of Ishmael, which receives the rain-water that falls off the Caaba by a spout, formerly of wood, but now of gold. The black stone, if we will believe the Mohammedans, was brought down from heaven by Gabriel, at the creation of the world, and originally of a white colour, but contracted the blackness that now appears on it, from the guilt of those sins committed by the sons of men. They also relate, that, at the time of the deluge, it was taken up into heaven again, and carried from thence a second time by Gabriel, when Abraham built the Caaba. The double roof of the Caaba is supported within by three octangular pillars of aloes wood; between which, on a bar of iron, hang some silver lamps. The out-side is covered with rich black damask, adorned with an embroidered band of gold, which is changed every year, and was formerly
- d sent by the Khalifs, afterwards by the Sultans of Egypt, and is now provided by the Turkish emperors. At a small distance from the Caaba, on the east-side, is the station, or place, of Abraham, where is another stone much respected by the Mohammedans, where they pretend to shew his footsteps, telling us he stood on it, when he built the Caaba. For which reason, it is at this day called by the pilgrims, who visit the temple we are describing, the stone in Abraham's place *.

WE are next to observe, that the Caaba, at some distance, is surrounded, but not intirely, by a circular inclosure of pillars, joined towards the bottom by a low balustrade, and towards the top by bars of silver. Just without this inner inclosure, on the south, north, and west sides of the Caaba, are three buildings, which are the oratories or places where

e three of the orthodox sects assemble to perform their devotions; the fourth sect, viz. that of Al Shâfeï, making use of the station of Abraham for that purpose. Towards the south-east stands the edifice which covers the well Zemzem, the treasury, and the cupola of Al Abbâs. To which we may add, that, in the time of Sharîf Al Edrisi, there was another cupola, that went then amongst the Arabs by the name of the hemicycle, or cupola of Judæa; but whether or no any remains of that are now to be seen, we have not been informed by any modern traveller. Nor is any information in this particular easy to be obtained, all Christians being denied access to the pretended holy place we are here endeavouring to give our readers some idea of *.

THE square colonade, or great piazza, that, at a considerable distance, incloses the f magnificent buildings above-mentioned, consists, according to Al Jannâbi, of 448 pillars, and has no less than thirty-eight gates. Mr. Sale compares this piazza to that of the Royal Exchange, but allows it to be much larger. It is covered with small domes, or cupolas, from the four corners whereof rise as many minârets, or steeples, with double galleries, and adorned with gilded spires and crescents, after the Turkish manner, as are also the cupolas which cover the piazza and the other buildings. Between the columns of both inclosures hang a great number of lamps, which are constantly lighted at night. The first foundations of this outward inclosure were laid by Omar, the second Khalif, who built no more than a low wall, to prevent the court of the Caaba, which before lay open, from being a incroached on by private buildings. This court is in a peculiar manner stiled Al Masjid Al Harâm; which appellation, as has been already observed, is also frequently applied to the whole structure of the Caaba. The edifice here described made no very splendid appearance in the time of Mohammed, nor even in the reigns of his two immediate successors Abu Becr and Omar. But the structure has been since raised, by the liberality of many succeeding princes, and great men, to its present lustre. However, the form of the whole has undergone no very material alteration since the year of the Hejra 74<sup>z</sup>.

* GOLI notæ ad Alfragan. p. 98, 99. PITTS's account of the religion and manners of the Mohammedans, p. 96. AHMED EN YUSEF, SHARIF AL EDRI, KITAB MASALEC apud Pocock. not. in spec. hist. Arab. p. 125, &c. SYNCEL. chronic. p. 107. PAUSAN. lib. ix. 16. RELAND. de relig. Moham. p. 118, 119, 120. AL ZAMAKHSHAR. in Al KOR. MOHAM. sur. ii, ABULFED. ubi sup. p. 13, 14. SAFIO'DDIN, Pocock. not. in spec. hist. Arab. p. 118—128. * SHARIF AL EDRI apud Pocock um, ubi sup. p. 126. ut et ipse Poc. ibid. PITTS's account of the religion and manners of the Mohammedans, pass.

It must likewise be farther observed, that the whole territory of Mecca, as well as the Caaba and the city, is frequently dignified with the title of Al Masjid Al Harâm, and surrounded by a third inclosure, distinguished at certain distances by small turrets, some five, b some seven, and others ten miles distant from the city. Some think, that the most sacred part of the city, including the site of the Caaba, and a spot of ground contiguous to it, was called by the Arabs Becca, from remote antiquity; and that this name was never communicated to the other parts of the town; but others, and even with no small appearance of truth, are of a different opinion. Within the compass of ground surrounded by the third inclosure, it is not lawful to attack an enemy, or even to hunt or fowl, or cut a branch from a tree; which, says Mr. Sale, is the reason why the pigeons of Mecca are reckoned sacred. But we are, with Al Mogholtai, rather inclined to believe, that these pigeons are looked upon to be sacred, because they are supposed to be of the breed of those which laid c their eggs at the mouth of the cave where the prophet and Abu Becr hid themselves, when they fled from that city; especially, as those animals were believed to have not a little contributed to Mohammed's wonderful escape at that time, when he was so closely pursued by the Koreish. After what has been said, it cannot appear strange, that Euthymius Zigabenus should give the name of Mecca to the Caaba; since both that place and the town, in his time, were considered as sacred by the Mohammedans<sup>a</sup>.

As it has been already remarked, that the temple of Mecca was a place of worship, or, at least, held in singular veneration by the Arabs, many centuries before Mohammed, we shall say but little of its high antiquity in this place. However, we must not omit observing, that the Mohammedans take the Caaba to be almost coeval with the world. For they pretend, that Adam, after his expulsion from paradise, begged of God that he might erect d a building like that he had seen there, called Beit Al Mâmûr, or the frequented house, and Al Dorâb, or the remote house, towards which he might direct his prayers, and which he might compass, as the angels do the celestial one. Whereupon God let down a representation of that house in curtains of light, and set it in Mecca, perpendicularly under its original, ordering the patriarch to turn towards it when he prayed, and to compass it by way of devotion. After Adam's death, say these persons, his son Seth built a house in the same form, of stones and clay, which being destroyed by the deluge, was rebuilt by Abraham and Ishmael, at God's command, in the place where the former had stood, and after the same model, they being directed therein by revelation. Abu Horeira pretends, that this model, e or, which is the same thing, the celestial building from whence it was taken, was a thousand years older than Adam; and that the angels began to compass that heavenly edifice the same number of years before the creation of the world. Mr. Gagnier, and after him
 Mr. Sale, is pleased to affirm, that the primitive Christian church held a parallel opinion as to the situation of the celestial Jerusalem, with respect to the terrestrial; which he infers from a passage in the apocryphal book of the revelations of St. Peter. But sure nothing can be more illogical or unjust, than to impute the crude and absurd notions of a single impostor, for the author of that book deserves no better an appellation, of whatever antiquity he may be, to the whole primitive Christian church. What could induce these gentlemen to publish such an unfair insinuation as this, is, perhaps, not so easy to say: For, f probably, they thought it would be doing an honour to the Christian faith to put it on a level with Mohammedism, which they seem to have so much admired above any other religion; and, therefore, cannot justly be suspected of having had any thing of this kind in view. But by whatever motive they were influenced on this occasion, they are not the only writers whom some will believe to have attempted wounding Christianity through the sides of its unworthy professors; an author now alive, and supported by some great men, having apparently done the same thing<sup>b</sup>.

<sup>z</sup> Poc. ubi sup. p. 116. SALE. ubi sup. p. 115. GOLII notæ ad Alfragan. p. 99. <sup>a</sup> GOLIIUS, ubi sup. SALE, ubi sup. p. 116. AL MOGHOLTAI in vit. Moham. AL JANNAB. AL BEIDAWI, in Al Kor.
 f. ix. D'HERBEL. bibl. Orient. p. 445. EUTHYMIUS ZIGABENUS, in panoplia dogmatic. inter Sylburgii Saracenic. Vide etiam biblioth. vet. patr. tom. xix. Lugduni, 1677. & POCCOCK. not. in spec. hist. Arab. p. 116.
<sup>b</sup> AL SHAHRESTANI, AHMED EBN YUSEF, ubi sup. ABU HOREIRA, AL FIRAUZABAD. in Kâin. AL ZAMAHK-
 SHAR. ubi sup. Al Kor. MOHAM. f. ii. AL JUZI, ex tradit. Ebn Abbâs. GAGN. not. ad Abu'lfed. ubi sup. p.
 37, 38. JOAN. ALBERT. FABRIC. præfat. ad cod. apocr. Nov. Testament. Hamburgi, 1703. SALE, ubi sup.

a We have already taken notice, that the Koreish rebuilt the Caaba, after the birth of Mohammed; that it was afterwards repaired by Abd'allah Ebn Zobeir, the Khalif of Meccâ; and that Yusef, surnamed Al Hejâj, in the seventy-fourth year of the Hejra, put it in the form wherein it now remains. To which we shall beg leave to add, that, some years after, either the Khalif Harûn Al Rashîd, or his father Al Mokdi, or else his grandfather Al Mansûr, intended to change what had been altered by Al Hejâj, and to reduce the building to the old form in which it was left by Abd'allah; but was dissuaded from meddling with it by one Mâlec, lest so holy a place should become the sport of princes, and being new-modelled after every one's fancy, should lose that reverence which was justly paid to it. Some of the Orientals believe, that this temple was at first consecrated to Zohal, or Saturn; as the b ancient Arabs and Indians, between which two nations was a great conformity of religions, had seven celebrated temples, dedicated to the seven planets. One of these, called Beit Ghomdân, was built in Sanaa, the metropolis of Yamen, by Debac, to the honour of Al Zoharah, or the planet Venus, and was demolished by the Khalif Othmân; by whose murder was fulfilled the prophetic inscription, set, as is reported, over this temple, viz. Ghomdân, he who destroyeth thee, shall be slain. But, notwithstanding the antiquity and holiness of this building, the Mohammedans have a prophecy, that, in the last times, the Ethiopians shall utterly demolish it; after which it will not be rebuilt again for ever. It will not displease our curious readers to be informed, that Mr. Reland received an exact plan of the Caaba, or temple of Meccâ, from the learned Michael Enemannus, professor at Upsal, who c lived some years in Egypt and Arabia, after his return from the East; which was taken by a Turk upon the spot, and has been preserved by a plate inserted in the excellent treatise Mr. Reland has written upon the Mohammedan religion.

BEFORE we dismiss the present subject, it may not be amiss to take farther notice of some few particulars, that have hitherto been but slightly touched upon. First, then, the celebrated black stone is set in silver, and fixed in the south-east corner of the Caaba, looking towards Basra, about two cubits and one-third, or seven spans, from the ground. The pilgrims kiss this stone with great devotion, and some of them even call it the right hand of God. The Moslems pretend, that it was originally one of the precious stones of paradise, and fell down to the earth with Adam. This stone is said to have grown black by the touch d of a menstruous woman, or, as others tell us, by the sins of mankind, but probably by the kisses and touches of so many people; the superficies being only black. After the Karmatians had taken Mecca, they carried away this stone, and could not be prevailed on by the Meccans to restore it for 5,000 dinars. However, after two-and-twenty years detention of it, finding they could not thereby withdraw the pilgrims from Mecca, they sent it back of their own accord. According to Euthymius Zigabenus, there appears the figure of a human head cut in it, which some take to be the head of Venus; but this is not supported by any good Arab author. Notwithstanding the respect this stone meets with from the Mohammedans, it was probably worshipped by idolaters in the earlier ages. The tradition, that asserts it to have been blackened by the sins of men, is supposed to have been derived originally from the e prophet himself; and this notion is the most generally received amongst his followers. 2. The stone in Abraham's place above-mentioned, on which the Moslems believe that patriarch stood, whilst the wife of his son Ishmael washed his head, was inclosed in an iron chest, and had a cavity in it, in the time of Ahmed Ebn Yusef; who tells us, that he drank some of the water of the well Zemzem out of it, and not out of the iron chest, as Mr. Sale has wrongly affirmed. Some of the Moslems, according to Euthymius Zigabenus, formerly believed, that Abraham lay with Hagar on this stone, and esteem'd it highly on that account. Mohammed enjoined his followers to pray before it, in the second chapter of the Korân. Ahmed Ebn Yusef, who saw it, relates, that one of Abraham's footsteps, still visible in this stone, was much deeper than the other. But for a farther account of it, we must beg leave f to refer our curious readers to Safioddin, Al Zamakhshari, Ahmed Ebn Yusef, and other Arab authors. 3. The well Zemzem is on the east side of the Caaba, and covered with a small building and cupola. Many strange things are related of the water of this well, which we have formerly taken notice of. It will, therefore, be sufficient to observe at present, that, according to a tradition, derived ultimately from Mohammed, but immediately from the Khalif Omar, the water of this celebrated well is medicinal, and, drank moderately, will cure many bodily distempers. The same tradition adds, that, if it be taken copiously, it will heal all spiritual disorders, and procure an absolute remission of sins. No wonder then, that it should not only be drank with such particular devotion by the pilgrims, but also sent in bottles, as a great rarity, to most parts of the Mohammedan dominions. We must not forget to acquaint our readers, that the stone in Abraham's place, out of which, as is intimated by Abmed Ebn Yusef, the water of Zemzem is sometimes drank, was hid by the officers of the temple in one of the mountains near Mecca, to prevent its being carried away with the black stone by the Karmatians. 4. The white stone, or sepulchre of Ishmael, has been taken particular notice of by Sbarif Al Edrisi; from whence we may conclude, that it has continued many ages in its present situation; and that it was probably held in considerable repute even amongst the pagan Arabs, many of whom acknowledged Ishmael to have been their great progenitor. Be that as it will, this stone, on account of its antiquity, merits the attention of the curious, and has therefore been mentioned, in the description of the Caaba, by the most celebrated modern writers <sup>a</sup>.

* ARU'LFED. ubi sup. p. 13. & in hist. gen. AL JANNAB. AHMED EBN YUSEF. Poc. not. in spec. hist. Arab. p. 115, 116, &c. AL SHAHRESTAN. HADR. RELAND. de relig. Moham. p. 120. Trajecti ad Rhenum, 1717.

Mohammed
performs the ceremonies of the pilgrimage.

BUT, after so necessary a digression, to return to our history—When the prophet arrived at Mecca, his men having occupied the same posts, he entered the city in the same manner as when he first took possession of it. Descending from the heights on the side of Cada, he advanced to the mountain Al Hajun, and went directly from thence to the Caaba, about day-break, on the fourth day of the month of Dbu'lhajja. Here he kissed, with great devotion, the corner of the black stone; after which, he made seven circuits round the Caaba, the three first in a light nimble manner, and the four last with a graver pace. Then he approached the place, or station, of Abraham, and returned from thence to the black stone, which he kissed a second time. After which, he went out of the city by the gate of the Banu Mahdom, ascended the hill Al Safâ, from the top of which he took a view of the Caaba, and turning towards the Kebla, pronounced the profession of the unity of the Divine Nature, contained in the following words: God is great: There is no God but God: He has no companion: He is the only supreme Governor: He only ought to be praised: He is powerful above all things: There is no God but God: He has no companion: He only is strong: He has succoured his servant; and he alone has put to flight legions of his enemies. From thence he went to Al Merwâ, and ran seven times between that mountain and the other of Al Safâ, walking gravely to the place between two pillars, where he began to run, and afterwards walked again. He performed this ceremony, sometimes looking back, and sometimes stopping, like one who has lost something, to represent Hagar seeking water for her son. From whence 'tis plain, that the Moslems look upon this ceremony to be coeval with Hagar, and consequently believe, that it was observed by the ancient Arabs many centuries before the birth of Mohammed <sup>c</sup>.

FROM the mountains Al Safâ and Al Merwâ the prophet passed to mount Arafat, a little before sun-set, where he made an harangue to the people, standing, and instructed them in the rites and ceremonies of the pilgrimage, which continued till sun-set. Then he went to Mozdalifa, an oratory between Arafat and Mina, where he repeated the evening prayers, and gave the pilgrims an exhortation, or short moral discourse, with two assurances. Then he laid himself down on the ground, and slept till morning, when he said the prayer used by the Mohammedans before sun-rise. After this, he posted himself in the middle of the Caaba, and prayed standing till the sun was upon the point of making his appearance. Then he hastened by the valley of Mohaffer to that of Mina, where he threw seven stones at three marks, or pillars, in imitation of Abraham, who meeting with the devil in that place, and being by him disturbed in his devotions, or tempted to disobedience, when he was going to sacrifice his son, was commanded by God to drive him away, by throwing stones at him; tho' others pretend this rite to be as old as Adam, who also put the devil to flight in the same place, and by the same means. Every time the prophet cast a stone at Satan, he repeated the formula ALLAH ACBAR, &c. God is great, &c. and then went to the place in the valley of Mina, where the pilgrims at this day slay the victims, and give the remains of them, after they with their friends have fed upon them, to the poor. It is observable, that the pilgrims at present, in imitation of Mohammed, on the ninth of Dbu'l-hajja, after morning prayer, leave the valley of Mina, whither they come the day before, and proceed in a tumultuous and rushing manner to mount Arafat, where they stay to perform their devotions till sun-set, and from thence go to Mozdalifa, spending there the night in prayer and reading the Korân; from whence the next morning, by day-break, they visit Al Mesher Al Harâm, or the sacred monument, and pass by Batn Mohaffer before sun-rise to the valley of Mina, where they perform the same operation with the stones the prophet did. It must also be remarked, that these pilgrims, the sacrifices being over, shave their heads, and cut their nails, burying them in the same place: after which, they look upon the pilgrimage as completed; tho' they again visit the Caaba, to take their leave of that a sacred place. In all which particulars they follow the example of their prophet, who did the same on the present occasion <sup>f</sup>.

<sup>a</sup> AL JANNAB. AHMED EBN YUSEF, ubi sup. Poc. ubi sup. p. 115, 116, 117, 118. AL GHAZAL. SHAHABODDIN, SAFIODDIN, AL ZAMAKHSHAR. ubi sup. EUTHYM. ZIGABEN. apud Pocockium, ubi sup. p. 120. ut & ipse Poc. ibid. D'HERBEL. biblioth. Orient. p. 927, 928. SHARIF AL EDRISI, SALE, ubi sup. p. 118. <sup>c</sup> ABU'LFED. ubi sup. p. 131. AL JANNAB. ubi sup. p. 280, 281. EBN AL ATHIR, AL GHAZAL. Vide etiam ALBERT. BOBOV. ubi sup. Poc. not. in spec. hist. Arab. p. 314.

WHEN Mohammed came to the place where the victims were to be slain, he made a speech to the people, pointing out to them therein the rites and ceremonies of the immolation. At this juncture it was, that the following passage of the Korân, according to the pretended prophet, descended from heaven: "On this day, wo unto those who have apostatized from their religion; therefore fear not them, but fear me. This day have I perfected your religion for you, and have completed my mercy upon you; and I have chosen for you ISLAM, to be your religion." Which words being heard by Abu Becr, if we may depend upon Al Jannâbi, he burst out into tears, as he understood from them how far he

b was from being arrived at a state of perfection. However, he comforted himself with this pleasing reflection, that the prophet was his friend, and that he would not fail making perpetual intercession for him <sup>g</sup>.

WE are likewise told by the same historian, that the descent of this famous passage was attended, or rather followed, by a most illustrious miracle. The camel Al Kafwâ, on which the prophet rode, says he, hearing these celestial words, fell down on her knees, through the power of the divine revelation, and out of the profound reverence she had for the Korân. Nay, this most stanch Moslem assures us, that the very spot, on which this miraculous fit of devotion happened to the camel, after it had lain hid for many ages, was at last discovered, and that by a miracle too, in the year of the Hejra 964, or of CHRIST 1557, in the following manner: Al Wâled, the great Kâdî of Mecca, celebrating there the pilgrimage, or grand festival, that year, was extremely desirous of seeing the place where the prophet's camel fell down on her knees, when the famous passage in the beginning of the fifth chapter of the Korân was revealed. In order, therefore, to discover this, he rid on his camel over every part of the town, and was at last met by one Sheikh Houssein, a most pious and devout person, favoured with frequent revelations, who told him, that the apostle of God had appeared to him the preceding night, and assured him, that the place he then stood on was the very spot of ground he sought after. Upon which, adds this writer, Al Wâled's camel at that instant fell down on her knees, opposite to the building then called the house of Adam; which fresh miracle put the Sheikh's veracity in the point before us d beyond all manner of doubt. Upon which extraordinary relation we have at present no other reflection to make, than that Mr. Gagnier POSITIVELY AFFIRMS, that our author, as indeed appears from the relation, was an eye-witness of this most surprising event; which, as it seems to imply his assent to the whole story, will doubtless add great weight to the authority of Al Jannâbi, and even absolutely evince the reality of these and all the other illustrious miracles handed down to us by that historian <sup>h</sup>.

BEFORE the conclusion of the preceding solemnity, Ali returned from Yaman, where he had been upon some particular business, and desired to be permitted to partake of it, and to celebrate the praises of God, in the same manner that the prophet and his other companions had done; which, as he appeared in his sacred garment, or pilgrim's habit, as e Mohammed himself and all his followers at that time did, was immediately granted him. Then the prophet slew with his own hands sixty-three camels, which answered to the years of his age, he being then sixty-three years old, and sacrificed them in the valley of Mina. Thirty-seven more he gave to Ali for immolation, that he might complete the number of victims to an hundred. Part of these the prophet brought with him from Medina, and the other part Ali procured in Yaman. Afterwards Mohammed shaved his head, and threw the hair on a tree or shrub called Talba, that the wind might blow it amongst the people. Most of the fore-locks were seized by Khâled Ebn Walid, who tied them to a turban that he wore in all his future wars; and hence it came to pass, says a Moslem author, that this general was so powerfully assisted in every future engagement, or, in other words, that he was so constantly victorious. What a pity it is, that Mr. Gagnier has not supported the authority of f this writer, as he seems to have done before that of Al Jannâbi, either by explicitly, or at least implicitly, signifying his assent to what he has been pleased to advance on this occasion <sup>i</sup>!

AFTER the prophet had taken his repast, in company with Ali only, he remounted his camel, and went directly to the Caaba. Then he said the prayer used after the sun begins to decline from the meridian, took several large draughts of Zemzem water, compassed the temple seven times, and ran as before between Al Safâ and Al Merwâ. On the ninth day of the festival, he performed his devotion on mount Arafat, about a mile from Mecca, a place held in high veneration by the Moslems. For they say, that when Adam and Eve were cast down from paradise, Adam fell on the isle of Ceylon, or Serendib, and Eve near Jeddah, the port of Mecca, in Arabia; and that after a separation of 200 years, Adam was, on his repentance, conducted by the angel Gabriel to a mountain near Mecca, where he found and knew his wife, the mountain being thence named Arafat. To which they add, that he afterwards retired with her to Ceylon, where they continued to propagate their species. This mountain, the Moslems pretend, has always been more immediately dedicated to the service of ALMIGHTY GOD; and here, according to Al Jannabi, the prophet acquitted himself of his duty with great humility on the present occasion, imploring the divine clemency, and begging pardon, with great fervor, both for his own sins, and those of all his followers. With this penitential act, and the reformation of the Arab kalendar, of which we shall here beg leave to subjoin a short account, he concluded the pilgrimage of valediction<sup>k</sup>.

<sup>f</sup> Iidem ibid. Al Kor. MOHAM. f. ii. AHMED EBN YUSEF, HADR. RELAND. de relig. Moham. p. 113—121. PITTs's account of the religion of the Mohammedans, p. 92, &c. CHARD. voy. de Perse, p. 35. <sup>g</sup> ABU'LFED. & AL JANNAB. ubi sup. Al Kor. MOHAM. f. v. v. 4. <sup>h</sup> AL JANNAB. ubi sup. GAGN. la vie de Mahom. tom. ii. p. 263. <sup>i</sup> AL DAMIR. in lib. dict. vit. animal. AL JANNAB. ubi sup. p. 283. ABU'LFED. ubi sup. p. 131, 132. JALLALO'DDIN, AL SHAFI, GAGN. ubi sup. p. 285.

Mohammed reforms the Arab kalendar;

It has been already observed, that the pagan Arabs esteemed four months in the year as sacred, during which they held it unlawful to wage war, and therefore ceased then from all incursions, and other hostilities. However, in process of time, some of them being weary of sitting quiet at home, transferred the observance of a sacred month, when it suited their conveniency, to the succeeding profane month. Thus, for example, they put off the observance of the month Al Mobarram to the following month Safar, which, in that case, was looked upon to be sacred. This translation, or transferring, of the observance of a sacred month to a profane one, is imported by the Arabic word Al Nasî, and was absolutely condemned, as an impious innovation, first introduced by Janâda Ebn Awf, of the tribe of Kenâna, in a passage of the Korân; as was also the intercalation of a month every third or second year, which the Arabs had learned of the Jews, in order to reduce their lunar to solar years. For, by this means, they fixed, contrary to the original institution, the time of the pilgrimage, and of the fast of Ramadân, which ought to be ambulatory, to a certain season of the year. These ordinances, relating to the months, were promulgated by Mohammed himself at the pilgrimage of valediction, so called either because the prophet, after this, never saw Mecca, or because, in the last sermon he preached to the people, he took his leave of them in a formal manner. The last of these opinions has been maintained by Al Jâzi, in which he is followed by Mr. Gagnier; and the first, with a great appearance of truth, if we may be allowed the liberty of judging, by the famous Ismael Abul feda<sup>l</sup>.

Thus we have given our readers a particular, tho' at the same time, considering the variety of circumstances attending it, a very concise account of the last pilgrimage performed by Mohammed, stiled by the principal Arab writers, who have mentioned it, the pilgrimage of valediction. Nor can this, we persuade ourselves, be deemed too prolix, if it be considered, that the famous event therein related, was by the prophet intended to serve as a model, for the celebration of this great solemnity, to the Moslems of all succeeding ages. So that the preceding account, at the same time that it exhibits to us a very curious piece of Arabic history, contains an exact description of all the principal rites and ceremonies observed by the Mohammedans at this day, who perform the pilgrimage to Mecca. Nor could we, without such a description, sufficiently understand several passages in the history of the Khalifs, as well as that of Mohammed, and other Moslem princes, that will hereafter occur to us, and allude to the celebration of the festival here described. But to wave every thing else that might be offered by way of apology, it would certainly have been unpardonable, in such a work as this, to have only just touched upon so grand an institution; the Mohammedans holding the pilgrimage to Mecca to be so necessary a point of practice, that, according to a tradition of their prophet, received amongst them, he who dies without performing it, may as well die a Jew or a Christian; and it being likewise expressly commanded in the Korân. To the Caaba, therefore, every Moslem, who has health and means sufficient, ought once, at least, in his life to go on pilgrimage, and put on the Ibrâm, or sacred habit; nor are even the women themselves excused from the performance of so necessary a duty. As to the rest, those who desire to be thoroughly acquainted with the nature and manner of this peregrination, may consult Albertus Bobovius, and our countryman Pitts, who, in every thing, even the minutest particular relating to it, will give them full and ample satisfaction<sup>m</sup>.

and sends an embassy to the Al Nakhaïtes.

THE following year, being the eleventh year of the Hejra, a numerous embassy was sent by the Al Nakhaïtes, a tribe of Arabs settled in Yaman, to Mohammed, which arrived at

<sup>k</sup> AL JANNAB. ubi sup. Vide etiam ALBERT. BOBOV. ubi sup. D'HEREEL. biblioth. Orient. p. 55 AHMED EBN YAHYA, MONCONY's voyage, par. i. p. 372, &c. KNOX's account of Ceylon. Anciennes relations des Indes, &c. p. 3. AL HASAN. GAGN ubi sup. p. 266, 267. <sup>l</sup> AL KAZWINI, apud Golium in not. ad Alfragan. p. 4, &c. ut & ipse GOL. ibid. AL SHAHRESTANI apud Pocockium in not. ad spec. hist. Arab. p. 311, ut & ipse POCOCK. ibid. EBN AL ATHIR, AL JAWHAR. in Al Saba, AL DAMIR, ubi sup. AL FIRAUZABADI, AL KOR. MOHAM. f. ix. ABU'LFED. ubi sup. p. 132. AL JUZI de ritib. peregrinat. Meccan. AL BEIDAWI, JALLALO'DDIN. ABU ABD'ALLAH MOHAM. EBN AHMED, in lib. dict. Odorat. Flor. Poc. not. in hist. spec. Arab. p. 177, 323, &c. <sup>m</sup> AFLERTUS BOBOVIUS & PITTS, ubi sup. AL KOR. MOHAM. f. iii. AL BEIDAWI.

- a Medina, where he then was, about the middle of the month of Al Moharram. The persons that composed this embassy, to the number of an hundred, had before been initiated in the rites and mysteries of Islamism; and had likewise taken the oath of allegiance to the prophet, which was administered to them by Moadb Ebn Jabal. They met, therefore, with a very gracious reception from Mohammed; who, on the 25th of the month Safar, nominated Osama, the son of Zeid, who was killed in the battle of Mûta, a youth of about twenty years of age, to command a body of troops in an expedition, projected by the prophet, to revenge his father's death. Osama having assembled his forces, consisting intirely of Mohâjerin and Ansârs, and received the standard from the prophet himself, set out from Medina the 28th, attended by Abu Becr, Omar, and Saad Ebn Abu Wakkâs, who were all appointed
- b to command under him. The first day he only advanced to Jorf, a place about a parasang distant from Medina, where he incamped the following night<sup>n</sup>.

In the mean time the prophet, who had been attacked the day before, being the 27th of Mohammed Safar, by a violent pain in the head, attended by a fever that afterwards brought a delirium<sup>faul sick</sup> upon him, in the apartment of Zeinab Bint Jabesh, one of his beloved wives, found himself something better before the departure of the army. But soon after, his disorder was heightened by the advice he received of the revolt of two famous impostors, who had commenced prophets in the provinces of Al Yamâma and Najrân. These two competitors in the prophetic office were Moseilama and Al Aswad, whom the Mohammedans usually call the two lyars. The first of these was of the tribe of Honcifa, who inhabited the province of Yamâma, and a principal man amongst them. He had headed an embassy sent by his tribe to Mohammed, in the ninth year of the Hejra, and then professed himself a Moslem. But being desirous of raising himself to a greater degree of power, the next year he set up for a prophet. As he survived Mohammed, and even grew formidable after his death, we shall give a farther account of him in our history of the Khalifat of Abu Becr, to which place such an account more properly belongs<sup>o</sup>.

- AL ASWAD EBN CAAB, the other impostor, whose name was Aibala, was of the tribe of Al Aswad, Aws, and governed that and the other tribes of Arabs descended from Madhaj, the prince of Sofâr, a city of Yaman. This man was likewise an apostate from Mohammedism, and began to act the part of a prophet the very year that Mohammed died. He had acquired great power and authority over all the Arab tribes settled in Yaman. Abu'lfeda relates, that he was surnamed Dhu'lbemâr, or the master of the afs, because he used frequently to say, The master of the afs is coming unto me; and gave out, that he received his revelations from two angels, named Sobaik and Sboraik. The first of these, as he pretended, sold him an afs, that he had taught to play all manner of tricks, and when he saw him at any time appear, he immediately said, Here comes the master of the afs; from whence he was distinguished by the aforesaid appellation. The latter, as he said, frequently exhibited to his view a vast variety of spectres, or phantoms, so glorious that they dazzled his eyes. Having a good hand at legerdemain, and a smooth tongue, he gained mightily on the multitude by the strange feats which he shewed them, and the eloquence of his discourse; which, to set off the more, and render the more engaging, he assured the people was derived from the two angels above-mentioned, who, he told them, moved his tongue as they pleased. By these means he greatly increased his power, and having made himself master of Najrân, and the territory of Al Tâyes, on the death of Badhân, the governor of Yaman for Mohammed, he seized that province also, killing Shabr, the son of Badhân, and taking to wife his widow, whose father, the uncle of Firuz the Deilamite, he had also slain. The news of so considerable a progress being brought to Mohammed, he was very uneasy; especially as the same express informed him, that Al Aswad had possessed himself of Sanaa, the capital of Yaman, and appointed Amru Ebn Moadb his lieutenant over the tribe of Madhaj. He, therefore, dispatched a courier to some of the leading men of the tribes of Hamyar and Hamdân, with
- f secret orders to cut him off, either by surprize or open force; which orders were effectually executed, as will hereafter more clearly appear<sup>p</sup>.

In the mean time the prophet's distemper, which began with a violent and acute pain in the head, increased to such a degree, that his life was soon apprehended to be in danger. This malady was occasioned, as has been already observed, by the poison he received at Khaibar, which, at certain intervals, had greatly disordered him, ever since the reduction of that place; and, having diffused itself over the whole mass of his blood, and by its extreme malignity affected every vein, produced the uncommon head-ach, and fever attending it, that now put a period to his days. As soon as he found that his distemper might prove fatal to him, he sent for all his other wives to the apartment of Maimûna Bint Al Hâreth,<sup>a</sup> and desired they would give Ayesha leave to take care of him in his sickness; which they agreeing to, he was immediately carried to her apartment. Here he is said to have attributed his death, which he soon was sensible approached, to the poison given him at Khai-bar, in the presence both of Ayesha and the mother of Bashar Ebn Al Bara, who likewise was poisoned there. We are told, that, in the discourse which passed between the prophet and his wife Ayesha, some pleasantries were made made use of at this sorrowful juncture, which seemed a little to alleviate his pain. After which, the fever raged to such a degree, that he thought himself on fire. No one could feel his pulse, or put his hand on his stomach, without being sensible of a most intense and insupportable heat; which made him break out into the following exclamation: Oh! none of the prophets ever suffered such torments as I now feel;<sup>b</sup> but the greater my present affliction is, the more glorious will be my future reward. Then, at his request, his wives threw a large quantity of cold water upon his body, in order to abate the heat with which he was consumed; which, says one of the Moslem writers, wonderfully refreshed him<sup>c</sup>.

<sup>n</sup> AL JANNAB. ubi sup. p. 284.

<sup>o</sup> ABU'LFED. ubi sup. c. lxi. p. 133. GREG. ABU'L FAR. hist. dynast. p. 164. AL FIRAQZABAD. Poc. not. in spec. hist. Arab. p. 178. AL BOKHAR. ABU'LFED. ubi sup. p. 160. ELMACIN. ubi sup. p. 9.

<sup>p</sup> ABU'LFED. ubi sup. p. 158, 159. AL SOHEILI, apud Gagn. in not. ad Abu'lfed. ubi sup. p. 153, ut & ipse ABU'LFED. ibid. ELMACIN. ubi sup. AL JANNAB. ubi sup. p. 287. GAGN. la vie de Mahom. tom. ii. p. 273, 274, 275.

NAY, this seemed to have produced not only present ease, but a much more wonderful effect upon him. For he found himself so much better the next day, that he went to a mosque, tho' supported by Fadhl Ebn Al Abbâs and Ali, where he largely celebrated the praises of the ALMIGHTY, and begged pardon of God, in a most devout manner, for all his sins. Then he mounted a pulpit, or seat erected for him, out of which he harangued the people assembled to see him, in the following words: O men, if I have ever whipped any person<sup>c</sup> with severity, let me endure the same stripes that he did; if I have ever wounded any person's reputation, let mine be treated in the same manner; if I have taken money from any one unjustly, I am ready here to return it. Nor let such a person be afraid to demand what is his due; it is not agreeable to my genius and disposition to resent this. After which, he came out of the pulpit, said the prayer used when the sun begins to decline from the meridian, remounted his pontifical chair, and resumed his discourse there; but was prevented from continuing in it, by a man who demanded three dirhems, that he pretended were due to him. This small sum the prophet immediately paid him, saying, It is better to suffer disgrace in this world than in that which is to come. Then he prayed to God for the martyrs that had been slain in the battle of Ohod, and for all those interred in the burying-place called Al Baki; interceding for them, says Al Jannâbi, according to the pact and communion subsisting between the living and the dead. To which he added, God has given one of his servants the choice<sup>d</sup> either of this world, or of that which is to come; and he, meaning himself, has chosen the latter. Upon which, Abu Becr burst forth into tears, and said to him, We have given you absolute power over our souls<sup>e</sup>.

Mohammed gives his last orders to the Ansârs.

AFTER this, the prophet gave his last orders to the Ansârs, the most zealous and faithful of his companions. These orders have even to this day been regarded by the Moslems as the most essential articles of Mohammed's will; and are the three following; viz. 1. They were commanded to chase all idolaters out of Arabia. 2. To grant proselytes all the privileges that they themselves enjoyed. 3. To apply themselves constantly to prayer. The first of which orders has always been so punctually and rigorously observed, that no religion but Islamism has, from the death of the prophet, been tolerated in Arabia; tho' the Christians, Jews, Sabians, and Magians, who are considered as idolaters, are permitted to exercise their religion, upon the payment of an annual tribute imposed upon them, in all other parts of the Mohammedan dominions. The second order, relating to proselytes, has always, as it is at present, been perfectly complied with by the Moslems, who have never failed to fill their principal employments with new converts, as well as with those who were educated in the Mohammedan religion. As for the third, nothing is more expressly enjoined in the Korân than prayer. It is, indeed, one of the five fundamental articles of the Moslem faith; and was by Mohammed thought so necessary a duty, that he used to call it the pillar<sup>f</sup> of religion, and the key of paradise. When, therefore, the Thakîfites, who dwelt at Tâyef, sending, in the ninth year of the Hejra, to make their submission to that prophet, after the keeping of their favourite idol had been denied them, begged, at least, that they might be dispensed with as to their saying of the appointed prayers, he answered, There could be no good in that religion wherein was no prayer. Nay, according to a tradition that came originally from Omm Salma, when he was at the point of death, he insisted more upon the performance of this duty than that of any other. He also then said, if the tradition derived from Ayesha may be credited, May God's curse fall upon the Jews, for converting the sepulchres of their prophets into temples; which probably prevented his own from meeting with the same fate. This might be one of his views in uttering such an imprecation; tho' we are a inclined to believe, that it proceeded chiefly from the invincible aversion he had conceived to that people, whom he considered as the most bitter and irreconcilable, notwithstanding his repeated endeavours to soften them, of all his enemies<sup>s</sup>.

<sup>a</sup> ISM. ABU'LFED. ubi sup. p. 134, 135. AL BOKHARI, AL JANNAB. ubi sup. p. 290. MOSLEM, GAGN. not. ad Abu'lfed. ubi sup. p. 134, 135. <sup>b</sup> ABU'LFED. ubi sup. p. 135. AL JANNAB. ubi sup.

ON Friday, he having been taken ill the Monday before, and the following days, as long as he was able, he constantly said prayers in the mosque to the people; but the three last days preceding his death, he was so extremely bad, that he was obliged to confine himself intirely to Ayesha's apartment, where he entertained his friends with discourses on religious topics. Then he gave them instructions how to behave to him, both before and after his death, and manumitted a great number of slaves. After which, growing delirious, through the violence of the paroxysm that seized upon him, he called for pen, ink, and paper, in order to write a book to deliver to his followers, for the better regulation of their future conduct. This, tho' agreed to by some, was opposed by Omar, who rightly attributed so unseasonable, as well as absurd, a motion (especially as the prophet had always been illiterate, and incapable of either reading or writing) to the violence of his distemper; since, as he justly observed, the Korân, which they had received from heaven, was of itself sufficient to direct them in all spiritual matters. However, a dispute arising, Mohammed, with some emotion, ordered all the company to withdraw, telling them, that it was not proper for them to dispute in the presence of a prophet<sup>t</sup>.

WE must not forget to observe, that the prophet, thinking himself incapable of praying publicly, the Friday before his death, ordered Abu Becr to officiate for him. However, finding himself afterwards something better, he came into the mosque, supported by Ali and Abd'allah Ebn Al Abbâs. As soon as he had taken his seat, he said some prayers, which Abu Becr repeated after him, and the people then present at divine service did the same after Abu Becr<sup>u</sup>.

ON Saturday night, or the day following, Gabriel, according to the Moslem historians, visited the prophet, and brought him the agreeable news of his competitor Al Aswad's death. This was effected by a party of Mohammed's friends, to whom he had written on occasion of that impostor's revolt, as has been already observed, and some of the Arabs of Hamdân; who, conspiring with Kais Ebn Abd'al Yaghûth, who bore Al Aswad a grudge, and with Firâz and Al Aswad's wife, broke by night into his house, where Firâz surprised him, and cut off his head. While he was dispatching, he roared like a bull; at which his guards came to the chamber-door, but were sent away by his wife, who told them that the prophet was only agitated by the divine inspiration. This was done a day or two before Mohammed died. The next morning the conspirators caused the following proclamation to be made; viz. I bear witness that Mohammed is the apostle of God, and that Ahaila is a liar; and letters were immediately sent away to Mohammed, with an account of what had been done. But the messenger from heaven, according to Abu'lfeda and Al Jannâbi, outstripped them, and acquainted the prophet with the news, which he imparted to his companions but a little before his death; the letters themselves not arriving till Abu Becr was chosen Khalif. It is said, that Mohammed, on this occasion, told those who attended him, that, before the day of judgment, thirty more impostors, besides Moseilama and Al Aswad, should appear, and every one of them set up for a prophet. He also informed them, that the defection of the princes of Al Yamâma and Sofâr, that is Moseilama and Al Aswad, had been signified to him on the night Al Kadr, when he was honoured with his first revelation, and the Korân came down from heaven. The whole time, from the beginning of Al Aswad's rebellion to his death, was about four months<sup>v</sup>.

EARLY on Saturday morning, some of Osâma Ebn Zeid's officers came to pay their duty to the prophet, having been informed of his indisposition; and returned immediately after they had taken their leave of him to the camp at Jorf. The general himself also visited him the next day, and found him in a fainting fit; out of which when he recovered, he gave him his benediction, and recommended him to the divine favour. The day following, Osâma had given the signal to his soldiers to begin their march, when news was brought him by a courier of the apostle's being at the point of death. This obliged him to alter his measures, and to defer, for the present, the intended expedition. However, this was soon after executed with great success, as we shall see in our history of the Khalifat of Abu Becr<sup>x</sup>.

<sup>s</sup> EBN ABBAS, AL BOKHAR. EBN AL KATAN. ABU'LFED. & AL JANNAB. ubi sup. p. 290—294. Vide etiam ABU'LFED. de vit. Moham. p. 127, & OMM SALMA apud Al Jannab. ubi sup.

<sup>t</sup> ABU'LFED. & AL JANNAB. ubi sup. AL SHAHRESTAN. EBN ISHAK, AL TABAR. AYESHA, apud Al Bokhar. in Son. ut & ipse AL BOKHAR. ibid. EBN ABBAS. Vide etiam POC. not. in spec. hist. Arab. p. 178. GAGN. not. ad Abu'lfed. ubi sup. p. 136. ut & ipse ABU'LFED. ibid.

<sup>u</sup> AL JANNAB. & AL BOKHAR. ubi sup. <sup>v</sup> AL JANNAB. ubi sup. p. 293. ABU'LFED. ubi sup. p. 159. Aut. lib. dict. Al Montek. AL MAKIN. ubi sup. Vide etiam LUDOVICUM MARRACCIVM, in prodr. par. ii. p. 48. col. 2. Patavii, 1698.

<sup>x</sup> AL JANNAB. ubi sup.

Mohammed's
death.

AT last, after many struggles and agonies, the prophet departed this life on Monday,<sup>a</sup> the twelfth day of the former Rabî, about noon, in the eleventh year of the Hejra. Ebn Abbâs pretends, that the principal events of his life happened on Monday, or the same day of the week on which he died. He was, according to this tradition, born on Monday. He also entered upon his prophetic function, fled from Mecca to Medina, made his first entrance into the latter city, and took Mecca, if Ebn Abbâs may be credited, tho' others are of a different opinion, on the very same day. Abu'lfeda and Al Jannâbi relate, that the first words the prophet spoke, were ALLAH ACCUR, God is great; and the last, which were uttered in the presence of Ayesha, YEA WITH THE CELESTIAL COMPANIONS; that is, Let me be with the spirits above. After which, having sprinkled his face with some water that stood by him, adds the former of these writers, he immediately expired.<sup>b</sup>

AUTHORS are, however, not exactly agreed with regard to the day, nor even the year, on which Mohammed died. Said Ebn Batrik, or Eutyckius, says he died on the second day of the former Rabî, and the eleventh year of the Hejra. Abu'l Faraj (N) affirms, that he departed this life on the 28th day of the month Sefâr, and the eleventh year of the Hejra. Dionysius Telmarenfis maintains, that he died in the year of CHRIST 627, or of the Greeks 938, after he had governed the Arabs only seven years. But Al Makîn, in agreement with the generality of the Arab historians, who certainly must be allowed to have been the best acquainted with this event, asserts the decease of Mohammed to have happened on the twelfth day of the former Rabî, in the eleventh year of the Hejra, or the 17th of June, in the year of CHRIST 632, after he had presided over the Arabs, or rather had attempted<sup>c</sup> to preside over them, ten lunar years and seventy-one days, or nine solar years and eleven months, wanting only one day. This opinion, therefore, cannot but be the most acceptable to our curious and learned readers; for which reason we have not scrupled to follow it here.<sup>2</sup>

S E C T. III.

A commotion amongst his followers after his death.

SOME of the Mohammedan writers pretend, that, just before the prophet died, the angel of death, named Azraïl, in company with Gabriel, appeared to him, and asked<sup>d</sup> his leave to separate his soul from his body; which, he assured him, he could not do without his express permission. Nay, he gave him, as they tell us, his option of life or death; which the Moslem doctors look upon as one of the most singular and illustrious prerogatives of the prophet. Whereupon Mohammed, continue these authors, having chosen death, and desired the aforesaid angel to execute his office, he was immediately thrown into agonies that terminated with his life. A great part of the people, however, for some time, would not believe him dead, but affirmed him to be translated to heaven, as was Isa, or JESUS, the last great prophet, that preceded him. In consequence of this notion, which, with uncommon impetuosity, was at first insisted upon by Omar, they would not suffer him to be interred, till Al Abbâs, the prophet's uncle, had publicly declared that he had tasted of<sup>e</sup> death. But nothing contributed so much to the calming the minds of the populace, as well as the conviction of Omar, who had affirmed, that he was only gone for a season, as Mûsa Ebn Amrân, or Moses, left the Israelites for forty days, as the presence of Abu Becr; who, upon the first news of Mohammed's decease, came from that part of the city called Al Sonoh, or the upper town, and convinced every body of the reality of that event; not only by exposing the corps to the view of all the people, but likewise (which had a greater effect upon them) by demonstrating, from two express passages of the Korân, that the prophet was not to be exempted from death.<sup>2</sup>

Moadh Ebn Jabal is informed in a supernatural

WE are told by Al Jannâbi, that the moment Mohammed was attacked by Azraïl, the news of this melancholy accident was imparted to Moadh Ebn Jabal, his governor of<sup>f</sup> part of Yaman, in a dream, or vision, at Sanaa, the capital of that country; and that he was

<sup>y</sup> ABU'LFED. ubi sup. c. lxii. p. 136, 137. AL JANNAB. ubi sup. p. 294. AYESHA, apud Al Bokhâr. in Son. ut & ipse AL BOKHAR. ibid. AL SOHEILI, apud GAGN. not. ad Abu'lfed. ubi sup. p. 136, 137, 138.
<sup>z</sup> EUTYCH. patriarch. Alexandrin. annal. tom. ii. p. 251. Oxon. 1656. ABU'LFAR. ubi sup. p. 164. JOSEPH. SIMON. ASSEMAN. bibliothec. Orient. tom. ii. p. 102. Romæ, 1721. AL MAKIN. in histor. Saracen. c. i. p. 9. Vide etiam ABU'LFED. & AL JANNAB. ubi sup. <sup>a</sup> AL SOHEILI, ubi sup. p. 138, 139. AL JANNAB. ubi sup. p. 295. AL BOKHARI, in Sonna.

(N) It may not be improper to inform our curious readers, that this historian is called by the Arabs Abu'l-Faraj, and not Abu'l-Faraji, or Abu'l-Faraghi, as we find intimated by Dr. Pococke and Dr. Prideaux. This most evidently appears from one of the MS. copies of his Historia compendiosa dynastiarum, made use of by Dr. Pococke, as well as from a passage in his Chronicon Syriacum, published by a very learned modern author, cited here (37.)

(37) Poc. præfat. ad lector. prefix. hist. compendios. dynastiar. Greg. Abu'l-Farajii, p. 1, 2. Oxon. 1663. Jos. Simon. Asseman. bibliothec. Oriental. Clementino-Vatican. tom. secund. p. 309. Romæ, 1721.

afterwards

a afterwards apprized of the prophet's interment, when it happened; in the same supernatural manner. That sorrowful event, adds the same author, caused a general consternation; in-much that, whilst the angels were carrying the departed prophet's soul in triumph to heaven, all the people of Medina, and the neighbouring district, were overwhelmed with the most inconsolable grief for his departure <sup>b</sup>.

WHEN the prophet lay at the point of death, an express was dispatched to the camp at Yorf, with advice that he was drawing towards his end, his extreme parts being already perfectly cold. Osama, upon the arrival of this express, countermanded the march of the troops to the borders of Syria, and returned to Medina, where he arrived a little after the sun began to decline from the meridian; but found the prophet just expired. Notwith-
 b standing which, he ordered Terida Ebn Hofaib, his standard-bearer, to plant the great standard, or standard of Islamism, directly before his door, and assigned all the officers of the army their respective posts. This preserved the public tranquillity, and enabled the Moslems to proceed to the election of a Khalif, or successor to Mohammed, without interruption or delay, as will be hereafter seen in its proper place <sup>c</sup>.

AL JANNABI pretends, that the prophet Al Kbedr, or Elias, with an audible voice; tho' he did not appear, and words full of consolation, comforted Mohammed's disconsolate family, after he was taken from them; which convinced them of the certainty of his decease. He also relates, that Asma Bint Omaïs, examining the prophet's shoulders, found that the seal of prophecy was vanished from thence; from whence she concluded, that he
 c must be infallibly dead. Nor did any of the Moslems after this entertain the least doubt of the reality of his death <sup>d</sup>.

As to the prophet's age, some of the Arab writers make him to have been sixty, and others sixty-five years old, when he died; but the generality and best of them, and they seem to have reason on their side, say that he was then sixty-three years of age. The last compute in this manner: He was forty years old, when the angel Gabriel first appeared unto him; after which, he lived thirteen years at Mecca, and ten at Medina. Those who assign him sixty-five years make that of his birth and that of his death two of them, and those who allow him but sixty years reckon only in round numbers; so that all these authors may perhaps mean the same thing. Those who differ from them considerably in this
 d point are not to be depended upon, as they run counter to the whole stream of Moslem antiquity, and deny the reality of certain facts that have been attested by the generality of the best Arab historians <sup>e</sup>.

THE ferment amongst the populace, already mentioned, supported in a great measure by Omar, and occasioned by the almost general disbelief at first of the prophet's death, together with some disputes relating to the election of his successor, obliged his family, and the Moslem leaders, to defer his interment till the Thursday following. Then the care of the funeral was committed to Al Abbâs, the prophet's uncle, who, with his two sons, Al Fadhl and Kothâm, Osama Ebn Zeid, Mohammed's intimate friend, and Shokrân, his enfranchised slave, saw Ali Ebn Abu Tâleb wash the body, that was deposited in the middle of a c magnificent tent, erected for that purpose, with the most pure and limpid water that could be procured. Afterwards they embalmed it with camphire, anointed the seven parts applied to the earth in adoration with an aromatic composition, and performed upon the face, arms, palms of the hands, soles of the feet, &c. the Wodû, or sacred ablution. Ali went through the operation of the first ablution, by virtue of the power given him by the prophet some time before his death; and, at his particular request, took care not to cast his eyes upon that part which nature has ordered to be concealed. According to a tradition derived originally from Omm Salma, one of the prophet's wives, the corps emitted an odour resembling that of musk, but in fragrancy much exceeding it, till it was inhumed. The Moslems wrapped it in three garments, two of which were white, and one striped after the manner ( of Yaman. They also put round it some pieces of odoriferous wood, and a composition of amber, musk, and other perfumes. After which, the prophet's family, with Al Abbâs and the Hâshemites, began the prayers for the deceased; and were followed by the Mohâjerîn and Ansârs, as they were by the principal citizens of Medina, the populace, women, and children, &c. the whole ceremony being conducted with so much decency and regularity, that not the least disorder was committed. And this was reckoned one of the singular privileges, or prerogatives, of the prophet. The form of prayer used on this occasion, was founded upon the following words, contained in the thirty-third chapter of the Korân: "Verily God
 " and his angels bless the prophet: O true believers, do ye also bless him, and salute him " with a respectful salutation." The prayer drawn up for the common people by Ali, at g their request, or, at least, the substance of it, has been preserved by Al Jannâbi, to whom

<sup>b</sup> AL JANNABI ubi sup.
 sup. c. lxiv. p. 142.

<sup>c</sup> Idem ibid.

<sup>d</sup> Idem ibid.

<sup>e</sup> ISM. ABULFED. ubi

we must beg leave to refer our curious readers for a sight of it; since the bounds we have a prescribed ourselves in this work will not permit us to insert it here <sup>e</sup>.

and sepulchre.

In relation to the place where the prophet's remains were to be deposited, there happened some dispute amongst his followers. The Mohâjerîn insisted upon his being buried at Mecca, the place of his nativity; and the Anfârs at Medina, the place of his residence during the last ten years of his life. Others were for transporting him to Jerusalem, and erecting a monument for him there amongst the sepulchres of the prophets. But his successor, Abu Becr, decided the whole affair at once, by declaring, that a prophet ought to be interred in the place where he died; and that he had heard Mohammed, in his life-time, own himself to be of this opinion. Whereupon the body was buried in a grave dug under the bed on which he died, in the apartment of Ayesha, his best-beloved wife, at Medina, where it b remains to this day. Ali first descended into the grave, after the corps was deposited therein; and all the others concerned in the management and direction of the funeral followed him. Kothâm Ebn Al Abbâs was the last that approached the prophet, and Abu Telba, the Anfâr, dug his grave; the bottom of which was paved with nine bricks, and earth thrown on all sides the coffin, in order to fill up the cavities. This has made the tomb appear convex, and a little elevated above the rest of the surface of the earth there; so that nothing can be more ridiculous than the notion, espoused by great numbers of Christians, of Mohammed's body being hung in the air in an iron coffin, or chest, supported by the power of loadstones. Nor can any thing be more remote from truth, than that his remains are inhumed at Mecca, which has long been exploded, tho' several modern writers, whether c through ignorance or negligence we will not take upon us to determine, have fallen into such an opinion. Those authors also are greatly mistaken, who affirm, that one essential point of the religion of the Mohammedans is to visit, at least once in their lives, the tomb of their prophet; since, 'tis certain, they think themselves under no manner of obligation in that respect. Ahmed Ebn Yusef relates, that the tombs of Abu Becr and Omar, the two first Khalîfs, or immediate successors of Mohammed, are placed near that of the prophet; and that his is the most anterior of the three towards the Kebîla; that is to say, the south, the city of Mecca standing in a southern direction with respect to that of Medina. Be this, however, as it will, the body of Mohammed lies at present interred at Medina, in a magnificent building, covered with a cupola, and adjoining to the east-side of the great temple, which d is built in the midst of the city <sup>f</sup>.

Thus have we given our readers a full and ample account of the life and actions of Mohammed, the pretended great prophet and legislator of the Arabs, extracted from the best authors, both Christian and Mohammedan, and according to the most authentic Moslem traditions; which will enable them to form a sufficient, and even adequate, idea of him. However, in order to present them with a true portrait in miniature of this famous, or rather most infamous, impostor, we shall now beg leave to touch upon his personal qualifications; his form of body, as well as his turn and disposition of mind, his excellencies and defects, his genius and capacity, in fine, his moral as well as his intellectual endowments. This, notwithstanding the vastly different characters assigned him by different e authors, we shall endeavour to do with the strictest impartiality, and with the highest regard to truth; a close attachment to which we look upon to be a point essentially requisite in a good historian <sup>g</sup>.

Description of his person.

As to his person, Mohammed was of a middle stature, and ruddy complexion. He had a large head, and a thick bushy beard. The palms of his hands, and soles of his feet, were rough and strong. He had large black eyes, and smooth lank hair of the same colour. His bones were big and solid, the turn of his jaws agreeable, even, and well-proportioned, and his neck, according to Ali's description, resembled a silver ewer. Tho' he was sixty-three lunar, or about sixty-one solar, years old at his death, scarce any grey hairs, or other f signs of old age, appeared upon him. He was corpulent, had a clear fair skin, and large, tho' regular, features. He had round full cheeks, an extended prominent forehead, and long smooth eyebrows, that mutually approached each other, but did not intirely meet; between which there appeared a vein, whose pulse was quicker and higher than usual, when he was angry. He had an aquiline nose, a large wide mouth, and the upper foreteeth placed at some little distance from one another. All his teeth were bright, pointed like a saw, and a ranged in a beautiful order. When he laughed, he discovered them, and they appeared then like hail-stones, or little white pearls. Even his laughter itself was full of majesty, and when he smiled, he contracted his mouth in a very agreeable manner. On his lower lip he had a little black spot, or excrescence, that did not appear at all diffightly, but rather gave an additional grace to his countenance. He had a good ear, and a fine sonorous voice. He was well furnished with hair, which partly fell in buckles, or ringlets, about his ears, and partly hung down strait between his shoulders. To this, by the application of Al Henna, or Cyprus indigo, and the herb Al Catam, he gave a reddish shining colour; in which he is imitated by the Scenite Arabs at this day. Every Thursday night he shaved himself, and pared his nails. As no prophet's head, according to a maxim in the Sonna, was ever white, the hair b being by the Moslems supposed to receive that colour from Satan, he had very few white or grew hairs at his death. He had a free open air, a grand majestic porte, and a very engaging address. This is the description of Mohammed's person, tho' stripped of many fabulous articles, imaginary beauties, and fictitious decorations, with which we are supplied by the most authentic traditions of the Moslems <sup>a</sup>.

<sup>e</sup> ABU'LFED. ubi sup. c. lxiii. p. 139, 140, 141. AL JANNAB. p. 296—301. Aut. lib. dict. Asad Al Gabat, apud Gagn. in not. ad Abu'lfed. ubi sup. p. 139. Aut. lib. dict. Al Etesfa. OMM SALMA apud Yûnas in lib. Al Sairat, ut & ipse YUNAS, ibid. ABU ZEID SEID in lib. Splendor. EBN ISHAK, AL SOHEILI. GAGN. not. ad Abu'lfed. ubi sup. p. 139, 140

<sup>f</sup> GREG. AB'UL FAR. ubi sup. p. 165. Poc. not. in spec. hist. Arab. p. 180. AHMED EBN YUSEF, AL BOKHAR. AL MAKIN. hist. Saracen. p. 35. AL JANNAB. ubi sup. p. 300—304. ABU'LFED. ubi sup. p. 141. & descript. Arab. p. 40. AL BEIHAKI, GOLII note ad Alfragan. p. 97. GAGN. ubi sup. p. 141. SALE's preliminary discours. p. 5.

<sup>g</sup> ABU'LFED. & AL JANNAB. EUTHYMIUS ZIGABEN. CUSAN. JOAN. ANDR. FRID. BOVLAINVILL. GAGN. SALE, alique quamplurim. scriptores.

BUT here we must not omit mentioning the seal of prophecy, tho' a mere fiction of the Moslems, said to have appeared between the shoulders of Mohammed, that is so much insisted upon by the Arab writers. This, according to Abu'l-feda, was a protuberance of flesh, either of a whitish or red colour, surrounded with hair, and about the size of a pigeon's egg. This excrescence having been once seen by Abu Rothama, an Arab physician, who c was an idolater, he desired the prophet would give him leave to remove it; from whom he received for answer, that he who created this would in due time take it away. And, in proof of the veracity of this most celebrated prediction, we are told, that the tumour, or illustrious argument of Mohammed's gift of prophecy, was REALLY perceived to have totally disappeared, and to have been intirely effaced, after his death. It has also been remarked by the Moslem doctors, that the aforesaid seal of prophecy was predicted by the following words of the prophet Isaiah: For unto us a child is born, unto us a son is given, and THE GOVERNMENT SHALL BE UPON HIS SHOULDER. Hence it appears, that these doctors render here the original word, המשרה, Hammissrah, which denotes the government, by Al Shâma, the black spot, without the least foundation or authority. For a confutation of which absurd d and arbitrary translation, or rather manifest perversion, of the sacred text, our curious readers may have recourse to the learned father Marracci; if the very publication of so palpable an absurdity does not sufficiently expose and confute it <sup>1</sup>.

WITH regard to the genius and disposition of Mohammed, the dominion he usurped over his countrymen was a demonstrative argument of his ambition, as the great number of e wives and concubines with whom he had to do was of his sensuality. The assassinations likewise that he committed, and his retaliation of injuries, so visible on several occasions, are clear indications of his cruelty and vindictive temper. The spurious revelations also that he imposed upon the Arabs, and the frequent conferences he pretended to have with ALMIGHTY GOD, whose tremendous name he made use of, in order to support falsehoods, c to propagate error and imposture, and to enable him to gratify his lust and ambition, either immediately, or by the assistance and interposition of the angel Gabriel, if they do not prove him to have been the most profligate and abandoned wretch that ever lived, most certainly evince him to have been a person of great profaneness and impiety. Nay, this may be directly inferred from his own express words in the sixth chapter of the Korân; which, in the strongest manner, assert, that no one can be more wicked than he who forges a lie concerning God, and publishes to the world a false revelation. Nor was it one of the least of his crimes, that he corrupted and perverted the sacred writings, in order to serve very infamous purposes; of which several instances, besides that above-mentioned, might be here produced, were it in any manner necessary. And this, by the way, is a plain intimation, f that he was conversant with the Scriptures, and therefore either actually did, or easily might have sufficiently understood them; which will cut off all manner of excuse in his favour, from his supposed ignorance of the true sense and meaning of those lively oracles. But, to avoid prolixity, that cruelty, lust, and ambition, were the distinguishing characteristics of this impostor, the Korân itself puts beyond all doubt; many of the parts of that book having been pretended to be revealed, as is allowed even by the Moslem commentators themselves, to enable him to gratify some one or other of those illicit passions. Nay, the spirit that composition breathes throughout, to wave other considerations that might be offered, a indisputably evinces what is here laid to his charge ; as might be proved by an induction of particular passages extracted from thence, would the limits we have prescribed ourselves in this work permit <sup>k</sup>.

<sup>a</sup> ABU'LFED. ubi sup. c. lxxv, lxxvi. p. 142—146. AL JANNAB. ubi sup. ANAS EBN MALEC, GAGN. la vie de Mahom. tom. ii. p. 312—325. PRID. life of Mahom. p. 79, 80, &c. Lond. 1718. SALE's prelimin. disc. p. 38—43. Vide etiam ABU ZEID SEID, ABU NAÏM, ABU HOREIR. AL BOKHAR. AL TERMED. MOSLEM, AL WAKED. EBN ABBAS, &c. apud Joan. Gagn. in not. ad Abu'lfed. ubi sup. p. 142—146. AL MAKIN, lib. i. c. 1. ABUNAZAR, AL KODAI, SCHIKHAKD. Tarikh. p. 32. PRID. life of Mahom. p. 79. <sup>1</sup> ISM. ABU'LFED. ubi sup. clxxv. p. 145. Aut. lib. dist. Haizwat Al Haizwan, AL WAKED. LUDOVIC. MARRACCIUS, in prodr. par. i. p. 24. col. 2. Patavii, 1698.

and personal qualifications.

On the other hand, whatever were his motives, Mohammed seems not to have been destitute of the personal qualifications which were necessary to accomplish his undertaking. The Mohammedan writers are excessive in their commendations of him, speaking much of his religious and moral virtues. They extol above measure his piety, veracity, justice, liberality, clemency, humility, and abstinence ; in which, according to them, he may be considered as a perfect pattern to all his followers. His charity, in particular, they say was so conspicuous, that he had seldom any money in his house, keeping no more for his own use than b was just sufficient to maintain his family ; and he frequently spared even some part of his own provisions, to supply the necessities of the poor ; so that before the year's end, he had generally little or nothing left. God, says Al Bokhâri, offered him the keys of the treasures of the earth, but he would not accept them. In fine, if these authors may be credited, he had infinitely more perfections than any other man that ever lived. Nor are they sparing in their citations from the Sonna, a book with them of canonical authority, in support of their assertion. But the misfortune is, that this book, as well as the authors that cite it, contains so many absurdities, that whatever weight it may have with the professors of Mohammedism, it will have very little with those of any other religion. Besides, the very things related in that book, and by those authors, of their favourite prophet, intirely overturn the high opinion c they entertained of him ; so that they ought to be considered either as inconsistent with themselves, or as advancing notions repugnant even to the fundamental principles of natural as well as revealed religion. However we are not unwilling to admit, that he might not have been, to outward appearance, a wretch of quite so profligate a character as several writers have represented him ; since some degree of hypocrisy must have been necessary to enable him to succeed in the enterprize he had formed. But it must at the same time be allowed, that the enormity of his actions frequently proved the insincerity of his professions ; and therefore, that what Mr. Sale has insinuated to the contrary ought to be looked upon as altogether impertinent, if not as approaching an absolute falsehood, when he is pleased to declare, that the sincerity of Mohammed's intentions is what he pretends not to inquire into <sup>l</sup>. d

THE aforesaid writers likewise affirm, and to their notion in this particular Mr. Sale readily subscribes, that he had a very piercing and sagacious wit, and was thoroughly versed in all the arts of insinuation. The Eastern historians describe him to have been a man of an excellent judgment, and a happy memory ; and these natural parts, according to them, were improved by a great experience and knowlege of men, and the observations he had made in his travels. They say, he was a person of few words, of an equal chearful temper, pleasant and familiar in his conversation, of inoffensive behaviour towards his friends, and of great condescension towards his inferiors. This they endeavour to prove from numberless instances of his conduct on a great variety of occasions ; accounts of which they draw from the most authentic Moslem traditions ; and particularly those derived from Ayesha, Ali, e and Abu Horeira. To all the preceding amiable qualities, add the same historians, were joined a comely agreeable person, and a polite address ; accomplishments of no small service in prejudicing those in his favour, whom he attempted to persuade, and yet such as even the most flagitious person might be in possession of. In fine, admitting that much of what is here supposed may be true, which is as much as any reasonable person can admit, considering that the elogies of these writers are justly to be suspected of partiality, as even Mr. Sale himself allows ; yet we cannot infer from hence, that Mohammed was either a great or good man. A proper degree of hypocrisy will conceal a vast number of the most execrable crimes, at least from the public view, and even procure the person guilty of them, if he be a man of parts and address, and sufficiently acquainted with the arts of dissimulation, as well as f endowed with a competent knowlege of mankind, popular applause. But that even Mohammed arrived at such a degree of perfection as this, is what we will not very sanguinely maintain <sup>m</sup>.

BUT notwithstanding the excellency of his parts, if the preceding authors have given us a just description of him in this particular, it does not appear from the writers of his life, that he was at all versed in any branch of literature. Nor, indeed, can this well be expected, as acquired learning was never much in vogue amongst the Arabs. He, therefore, had no other education than what was customary in his tribe, who neglected, and perhaps despised,

<sup>k</sup> Al Kor. MOHAM. pass, PRID. life of Mahom. p. 79, 87, &c. Vid. etiam Comment. in Al Kor. & GAGN. pass.
<sup>l</sup> ABU'LFED. ubi sup. c. lxvi. p. 144, 145, 146. AL JANNAB. ubi sup. p. 323, & alib. ANAS EBN MAIEC, AL TERMED. ex Abu Horeira, MOSLEM ex Monkend. EBN ABBAS, AL BOKHAR. Aut. Lib. Al Sbasfa, SALE's prelim. disc. p. 41. <sup>m</sup> Ibidem ibid.

- a what we call literature; esteeming no language in comparison with their own, their skill in which they gained by use, and not by books; and contenting themselves with improving their private experience, by committing to memory such passages of their poets, as they judged might be of use to them in life. But of this we have given a fuller account in our history of the Arabs, who lived before the time of Mohammed. This, defect, however, was so far from being prejudicial to him, or putting a stop to his design, that, according to Mr. Sale, it greatly facilitated the execution of it. He pretended, that the writings he produced as revelations from God, could not possibly be a forgery of his own; because it was not conceivable, that a person, who could neither write nor read, should be able to compose a book of such excellent doctrine, and in so elegant a style; thinking thereby
- b to obviate an objection that might otherwise have been offered to the authority of the Korân. But tho', by such empty sophistry as this, he might impose upon the Arabs, who were none of the most refined reasoners themselves, and therefore could not so easily discover or detect the false reasonings of others, it will never pass for true and solid argumentation with men of sense. For, notwithstanding a person's defect in point of acquired endowments, good natural parts, and a tolerable share of common sense, will enable him to talk in his mother-language with fluency and propriety enough, and even dictate with the same fluency and propriety to others. Of this we meet with an infinity of instances in common life. Besides, it may be easily proved, as has already been observed in the beginning of this history, that Mohammed was not the sole author of the Korân; he having been assisted by others
- c in the composition of that book. To which we may add, that Mohammed by no means left it in the form in which it now appears. Great additions were made to it in the Khalifat of Abu Becr, as we find allowed even by the Moslems themselves. But, to wave all other considerations, that the Korân was not of divine original, does not only appear from the matter it contains, but also from what we have related above of Abd'allah Ebn Saad Ebn Abu Sarah, the prophet's amanuensis, who corrupted that book; the author of it not being able, even according to Al Beidawi himself, to distinguish his own dictates from Abd'allah's interpolations. And yet Mr. Sale seems to imagine, that Mohammed's ignorance and illiterature really obviated a formidable objection that might have otherwise been urged against the divine original of the Korân; and to tell us with an air of triumph, that his followers,
- d instead of being ashamed of their master's ignorance, glory in it, as an evident proof of his divine mission, and scruple not to call him, as he is indeed called in the Korân itself, the illiterate prophet <sup>n</sup>.

MOHAMMED had four sons and four daughters by his first wife Khadîjah, and no children at all by any of the others; tho' his concubine, Mary the Copt, brought him a son, whom he named Ibrahim. The four sons he had by Khadîjah, Al Kâsem, Al Tayeb, Al Táher, and Abd'allah, from the first of whom the prophet derived his name of Abu'l Kâsem, all died in their infancy. The daughters that lady bore him were Zeinab, Rakîab, Omm Kolthûm, and Fâtema. Zeinab was married to Abu'l As, and died of a hurt she received from Al Howaireth Ebn Nokaid Ebn Wabab, which occasioned first a miscarriage, she being pregnant when she was thrown off her camel by him, and afterwards her death; for which

e he was solemnly proscribed by the prophet, after the surrender of Mecca. Rakîab was first married to Otha Ebn Abu Labeb, and afterwards having been repudiated from her former husband, to Othmán, with whom she first fled into Ethiopia, and then to Medina. She bore Othmán a son, called Abd'allah, from whom he was named Abu Abd'allah; and died in the second year of the Hejra, whilst her father was engaged in the Bedr expedition. Abd'allah had one of his eyes put out by a cock, when he was about six years of age, in the fourth year of the Hejra, which occasioned his death. Omm Kolthûm, whom Othman took to wife after Rakîab's decease, died without leaving any issue behind her. Fâtema, whom Abu'l feda makes the eldest of Mohammed's daughters, was esteemed by the Moslems

f as one of the four women, who only, according to Mohammed, were supposed to have attained perfection. About the beginning of the month Ramadân, in the second year of the Hejra, she was espoused by Ali, who, in the following month of Dhu'lhajja, consummated his marriage with her. Her dower, according to Al Jannâbi, amounted to 480 dirhems. She was in the sixteenth year of her age, or, as others will have it, about eighteen, when Ali took her to wife. Abmed Ebn Yusuf, from a pretended tradition of Ebn Abbâs, almost of divine authority with the Moslems, gives us a fabulous account of Khadîjah's miraculous conception of Fâtema, and of the latter's introduction to the bridal-bed by Gabriel and Michael at the head of 70,000 angels, who celebrated the divine praises till morning appeared; which might serve to give us a sufficient idea of the Mohammedan credulity, were we destitute of every other instance of it. She attended the prophet in his last illness, and survived him but a few months, dying likewise without issue. As for his son Ibrahim, he departed this life on the tenth day of the former Rabî, to the unspeakable grief of the prophet, and all his companions, as has been already observed, in the tenth year of the Hejra. It cannot be inferred from any writer, how old he precisely then was ; but none of those who mention him, seem <sup>a</sup> to allow that he completed the second year of his age °.

<sup>n</sup> Al Kor. MOHAM. f. vii. AL BEIDAWI, SALE, ubi sup. p. 42. Univerf. Hist. vol. vii. part i. p. 257.
MOD. HIST. VOL. I.

His wives.

THE Moslem authors are not agreed as to the number of the prophet's wives, according to Al Kodai. Some assign him thirteen, and tell us, that he lay with eleven of them ; others fifteen, who say, that he made use of only twelve of these ; and others, again, make them to amount to seventeen, besides the concubines that he enjoyed. But, if Gentius may be credited, he had no less than one-and-twenty wives, besides concubines ; which number others increase to twenty-six. Abu'lfeda relates, that the prophet had fifteen wives, eleven or twelve of which he lay with, and never touched the rest. Be that as it will, 'tis agreed on all hands, that he had more than four, the number allowed every Moslem by the Korân ; having been left at liberty, by another passage of that book, to take as many wives as he pleased ; <sup>b</sup> tho' this peculiar privilege was qualified with some restrictions. We shall give our readers a short account of those twelve with whom he actually had to do, if any credit be due to the most approved Oriental writers, according to the order of time in which he espoused them <sup>p</sup>.

THE first he married was Khadîjah Bint Khowailed Ebn Asad, of the tribe of Koreish, a widow, who had had two former husbands. This happened in the time of ignorance, or paganism, when she was about forty years of age, and Mohammed twenty-five. She was the first who embraced Islamism ; and therefore had the honourable appellation given her of the mother of the faithful. The prophet lived with her twenty-four years, five months, and eight days. She died in the tenth year of his mission, and about three years before the commencement of the Hejra ; being then, according to Al Jannâbi, in the sixty-fifth year <sup>c</sup> of her age °.

His second wife, Sawda Bint Zamaa, who had been nurse to Fâtema, he espoused soon after the decease of Khadîjah. She fled with her former husband Sokrân, one of the Moslem refugees, into Ethiopia ; and, upon her return to Mecca, after his death, was married to Mohammed. She died, according to Al Kodai, in the Khalîfat of Omar <sup>r</sup>.

AYESHA BINT ABU BECR was his third and best beloved wife, whom he married in the first year of the Hejra. The story of her accusation, which was declared to be unjust by a passage in the Korân, pretended to be revealed some time after that accident happened, our readers will find related above. The principal authors of this accusation, which Mr. Gagnier <sup>d</sup> calls a black calumny, tho' many of the Arabs had quite another notion of it, were Meslab Ebn Othâtha, Zeid Ebn Refâa, Hassân Ebn Thâbet, Abd'allah Ebn Obba Solûl, and Hamna Bint Jahash ; the fiercest of whom was Abd'allah Ebn Obba Solûl. This affair gave the prophet so much inquietude, that he consulted with Ali Ebn Abu Tâleb and Osâma Ebn Zeid about the properest method of restoring peace to his family ; when Osâma asserted, in the strongest terms, Ayesha's innocence ; but Ali seemed, on the other hand, fully convinced of her infidelity. Each of them, therefore, gave Mohammed such advice as best agreed with the sentiments he entertained. Some believe, that Ali was the person who discovered her incontinency to Mohammed ; and that hereupon she conceived such a prejudice against him, that she afterwards made use of all her interest to exclude him from the Khalîfat, <sup>e</sup> tho', as son-in-law to the prophet, he had the fairest title thereto. Nay, after his advancement to that high dignity, she opposed him to the utmost of her power ; appearing even in arms against him, and causing such a defection amongst his subjects, as ended in the destruction of his family. She also was honoured with the title of the mother of the faithful. According to a Christian writer, the Moslems consulted her in the most difficult points relating to their law, after the prophet's death ; and the answers she gave, as she was supposed to be the best acquainted with her husband's sentiments in every particular, passed afterwards amongst them for the most authentic traditions. The next to these, in point of authority, were those that came from Abd'alrahmân Ebn Awf, one of Mohammed's first converts, and most intimate acquaintance, surnamed by the prophet, Abu Horeira, or <sup>f</sup> the father of the cat ; because, where-ever he went, he carried one of those animals about with him. Mohammed thundered from the pulpit against those who had accused Ayesha, whom some represent as a most accomplished lady, extremely well versed in Arab literature, and the antiquities of her country, which had liked to have occasioned no small effusion of blood amongst his followers ; but the pretended revelation from heaven of her innocence silenced all the clamours that had been raised. The testimony of Barira contributed not a little to a the descent of this fresh revelation, and to induce the prophet to support the honour and reputation of his wife. The justification of Ayesha is contained in ten verses of the twenty-fourth chapter of the Korân. She was sixty-seven years of age at her death, which happened at Medina, in the Khalifat of Moâwiyah, and the fifty-eighth year of the Hejra <sup>1</sup>.

° ABU'LFED. ubi sup. c. lxxvii. p. 146, 147. AL KODAI, EBN ISHAK, GREG. ABU'L-FAR. hist. dynast. p. 165. MOSLEM, in lib. dict. Al Sahib, AL BOKHAR. LUDOVIC. MARRACC. ubi sup. p. 32. col. 2. P ABU'LFED. ubi sup. c. lxxviii. p. 147—152. AL KODAI, GREG. ABU'L-FAR. ubi sup. AHMED EBN YUSEF, GENTIUS, in notis ad Mufladinum Sadum, p. 568. JOAN GAGN. not. ad Abu'lfed. ubi sup. p. 147—152. AL TABAR, EBN ISHAK, AL JANNAB. p. 339, &c. Append. ad geogr. Nubienf. c. 8. JOAN. ANDREAS, c. 5. BELLONIUS. lib. 3. LUDOVIC. MARRACC. ubi sup. <sup>r</sup> ISM. ABU'LFED. ubi sup. p. 12, 29, &c. <sup>f</sup> AL BOKHARI, AL KODAI, GENTIUS, ubi sup.

THE next wife, mentioned by the Oriental writers, was Ghozîa Bint Jâber, surnamed Omm Shoraic, from her son Shoraic, that she had by Abu'l Acr Ebn Somai, her first husband; she being a widow when Mohammed married her. She was the only one of the prophet's wives that he divorced, after the consummation of his marriage with her <sup>2</sup>.

THE fifth was Hafsa Bint Omar, of the tribe of Koreish, and widow of Hobaisb Ebn Kho-dafa. Mohammed married her in the month of Sbaabân, and the third year of the Hejra.

b To her custody Abu Becr committed a transcript of the Korân, after he had completed it, as has been already observed. Of the manner in which this transcript was completed, our readers may expect a further account hereafter. The dower assigned this lady, according to Al Kodai, was dirbêms. Some say she died in the Khalifat of Othmân, about the 27th year of the Hejra; and others, in the Khalifat of Moâwiyah, and the 45th year of that æra. According to Gentius, she was about sixty years of age at her death, and at least forty when the prophet died. He repudiated her in the month of Sbaabân, and the seventh year of the Hejra, because she had indiscretely divulged his intrigue with Mary the Copt. But, after some time, he took her to his bed again; being afraid of disobliging her father Omar, at the command, as he gave out, of the angel Gabriel <sup>3</sup>.

c THE prophet's sixth wife was Zeînab Bint Khozaima, the Helâlite, the widow of Tofail Ebn Al Hâreth. He espoused her in the month of Ramadân, and the fourth year of the Hejra. She was given in marriage to him by Kobeisa Ebn Amru, had 400 dirbêms assigned her for a dower, and was the only one of the prophet's wives, besides Khadîjah, that died before him <sup>4</sup>.

His seventh wife was Omm Salma Bint Ommeya, whom he espoused after the death of her former husband Abu Salma Ebn Abd'allah, of the tribe of Makhzûm, in the month of Sba-wâl, and the fourth year of the Hejra. Some say, that her maiden name was Hend; and that her mother was the prophet's aunt. Be that as it will, she died in the Khalifat of Yezid Ebn Moâwiyah, after she had lived eighty-four years, and the 59th year of the d Hejra <sup>5</sup>.

THE eighth wife of Mohammed was Zeinab, or Zenobia, Bint Jabash, whose history has been given above. Her father was of the tribe of Asad, and her mother, Amîma Bint Abd'almotalleb, the prophet's aunt. He married her in the month of Dhu'lkaada, and the fifth year of the Hejra, after she had been separated from Zeid Ebn Hâretha, his freed-man, and adopted son, as has been already observed. Her brother Abu Ahmed Ebn Jabash assisted at the celebration of the nuptials, and she had 400 dirbêms, which seems to have been the usual sum on such occasions, assigned her for a dower. The prophet's marriage with this lady gave great offence to his followers, as she had been his adopted son Zeid's wife. For this feigned relation created an impediment of marriage among the old Arabs within the prohibited degrees, in the same manner as if it had been real. However, as this marriage was authorized by the Korân, and God is therein declared to have joined Mohammed and Zeinab together, she valued herself above the rest of the prophet's wives on that account. Zeinab died in the Khalifat of Omar, about the 20th year of the Hejra, after she completed the fifty-third year of her age <sup>6</sup>.

His ninth wife was Omm Habiba Bint Abu Sofîân, of the tribe of Koreish. She was the widow of Obeid'allah Ebn Jâbash, who had by her a son, named Habiba; from whence she derived the prænomen of Omm Habiba. Her true name, according to some, was Ramla, or, as others say, Hend. She was with her first husband in Ethiopia at the time of his death, which happened in the beginning of the sixth year of the Hejra. Mohammed receiving advice of this accident, immediately dispatched an express to the Najâshi, to beg that he would him the honour to marry him to Omm Habiba; which request that prince immediately complied with, and performed the nuptial ceremony with great pomp and solemnity. The prophet chose Khâled Ebn Said, his cousin, for his representative on this occasion; and, after Omm Habiba's return to Medina from Ethiopia, in the seventh year of the Hejra, consummated his marriage with her. She died, according to Al Kodai, in the Khalifat of Moâwiyah, and the 44th year of the aforesaid æra <sup>a</sup>.

<sup>1</sup> ABU'LFED. ubi sup. p. 53. AL KODAI, Appendix ad geogr. Nubiens. c. vii. Disputat. Christian. c. vi. Commentatores in Al Kor. MOHAM. f. xxiv. AL MAKIN, lib. i. c. 4, 7, &c. GREC. ABU'L-FAR. ubi sup. p. 186, 187, &c. JOAN. ANDREAS, c. iii. GENTIUS, in notis ad Mussadinum Sadum, p. 578. AL Kor. MOHAM. f. xxiv. v. 1—11. AL EOKHARI, in Sonna. AL BEIDAWI, JALLALO'DDIN. See also SALE's translation of, and notes upon, the Korân, p. 289.

<sup>2</sup> ABU JAAFAR AL TABAR. <sup>3</sup> ABU'LFED. ubi sup. p. 150. AL KODAI, JOHN. ANDREAS, c. vii. HOTTINGER. bibliothec. Orient. c. ii. POCOC. not. in spec. hist. Arab. p. 362. GENTIUS, ubi sup. p. 368.

<sup>4</sup> ABU'LFED. ubi sup. p. 151. AL KODAI. <sup>5</sup> Ibidem ibid. AL JANNAB. <sup>6</sup> Poc. not. in spec. hist. Arab. p. 182. RICARD. confut. c. viii. Disputat. Christian. c. vi. ECCHELLENS. hist. Arab. par. i. c. 5. Confut. Moham. edit. per LE MOYNE, JOAN. ANDREAS, c. vi. GUADAGNOL, tract. ii. c. 5. sect. 3. & c. 10. sect. 1. AL ZAMAKHSHAR. AL BEIDAWI, alique commentator. in Al Kor. MOHAM. f. xxxiii. ut & ipse Al Kor. ibid. AL JANNAB.

MOHAMMED'S tenth wife was Joweira Bint Al Hâreth, the Khozaite. Her father Al Hâreth Ebn Abu Dharâr was the general of the Mosalekites, whom the prophet overthrew in the manner already related. Some authors tell us, that Joweira's true name was Barra. She was the widow of one of her cousin-germans, and fell into the hands of Thâbet Ebn Kais, having been taken prisoners in the battle of Mercisi. The prophet first paid her ransom, and then espoused her, in the month of Sbaabân, and the sixth year of the Hejra. Al Kodai informs us, that she died in the Khalifat of Moâwiyah, and the 45th year of the Hejra, being then about sixty-three year of age <sup>b</sup>.

THE eleventh was Safya Bint Hoyai, a Jewess, and descended, as her family gave out, from Aaron. She was the wife of Kenâna Ebn Al Rabi, the principal Jew of Kbaibar, whom Mohammed slew after the reduction of that city. He espoused his lady in the month of Safar, and the seventh year of the Hejra. She died, according to Al Kodai, in the Khalifat of Moâwiyah, and the 56th year of the aforesaid æra <sup>b</sup>.

THE twelfth and last wife married by the prophet was Maimûna Bint Al Hâreth, whom he took to wife on his return to Medina from the sacred visitation called Al Kada, or the completion. The nuptial ceremony was performed by his uncle Al Abbâs, in the month of Dbu'lkaada, and the seventh year of the Hejra. She was the widow of Raham Ebn Abdâl Uzza, and became Mohammed's wife whilst he was cloathed with the Ibram, or sacred habit; but the marriage was not consummed till after he had quitted that habit. She died at Shorf, near Mecca, if we will believe Al Kodai, about the 38th or 40th year of the Hejra <sup>c</sup>.

BESIDES these wives, Mohammed married two others that he never enjoyed. The first of these was Asma Bint Al Nooman, the Kendite, who was infected with the leprosy, and therefore not suffered to approach the prophet's bed; and the other, Amru Bint Yezid, the Kelâbite, who, relapsing into idolatry, was so detested by her husband, on that account, that he could not prevail upon himself to come near her. Some, however, think, that the wife, who had rendered herself so extremely disagreeable to Mohammed, was a near relation of Asma Bint Al Nooman; and others, that she was one Fatema Bint Al Dbabûk, whose mother's name was Tabiana. In the Korân, the prophet had an express permission to marry any believing woman, that should give herself unto him; and the commentators are of opinion, that a certain Moslem lady disposed of herself in that manner; tho' Ebn Abbâs maintains, that Mohammed married no woman, without assigning her a dower. The former, however, are not agreed who was the woman particularly meant in the passage here hinted at; but they name four, who are supposed to have given themselves to the prophet; viz. Maimûna Bint Al Hâreth, Zeinab Bint Khozaima, Ghozia Bint Jâber, surnamed Omm Shoraic, which three he actually married, and Khawla Bint Hakim, whom, as it seems, he rejected. We find likewise a lady belonging to the Banu Sâmâ Ebn Lowa, who was not accepted by the prophet, tho' she offered herself to him, mentioned by Al Kodai on this occasion <sup>d</sup>.

His concubines. As for the female captives, or slaves, of the prophet, as well those which, according to the stile of the Korân, his right hand possessed, that is to say, those which came to him as part of his share of the plunder acquired in some of the above-mentioned expeditions, as those which he purchased with his own money, or had sent as presents to him, that were in number eleven; the principal of which seem to have been the five following: <sup>e</sup>

RIHANA, or Raibana, Bint Amru, of the tribe of Koreidba, a most celebrated beauty, that fell into his hands, when he reduced the fortrefs of that tribe. She persisted in the profession of Judaism, for some time after she became his property; but, at last, being overcome by Mohammed's importunity, she embraced Islamism. She remained in his possession as long as he lived; but, at his death, he presented with their liberty both her and all the rest of his slaves <sup>e</sup>.

SHIRIN, a beautiful Copt, sent the prophet by Mokawkas, governor of Egypt. What became of her after Mohammed's death, or whether she survived the prophet, we are not told by any Oriental author <sup>f</sup>.

MARY, the Copt, a present likewise from Mokawkas, was the prophet's concubine, by an express permission contained in the sixty-sixth chapter of the Korân, and the sister of Shirin. She lived at Medina about five years after her master's death; and was interred in a the burying-place called Al Baki, in the sixteenth year of the Hejra; where the remains of her son Ibrahim had probably before been deposited <sup>g</sup>.

<sup>a</sup> ABU'LFED. ubi sup. p. 91, 92, 151. MOHAMMED EBN ABD'AL BAKI, AL KODAI. <sup>a</sup> ISM. ABU'LFED. & AL KODAI, ubi sup. AL JANNAB. <sup>b</sup> AL KODAI, AL BEIDAWI, Disputat. Christian, c. 4. <sup>c</sup> ISM. ABU'LFED. ubi sup. p. 99. AL KODAI, AL MONDRERI, apud Joan. Gagn. in not. ad Abu'lled. ubi sup. p. 149. <sup>d</sup> EN ISHAK, AL KODAI, AL KOR. MOHAM. f. xxxiii. v. 47. GAGN. ubi sup. <sup>e</sup> ABU'LFED. ubi sup. p. 79. AL JANNAB. EBN ISHAK. AL JANNAB. GREG. ABU'LFAR. hist. dynast. p. 165. AHMED EBN YUSEF, JALLALO'DDIN, AHMED EBN YAHYA.

BESIDES Mary and Sbirin, Mokawkas set the prophet two other beautiful Egyptian, or Coptic, girls, which he probably made use of as concubines. But how he disposed of them, after they settled with him at Medina, what were their names, or when and where they died, we have not been informed by any of the Moslem historians <sup>h</sup>.

THAT the desire of satisfying his sensuality was one of the principal motives of Mohammed's undertaking, seems indisputably clear from the great number of wives and concubines he maintained, as well as from the wicked and unjustifiable methods he was obliged to make us of, in order to come at some of them. But, notwithstanding this, we must not imagine, as some learned men have done, that he granted an unbounded plurality, or even the same number, of wives to his followers. For, according to the express words of the Korân, no man can have more than four women, whether wives or concubines, to his share. And if any one apprehends an inconvenience from even that number of ingenuous wives, it is added, as an advice, which is generally followed by the middling and inferior people, that he marry one only; or, if he cannot be contented with one, that he take up with his she-slaves, not exceeding, however, the limited number. This is certainly the utmost Mohammed allowed his followers. Nor can we urge, as an argument against so plain a precept, the corrupt manners of his followers, many of whom, especially men of quality and fortune, indulge themselves in the most criminal excesses; nor yet the example of the prophet himself, who had peculiar privileges in this and other points, as will be observed hereafter. In making the above-mentioned limitation, Mohammed was directed by the decision of the Jerriſh doctors, who, by way of council, limit the number of wives to four, though their law confines them not to any certain number. These observations we have thought fit to make, though in direct opposition to what has been advanced, upon this head both by Dr. Prideaux and Father Marracci, in order to manifest to the world our inflexible attachment to truth, the inseparable property of every just and impartial historian <sup>i</sup>.

As Mohammed was wholly illiterate, and consequently could neither write nor read, 'tis self-evident, that he himself did not commit to writing the scheme of religion which he had framed; nor consequently pen those written revelations, as he pretended them to be, which compose the Korân. Besides, whatever proficiency he might have made in literature, this would certainly have been beneath his dignity, whether we consider him as a prophet, or a great and powerful prince. He must therefore have had some secretaries, or amanuenses, to assist him in transmitting down to posterity his decisions, as well as to take down in writing the orders and directions that he found it necessary to publish, from time to time, on a great variety of occasions. And that, in fact, he had a considerable number of such amanuenses, we learn from both Abu Jaafar Al Tabari and Abu'lſeda; the principal of which, according to those authors, seem to have been the following <sup>k</sup>.

OTHMAN EBN AFFAN and Ali Ebn Abu Tâleb, whom we have so frequently mentioned in this history, were the prophet's principal amanuenses that he made use of in committing to paper his pretended revelations; for which reason we find them stiled by Al Kodai, the scribes, or secretaries, of the divine revelation <sup>l</sup>.

OBBA EBN CAAB and Zeid Ebn Thâbet, in their absence, suppl'd the places of the former amanuenses, and were greatly confided in by the prophet. If they were at any time absent, he thought fit to employ some of the inferior scribes, says Al Tabari, and particularly Moâwiyah Ebn Abu Sofîân, who was afterwards Khalîf, Khâled Ebn Said Al As, Al Ala Ebn Al Hadbama, and Khantala Al Rabî. However, he took care not to impart his pretended revelations to any at first, but those in whom an intire confidence might be reposed <sup>m</sup>.

HE likewise employed, on some occasions, Abd'allah Ebn Saad Ebn Abu Sarah, who falsified the Korân by his interpolations, and was for that reason proscribed after the reduction of Mecca, as has been already observed <sup>n</sup>.

BESIDES these, Mohammed appointed Al Zobeir Ebn Al Awân and Jahm Ebn Safwân to take down an account of the alms that were regularly collected; Hodeifa Ebn Al Samâl to draw up an estimate of the dates that were received; Al Mogbeira Ebn Shoba and Hoscin Ebn

<sup>g</sup> Iidem ibid. AL KODAI. Al Kor. MOHAM. f. lxxvi. PRID. ubi supra. p. 85. GAGN. ubi sup. p. 150.

<sup>h</sup> AHMED EBN YUSEF, GAGN. la vie de Mahom. tom. ii. p. 335. <sup>i</sup> NIC. CUSANUS, in cribrat. Al Kor. lib. ii. c. 19. CLEARIUS, itinerar. P. GREG. THOLOSANUS, in synt. juris, lib. ix. c. 2. sect. 22. SEPTIM-CASTRENSIS, de morib. Turc. p. 24. RYBAUT's present state of the Ottoman empire, book iii. chap. 21. LUDOVIC. MARRACC. in prodr. ad refut. Alcor. par. iv. p. 52, & 71. CHARDIN, voy. de Perse, tom. i. p. 166. DU RYER, sommaire de la rel. des Turcs, &c. PUFFENDORF. de jure nat. & gent. lib. vi. c. 1. sect. 18. Al Kor. MOHAM. f. iv. HADR. RELAND. de relig. Mahom. p. 243—251. SELDEN. ux. Hebr. lib. i. c. 9. MAUNDEV. travels, p. 164. MAIMON. in Hal. Ish. c. 14. JALLALO'DDIN, GAGN. not. ad Abu'lſed. ubi sup. p. 150. 151.

<sup>k</sup> AL TABAR. apud Al Makin. hist. Saracenic. p. 10. ISM. ABU'LFED. ubi sup. p. 152. AL KODAI. GAGN. ubi sup. p. 152. <sup>l</sup> AL TABAR. & ABU'LFED. ubi sup. <sup>m</sup> Iidem ibid. <sup>n</sup> AL BEIDAWI.

Nomair to keep a regular account of the finances, or execute the office of clerks of the exchequer; and Abd'allah Ebn Orkham to discharge the function of secretary of state, and answer the letters of those sovereign princes whom the prophet honoured with his correspondence. He also sent Ali Ebn Abu Tâleb, Maadh Ebn Jabal, and Abu Mûsa, to Yaman, to preside over all judicial affairs in that province; made Anas Ebn Mâlec, who died about the year of the Hejra 93, when he was above an hundred years of age, after his conversion to Islamism, master of his household, or, as some say, his head-porter, in which post he served him nine or ten years; pitched upon Belâl for his common crier; and constituted Kais Ebn Saad, the Ansâr, captain of his guards. As for his governors of cities and provinces, Otâb Ebn Ofaid was the commandant of Mecca at the time of his decease; Al Ala Ebn Hadrama governed the province of Al Babrein; Othmân Ebn Abu'l As the city of Al Tâyes; Omar Ebn Abu Ommeya, the Makzbûmite, the city of Sanaa, and the villages in the district of Al Janad; Khâled Ebn Said Ebn Abu'l As many others of the towns and cantons of Yaman; Abu Sofiân Ebn Harb the cities of Najran and Jorsh; Zeyâd Ebn Lobeid, the Ansâr, the province of Hadramaut; Abu Mûsa, the Asbarite, who resided at Zabid and Aden, the country called Mekblaf; Omar Ebn Al As the province of Omân, and its dependences; Yezid Ebn Abu Sofiân the city of Tayma; and Ali Ebn Mina a particular extent of territory in the province of Yaman. Some of which officers we may probably have occasion to mention hereafter, in our history of the first Khalîfs, or immediate successors of Mohammed °.

His companions.

As for those persons who had an undoubted right to the honourable title of Sababi, or Sakaba, or to be considered as proper companions of the prophet, we cannot pretend to determine the number of them with any tolerable precision, as authors are divided in their sentiments on this subject. Said Ebn Al Masîb, one of the seven great doctors skilled in the law, who lived in the times immediately succeeding the age of Mohammed, maintains, that no person ought to be ranked amongst the companions of the prophet, who had not conversed with him a year or more before his death, and even fought under him, in some sacred war against the infidels. Some, however, extend the aforesaid title to all who ever had any discourse with him, embraced Islamism in his life-time, or even ever saw him in public. Such a one they affirm to have been a proper companion of the prophet, tho' he should never have been above a single hour in his company. Lastly, others assert, that this honour belongs only to those whom Mohammed himself received into the number of his companions, and inrolled amongst his troops; who constantly afterwards adhered to him, remained always closely attached to his interest, and attended him in his expeditions. Such companions as these, to the number of 10,000, acted under his conduct, when he made himself master of Mecca; with 12,000 of them he fought the battle of Honein; above 40,000 accompanied him in the pilgrimage of valediction; and, at the time of his death, according to an exact list of those who went under that denomination, the number of his Moslem companions amounted to 124,000 effective men °.

AMONGST the prophet's companions, the Mohâjerîn, or those who attended him in his flight to Medina, held the first rank. The next to these, in point of dignity, were the Ansârs, or those auxiliaries who immediately joined him upon his expulsion from Mecca. However, these took place of the later Mohâjerîn, or refugees, who came in after Mohammed's settlement at Medina. These companions have been distributed into different classes, in the following chronological order, by some of the best Oriental historians °.

THE first class comprehends all those who first declared themselves converts to Islamism; such were Khadijah, Ali, Zeid Ebn Hâretha, Abu Becr Al Seddik, and all the others who immediately followed their example, and professed themselves Moslems, before the fury of the Khoreish obliged the prophet to retire to mount Al Safâ °.

THE second includes Omar, and all the rest of the Arabs who became proselytes to Islamism, while the prophet remained on the top of that mountain °.

THE third class consists of the Mohâjerîn, as they are called by Abu'lfeda, who were obliged to seek for refuge at the court of the Najâshi, and consequently to make their escape into Ethiopia °.

THE fourth class is composed of those companions of Mohammed, who attended him the first time to Al Akaba, a hill on the north-side of Mecca, and those Ansârs, or confederates, of the tribes of Khazraj and Aws, who gave them the meeting there °.

THE fifth class comprises those who met the second time at Al Akaba, and took an oath of fidelity to Mohammed there, by which they oblige themselves to renounce all idolatry, and to obey the prophet in all things that were reasonable °.

° AL TABAR. ubi sup. AL KODAI, AL JANNAB. SIM. OCKL. lib. de expugnat. Syr. GAGN. ubi sup. p. 152, 153. ° ABU'LFED. ubi sup. c. lxxii. p. 156, 157. GAGN. la vie de Mahom. tom. ii. p. 335—338.

° ABU'LFED. ubi sup. p. 157. GAGN. ubi sup. p. 337. ° ABU'LFED. ubi sup. p. 17, 157. ° ABU'LFED. ubi sup. p. 22, 157. ° Idem ibid. ° Idem ibid. ° ABU'LFED. ubi sup. p. 157.

a THE sixth is destined for them who assembled the third time on Al Akaba, and made profession of Islamism, who amounted to about seventy in number <sup>x</sup>.

THE seventh contains all the Mohâjerîn that resorted to Mohammed at Medina, before he had finished the new temple, or mosque, that he erected there <sup>y</sup>.

THE eighth takes in all the troops he had with him at the battle of Bedr <sup>z</sup>.

THE ninth class is made up of those who came over to him during the interval between the battle of Bedr and his inauguration at Al Hodeibiya <sup>a</sup>.

THE tenth is formed of those who took the oath of fealty, or inauguration, to Mohammed under the tree at that place <sup>b</sup>.

b THE eleventh is allotted them who embrace Islamism during the space of time between the inauguration at Al Hodeibiya and the reduction of Mecca <sup>c</sup>.

THE twelfth exhibits those who were compelled to profess themselves Moslems the day on which Mecca was taken <sup>d</sup>.

THE thirteenth class is appropriated to those who saw the prophet, but were children at the time of his death <sup>e</sup>.

c To these may be added those poor indigent persons called Assessors, who, being destitute of friends and relations, and all sorts of necessities, implored the prophet's protection. They derived their name from the position they were generally in; being, for the most part seated on the Sofa, or bench, of the mosque, as they had no settled place of habitation. The prophet frequently admitted some of these poor people to his own table, and recommended others of them to the hospitality of his companions. The most celebrated amongst them were Abu Horeira, whom we have already taken notice of, Aibala Ebn Aska, Abu Dhar, and others, on whom Abu'lfeda very kindly confers his benediction <sup>f</sup>.

d THE second, or lower, order of those persons who lived in the time of the prophet, are The Tabeites. the Tabeites, that is to say, the followers, votaries, or adherents. These agree with the companions of the prophet in this, that many of them were cotemporaries with him; but in this they differ from them, that none of them either saw or conversed ever with him. However, some of them did themselves the honour to write to him, and apprise him of their conversion to Islamism. Such was the Najâshi, or king of Ethiopia, the first prince, according to Mohammed Ebn Abda'l Bâki, that the prophet invited to the profession of his religion; who never saw Mohammed, though he frequently conversed with some of his companions. Such was Badhân, the Persian, governor of Yaman, who became an easy proselyte to Islamism, and all the other Persians that followed his example. Such, finally, were all those Arab tribes, and sovereign princes, that the prophet brought over to the Mohammedan faith; of whom we have given our readers a detail in the preceding parts of this history <sup>g</sup>.

e THE most illustrious of the prophet's friends were Abu Becr, Omar, Othmân, and Ali, The prophet's the four first Khalifs, who were his immediate successors. He afterwards also contracted friends, officers, servants, &c. a very great intimacy with Jaasar, Abu Dhar, Mokdad, Salmân the Persian, Hodeifa, Ebn Masud, Amer Ebn Taser, and Belâl, his public crier. Amru Ebn Omm Ma'âum, who acted jointly with Belâl in the capacity of crier, Saad the Koradhite, the public crier of the mosque at Koba, and Abu Makhdura, who officiated in that quality at Mecca, during the absence of Belâl, had likewise a very considerable share of his favour. Besides whom, he had several favourites amongst his domestics, officers, judges, slaves, and poets; the most noted of which seem to have been the following <sup>h</sup>.

f ANAS EBN MALEC EBN AL NASR, of the tribe of Khazraj, already mentioned, one of the six authors of the most authentic Moslem traditions, who served Mohammed nine or ten years in quality of head-porter, apparitor, or else master of his household; for, in this point, authors are not fully agreed; which procured him a great degree of familiarity with the prophet. He died at Bostra, about the year of the Hejra 93, after he had completed the 103d year of his age, and had begotten 100 children, in conformity to his master's prediction. He survived all the prophet's other proper companions, who were dignified and distinguished with the title of Sâkaba <sup>i</sup>.

ABD'ALLAH EBN MASUD was one of the first of those who were honoured with the title of Sabeka, that is to say, one of the first Antecessors. He distinguished himself at the battle of Bedr, and in several other engagements. He had the prophet's pillow, tooth-picker, shoes, and water of purification, committed to his care. He prayed over the body of Abu Dhar, at a place called Rabadha; and died at Medina, in the 32d year of the Hejra, a little after Abu Dhar <sup>k</sup>.

OKBA EBN OMER, the prophet's muleteer, was extremely well versed in the Korân, or divine book, as 'tis called by the Moslems; and perfectly understood all the rites, ceremonies,

<sup>x</sup> Idem ibid. <sup>y</sup> Idem ibid. <sup>z</sup> Idem ibid. <sup>a</sup> Idem ibid. <sup>b</sup> Idem ibid. <sup>c</sup> Idem ibid.
<sup>d</sup> Idem ibid. <sup>e</sup> Idem ibid. <sup>f</sup> ABU'LFED. ubi sup. p. 157, 158. <sup>g</sup> D'HERBEL. bibl. Orient. GAGN. ubi sup. p. 340.
<sup>h</sup> AL MAKIN. AL JANNAB. ABU'LFED. &c. GAGN. ubi sup. p. 341.
<sup>i</sup> Idem ibid. <sup>k</sup> Idem ibid.

and ordinances, of the law. He was also a celebrated poet, and was made governor of Egypt <sup>a</sup> by the Khalif Moawiyah, in the year of the Hejra 44; but succeeded in that post, the following year, by Mosilama Ebn Morkalled, the Ansar, of the tribe of Khazraj. He died in the year of the Hejra 58 <sup>1</sup>.

DHU MOKHAMMARA, the nephew of Asbama, the Najáshi, or king of Ethiopia, so often mentioned in this history <sup>m</sup>.

RABIA EBN CAAB, the Aslamite, who took care of the water destined for the sacred ablution, called Wodú. He died in the 63d year of the Hejra <sup>n</sup>.

AIMAN EBN OBEID, who washed the prophet with the water of purification. He had the honour to die a martyr at the battle of Honein; in which action being pierced with an arrow, he dropped down dead at Mohammed's feet <sup>o</sup>.

SAAD, who, together with Belál Ebn Riyák, the crier, an Ethiopian, had been Abu Bacr's slave <sup>p</sup>.

BOCAIR EBN SHADAKH, the Leithite, and Al Asla Ebn Shoraik, the Acfite, who was trusted with the care of the prophet's mules <sup>q</sup>.

ABU'L SAMAH, whose proper name was Ayád, one of the prophet's domestics; Michájer, a slave belonging to Omm Salma, one of his wives; Honein, slave to Ebn Abbás; Naim Ebn Rabia; and Abu'l Hamra, another of the prophet's domestics, who died at Hems <sup>r</sup>.

OMM AIMAN, Omm Ofáma, Khawla, Omm Ráfe, Maimúna, and Omm Abbás, the prophet's chamber-maids *.

ZEID EBN HARETHA EBN SHORHEIL, who was killed in the battle of Múta; Ofáma Ebn Zeid, whom the prophet constituted general of the army destined to act against the Greeks in Syria, just before his death; Abu Abd'allah Thawbán, who, after the death of Mohammed, retired to Hems, where he died in the year of the Hejra 54. Shokran; Abu Salab, the Ethiopian, or, as some will have it, the Persian; Rabáb; Soyar, the prophet's chief shepherd, who was massacred by the Oranite Arabs; Abu Ráfe, the Copt, who was afterwards secretary to Ali, when he was Khalif; Modgham, who was slain by an arrow that came from an unknown quarter; Mafúra, the Copt, a present from Mokawkas; Safaina, the register; Abu Hend; Anjashá, groom of the stable to the prophet; Salmán the Persian, a native of Isfahan, who has been already mentioned in this history; Shemun, or Simeon, Ebn Zeid, the father of the beautiful Ribána, who was at the taking of Damascus, in the thirteenth year of the Hejra, and afterwards settled at Jerusalem; Mocawal; and Náfe Abu'l Saieb; all originally the prophet's slaves <sup>s</sup>.

CAAB EBN ZOHAIK, a celebrated poet, already mentioned, who died in the Khalifat of Moawiyah; Abd'allah Ebn Rawáha; Hasan Ebn Thábet, the Ansar, who lived 120 years, 60 in the time of ignorance, or paganism, and 60 after the introduction of Islamism, his father and grandfather having arrived at the same age before their death, and died in the 54th year of the Hejra; Amru Ebn Al Acwa, the Aslamite, and Anjashá, Mohammed's groom of the stable above-mentioned, who had been one of Al Aswad's slaves, were the prophet's poets, after the establishment of Mohammedism in Arabia <sup>t</sup>.

His horses, mules, asses,
camels, &c.

THAT he had 22 fine horses, we learn from Al Termedi; the seven principal of which, according to Al Háfedh Abd'al Múmen of Al Damiati, were Sacab, the light or nimble, Lahif, that covered the ground with his tail, Al Sabba, the magnificent, Al Dhareb, shaking the earth with his hoof, Al Lazáz, the swift, Al Mortajez, the thunderer, and Al Ward, the red. His mules of greatest note, according to the same Al Termedi, were Al Daldal, the trembler, and Fadda, silver; the former of which he received as a present from Mokawkas, governor of Egypt, and the latter from Farwa Ebn Amrú, the Jodhamite, in the tenth year of the Hejra. The prophet himself was mounted on Al Daldal at the battle of Honein, and his uncle Al Abbás on Fadda, the night before the surrender of Mecca. His principal asses were Ofair, that rolled himself in the dust, and Tafúr, the brave, the hardy, or the roe-buck, that was given him by Mokawkas. The latter of which, as the Moslems pretend, threw himself headlong into the well, called the well, or fountain, of Abu Hotkam, out of grief and sorrow for the death of the prophet. The chief of his camels were Al Kafwa, that had the tip of one of his ears cut off, Al Adhba, the mutilated, maimed, &c. Al Fadba, the short or slit-eared, and another that he bought for 80 dirhems of the Banu Keshair. The first of these fell down upon his knees upon the spot of ground where the great mosque was afterwards erected at Medina; and also, according to Al Jannábi, understood the words of the Korán revealed at the pilgrimage of valediction. The second Ali rode, when he published to the people of Mecca the ninth chapter of the Korán. But of the third and fourth we find nothing remarkable related by the Oriental authors. Besides these, the prophet had twenty milk-camels, that supplied

<sup>1</sup> GAGN. ubi sup. p. 342.

<sup>2</sup> Idem ibid.

<sup>3</sup> AL JANNAB. ABU'LEED. &c.

<sup>m</sup> Idem, p. 313.

* Idem ibid.

<sup>n</sup> Idem ibid.

<sup>o</sup> Idem ibid.

<sup>p</sup> Idem ibid.

<sup>q</sup> AL JANNAB. ubi sup. p. 287, & alib. ELMACIN.

- a him every day with a large quantity of milk, which he distributed amongst his women. He had also an hundred sheep, and six or seven milk-goats, that were fed and milked by his nurse Omm Aiman. As for his white cock, of an immense size, that has been so pompously and magnificently described by Al Termedi, it ought to be looked upon as an animal purely imaginary; and therefore the account of it given us by that writer, which is intirely fabulous, merits not the least attention <sup>u</sup>.

- We have likewise a list of the swords, lances, bows, cuirasses, shields, helmets, pikes, His arms, military ensigns, &c. that the prophet left behind him. His swords were in number nine; Mâbûr, the sharp, Al Adhab, the pointed, Dhu'l Fakar, the piercing, the Kola'ite, Al Battâr, the cutting, Al Half, ruin, death, &c. Al Metdham, the keen, Al Rosûb, the penetrating, and Al Kadib, the thin, or Al Mokbazzem, the piercing. The third of which, Dhu'l Fakar, the prophet had allotted him as part of the spoil after the battle of Bedr. It belonged to Munba Ebn Al Habâj, who was killed in the action; and, after the death of Mohammed, who used it in all his future engagements, it fell into the hands of Ali. The fourth sword, called the Kola'ite, was so denominated from the city of Kola', near Hokwân, in Assyria, a place famous for the excellent sword-blades that were made there. The seventh, Al Metdham, was taken from the Banu Kainoka'; and the two last were found amongst the treasures belonging to the idol Al Fatas, when Ali completed its destruction. He also took from the Banu Kainoka' two lances, called Al Monthawi and Al Monthari, the destroying and the dispersing, and three bows, one of which had the name of Al Catûm, or the solid. His quiver he denominated Al Jama', or the collection. His cuirasses went under the appellations of Dhât Al Fodhûl, the excellent, or full of excellencies, &c. Dhât Al Weshab, fortified with a leathern belt, Dhât Al Hawâshi, adorned with a border and fringes, Al Betrâ, the interseced, Al Khernâk, so called, perhaps, from the hare's skin with which it was covered, or which it resembled in lightness, Al Sa'adia, the Saadite, that he found amongst the spoils taken from the Banu Kainoka', and was said to be that which David had on when he slew the giant Goliath, and Al Fadda, the silver, or washed with silver, which he likewise acquired in his expedition against the Banu Kainoka'. His three shields, Al Zalûk, the repellent, Al Razîn, the strong, or firm, Al Fatîk, the flash, brightness, or the brilliant, he also took from his enemies. He had two helmets, an interior and exterior one; the latter of which, called Al Mawashshah, the fillet, wreath, or wreathed garland, he wore at the battle of Ohed. The longest of his pikes had the name of Baidha, the white; his three half-pikes, the first of which was presented to Zubair Ebn Azzâm by the Najâshi, were denominated Atra, Al Nab'a, and Al Hafr. Besides which, he had a stick, or rod, called Mamshâk, and another crooked one that he carried in his hand at the surrender of Mecca; together with a little cane, that went under the appellation of Orjân. The great standard of Islamism, as well as his other larger military ensigns and colours, for the most part, was white; tho' some of the latter had a mixture of black in them. They were generally adorned with a double profession of the Mohammedan faith, contained in the following words; THERE IS NO GOD BUT GOD; MOHAMMED IS THE APOSTLE OF GOD. As for his signet, or seal, that he caused to be made before he invited the neighbouring princes to Islamism, we shall say nothing of it here, as having given a full and ample description of it in a former part of this work <sup>w</sup>.
- d
- e

- WITH regard to the number of his expeditions, authors are not perfectly agreed. Some His expeditions make them nineteen, others twenty-six, and others again twenty-seven; of which the last was that of Tabûc. In nine of these he commanded his army in person; namely, at Bedr, Ohod, the war of the ditch, those undertaken against the tribe of Korcidha, the Banu Mestalek, and the Jews of Kbaibar; as also at the reduction of Mecca, the battle of Huncin, and the siege of Al Tâyesf. In all his other wars, the troops were commanded by some of his generals. As for his lesser military expeditions, or rather predatory excursions, some assert them to have amounted to thirty five, others to forty-seven, and, lastly, others to fifty; tho', in our opinion, they greatly exceeded that number. It was not without reason, therefore, that he was stiled by many of his followers, the prophet of war, or, to approach nearer our form and manner of expression, the warlike prophet <sup>x</sup>.
- f

BEFORE we conclude our history of the life and actions of Mohammed, that we here present our readers with, it will be proper just to touch upon some of the principal privileges and prerogatives that were granted him, as well as those peculiar to the Arab nation, according to the Moslem writers. For, to give a large account, or even a bare enumeration of all of them, such as is to be met with in the aforesaid authors, many of which have not the least tendency to illustrate the Mohammedan history, would be altogether inconsistent The principal privileges and prerogatives of Mohammed, and the Arab nation.

<sup>u</sup> AL TERMED. in lib. dist. Haiawato'l Hicwân, AL HAFEDH AEDA'L MUMEN AL DAMIATI, AL JANNAB. ABU'LFED. AL BEIDAWI, AL KODAI, GAGN. not. ad Abu'lfed. ubi sup. p. 153—156. <sup>w</sup> ISM. ABU'LFED. ubi sup. c. lxx. p. 153—156. AL JANNAB. AL KODAI, AL TERMEDI, AL TABARI, & MACHUL, apud Al Kodaium. Vide etiam GAGN. not. ad Abu'lfed. ubi sup. p. 153—156. <sup>x</sup> ISM. ABU'LFED. ubi sup. c. lxxi. p. 156. AL JANNAB. ubi sup. p. 78, & alib.

with the brevity here proposed; nor, indeed, can an insertion of so many particulars, the a greatest part of which will not afford our readers the least advantage or rational entertainment, be expected in a work of this nature.

HE was the first of the prophets in the order of creation, though the last in the order of mission; Adam, and all other creatures, having been created by him <sup>r</sup>.

His glorious name is written upon the throne of God, and upon all the gates of the seven heavens <sup>z</sup>.

HE was foretold by the ancient prophets, in whose writings his name and epithets are expressly mentioned, as well as those of his companions, successors, and nation <sup>a</sup>.

THE devil, or Eblis, was thrown down from heaven at the moment of his birth; and all his accomplices were then expelled from the seven heavens, which, till that time, they b had been permitted to enter <sup>b</sup>.

His breast was miraculously opened by angels, and he had the seal of prophecy in a supernatural manner impressed upon him <sup>c</sup>.

ANGELS sheltered him with their wings from the heat of the sun <sup>d</sup>.

HE surpassed all the rest of mankind in sense and understanding, and particularly in every branch of divine knowledge <sup>e</sup>.

HE was saluted by the prophets and patriarchs in his night-journey to heaven <sup>f</sup>.

HE performed that journey, traversing the immense space which includes the seven heavens <sup>g</sup>.

HE was permitted to approach within two cubits length of the throne of God, who con- c versed with him, and promised to defend him against all who should attempt to obstruct his designs <sup>h</sup>.

HE trod in the steps of the great prophet who immediately preceded him <sup>i</sup>.

HE was saluted by the angels, who afterwards fought for him, as well as by the prophets, and saluted them all in his turn <sup>k</sup>.

THE Korân was brought down from heaven to him, tho' he was intirely illiterate, understood no language but his own, and could neither read nor write <sup>l</sup>.

THE Korân, which the Moslems call his book, as having been revealed to him, was itself a miracle, and will be preserved through the course of all succeeding ages from every species of alteration or corruption. 'Tis a permanent and perpetual miracle, differing from the d books, or miracles, of the other prophets, which have been diminished, if not, in a great measure, destroyed, by time; but had they been preserved intire to this very day, they would, in point of excellency, have been much inferior to the Korân <sup>m</sup>.

HE wrought more miracles than all the other prophets put together; some making them to amount to 1,000, and others to above three times that number, without including the Korân, which, according to the Moslems, is the greatest of all miracles <sup>n</sup>.

THE Korân itself contains near 60,000 miracles; every verse of this sacred book being considered as one of them. This, according to the Mohammedans, sufficiently appears from the Arabic word Ayât, which signifies both a verse and a sign, or miracle, as has been observed by Mr. Gagnier, who has followed the learned Dr. Pocock in this particular <sup>o</sup>.

WHEN the infidels demanded a sign of him, the moon appeared to them cloven in two, one part vanishing, and the other remaining. Nay, Ebu Mas'ud affirmed, that he saw mount Harâ interpose between the two sections. The stones also saluted him, a beam or trunk of a tree groaned in his presence, and streams of water issued from between his fingers. He likewise in one day preached to all mankind, and instructed them in the knowledge of the true God. Nay, the genii, or demons, and even the angels themselves, attended his predication <sup>p</sup>.

HE had more followers than all the other prophets put together; his mission being the effect of the divine mercy to all creatures. Those, therefore, who will not allow the validity of it, will hereafter be doomed to eternal punishment; whereas all the Moslems, or true f believers, will be transplanted to a state of great and unspeakable felicity <sup>q</sup>.

God has divided his praises and benedictions with him, and has joined his own great name with that of the prophet in the Korân <sup>r</sup>.

<sup>r</sup> AL JANNAB. ubi sup. p. 223. <sup>z</sup> Idem ibid. Vide etiam PRID. ubi sup. p. 36. AL KOR. MOHAM. f. vii, lxxi, &c. <sup>a</sup> AL JANNAB. <sup>b</sup> AL KOR. MOHAM. f. xv. AL BEIDAWI, JALLALO'DDIN. <sup>c</sup> ABU'LFED. ubi sup. p. 9, 143, &c. SHAHABO'DDIN EBN ABU'L DAM, in Tarikh, seu hist. dict. Al-Mubtahir, MOSLEM, AL BOKHAR. AL JANNAB, &c. <sup>d</sup> AL BEIDAWI, AL JANNAB. <sup>e</sup> ABU'LFED. AL JANNAB. AL BEIDAWI, aliique in AL KOR. commentat. <sup>f</sup> ABU HOREIR. ABU'LFED. GUERAGN. AL JANNAB. &c. <sup>g</sup> Idem ibid. <sup>h</sup> Idem ibid. & AL KOR. MOHAM. f. liii. <sup>i</sup> AL BOKHAR. AL JANNAB. &c. <sup>k</sup> AL KOR. MOHAM. AL BEIDAWI, JALLALO'DDIN, &c. <sup>l</sup> AL KOR. MOHAM. ABU'LFED. AL BOKHAR. AL JANNAB. &c. <sup>m</sup> AL BOKHAR. AL JANNAB. aliique scriptor. Arab. pass. <sup>n</sup> Idem ibid. <sup>o</sup> POC. not. in hist. spec. Arab. p. 192. <sup>p</sup> GAGN. la vie de Mahom. tom. i. p. 172, &c. AL ZAHABESHAR. AL BEIDAWI, AL GHAZAL. ABU'LFED. POC. not. in spec. hist. Arab. p. 188. AL KOR. MOHAM. f. lxxii. IERANIANI, AL KODAI, JALLALO'DDIN, aliique scriptor. Arabic. pass. <sup>q</sup> GAGN. la vie de Mahom. tom. iii. p. 367, 368. <sup>r</sup> AL BOKHAR. AL KOR. MOHAM. pass.

a GOD has commanded the world to obey him, to submit itself wholly to his will and direction; having conferred the government of it upon him, in full and proper sovereignty, with a perfect infallibility in all points whatsoever, according to what we find asserted in that lively oracle of GOD, the Korân <sup>s</sup>.

GOD never calls him by his proper name in the Korân, but makes use of the terms prophet and apostle. He has also forbidden the people of his own nation in that book to address him in any other manner; at least this must be admitted, if Jallalo'ddin's authority may be depended upon <sup>t</sup>.

GOD has vouchsafed him innumerable instances of his extraordinary love and dilection, both by conversing in a familiar manner with him, and by his nocturnal revelations <sup>u</sup>.

b HE elevated him to the highest pitch of empire and power, communicated the knowledge of the law and the truth to him, and took him under his more immediate protection when he was threatened by any impending dangers, especially when he found himself obliged to fly from Mecca to Medina <sup>w</sup>.

HE favoured him with the gift of the sublimest and most inimitable eloquence, offered him the keys of the treasures of the earth, and enabled him to comprehend the natures of all things, five mysteries only excepted, which he afterwards revealed to him, but enjoined him not to discover them to any other person whatsoever <sup>x</sup>.

THE prophet had the most perfect knowledge of his genealogy and descent of any man that ever lived.

c THERE is no mention made of GOD either in the formula of the proclamation for prayer, or the exordium of any sermon, or the profession of faith, or, lastly, in the preface of any book, where the apostle of GOD likewise is not expressly mentioned <sup>y</sup>.

GOD voluntarily offered him a remission of his sins, and clearly revealed to him every thing that should happen to his nation through the course of all succeeding ages, even to the day of judgment <sup>z</sup>.

HE is the prince and lord of all the children of Adam; is more noble in the sight of GOD than any of his other creatures; was supported and sustained by the angels Gabriel, Michael, Israfil, and Azraël, who protected him from all the insults and attacks of evil demons <sup>a</sup>.

d His wives and daughters were the most excellent of women; his companions (after the prophets) the most worthy of men; and his mosque, in point of dignity, superior to all others <sup>b</sup>.

THE angel of death durst not demand his soul without asking him leave first; which was an honour never granted any prophet before him <sup>c</sup>.

HE had a right to the best part of the spoils that were taken from the enemy in any successful expedition; nay, sometimes he was allowed to take the whole booty to himself, to dispose of it as he pleased <sup>d</sup>.

e BEFORE his time the whole earth was polluted by the Christians and the Jews; no prayers being any-where said, except in the churches of the former, or the synagogues of the latter. But he converted other places of worship into mosques, and purified the whole earth by the institution of the Tayammom, whereby the dust on the surface of it was declared pure, and allowed, on some occasions, to supply the want of water to perform the Wudu, or sacred ablution <sup>e</sup>.

HE instituted the five prayers, the proclamation for prayer, and the actual recitation of it; as also the manner of performing this duty, upon the model of that observed by the angels, the day of public divine service in mosques, or Friday, and the salutation of peace still in use amongst the Mohammedans <sup>f</sup>.

HE first discovered to the Arabs the favourable hour in which their prayers would most certainly be heard <sup>g</sup>.

f HE instituted the immolation of the victims in the valley of Mina, on the tenth of Dhu'l-hajja; the fast of Ramadân, when paradise is adorned, and the devils chained; the breakfast at the conclusion of that fast, and the celebration of the night Al Kadr <sup>h</sup>.

HE also instituted, by his own example, the rite, or ceremony, of making the station on mount Arafat till sun-set, in order to merit a pardon, or remission, of sins for two years <sup>i</sup>.

HE introduced the custom of washing the hands after a repast, the form of making a hole on one side of a sepulchre, and the fashion of wearing turbants with two flaps hanging down behind; a mark of distinction used by the angels themselves <sup>k</sup>.

<sup>s</sup> AL KOR. MOHAM. f. liii. <sup>t</sup> AL KOR. MOHAM. f. xxiv. v. 64. JALLALO'DDIN. <sup>u</sup> ABU'LFED. AL BOEHAR. AL JANNAB. ABU HOREIR EBN ISHAK, AL KODAI, alique scriptor. Arabic. piff. <sup>w</sup> Idem ibid.

<sup>x</sup> AL BOEHAR. JALLALO'DDIN, AL BEIDAWI, EBN AL KAYEM, AL ZAMAKHSHAR. &c. <sup>y</sup> GAGN. ubi sup. p. 370. <sup>z</sup> AL KOR. MOHAM. f. xlvii. v. 20. JALLALO'DDIN, GAGN. ubi sup. p. 370. <sup>a</sup> ABU'LFED. AL JANNAB. AL SOHEILI, AL KOR. MOHAM. AL BEIDAWI, EBN ISHAK, JALLALO'DDIN, AL ZAMAKHSHAR. &c.

<sup>b</sup> AL GHAZAL. POCKOCK. not. in spec. hist. Arab. p. 274. GAGN. ubi sup. <sup>c</sup> AL SOHEILI, ubi sup. <sup>d</sup> AL KOR. MOHAM. ABU'LFED. <sup>e</sup> ABU'LFED. ubi sup. p. 83. AL KOR. MOHAM. f. v. v. 7. GAGN. ubi sup. p. 371. <sup>f</sup> GAGN. ubi sup. <sup>g</sup> Idem ibid. <sup>h</sup> MOSELM, JALIL EBN ABD'ALLAH, ABU'LFED. &c. <sup>i</sup> Idem ibid. <sup>k</sup> Commentat. in AL KOR. MOHAM.

HE will be the first of the sons of Adam that shall rise from the dead, and advance to the place of judgment, on his beast Al Borâk, escorted by 70,000 angels <sup>1</sup>.

HE will be called by his own proper name to the place of judgment, and will appear there dressed in the most magnificent robes of paradise, on a glorious footstool, on the right hand of the great tribunal <sup>m</sup>.

HE will then carry in his hand the standard of glory, under which Adam, and all his followers, will range themselves <sup>n</sup>.

IN the day of judgment, he will be the Imâm, or great pontiff, of the faithful, their orator and conductor <sup>o</sup>.

HE will be the first who, after the resurrection, shall lift up his head, who shall be permitted to look at God, and to adore him <sup>p</sup>.

HE shall be the first intercessor, and the first whose intercession shall be accepted <sup>q</sup>.

HE will be the first who shall pass over the bridge called Al Sirât, that is to say, the strait and the sharp; after which, he will command all his attendants to look downwards till his daughter Fâtema has done the same <sup>r</sup>.

HE will be the first who shall knock at the door, or gate, of paradise, when he shall be immediately admitted; after which, his daughter Fâtema shall enter, and then both of them shall drink large draughts of the water of Al Cawthar, a celebrated river in paradise <sup>s</sup>.

HE shall not be asked any questions at his admission into paradise, as the other prophets will. The pulpit in which he preached shall be placed before one of the gates of paradise, and he shall enjoy a most intimate and perpetual union with ALMIGHTY GOD <sup>t</sup>.

THE prophet's pedigree, or the genealogical succession of his ancestors, shall always remain; whereas all others shall be confounded and destroyed at the day of the resurrection <sup>u</sup>.

HE was forbidden to pay any tax or contribution whatsoever, and even to give any alms; from which his family was likewise exempted, according to the sentiments of the most approved Mohammedan authors <sup>v</sup>.

NONE of his family were ever to serve the office of collectors of the customs, as the members of it were to preach, and make expiation for others; which exempted them from the execution of all public offices <sup>w</sup>.

HE was not allowed to taste any thing that had a disagreeable odour, to cloath himself in cotton and fine linen, to be concerned in any species of fraud, finesse, or sinister dealings, in order to kill or get his enemy into his hands <sup>x</sup>.

HE was forbidden to espouse a repudiated woman, and, as some say, to lie with her also <sup>y</sup>.

HE was permitted to stay in the mosque, and to continue his prayers there, notwithstanding any pollution he might have contracted; as he never lost the purity he acquired, on any occasion, by the sacred ablution <sup>z</sup>.

HE was permitted to continue his prayers after mid-day, to kiss any woman upon a fast-day, and even, if his inclinations were very impetuous, to lie with her <sup>a</sup>.

HE was allowed to perform the pilgrimage to Mecca without putting on the Ibrâm, or sacred habit, to look at all the strange women there, and even to retire with them into a secret place, in order to enjoy them <sup>b</sup>.

HE was allowed to marry above four wives, to espouse a woman without any witnesses, and even to affiancé himself to her, tho' she was within the prohibited degrees <sup>c</sup>.

HE had several peculiar privileges in relation to the spoils taken from an enemy; that have been already mentioned in other parts of this work <sup>d</sup>.

HE was permitted to commit murder within the sacred territory, and even in the city of Mecca itself; to pass what sentence he pleased upon any of his followers; and to receive presents from his clients, which every other person was prohibited to do <sup>e</sup>.

HE was allowed to make what division of lands he pleased, and that even before he had made himself master of them; the Moslems supposing that God had put him in possession of the whole earth. And in consequence of this privilege, according to Al Ghazâli, he divided, in an arbitrary manner, some lands belonging to the Banu Tamim Al Dûri <sup>f</sup>.

HIS prayers were always heard, though his attention might have been sometimes interrupted in the course of them; a lie uttered against him was infinitely more insupportable to him than one advanced against any other person; and his urine, as well as his blood, was extremely pure, and even in many cases medicinal <sup>g</sup>.

<sup>1</sup> GAGN. ubi sup. p. 376.

<sup>m</sup> Idem ibid.

<sup>n</sup> Idem ibid.

<sup>o</sup> Idem ibid.

<sup>p</sup> Idem

ibid. <sup>q</sup> Idem ibid.

<sup>r</sup> AL GHAZAL.

<sup>s</sup> Idem.

<sup>t</sup> GAGN. ubi sup. p. 377.

<sup>u</sup> Idem

ibid. p. 378.

<sup>w</sup> Idem ibid. p. 381.

<sup>x</sup> Idem ibid.

<sup>y</sup> Idem ibid. p. 382.

<sup>z</sup> Idem ibid.

<sup>a</sup> Idem ibid. p. 383.

<sup>b</sup> Idem ibid.

<sup>c</sup> Idem ibid.

<sup>d</sup> AL KOR. MOHAM. f. xxxiii.

<sup>e</sup> AL

KOR. MOHAM. ARU'LFED. &c.

<sup>f</sup> GAGN. ubi sup. p. 383, 384.

<sup>g</sup> AL GHAZAL.

<sup>h</sup> GAGN.

ubi sup. p. 385.

a His hair was likewise clean and neat; he having been extremely remarkable for his purity, both of body and mind. Some Moslem writers pretend, that he was not guilty of any, even the minutest, sin; but the most approved commentators on the Korân are of a different opinion. Jallalo'ddin says expressly, that, after the revelation of the 110th Sûra, or chapter, of that book, he frequently asked pardon of God; which implies an acknowledgement of many actual transgressions <sup>1</sup>.

He always entertained the most pious sentiments, had a religious love of God, and the divine laws; and ever treated both his family and companions with marks of the most tender affection <sup>2</sup>.

b If any one treated him contemptuously, he easily forgave him; but frequently punished capital injuries that were offered him, and particularly false accusations, with death. This he thought himself, in a most particular manner, authorized to do. In some few instances, however, though the crimes were of the most heinous nature, he inflicted, as a punishment on the offenders, only double fustigation <sup>3</sup>.

His sleep itself was a divine revelation. The extasies and divine inspirations, by which he was so frequently agitated, exceeded both in number and duration those of the other prophets <sup>4</sup>.

ALL people were pleased with his decisions, than which nothing could be more equitable or just. Nor was any of his progenitors ever considered in the light of a tyrant or an oppressor <sup>5</sup>.

c As soon as he came out of his mother's womb, he adored God by prostration. He was born circumcised, surrounded with a luminous appearance that enlightened the castles and towns of Syria, in an extraordinary manner. He talked in his cradle, was sheltered from the heat of the sun by supernatural clouds, was prayed for and considered by all the Arabs after his death as their sovereign pontiff, or great Imâm, and his body remains in the tomb or sepulchre where it was at first interred, without being subject to decay <sup>6</sup>.

d SOME of the Moslems believe, that he is still living in his tomb, and that he says his prayers there every time the crier makes proclamation for the people to repair to the mosque. They also believe, that an angel is posted at his tomb, who gives him continual advice of the prayers of the faithful that are offered up for him; as likewise of the wicked actions of every individual of his nation, that he may ask pardon of God for them <sup>7</sup>.

A general sorrow spread itself over the whole Arab nation for his death, which will continue to the day of the resurrection. The lecture of his traditions is put upon the same foot by his followers with that of the Korân; which most authentic traditions, of the actions and sayings of Mohammed, are contained in the two books called the Two Sabîhs, compiled by Moslem and Al Bokhârî <sup>8</sup>.

e He feels a most sensible pleasure, and receives infinite satisfaction, when he understands, that the good Moslems perform the ablution, as well as perfume themselves, before they apply themselves to the lecture of those traditions, and afterwards read them on some public eminence. But it gives him great offence, when he is told, that any of the faithful retire into an obscure solitary corner, in order to read them there <sup>9</sup>.

THE faces of those who carry these traditions will always be pure, resplendent, and bright; and the books that contain them, in conjunction with the Korân, will be placed by the prophet on the throne of God at the day of the resurrection <sup>10</sup>.

He chose some of the justest and most upright men that ever lived for his companions; by which he discovered his own transcendent goodness, sincerity, and penetration. No wonder then, that the loss of a person endued with so many excellencies should be so sincerely regretted by the whole Arab nation; and that the women themselves, who have generally such an aversion to the visitation of sepulchres, should yet without the least repugnancy visit his tomb <sup>11</sup>.

f THE Arabs are the noblest nation upon earth, and will subsist longer than any other nation <sup>12</sup>.

THE prophet honoured them with two appellations, derived from two of the names of God himself, viz. MOSLEMS, or MUSULMANS, and THE FAITHFUL; and their religion he called Islamism, or Islâm <sup>13</sup>.

THEY are not obliged to the performance of any rash vow, as the nations before them were <sup>14</sup>.

THE prophet has exterminated all the places of impurity and pollution from amongst them <sup>15</sup>.

<sup>1</sup> Al Kor. MOHAM. f. cx. AL BEIDAWI, JALLALO'DDIN. sup. p. 83. <sup>2</sup> GAGN. ubi sup. p. 386. <sup>3</sup> Idem ibid. JALLALO'DDIN, &c. <sup>4</sup> GAGN. ubi sup. p. 387, 388. <sup>5</sup> Idem ibid. <sup>6</sup> GAGN. ubi sup. p. 388. <sup>7</sup> Idem ibid.

<sup>8</sup> Al Kor. MOHAM. f. iii. v. 110. <sup>9</sup> Al Kor. MOHAM. pass.

<sup>10</sup> GAGN. ubi sup.

<sup>11</sup> ABU'LFED. ubi

<sup>12</sup> AL HAFEDH, ABU'LFED. AL JANNAB.

<sup>13</sup> ABU'LFED. AL JANNAB. MOSLEM, AL

<sup>14</sup> AL GHAZAL. & GAGN. ubi sup. p. 389.

<sup>15</sup> GAGN. ubi sup. p. 373. <sup>16</sup> Idem ibid.

HE has assigned the fourth part of their effects for the payment of taxes and contributions <sup>a</sup> of every denomination.

THEIR religion is infinitely purer than that of their pagan ancestors; the criminal licences and indulgences granted the Arabs in the times of ignorance having been cancelled by the prophet <sup>2</sup>.

HE left it to their choice either to slay a murderer, or to suffer him to expiate his crime with a sum of money, which they might look upon as the price of the blood that was spilt <sup>3</sup>.

HIS followers are preserved from falling into error. Disputes, indeed, may sometimes happen amongst them; but then these will be of such a nature, that they will rather intitle them to the divine compassion. On the contrary, the disputes that arose amongst their unbelieving progenitors will infallibly terminate in their destruction <sup>b</sup>.

THOSE who favour and obey them will always enjoy the sweets of a good conscience, and be intitled to mercy; but the reverse will happen to all those nations that are their enemies <sup>c</sup>.

THE fruit of their alms is the perpetual feast of a good conscience, and their sins are forgiven <sup>d</sup>.

THEY have a certain promise, that they shall never be totally extirpated by their enemies <sup>e</sup>.

THE good testimony of two of them is sufficient to insure to a man paradise <sup>f</sup>.

THEY labour less than other nations, and yet they shall hereafter meet with a greater reward <sup>g</sup>.

THEY have flourished fewer ages than other nations, and yet they have made a greater progress in every branch both of ancient and modern learning. Nor shall their nation want many searchers after truth through the remotest periods of time, even to the day of judgment <sup>h</sup>.

THEY abound with great princes prudent magistrates, valiant heroes, men of generous and noble dispositions, and religious persons, intirely devoted to the service of ALMIGHTY GOD <sup>i</sup>.

THEIR doctors are like the prophets of the children of Israel <sup>k</sup>.

AMONGST the Moslems there are three sorts of men; those who are the most perfect, <sup>d</sup> and first enter paradise; those who hold a middle rank in the scale of perfection; and those who are apparently wicked. But the latter, as well as the former, shall be received to mercy, tho not meet with so glorious a reward. Not a single believer shall hereafter eternally perish <sup>l</sup>.

THE angels are at hand to support them in all their general actions and engagements, as they formerly sustained their progenitors at the battle of Bedr; of which we have already given our readers a full and particular relation <sup>m</sup>.

MOHAMMED has prescribed them the very same rites, by the divine command, that God himself prescribed the prophets of old, as well as the other ministers sent to instruct his people; and consequently these rites are of divine institution. Such were the ablution denominated Wodû, that called Ghoûl, enjoined after conjugal embraces, the pilgrimage to Mecca, the holy war, and others that it would be too tedious to enumerate here <sup>n</sup>.

THEY perform many works of supererogation, as did likewise the prophets; for whose memory they express so profound a regard, and whom they so frequently propose to themselves as a pattern for their imitation <sup>o</sup>.

THEY are addressed in a very particular stile, and greatly preferred to all other nations, by the Korân <sup>p</sup>.

THEY shall rise from the dead before the people of any other nation <sup>q</sup>.

THEY shall appear in great numbers on the day of the resurrection, incircled with a most pure and resplendent light, the effect of the sacred ablution called Wodû, by which they <sup>f</sup> will be purified in this world, and consequently qualified for the enjoyment of the pleasures in the next <sup>r</sup>.

THEY will be placed on an eminence at the day of judgment above all other nations <sup>s</sup>.

THEY will be distinguished then from all other nations by a mark imprinted upon their faces, the natural effect of the adoration practised by them in this world <sup>t</sup>.

<sup>a</sup> Al Kor. MOHAM. pass.
p. 374.

<sup>c</sup> Idem ibid.

<sup>2</sup> Al Kor. MOHAM. f. iv. v. 91. JALLALO'DDIN.

<sup>d</sup> Al Kor. MOHAM.

<sup>e</sup> GAGN. ubi sup.

<sup>b</sup> GAGN. ubi sup.

<sup>f</sup> Idem ibid.

<sup>3</sup> Idem ibid.

<sup>h</sup> GAGN. ubi sup. p. 374, 375.

<sup>i</sup> Idem ibid. p. 375.

<sup>k</sup> GAGN. ubi sup.

<sup>l</sup> Al Kor. MOHAM. f. lvi. v. 12.

<sup>m</sup> AL BOKHAR. ABU'LFED. EBN ISHAK, AL JANNAB. AL BEIDAWI, JALLALO'DDIN, AL ZAMAKHSHAR. &c.

<sup>n</sup> Al Kor. MOHAM. pass.

<sup>o</sup> Al Kor. MOHAM. & GAGN.

ubi sup. p. 376.

<sup>p</sup> Al Kor. MOHAM. pass.

<sup>q</sup> GAGN. ubi sup. p. 378.

<sup>r</sup> Al Kor. MOHAM.

<sup>s</sup> GAGN. ubi sup.

<sup>t</sup> Idem ibid.

a THEY shall then produce their books as evidences of their faith, their little ones running before them. And though a frightful catalogue of the sins they had committed was inscribed in these books, when they entered their sepulchres, yet they shall find this intirely effaced at the day of the resurrection; their fidelity intitling them to an absolute remission of all those sins <sup>u</sup>.

THEY shall carry with them not only their own good works, but likewise those of others that were wrought for them; whereas the nations preceeding them shall only carry with them, and reap the benefit of, their own <sup>w</sup>.

JUDGMENT shall pass in their favour, before any other nation is summoned to appear before the great tribunal; and they shall immediately take possession of the habitations b assigned them by the favourable decision of ALMIGHTY GOD. When they enter paradise, which they shall do before any other nation, 70,000 of them shall be admitted without examination, or having a single question asked them. Their little ones also shall attend them on this occasion, and be conducted to the mansions of ineffable bliss, as well as themselves <sup>x</sup>.

IN order to qualify themselves for this happiness, they are enjoined to offer up their prayers every day the number of times above-specified, to keep their teeth clean and neat, to sacrifice victims on the day prescribed, to hold a council of war, before they march against the enemy, to perform the ablution every Wednesday and Friday, to engage the enemy with resolution, however superior to them in point of numbers, to animate one another on c such occasions, and not to be intimidated by the fear of death, or the apprehension of a future judgment. To the last of which their leaders encourage them, by representing to them, that all those who die in battle, inrolled amongst the Moslems, ought not to regret the loss of what they enjoyed in this world; as, immediately after death, they will enter paradise, and be introduced to the beatific vision. But if, notwithstanding this, they should conceive any inquietude on account of their sins, they are to ask pardon of God for them seventy times before the beginning of the action; which, in conjunction with their prophet's intercession, will infallibly procure them an easy admission into a state of eternal and inconceivable felicity <sup>y</sup>.

WE find in the Bodleian library at Oxford an Arabic manuscript, intitled, The Prophetic <sup>The prophet's</sup> d Physic, or, more simply, The Physic of the Prophet; wherein the anonymous author under-takes to prove, from the most authentic traditions, that Mohammed was perfectly well versed in every branch of physick. He remarks, after Al Khattabi, that, in the time of the prophet, physick, or the medicinal art, was divided into methodic and empiric. The former was founded upon reasoning, and practised over a great part of the world; the latter depended intirely upon experience, and was then in vogue amongst the Arabs and the Indians. This was the species of physick followed by the prophet, who regulated his practice by experience, as it was then the most admired by his countrymen. However, according to this writer, Mohammed had a thorough knowlege of every particular relative to the art of medicine, taken in its utmost extent; which knowlege, continues the same author, he did not e acquire by labour or study, but, as the immediate gift of God, it was infused into him. Hence 'tis not to be wondered at, that he should arrive instantaneously, as it were, at the highest degree of perfection in this art; and that he should neither say nor do any thing herein, but what was exactly agreeable to truth, and precisely adapted to the fixed and invariable laws of nature. For, as the whole circle of nature, if we will believe some of the Moslem historians, lay open to his view, he must have perfectly understood the whole frame and structure of the human body, the nature of all the parts of which it is composed, the mutual dependency they have on one another, their respective functions, the causes, effects, nature, and symptoms, of every disease incident to human kind, and the essential qualities of all things used in medicinal compositions. From whence it will follow, that he must f have instantly discovered what every distemper was from the symptoms it exhibited, and consequently could never have been at a loss for an immediate remedy on any, even the most critical, occasion whatsoever <sup>z</sup>.

WE are told by Ebn Al Kayem, that the prophet had three ways of curing all maladies and disorders; the first by the application of natural remedies, the second by having recourse to those that were divine, or supernatural, and the third by a mixture or composition of the other two. He attributed, according to the author of the aforesaid manuscript, the origin of physick to Solomon; which notion he must undoubtedly have received from one of the inspired writers, who intimates, that this prince understood the nature of all trees and plants, from

<sup>u</sup> GAGN. ubi sup. p. 379.

<sup>w</sup> Idem ibid.

<sup>x</sup> AL KOR. MOHAM. AL GHAZAL. Vide etiam GAGN. ubi sup. p. 379. THEOPHAN. chronograph. p. 277, 278. Parisiis, 1655. GEORG. CEDREN. historiar. compend. p. 423. Parisiis, 1647.

<sup>y</sup> AL KOR. MOHAM. AL BORHAR. in Son. AL GHAZAL. AL BEIDAWI, AL ZAMAKHSHAR. JAHALLODDIN, &c.

<sup>z</sup> MSS. HUNTING. in Bibl. Bodl. Oxon. num. 333. 1 KINGS, iv. 33.

the cedar of Lebanon even to the hyssop that springeth out of the wall. However, he did not pretend to stop the progress of death, nor to deliver men from the infirmities of extreme old age; which he considered as the necessary effect of destiny, inevitable fate, or rather the divine decree <sup>a</sup>.

THE aforesaid author observes, that the human body is composed of the four elements, and consists of 360 limbs or joints, every one of which contains 360 bones, and 36 little bones. He has also compiled a vast number of aphorisms, said to have been drawn up by the prophet, relative to these parts, to diet, to the conservation of health, and to the practice of physic, intermixed with some very curious histories or relations, which it would be too tedious to enumerate here. He likewise produces a great number of passages, extracted from Hippocrates, Galen, Avicenna, and other celebrated physicians, both ancient and modern, in order to support and confirm the prophet's method of practice, and to evince the truth of all the sentiments advanced by him on this occasion <sup>b</sup>.

BESIDES which, he exhibits a long catalogue of remedies, both simple and compounded, for the cure of all diseases; as also of trees, fruits, liquors, plants, &c. together with their virtues properties, &c. and the methods of preparing them for use, and applying them. Which catalogue, as well as the descriptions attending it, is said to be drawn up in the very words of the prophet. Of this manuscript the learned Mr. Gagnier has obliged the world with several extracts, which we have not time now to touch upon. Our curious readers, therefore, may either consult his Life of MOHAMMED, so often cited in this work, or have recourse, for their farther satisfaction in the point before us, to the manuscript itself, which is very carefully preserved in the public library at Oxford <sup>c</sup>.

The visitation of Moham-
med's tomb.

THE pilgrimage to, or visitation of, Mohammed's tomb, according to the unanimous opinion of the Moslem doctors, is one of those duties that approaches nearest to the obligatory precepts that are of divine institution; the performance of it being a work of great merit, especially if any favourable opportunity of doing it offers, tho' it be not expressly enjoined by any positive command. When a Moslem turns his face towards Medina, at his first setting out for that place, on this pilgrimage, or visitation, he repeats several times a formula of prayer for the prophet, drawn up for the occasion. And when he first perceives the trees in the territory of Medina, at a great distance from that city, he repeats it more frequently; beseeching God to grant, that the journey he has undertaken may be conducive both to his present happiness and future salvation. Before he enters Medina, after he has approached the frontiers, he ought to purify himself with the ablution, put on his most rich and splendid apparel, perfume himself with the most odoriferous aromatic compositions, and set apart as large a sum for alms as his circumstances will permit. Then he enters the city, with a passage of the Korân in his mouth; and, being arrived at one of the gates of the mosque, says the following ejaculation: O God be favourable to Mohammed, and to the family of Mohammed; O God pardon my sins, and open to me the gates of thy mercy and thy grace. From thence he advances directly to the glorious parterre of flowers, as the tomb of the prophet is called; and, at the place where Mohammed frequently said his prayers, he prays for the prosperity of that mosque. After which, having made what other stations he thinks proper, he prostrates himself upon the ground, adores God, thanks him for his happy arrival in that glorious valley, begs that this visitation may be agreeable to him, and that his divine grace may attend him through the whole course of it. Then approaching the sepulchre, he stands upright at the head of it, turns his face towards the south, or the city of Mecca, which is to the south of Medina, and takes care not to touch the wall that surrounds it, according to the custom observed by the companions of the prophet themselves. This being done, at the distance of about five or six feet, he repeats again the form of prayer for Mohammed, and also prays for the repose of his two successors Abu Becr and Omar, who are deposited near him. Then he retires backwards about a pike's length, or a little less, according to the decision of Abu'l Laith, the Al Fakih, or doctor of the law, and others of the sect of Abu Hanîfa. But, according to Al Shâfeî and Mâlec, he ought to turn his back towards the Kebla, and consequently his face towards the glorious vestibule, and the illustrious inclosure, as the Arabs term the spot on which the sepulchre stands, in order to salute the prophet with the greater cordiality and affection <sup>d</sup>.

WHEN the pilgrim performs this ceremony, he ought to stand upright, with his eyes fixed upon the ground, filled with sentiments of the most profound respect and veneration. He ought to have his heart likewise intirely detached from all wordly affections and concerns, and his mind solely occupied by the thoughts of the majesty of the place; considering himself then as exposed to the immediate view of the prophet, who had formerly been himself visibly present there in the same posture. In this disposition he is to pronounce

<sup>a</sup> EEN AL KAYLM. <sup>b</sup> MSS. HUNTING. ubi sup. <sup>c</sup> MSS. HUNTING. ubi sup. <sup>d</sup> AL JAN-NAB. ubi sup. p. 305, &c. Al Kor. MOHAM. sur. xvii. v. 81.

- a with a soft low voice, and a true sense of devotion, a form of prayer, too long to be inserted here. Then he prays for himself, his wife, children, and friends, in what manner he pleases; and if any person had desired him to salute the prophet in his name, and recommend him to his prayers, he makes use of another short form, drawn up for that purpose. After which, he takes a turn, posts himself over-against the prophet's face, and, in an erect posture, repeats the formula of appreciation and salutation two or three times. Then he stands opposite to the top of Abu Becr's tomb, that Khalif's head answering to the level of the prophet's shoulders, according to the common opinion, and prays there for the repose of his soul. From thence he advances to the right, and stops upon a spot over-against the head of Omar's tomb, corresponding with the line of Abu Becr's shoulders, where
- b he pronounces with an audible voice a prayer for that Khalif; and afterwards retiring a little backwards, between Abu Becr's and Omar's sepulchres, he repeats another; which is succeeded by one for himself, his wife, children, and the whole body of the faithful. The Friday following the conclusion of this ceremony, he performs his devotions in the burying-place called Al Baki, on account of a traditional saying of Mohammed, viz. That there were two burying places in the world, which shone to the inhabitants of heaven, as the sun and moon did to those of the earth; that is to say, the cemetery of Al Baki at Medina, and that of Ascalon in Palestine. The Kâdi Ayad, in his book, intituled, Medarec, affirms, upon the authority of Mâlec, that about 10,000 of the prophet's companions died at Medina; and that almost all those whose death preceded his, were interred in Al Baki. The pilgrim like-
- c wise, before his departure from Medina, visits the tombs of the principal ladies of the prophet's family, as well as those of his chief domestics, followers, successors, and companions; particularly that of Othmân Ebn Affân, the emperor of the faithful, situated in a separate place, under a dome erected by Osâma Ebn Menân, the Salckite, one of the Emirs of Salâb'-oddin Yusef Ebn Ayub; that of Al Abbâs, under a dome called by his name; that of Al Hâsan Ebn Ali, emperor of the faithful, Zain Al Abidin Ebn Hosein, Ebn Mohammed Al Bâker, with his son Jaafar, surnamed Al Sâdek, all whose bodies are deposited in one tomb; that of Fâtema, the daughter of Mohammed, erected by Omar Ebn Abd'alaziz; that of Fâtema Bint Asad, the mother of Ali, which has a fine dome built upon it; that of Ibrahim, the prophet's son, near the remains of Othmân Ebn Matân, Abd'alrahmân Ebn Awf, Okail
- d Ebn Abu Tâleb, and Abd'allah Ebn Jaafar, the three last of which are supposed to have been interred in the same sepulchre; that of Ismael Ebn Jaafar Al Sâdek, to the west of the dome of Al Abbâs, with those of four of the prophet's wives; and that of Mâlec Ebn Awf, with others at a small distance from him, which it would be too tedious to enumerate in this place <sup>e</sup>.

WITHOUT the walls likewise of Medina there are other tombs that demand the attention of the devout and religious pilgrim; the most remarkable of which are the following. The sepulchre of Mohammed Ebn Abd'allah Ebn Hosein Ebn Ali Ebn Abu Tâleb, who died a martyr in the Khalifat of Abu Jaafar Al Mansûr, on which a structure is erected, intended for a dome, but not yet finished. The sepulchres of the martyrs who fell in the battle of e Ohod, and particularly that of Hamza, the prophet's uncle; which contains likewise the corps of his nephew Abd'allah Ebn Hajash, who commanded in an expedition undertaken on the side of Nakbla. The tombs of Mosaab Ebn Omaïr, Saad Ebn Al Rabi', Anas Ebn Al Madre, Abu'l Dada, Majadder Ebn Ziyâd, and many others that lie mixed together at the feet of Hamza, without any manner of distinction, who are supposed to have lost their lives in defence of the Mohammedan faith, and are consequently looked upon as martyrs by the Moslems <sup>f</sup>.

THE pilgrim also visits the mosque at Koba, the day after his visitation of Al Baki and the afore said sepulchres, that is, on Saturday, if it be possible. Here, in a most devout manner, he says his prayers with two inclinations <sup>g</sup>.

- f FROM thence he goes to the well named Aris, in which the prophet is reported to have spat. It is likewise said, that Mohammed's seal fell out of Othmân Ebn Affân's hand into this well; and that he would not suffer any of the Arabs ever to look after it; so that it has remained there undiscovered to this day. The well Aris is near a mosque, that stands at the entrance of a garden. The pilgrim drinks copiously of its water, and also supplies himself with a sufficient quantity of it for the performance of the sacred ablution. Then he visits the mosque of Victory, constructed near the ditch or trench, which gave name to the signal victory obtained there over the nations that had entered into a confederacy against the prophet. After which, he pays his respects to all the other mosques and oratories of Medina, which amount to about thirty in number. The inhabitants shew these, as also the wells,
- g in which the prophet used to bathe himself, and of whose waters he frequently drank, to

<sup>e</sup> AL JANNAB. ubi sup. p. 305, 306, &c.
NAB. ubi sup.

<sup>f</sup> Idem ibid. AL MAKIN. p. 102.

<sup>g</sup> AL JAN-

the pilgrims that come thither; and this that they may not only follow his example herein, a but procure for themselves likewise health and benediction. The names of these wells are Aris, Gbars, Rawma, Bada, Bir-Hâ, and Al Abn, whose waters are greatly celebrated by some of the Moslem historians <sup>b</sup>.

The excellency of Medina.

IN fine, as the prophet resided the last ten years of his life chiefly at Medina, was buried there, and conferred some very singular privileges upon the inhabitants of that city, as well as upon the Moslems who should at any time perform their devotions in his mosque; the Mohammedans have always entertained, as they do at present, the most exalted sentiments of the nobility and excellency of that place. To this likewise they have been farther excited by the exemplary punishment, which they apprehend to have been inflicted upon Moslem Ebn Okba, who massacred a great number of the citizens of Medina in the 63d year b of the Hejra, and Yezid Ebn Mezayab, who also behaved in a very hostile manner towards them; both of whom were taken off by a sudden death, and greatly agitated by a desponding sense of their crimes before they expired. As a considerable part of the Korân was likewise revealed at Medina, and the sepulchre of the prince of the prophets, as the Moslems term Mohammed, as well as those of his wives, children, and companions, is so frequently visited there, they are induced from hence to think, that it ought to be esteemed as the asylum of the elect, and, consequently, that a superior degree of respect and veneration is due to it. Hence it comes to pass, that some of the Mohammedan doctors consider Medina as the most excellent place in the whole peninsula of the Arabs; tho' others are of a different opinion. Abu Hanîfa prefers Medina even to Mecca itself; but Mâlec espouses the contrary c notion. However, the Moslems unanimously agree, that the spot on which the prophet's tomb stands is the most respectable place in the world. Al Zamakhshari mentions a tradition, which asserts, "that he who finishes his days either at Mecca or Medina, is assured by God " of being resuscitated with the just on the day of the resurrection <sup>1</sup>."

The conclusion.

THUS have we brought to a conclusion our history of the life and actions of Mohammed, the prophet and legislator of the Arabs, who laid the foundations of an empire, that, in less than a century, spread itself over a greater part of the world than the Romans could ever make themselves masters of. 'Tis true, this mighty empire did not continue in the zenith of its power much above two hundred years; the Khalîfs being first in a great measure stripped of the regal authority they had all along assumed, by the governors of provinces, d about the year of the Hejra 325, and afterwards by others, who scarce left them the faintest traces of their former grandeur. As for Arabia, in particular, the source of the Moslem power, it remained, for about three centuries after the time of Mohammed, under the Khalîfs his successors. But in the aforesaid year of the Hejra 325, a great part of that country was in the hands of the Karmatians, a new sect, of whom we shall hereafter have occasion to speak, who had committed great outrages and disorders even in Mecca itself, and to whom the Khalîfs were obliged to pay tribute, that the pilgrimage thither might be performed. Afterwards Yaman was governed by the house of Tbabateba, descended from Ali, the son-in-law of Mohammed, whose sovereignty in Arabia some place so high as the time of Charlemagne. However, it was the posterity of Ali, or pretenders to be such, who reigned e in Yaman and Egypt so early as the tenth century. The present reigning family in Yaman is probably that of Ayub, a branch of which reigned there in the thirteenth century, and took the title of Khalîf and Imâm, which they still retain. They are not possessed of the whole province of Yaman, there being several other independent kingdoms there, particularly that of Fartach. The crown of Yaman descends not regularly from father to son; but the prince of the blood royal, who is most in favour with the grandees, or has the strongest interest, generally succeeds. The governors of Mecca and Medina, who have always been of the race of Mohammed, also threw off their subjection to the Khalîfs, since which time four principal families, all descended from Hasan, the son of Ali, have reigned f there, under the title of Sbarîf, which signifies noble, as they reckon themselves to be on account of their descent. These are the Banu Kâder, the Banu Mûsa T'hani, the Banu Hasbem, and the Banu Kitâda; which last family now is, or lately was, on the throne of Mecca, where they have reigned above 500 years. The reigning family at Medina are the Banu Hasbem, which also reigned at Mecca before those of Kitâda. So that, for above 300 years, the successors of Mohammed enjoyed little more than the empty title of Khalîf, which was at last likewise taken from them; a total end having been put to the very name and being of the Khalîfs, as well as their power and authority, in the year of the Hejra 656, or of CHRIST 1258, when Hulaku, or Holagu, the Tartar, over-ran all the dominions of Al Mosta'sem Ebn Al Mostanser, and made himself master of Baghdâd <sup>k</sup>.

<sup>b</sup> AL JANNAB. ubi sup. vit Al Râdi. LA ROQUE, voyage de l'Arab. heur. p. 255, 153, 273, 254, &c. GREG. ABU'L FAR. hist. dynast. dyn. x. p. 517—521.

<sup>1</sup> AL JANNAB. AL MAKIN, AL ZAMAKHSHAR.

<sup>k</sup> AL MAKIN, in

- a As for the Korân, or the collection of tenets, precepts, and institutions, left the Arabs by Mohammed, we shall speak of it more largely in another place. That book being put into the form in which we find it by Abu Becr, the prophet's immediate successor, who found the pretended revelations it contains in great disorder; an account of its peculiarities, doctrines, and injunctions, of the manner of its being written and published, of the general design and genius of it, will be more naturally introduced in the life of that Khalif. And this our readers will be induced to expect, as without it they can by no means be enabled to form a proper and adequate idea of Islamism, the established religion of three of the most potent empires now on earth; nor, consequently, to understand the Mohammedan history. We need not inform them, that the empires here hinted at are those of the Othmans, commonly called Ottomans, or Turks, the Persians, and the Indians under the great Mogul<sup>1</sup>.
- b

<sup>1</sup> AL MAKIN, in vit. Abu Becr. ABU'LFED. alique scriptor. Arabic. pass.

C H A P. II.

The History of the Empire of the Arabs, under the first four Khalîfs, and those of the families of Ommiyah and Abbas, to the taking of Baghdâd by the Tartars.

- a THE death of Mohammed occasioned such a consternation in Mecca, that Otâb Ebn Osaid, the governor, hid himself, fearing to be called to an account for his former conduct; and the inhabitants, upon the arrival of this melancholy news, considered themselves as destitute of all manner of protection. But, after the first impressions of fear were worn out, they began to meditate a revolt, and to entertain thoughts of resuming their ancient form of government. Upon which, Sobail Ebn Amru, one of the principal of the Koreish, who had before been sent by his tribe to treat with Mohammed of a peace in his camp at Al Hodeibiya, assembled the chief of them at the door of the Cacba, and addressed himself to them in the following terms: O ye Meccans, ye were the last of the Arabs that embraced Islamism, and will ye be the first that shall renounce it? Can such a procedure as this be pleasing in the sight of God? These words gave their minds a different turn, and prevented them from taking any step that had the least tendency to a defection<sup>a</sup>.
- b

- BUT the tumults at Medina, consequential to the prophet's death, were not so easily appeased. The news of this sad event was no sooner published there, than a numerous concourse of people appeared before his door, crying out, How can our apostle be dead? Our intercessor, our mediator, has not entirely left us; he is taken up into heaven, as was Jesus, or Isa; therefore he shall not be buried. Nay, Omar, being of the same opinion, drew his sword, and swore, that if any person affirmed Mohammed to be dead, he would cut off his hands and his feet. For, said he, the apostle of God is not dead, but only gone for a season; as Moses, the son of Amrân, was gone from the people of Israel for forty days, and then returned to them again. The populace, therefore, kept the corps above ground, even after the belly began to swell; nor could the prophet's uncle Al Abbâs, notwithstanding this, convince them of the reality of his death. Of which Abu Becr being apprized, he immediately posted from Al Sonoh, another quarter of the city, and expostulated with them in the following manner: Do you worship Mohammed, or the God of Mohammed? If the latter, he is immortal, and liveth for ever; but if the former, you are in a manifest error, as he is certainly dead. The truth of which assertion he clearly evinced from several passages of the Korân. This produced the desired effect, and not only satisfied Omar, but likewise perfectly calmed the minds of the people. The arrival also of Osâma Ebn Zeid from the camp at Jorf, immediately after Mohammed expired, not a little contributed to the preservation of the public tranquillity. For,
- c
- d that general ordered the standard of Islamism to be planted before the prophet's door, and disposed his troops in such a manner as effectually prevented all commotions, or, at least, all the bad effects of them, and enabled the Moslems to proceed to the election of a Khalif, or successor of Mohammed, without any effusion of blood, as will presently more fully appear<sup>b</sup>.

<sup>a</sup> ISM. ABU'LFED. de vit. Moham. c. lxii. p. 138.

<sup>b</sup> Idem ibid. & p. 139. AL SOHAILI, AL SHAHRESTAN. AL JANNAB. Poc. not. in spec. hist. Arab. p. 179. AL BOKHAR. in Son. ex tradit. Ayesb. Vide etiam JOAN. GAGN. not. ad Abu'lfed. ubi sup. p. 138, 139.

Abu Becr. elekted Khalif. THE prophet having left no directions before his death concerning a successor, or at least none but such as were known to his wives, who were in the interest of Omar, very warm debates arose between the Mohajerin and the Ansars about the right of electing a Khalif. The former insisted upon that right, as having attended Mohammed in his flight to Medina, and declared themselves in his favour before any of the other Arabs came to him; the latter, as having supported him when he was expelled his native city, and enabled him to make head against his enemies, when he and his followers were in a state of persecution. In fine, the disputes on this occasion between the two principal branches of the Moslems came to such a height, that a rupture between them must have immediately commenced, had not an expedient for the determination of this arduous affair been proposed by one of the Ansars, who desired that each of the contending parties might be allowed to choose a Khalif. This for the present a little amused them; but the Mohajerin not entirely relishing the proposal, Abu Becr offered to recommend two persons, Omar Ebn Al Khattâb and Abu Obeidah, to their choice, and to recognize him of the two upon whom the suffrages of both parties should fall. But this producing no decision, Omar swore fealty to Abu Becr, and all the Moslems upon the spot followed his example; upon which, Abu Becr was saluted Khalif by both the Mohajerin and the Ansars, and acknowledged the rightful successor of Mohammed. It appears from Abu'l-Faraj, that Abu Becr was proclaimed Khalif, in the portico or piazza of the Saëdites, the very same day that Mohammed died <sup>a</sup>.

Abu Becr. owes his election chiefly to Omar. It has been asserted by several of the Moslem writers, that Mohammed, in his last sickness, appointed Abu Becr to officiate for him at the mosque in Medina; by which it should seem to appear, that he intended him for his successor. Nay, the prophet's two wives, Ayesha and Hafsa, who were then present, understood the order given on this occasion as a sort of nomination to the high post that Abu Becr afterwards filled, and opposed it to the utmost of their power; but without effect; Mohammed telling them in a passion, that they were as bad as Joseph's mistress Zoleikha, and that none but God had given the preference to Abu Becr. However, the contest, which happened after the prophet's death, clearly proves that these words of his had no influence in the election of his successor; but that Abu Becr's good fortune was chiefly, if not solely, owing to Omar's resignation. Notwithstanding which, the last person shewed afterwards an apparent dislike of his former conduct, when he prayed, "that God would avert the ill consequences which, it was to be feared, would attend so indiscreet a choice;" adding withal, "that such behaviour would for the future merit capital punishment;" and "that both the person elected and the electors hereafter ought to be put to death, unless the consent of all the Moslems rendered valid their election." Nor was Ali Ebn Abu Tâleb, who, by hereditary right, ought to have succeeded the prophet, at all pleased with what had been done. He expostulated with Abu Becr about the manner of his elevation to the Khalifat, which was effected without his knowledge; and received for answer, by way of apology, from the new Khalif, that the exigency of affairs would not admit of deliberation; and that had the election not been so sudden, the power would have been wrested out of their hands by the opposite party. Ali was in Fâtema's apartment, when Abu Becr had the good fortune to be appointed Khalif; where, upon the arrival of the news, he expressed great dissatisfaction at that event. But he found himself obliged to change his note, when the new Khalif sent Omar with orders to burn the house where he and his friends were assembled, unless he concurred with the other Moslems to support the election. However, the better to conciliate his affections, Abu Becr seemed desirous of resigning the government; to which Ali thought the right of succession belonging to him authorized him to aspire. But perceiving that the people in general were prejudiced in favour of Abu Becr, and that therefore, by opposing him in any shape, he should expose himself to their resentment, Ali declared that they would not accept of his resignation. Notwithstanding which, some relate, that he looked upon himself as injured, and did not absolutely come in till after the death of his wife Fâtema, who survived her father Mohammed but a very few months. It is intimated by Eutychius, or Said Ebn Batrick, that Othmân Ebn Affân, as well as Omar Ebn Al Khattâb, greatly contributed to Abu Becr's election <sup>a</sup>.

Many of the Moslems favour Ali's pretensions. By Ali's acquiescence in the measures that had been taken, Abu Becr seemed to be thoroughly settled in the government of Arabia; tho' many of the Moslems were still of opinion, that Ali ought to be deemed the lawful Khalif and Imâm. Which notion has been entertained by a very considerable part of the Mohammedans even to this day. Nor are there at present wanting a numerous body of them, who maintain, that the supreme authority, both in spirituals and temporals, of right belongs to Ali's descendants, notwithstanding they

<sup>a</sup> AL MAKIN. hist. Saracen. c. ii. p. 15, 16. edit. Tho. Erpen. Lugd. Batavor. 1625. GREG. ABU'L-FAR. hist. dynastiar. dyn. ix. p. 172. edit. Pocock. Oxon. 1663. EUTYCH. Alexandrin annal. tom. ii. p. 251. edit. Pocock. Oxon. 1656. <sup>d</sup> AL BOKHAR. in Son. ex trad. Ayesha, AL JANNAB. p. 291. AHMED EBN MOHAM. EBN AZDI RABBIHI, MS. Arab. HUNTINGT. in Bibl. Bodl. Oxon. num. 554. AL MAKIN. hist. Saracen. ubi sup. GREG. ABU'L-FAR. ubi sup. EUTYCH. ubi sup.

- a may be deprived of it by the injustice of others, or their own fear. These, however, are called Shiites, or Seſtaries, and looked upon by the Sunnites, or Traditionists, who consider the Khalifs preceding Ali as the lawful successors of Mohammed, as the worst and most detestable heretics; from whence proceeds that invincible aversion, which has so long reigned between the Turks and the Persians. Our readers will observe here once for all, that the Khalifs did not only succeed Mohammed in his regal character, but likewise in his pontifical authority; so that they governed the Arabs as the Maccabean princes, who were kings and chief priests at the same time, did the Jews. Their pontifical authority chiefly consisted in interpreting the Mohammedan law, as well as praying and preaching in the public mosques, which on all solemn occasions they used to do. And, indeed, at last this was all the
- b authority they had left them, being stript of all the rest by the governors of provinces, who set up for themselves, as will hereafter more fully appear. The followers of Ali teach, that the office of Imâm is not a common thing, depending on the will of the vulgar, so that they may set up whom they please; but a fundamental affair of religion, and an article which the prophet himself could not have neglected, or left to the fancy of the common people. Which tenet seems to be levelled at the conduct of the Moslems, in their election of Abu Becr and the two succeeding Khalifs. But, though Ali was Mohammed's cousin-german, and married his daughter Fâtema, yet the prophet seems to have had a superior respect for Abu Becr, who was his father-in-law, as having been of the most signal service to him. For he did not only most strenuously support him, when he first assumed the prophetic character, but also resolutely asserted the truth of Mohammed's account of his night-journey to heaven; from whence he received the honourable surname of Al Seddik, or the faithful witness, as has been already observed. Once as the prophet saw him approaching, he said to those about him: If any one is pleased with viewing a person who has escaped hell-fire, let him look upon Abu Becr. God, whose name be blessed, has given man his choice of this world, or that which is with him; and this servant (meaning Abu Becr) hath chosen that which is with God. Such marks of esteem as these could not fail of endearing him to the Moslems, and consequently of facilitating his promotion to the Khalifat. We must not omit remarking, that when Ali acknowledged Abu Becr the rightful successor of Mohammed, he secured to him the affection of the whole family of Hâshem <sup>e</sup>.
- d Soon after Abu Becr's accession, many of the Arabs refused to pay the zacât, or alms, A rebellion ex- and tribute, Mohammed had exacted of his followers, and attempted to shake off the yoke tinguished by he had imposed upon them. This so alarmed the Khalif and his subjects at Medina, that, Khâled Ebn Al Walid. fearing a general revolt, they sent all not able to bear arms to the cavities of the rocks and mountains, and put themselves in as good a posture of defence as the little time allowed them to do this in would permit. In the mean time, Abu Becr sent Khâled Ebn Al Walid with an army of 4,500 men, to reduce the rebels; who soon coming up with them, gave them a total defeat, brought off a vast quantity of plunder, and made many of their children slaves. Nor was he content with this. For, being dispatched by Abu Becr to Mâlec Ebn Noweirab, an eminent person amongst the Arabs, famous for his skill in poetry, as well as his horsemanship and bravery, who refused to pay the zacât, to bring him over by fair means, he
- e ordered Derâr Ebn Al Azwar, who attended him, to strike off his head: which, as he was the chief of the revolters, intirely extinguished all remains of the rebellion, and fixed Abu Becr upon the throne. However, as Mâlec returned to Islamism, offered to pay the money required of him, and was strongly interceded for by Abd'allah Ebn Amer and Kobâdab; the Khalif was not a little displeased at Khâled's barbarity, and would have put him to death, as he had exceeded the limits of his commission, had not Omar greatly exerted himself in his favour. As for Khâled, he was undoubtedly an excellent general, extremely kind to his soldiers, and a zealous Mohammedan: but then it must likewise be allowed, that he was a most bitter enemy to the Christians, and to those Moslems who apostatized; always, when
- f in his power, exercising great cruelties upon them. However, by his conduct and bravery, he conquered Syria, and greatly contributed to the establishment of the Mohammedan religion and polity. We are assured by Eutychius, that, in the first year of Abu Becr, Yazdejerd, or Yezdejird, the last king of Persia, began to reign <sup>f</sup>.

It may not be improper here to acquaint our readers, that in the latter days of Mohammed, Many of the and after his death, considerable numbers of the Arabs quitted his religion, and returned Arabs re- to Paganism, Judaism, or Christianity. Al Beidawi reckons them up in the following order. nounce Mo- hammedism.

1. Three companies of the Banu Modlaj, seduced by Dbu'lhamar Al Aswad Al Anfi, who set up for a prophet in Taman, and grew very powerful there.
2. The Banu Honeifa, who followed the famous false prophet Moseilama.
3. The Banu Asad, who acknowledged Tolcika Ebn

<sup>e</sup> AL SHAHRESTAN. p. 261. FRID. life of Mahom. p. 68. AL MAKIN. ubi sup. lib. iii. c. 1. AB'UL FAR. ABU HOREIR AL JANNAB. IERAHIM EEN MOHAM. EBN DAKMAK, MS. Arab. LAUD. in Bibl. Bodl. Oxon, 806.

<sup>f</sup> GREG. ABU'L FAR. ubi sup. p. 173. AL MAKIN. in hist. Saracen. lib. i. c. ii. p. 16, 17. ISM. ABU'LFED. hist. gen. EUTYCH. annal. Alexandrin tom. ii. p. 256.

Khowailed, another pretender to divine revelation, for their prophet. All these fell off in Mohammed's life-time. 4. Certain of the tribe of Fezârah, headed by Oyema Ebn Hosein. 5. Some of the tribe of Ghatfân, whose leader was Korrah Ebn Salma. 6. The Banu Soleim, who followed Al Fajâab Ebn Abd Yalil. 7. The Banu Yarbu, whose captain was Mâlec Ebn Noweirab Ebn Kaïs. 8. Part of the tribe of Tamîm, the profelytes of Sejaj, the daughter of Al Mondar, who gave herself out for a prophetess. 9. The tribe of Kendab, led by Al Asbatb Ebn Kaïs. 10. The Banu Becr Ebn Al Wayel, in the province of Babrein, headed by Al Hotam Ebn Zeid. The last six of which apostatized in the Khalifât of Abu Becr. 11. Some of the tribe of Ghassân, who with their prince Jabalab Ebn Al Ayham, renounced Mohammedism in the time of Omar, and returned to their former profession of Christianity. To which we may add, 12. Osud Al Abbasi, who likewise aspired to the dignity of a prophet, in the reign of Abu Becr. Nay, we are told by Abu'lfeda, that, immediately after the death of Mohammed, the whole body of the Moslems, except the cities of Medina, Mecca, and Al Tâyes, renounced the Mohammedan faith; whose defection, the commentators pretend, was foretold by the Korân, long before it came to pass. They likewise affirm, that, in conformity to the latter part of the same prediction, the loss of so many renegades was supplied by a considerable, if not equal, number of new converts. Some will have the latter to have been the inhabitants of Yaman, and others the Persians; the authority of Mohammed himself being vouched for both opinions. Others, however, suppose them to have been 2,000 of the tribe of Al Nakha, who dwelt in Yaman, 5,000 of those of Kenda and Bajilab, and 3,000 of unknown descent, who were present at the famous battle of Kadesia, fought in the Khalifât of Omar, who put an end to the Persian empire. The followers of the impostor Moseilama now growing formidable to the Moslems, the Khalîf resolved to send an army against him <sup>a</sup>.

Moseilama vanquished and killed by Khâled Ebn
Al Walid.

MOSEILAMA, as has been already observed, was of the tribe of Honeifa, who inhabited the province of Yamâma, and a principal man amongst them. He headed an embassy sent by his tribe to Mohammed, in the ninth year of the Hejra, and professed himself a Moslem; but, on his return home, being desirous of sharing with Mohammed in his power, the next year he set up for a prophet also, pretending to be joined with him in the commission to recall mankind from idolatry to the worship of the true God. Some, however, pretend, that he might have been a partner with Mohammed in his imposture; but that considering himself as superior to him, he renounced all manner of correspondence with him. Be that as it will, he is said to have published written revelations, in imitation of the Korân, of which Abu'l-Faraj has preserved the following passage, viz. Now hath God been gracious unto her that was with child, and hath brought forth from her the soul, which runneth between the peritonæum and the bowels. Whatever might have been his former sentiments, considering afterwards that he might run less risque by acting in conjunction with Mohammed, he sent him a letter, offering to go halves with him, in these words: From Moseilama, the apostle of God, to Mohammed, the apostle of God. Now let the earth be half mine, and half thine. But Mohammed, thinking himself too well established to need a partner, wrote him this answer: From Mohammed, the apostle of God, to Moseilama the liar. The earth is God's: He giveth the same for inheritance unto such of his servants as he pleaseth; and the happy issue shall attend those who fear him. During the few months which Mohammed lived after this revolt, Moseilama rather gained than lost ground, and grew very formidable; but Abu Becr, his successor, now in the eleventh year of the Hejra, resolved to reduce him. He, therefore, first sent Akramah and Serjabil, two of his experienced commanders, with a body of troops to Yamâma, with orders to destroy him; and afterwards that consummate general Khâled Ebn Al Walid, with a powerful army to support them. After the junction of these forces, the Moslem army amounted to 40,000 effective men; with which Khâled engaged Moseilama at Akreba in a bloody battle, but was at first repulsed with the loss of 1,200 men. However, rallying his troops, he renewed the fight with so much vigour, that the rebels were dispersed, leaving 10,000 of their men dead upon the spot. The impostor himself was slain by Wahsha, the negro slave, with the same lance that had before dispatched Hamza, the uncle of Mohammed. In fine, the victory was so complete, that the apostates, who survived this action, never afterwards gave Abu Becr the least trouble, but returned of their own accord to Mohammedism <sup>b</sup>.

Al Ola defeats another body of rebels.

AFTER this decisive action, the Khalîf sent a considerable army under the command of Al Ola, to reduce another body of rebels, who committed great disorders in the province of Babrein. This body was formed out of the Banu Becr Ebn Al Wayel, and headed by Al

<sup>a</sup> AL BEIDAWI, ABU'LFED. ubi sup. & de vit. Moham. p. 138. AL KOR. MOHAM. f. v. D'HERBEL. bibl. Orient. p. 226. POCCOCK. not. in spec. hist. Arab. p. 77. AL MAKIN, & ABU'L FAR. ubi sup. <sup>b</sup> ISM. ABU'LFED. in hist. general. de vit. Moham. p. 159, 160. AL MAKIN, ubi sup. p. 16, 17. GREG. ABU'L FAR. hist. dynast. p. 164, 173, &c. AL BEIDAWI. in Kor. f. v. AL TABAR. apud Al Makin, ubi sup. Vide etiam GAGN. not. ad Abu'lfed. de vit. Moham. p. 159, 160.

a Hotam Ebn Zeid. Al Ola soon obliged them to submit to Abu Becr, and return to the Mohammedan religion; having put great numbers of them to the sword, and plundered their country in a dreadful manner. In fine, he executed the Khalif's orders with uncommon bravery, and then returned to Medina with the immense spoils acquired in the expedition <sup>1</sup>.

THE next impostor, who found employment for Abu Becr's troops, was Toleiah Ebn Khâled de-Khowâiled, of the tribe of Asad, which adhered to him, together with part of the tribes of Ghatfân and Tay. Against these the Khalif ordered Khâled to advance at the head of a strong detachment of the Moslem forces. Khâled coming up with the enemy, engaged them; put them to flight, and obliged Toleiah, with his shattered troops, to retire into Syria, where he remained at a town called Acleb till the death of Abu Becr. Then he went to Omar, embraced Mohammedism in his presence, and having taken the oath of fidelity to him, returned to his own country and people. Al Makin seems to intimate, that, about this time, the Asbite, or rather Anbite, and Dibanian rebels were also overthrown with great slaughter by Abu Becr <sup>k</sup>.

IN the eleventh year of the Hejra, and the first of Abu Becr, Sejâj Bint Al Mondar, sur-Sejâj set up named Omm Sâder, of the tribe of Tamîm, and the wife of Abu Cabdala, a soothsayer of Tamâma, likewise set up for a prophetess, in opposition to the Khalif. She was followed not only by those of her own tribe, but by several others. Thinking a prophet the most proper husband for her, she went to Moseilama, and married him; but after she had staid with him three days, she left him and returned home. What became of her afterwards we do not find. Ebn Shohnab has given us part of the conversation which passed at the interview between those two pretenders to inspiration; but the same is a little too immodest to be translated. 'Tis probable, that, after the death of Moseilama, she was either cut off by the Khalif, or ceased to disturb the repose of his subjects by her delusions <sup>l</sup>.

ABU BECR having now no enemy to contend with in Arabia, and being free from all apprehensions of a competitor, resolved next to turn his arms against the Greek emperor. He, therefore, ordered Osâma Ebn Zeid, who was upon the point of making an irruption into Syria at the time of Mohammed's decease, in order to revenge his father's death, who was killed in the battle of Mûta, to destroy with fire and sword the country on the confines of Balka and Al Darûm. This enterprize Osâma conducted with great success, advanced as far as Obna, killed the person who had slain his father Zeid, and laid waste the neighbouring territory. Nay, we are told by an Arab writer, that this invasion struck the emperor Heraclius himself, who was then at Hems, or Emesa, with terror, and even obliged him to leave Syria. But this, for several reasons, we are not inclined to believe strictly true. However, the Arabs did undoubtedly penetrate into the imperial territories on the side of Syria; and after having done the Greeks considerable damage there, retired, without sustaining any remarkable loss, into their own dominions <sup>m</sup>.

Soon after, the Khalif sent Khâled Ebn Al Wâlid, at the head of a powerful army, to invade Irâk, and put an end to the kingdom of Hira. The province of Irâk, answering to the Babylonia of Ptolemy, is bounded on the east by Susiana, or Kbûzestân, and the mountainous region comprehending part of Assyria, Media, &c. on the north by part of Mesopotamia, or Diyar Becr, &c. on the west, by the desarts of Shâm, or Syria, and the solitudes from it denominated the desarts of Irâk, &c. and on the south by the last desarts, and part of Arabia Deserta, or the province of Najd. We are told by Khondemir, that Khâled was sent at this time by the Khalif with a body of troops to sustain Mothana, another of his generals, who had been detached before to penetrate into Irâk; and that, after the reduction of that province, the last officer was left to preside there. Khâled's usual success attended him in this expedition. He obliged the people of Irâk, as well as the inhabitants of the towns and villages of Sawada, to pay tribute to Abu Becr; which, according to Al Makin, was the first tribute money ever brought to Medina. He possessed himself of Anbar, Dawmat, Al Fandal, and several other places of note, which surrendered at the first summons. He took the city of Hira, and fought many battles, wherein fortune always declared in his favour. In fine, he put a period to the kingdom of Hira, which had been founded by Mâlec, of the descendants of Cablân, in Irâk; tho', after three descents, the throne came by marriage to the Lakhmians, called also the Mondars (the general name of those princes, as has been already observed), who preserved their dominion, notwithstanding some small interruption by the Persians, till this time, when Al Mondar Al Maghrûr, the last of them, lost his life and crown by the arms of Khâled Ebn Al Walid, Abu Becr's general; who likewise carried away his son Judi, and a great number of his subjects, captives with him. Several thousands of them were also slain. The kingdom of Hira lasted 622 years eight months. The sum exacted, by way of tribute, of the province of Irâk, on this occasion, if Eutychius may be credited, amounted to 70,000 pieces of money. As the Mondars were under the protection a of the kings of Persia, whose lieutenants they were over the Arabs of Irâk, as the kings of Ghassân were for the Roman emperors over those of Syria, this invasion of the Moslems was understood as undertaken against the Persians. Hira stands at a small distance from a branch of the Euphrates, and about a parasang to the west of Cûfa. We must beg leave to inform our readers, that Mr. Ockley is guilty of a mistake, when he asserts Hira to have been the imperial seat of Al Saffah; since Anbâr, on the northern bank of the Euphrates, and not far from its confluence with the Tigris, in the district of Baghdâd, was the residence of that prince. He was the first Khalîf of the house of Abbâs. Mr. Ockley's inattention to Golius seems to have occasioned this mistake <sup>n</sup>.

<sup>1</sup> AL BEIDAWI, in Kor. f. v. OCKLEY's hist. of the Sarac. vol. i. p. 17. <sup>k</sup> AL MAKIN, & AL BEIDAWI, ubi sup.

<sup>l</sup> EBN SHOHNAB, AL MAKIN, ubi sup. p. 16. <sup>m</sup> AL JANNABI, AL NAISA, &c. Vide etiam GAGN. not. ad Abu'Ised. ubi sup. p. 134.

The Khalîf
sends an army into Syria.

BUT the exigency of the Khalîf's affairs in Syria put a stop to the rapid progresses of Khâ- b led, and obliged him to recall that general out of Irâk. Before the departure of the army under his command, Abu Becr came to a resolution to attempt an invasion of Syria; and having communicated his design to the principal officers of his court, he had the satisfaction to find that they all intirely approved of it. He, therefore, thought fit to send circular letters to the petty princes of Yaman, the chief men of Mecca, Al Tâyes, and the other Moslem prefects of Arabia, ordering them to repair with all the forces they could raise as soon as possible to Medina. The purport of the letter was to this effect: That Abd'allah Atik Ebn Abu Kohâfa wished health, happiness, and the divine mercy and benediction, to them and all true believers; that, after praising the most high God, and praying for his prophet Mohammed, he signified to them his intention of taking Syria out of the hands of the infidels; and that he begged leave to inform them, that a war undertaken for the propagation of the true religion was an act of obedience to God. Nor were they deficient in paying a proper regard to the Khalîf's commands, all of them appearing at the head of their troops in a very short time at Medina, and pitching their tents round the city. Here they staid, though with some little uneasiness, on account of the scarcity of provisions, till the Moslem army, destined to act against the emperor, was completely formed, and in a capacity to begin its march. Then the Khalîf, with some of his friends, viewed the troops drawn up in order of battle from the top of a hill; and, after praying to God, to inspire them with courage, and grant them success, he attended the generals a little way on foot. As they were on horseback, they could not forbear expressing some concern at the Khalîf's thus demeaning himself; d but he told them, that it signified little whether they walked on foot or rode, as they all had the same views, viz. the service of God, and the propagation of the true religion. Having then taken leave of them, he addressed himself to Yezid Ebn Abu Sofiân, whom he had invested with the supreme command, in the following terms. Take care, Yezid Ebn Abu Sofiân, to treat your men with tenderness and lenity. Consult with your officers upon all pressing occasions, and encourage them to face the enemy with bravery and resolution. If you should happen to be victorious, destroy neither old people, women, nor children. Cut down no palm-trees, nor burn any fields of corn. Spare all fruit-trees, and slay no cattle, but such as you shall take for your own use. Adhere always inviolably to your engagements, and put none of the religious persons you shall meet with in monasteries to the sword. Offer no violence to the places they serve God in. e
As for those members of the synagogue of Satan, who shave their crowns, cleave their skulls, and give them no quarter, except they embrace Islamism, or pay tribute. After this salutary and humane advice had been delivered, he returned to Medina, and the army resumed its march for the borders of Syria. We are told by Abu'l Faraj, that the first body of troops that was ordered to advance towards the frontiers of Syria, under the command of Abu Obeidah Ebn Al Jerah, consisted of 20,000 men <sup>o</sup>.

The emperor Heraclius is alarmed at the approach of the Moslem army, which defeats
his forces.

THE approach of the Moslem army, and the preparations made to attack him, greatly alarmed the emperor; who calling a council, upon the arrival of this news, inveighed in a very pathetic strain against the wickedness and insincerity of his subjects, whose flagrant impieties, and repeated violations of the rules of the gospel, he considered as the principal f causes of the dangers that now threatened him. However, he took all the necessary precautions for the defence and security of his dominions. Being then, according to Eutychius, at Damascus, he detached a body of troops to reconnoitre, and even, if a proper opportunity offered, to engage the Arabs. In the mean time Yezid Ebn Abu Sofiân, the Moslem general, pursuing his march, advanced first to Ilab, and afterwards to Tadun, a small town in the neighbourhood of Gaza, and not far from the confines of Hejâz. Here they seem to have met with the imperial detachment, sent to get intelligence of their motions; upon which a battle immediately ensued, which ended in the defeat of the Greeks, who had their

<sup>n</sup> AL MAKIN, ubi sup. p. 17. GREG. ABU'L FAR. ubi sup. GOLII notæ ad Alfragan. p. 118, 119. KHOND-DEMIR, in Khelassâ Al Akh. Poc. not. in spec. hist. Arab. p. 66, 74. PROCOR. in Pers. apud Photium, p. 71, &c. EUTYCH. Alexandrin. annal. tom. ii. p. 256, 257. GOLII notæ ad Alfragan. p. 123, 124. OCKLEY'S hist. of the Sarac. vol. i. p. 30. <sup>o</sup> AL WAKED. GREG. ABU'L FAR. ubi sup. p. 174. EUTYCH. ubi sup. p. 251, 259. AL MAKIN, ubi sup.

- a commander and 1,200 men killed upon the spot, the Arabs losing only 120 men in the action. This was succeeded by many skirmishes and rencounters, wherein the Christians generally came off with the worst. The rich spoil acquired by the Arabs was conducted to Medina, as the first-fruits of their expedition, for a present to the Khalif, who thereupon sent an express to Mecca with the news of the advantages his troops had gained. This so animated the inhabitants of that city, that they furnished the Khalif with a strong reinforcement, which was immediately ordered to take the rout of Syria. In the mean time an accident happened, that might have proved of bad consequence to the Moslems, had they not been determined to make every thing, even ill usage itself, subservient to the propagation of their religion <sup>p</sup>.
- b ABU BECR, for some particular reasons best known to himself, appointed Said Ebn Khâled, an officer of distinguished merit, to command his forces in Syria. But understanding afterwards that this choice was disagreeable to Omar, by the advice of Ayesha, whom he consulted on all emergent occasions, he removed him from that post, and substituted Amru Ebn Al As, an excellent soldier, who afterwards conquered Egypt, in his room. Amru had before applied to Omar to procure him the post, as soon as he was informed of its being vacant, and that in a very instant and pressing manner. But Omar being unwilling to concern himself in the affair, advised him not to be solicitous for superiority and dominion in this world, but to consider that he who was not a prince to-day would be one to-morrow, meaning in a future state. However, the Khalif, without any application, being perfectly well acquainted with his abilities, made him general of his army, and, at the same time, exhorted him “to have the salvation of his soul always principally in view; to consider that he must be called to a strict account hereafter for all his actions; not to be inquisitive about other people’s affairs; to oblige his men frequently to read the Korân; and not to suffer them to discourse of any thing that happened in the times of ignorance, or before the introduction of Islamism, as this might probably be the occasion of dissensions amongst them.” Then he ordered him to march into Palestine, and to support the body of troops commanded by Abu Obeidab with such reinforcements, from time to time, as the circumstances of affairs should render necessary. When a messenger was sent by the Khalif to Said, to demand the standard of him, he resigned it with great patience and alacrity; saying, “It was matter of indifference to him who had the standard, as he was resolved to fight under it, however it might be disposed of, for the propagation of the true religion.” So determined were these men, whom God had raised up to be a scourge to the Christian church, for the crying iniquities, insincerity, and uncharitable disposition, of its members, to carry their point, that even such gross affronts as these, which would have excited resentment in others, served only the more to animate and confirm them in their resolutions <sup>q</sup>!
- c THE emperor receiving advice of the defeat of his forces, that were sent to get intelligence of the Arabs, ordered another body of troops to advance towards the frontiers, and join the imperial army assembled at Gaza. They did not continue long inactive here; but soon found an opportunity of engaging the enemy’s forces under the command of Abu Obeidab, a person of great piety, but not so well versed in military affairs, and gave him an intire defeat. This blow so intimidated the Moslems, that Abu Obeidab found himself obliged to stand upon the defensive; which so incensed the Khalif, that he dismissed him from his post, and recalled Khâled Ebn Al Walid from Irâk, to put him at the head of the army in Palestine. However, Abu Obeidab commanded under Khâled, and gained good reputation afterwards by his conduct, as will farther appear in the sequel of this history <sup>r</sup>.
- d KHALED, upon his arrival in the Moslem camp, found that Abu Obeidab had detached Serjabil with a body of 4,000 horse towards Bostra, a city of Syria Damascena, extremely rich and populous, which we have already described. The garison of this place, at that time, consisted of 12,000 horse; so that it seemed capable of making a brave defence even against the whole Arab power. Romanus, the governor, being informed of Serjabil’s approach, resolved to have a personal conference with him; and therefore meeting him at a small distance from the town, he demanded of him the reason of this irruption into his master’s dominions. Serjabil replied, that they came with a design to force the emperor’s subjects either to turn Mohammedans, or become tributaries to the Khalif; adding, that they had already made themselves masters of Aracca, Sachna, Tadmor, and Hawrân, and doubted not but they should easily reduce Bostra. This so intimidated the cowardly governor, that he would have persuaded the people of Bostra to pay tribute, rather than stand a siege; which they refusing, he made all the proper dispositions for a vigorous defence. And to convince Serjabil of their resolution, the garison made a sally upon his troops, as soon as he came within sight of the town, with so much bravery, that they forced him to retire; and had cut all the Arabs to pieces, had not Kháled, the new general, come in the critical moment with all his forces to their relief. This changed the fortune of the day, and the assailants were beat back with great slaughter into the town. We are told, that, before the beginning of the action, Serjabil said the following prayer: O Eternal Being, Creator of heaven and earth, who art infinitely great and munificent, who hast promised us victory by the tongue of thy prophet Mohammed, and even the conquest of Syria, Irák, and Persia, confirm our hopes, and assist those who assert thy unity. O God, support us as thou didst thy prophet Mohammed. O LORD, endue us with patience, keep our feet sure, and help us against the infidels. Hence it appears, that the Arab generals at this time were gifted men, and could pray as well as fight, tho' they were engaged in a very unjust and iniquitous war; in which they have been followed by other more hypocritical fanatics, in a political country, of a much later date. Kháled having reprimanded both Serjabil and Abu Ol Moh for offering to attack a town defended by so numerous a garison with such an inconceivable force, immediately invested the place. The following day after he and his troops had performed their morning devotions, some of the soldiers purified themselves with the sacred ablution, and others with the Al Taïamom, or friction of themselves with sand. Then he ordered part of his army to possess themselves of certain posts, the occupation of which would facilitate the reduction of the town, and drew up the rest in order of battle. This he did, in order to let the enemy see what they had to expect, and at the same time to be in a posture to repel all the sallies of the besieged.

<sup>p</sup> AL WAKEDI, EUTYCH. Alexandrin. annal. ubi sup. ubi supra. p. 258, 259.

<sup>q</sup> AL WAKEDI, ubi sup. GREG. ABU’L FAR. ubi sup. p. 174.

<sup>r</sup> EUTYCH.

The Christians defeated by the Arabs.

WHILST matters were in this situation, and the garison had posted themselves in the plains of Bostra, with a full resolution to engage the Moslem army, the traitor Romanus found means to have an interview with Kháled, in which he promised not only to embrace Islamism, but likewise to deliver up the place to the Arabs. However, in order to cover his villainous design, it was agreed between the two commanders, that they should engage in single combat, tho' without any considerable damage to either of them. But Kháled fearing lest the enemy should look upon it as a sham engagement, and thereby the plot laid between him and Romanus should be rendered abortive, treated his pretended antagonist so roughly, that he very narrowly escaped being killed. After his return, therefore, to the garison, he endeavoured to inspire them with the most exalted sentiments of the enemy's power, as well as of Kháled's personal bravery and conduct; which so enraged them, that had they not been afraid of the emperor's resentment, they would have immediately put him to death. However, they divested him of his authority, and prepared to give the Arabs a warm reception, in case they continued the siege. They also elected for their governor an experienced commander, that the emperor had sent some time before at the head of a strong reinforcement into the town. Having made these dispositions, the new commandant challenged Kháled to fight him in single combat; but whilst that general was preparing to meet him, a young Arab, named Abd'alrahmán, obtained his permission to answer the challenge. At their first interview, Abd'alrahmán called him a Christian dog, and defied him; and afterwards, using his horse and lance with great dexterity, he forced his antagonist to take to his heels, who, being better mounted than the Arab, tho' with some difficulty, made his escape. However, this brought on a very brisk action, in which the Christians were defeated, and forced to retire with great slaughter into the town; the Moslems losing only 230 men on this occasion. Before the beginning of the action, Kháled and Serjabil offered up their prayers in the following terms: "O God, help us, we beseech thee, against these wretches, who pray with idolatrous expressions, and take to themselves another God besides thee. Help us, O God, who acknowlege thy unity, and affirm that there is no other God but thou alone, for the sake of thy prophet Mohammed, against these idolaters." After which, Kháled cried out, "Fight, fight! Paradise, paradise!" which so animated his men that they fought like lions, insomuch that nothing could stand before them.

Bostra delivered up to the Arabs by treachery.

IN the mean time, Romanus, the former governor, found an opportunity of withdrawing himself privately to the Moslem camp; where he informed Kháled of the miserable situation to which he had been reduced by his attachment to the Arabs. Here also he formed a plan, for the delivery of the town into his hands; which had the desired effect. For Kháled detaching Abd'alrahmán with 100 men to attend Romanus, he easily introduced him into the place; where the Arab dividing his detachment into four parties of 25 men each, they scoured the four principal streets of the city, crying out, ALLAH ACBAR, &c. GOD IS GREAT, &c. and, with very little opposition, opened the gates to the Moslem army. To complete this important conquest, and facilitate the admission of the Moslem forces, Romanus had conducted Abd'alrahmán to the governor, whom he told that he had brought "his friend Abd'alrahmán with him to send him to hell." Upon the governor's attempting to make his escape, Abd'alrahmán killed him upon the spot, saying, "Though you fled from

* AL WAKEDI, ubi sup. ABU'LFED. in geogr. AL KOR. MOHAM. f. iii. v. 141. & f. v. v. 7. ABU'LFED. de vit. Moham. p. 83, 84. Vide etiam GAGN. not. ad Abu'lfed. ibid. * AL WAKEDI, ubi sup.

- a "me once in the day-time, it shall not be in your power to serve me so again." After the place was lost, the Arabs put many of the miserable inhabitants to the sword; till at last the principal men crying out for quarter, Khâled put a stop to the carnage, declaring that the prophet himself used frequently to say, "If any one be killed after he has desired quarter, that fault is not to be laid to my charge." The next day, Romanus, with unparalleled impudence, notified to the people the infamous part he had acted in favour of the Arabs; and at the same time gave them to understand, that he had commenced a zealous professor of Mohammedism. This so incensed them, that, had he not been defended by a Moslem escorte, he would have met with the just reward of his treason and apostasy. The besieged had an intention, after the late defeat, to have wrote for succours to the emperor,
- b whose forces, according to Said Ebn Al Batrik, were a little before assembled in a body at Gaza. But the progress of the Arabs was so rapid, and they pushed the siege with so much vigour, that, had the traitor Romanus's machinations not taken effect, that prince's whole power in Syria would scarce have been able to support them*.

WE are told by the last-mentioned writer, that the emperor's forces fortified their camp at Gaza, out of fear, as it should seem, of the Moslem army; and that Patricius, the imperial general, soon after Khâled's arrival from Irâk, inquiring of Amru Ebn Al As, one of Abu Becr's commanders, the reason of their irruption into Syria, received the same answer from him that Romanus had before from Serjabil, viz. that they came either to convert the emperor's subjects to Islamism, or to exact an annual tribute of them. We must not forget to observe, that the reduction of Bostra happened in the twelfth year of the Hejra†.

- THE emperor, who was then at Antioch, receiving advice of the loss of Bostra, and that the Arabs were in motion with all their forces to form the siege of Damascus, sent Calous, one of his generals, with a body of 5,000 men, to reinforce the garison of the latter of those places. Calous, upon his arrival at Hems, or Emesa, being informed of the depredations committed by the Arabs, and that they were in full march for Damascus, thought fit to halt at that place, which was well furnished not only with provisions of all kinds, but likewise with men, arms, and military stores. Hems, the Emesa, or Emessa, of Ptolemy, is situated in a plain between Aleppo and Damascus, at an equal distance, or five days journey, from each of those cities. The inhabitants breathe a very salubrious air, and the town is surrounded
- d by beautiful gardens and fruitful orchards, which are plentifully supplied with water by a branch of the Orentes, called by the Arabian geographers Alâsi, whose stream approaches within half a mile of the town. Abu'lfeda relates, that the water of this rivulet is of such a nature, that if a garment be washed by it, neither scorpion, serpent, nor any other venomous creature, will come near it, till it has been soaked in some other water. The same author, from Ebn Hawkal, likewise observes, that its inhabitants have the finest complexions, and are the most beautiful, of any people in Syria; as also, that no noxious animals will live in the territory belonging to it. This historian deduces its origin from the Amalekites, and places it in long. 61° lat. 34° 20'. From thence Calous advanced to Baalbec, where he received the same intelligence as before, and found this place in all respects
- e as capable of sustaining a siege as the former. Baalbec is a most splendid city of Syria, about three days journey distant from Damascus. It is seated on a mountain, and defended by a large and strong citadel. It abounds with trees, rivers, fountains, and all the necessities, as well as elegancies, of life. Its buildings are most magnificent and superb, and the surprizing remains of antiquity still visible in it indicate a most noble and polite taste. The Sabians pretend, that it formerly belonged to them; from whence, in conjunction with other concurring circumstances, we may infer, that it was the Heliopolis ad Libanum of the ancients, as Baal, amongst the Syrians, denoted the sun. William of Tyre calls it Malbec, as the Arabs called Becca Mecca. The tract between Baalbec and Damascus is one of the finest countries in the world. Abu'lfeda places the former city in long. 60° lat. 38° 50'. From
- f this place Calous marched to Damascus, where he safely arrived, without meeting with the least obstruction from the enemy*.

AFTER the reduction of Bostra, Khâled ordered Abu Obeidab to join him with the body of troops under his command, and then sent an express to the Khâlif to acquaint him with the success of his arms in Syria. The forces at this time under the conduct of Amru Ebn Al As in Palesline amounted to 7,000 men, those led by Abu Obeidab to 37,000, and those who obeyed the orders of Khâled himself only to 1,500 horse; so that after the junction of them all, which happened a few days after the surrender, or rather the delivery, of Bostra, the Moslem army consisted of no more than 45,500 men. With these Khâled, having left a garison in Bostra of 400 men, marched to Damascus, in order to lay siege to that place.

* Idem ibid. SAID EBN AL BATRIK, sive EUTYCH. ubi sup. p. 258, 259.

† EUTYCH. ubi sup. p. 260. 261. * AL WAKEDI, ubi sup. PTOL. geogr. lib. v. c. 15. COLLI not. ad Alfragan. p. 127. ISM. ABU'LFED. in geogr. SHARIF AL EDRISI, sive GEOGR. NUBIENS. p. 118. EBN HAWKAL. apud Abu'lfed. ubi sup. GUL. TYR. AL AZIZI, apud Ism. Abu'lfed. ubi sup.

Upon his arrival there, he found the citizens divided into parties and factions, and in a very a ill humour, on account of an order they had received from the emperor, to admit Calous for their governor, and send Izraïl, his predecessor, out of the town. For Izraïl being a man of known bravery, and acknowledged abilities, and Calous an utter stranger to them; they were extremely unwilling to comply with that order at this critical juncture, when they were threatened with a siege. However, when the Moslems approached the town, they found the Christians drawn up in order of battle without the walls, and ready to receive them. The two armies no sooner faced each other, than Derâr Ebn Al Azwar, at Khâled's command, who exhorted him to behave valiantly for the propagation of his religion, charged a body of the Christians, of whom he killed four troopers, and six of the infantry; but was at last forced to retire with considerable loss. He was seconded by Abd'alrahmân, who distinguished b himself at the attack of Bosra; but with no better success. However, this bad beginning did not discourage Khâled, who challenged to fight in single combat any man in the Christian army. Calous, the new governor lately sent by the emperor, being excited thereto in a taunting manner by his predecessor Izraïl, accepted the challenge; but was foiled by his antagonist, and taken prisoner. Nor had Izraïl, who afterwards found himself likewise obliged to fight Khâled, any better success. For, after Khâled had rallied him on account of his name, the angel of death being called Izraïl, or Azraïl, by the Arabs, telling him that "his name's-sake was at his service, and just ready to carry his soul to hell," he vanquished him, and conveyed him to the Moslem camp; where he ordered the heads of both the Christian commanders he had in his power to be struck off, because they refused to c embrace the Mohammedan faith. Damascus, pronounced by the Arabs Dimesjk, and Dimask, is the metropolis of Syria, and, by reason of the delightful country in which 'tis situated, the fertility of its territory, its beautiful trees, variety of fruits, plenty of fountains, magnificent buildings, &c. is denominated by the eastern writers the paradise of that country. It is a place of vast antiquity, and by some supposed to have derived its name from that of its founder, who, they say, was the son of Canaan. It is seated in a plain, surrounded on all sides by mountains, some of which seem to be the Trachones of Strabo. The inhabitants believe, that Cain killed his brother Abel in a cave here; and that in another, not far from it, forty prophets were destroyed by the Israelites. The air of Damascus is most salubrious, and the water excellent. The villages and castles about it are innumerable, and the verdure, d the beauty of the flowers, and the abundance of all kinds of the most delicious fruits, of the neighbouring tract so infinitely delightful, that this tract may pass for the Tempe of Asia. It extends to about a day's journey out of the city. At the western gate there begins a valley three miles broad and twelve long, planted with various kinds of trees, that is called by the natives the valley of violets. Its river, the Chrysorrhoas of the Greeks, the fountains of which are in mount Lebanon, or Hermon, at a village called Canwa, five parasangs from the city, is an exceeding great ornament, and of vast advantage, to the place. The Moslems pretend, that the four earthly paradises are the Gouta, or green garden, of Damascus; the Shibo Bawân, a most beautiful district in Persia; the Nabar Obulla, a charming tract, or rather island, near the confluence of the Obulla and the Tigris; and the Soghd of Samarkand. e Abu'lfeda makes the longitude of Damascus to be  $60^{\circ}$ , and its latitude  $38^{\circ} 30'$ . It was a city of so great note and eminence, that all the neighbouring part of Syria had from it the name of Syria Damascena assigned it by the ancients<sup>y</sup>.

The emperor
sends an army
of 100,000 men to the relief of Damaf-
cus.

AFTER the inhuman butchery above-mentioned, Khâled commanded the heads of the two Christian chiefs, or rather martyrs, to be thrown over the walls into the town, in order to intimidate the besieged; but this did not produce the desired effect. For the garison made frequent sallies upon the besiegers, and killed them abundance of men; tho' in these they were generally repulsed, and at last obliged, for the preservation of their men, whose numbers were greatly diminished since the beginning of the siege, to confine themselves within the walls of the town. This so animated the Arabs, who were before acted by an enthu- f stastic spirit, which rendered them insensible of danger, that they redoubled their attacks; Khâled having pitched his tent opposite to the east-gate, as Abu Obeidah had done his before that called the gate of Al Jâbiyah, that they might the more easily sustain each other in case either of them should be pushed. Al Makin seems to intimate, that about this time Khâled Ebn Said gained a considerable advantage over a body of the enemy, commanded by one of the imperial captains called Maban, and pursued them to the gates of Damascus; which probably is to be understood of a party of the garison, that made a sally, and was repulsed by the Arabs. The city being thus straitly besieged, an express was dispatched to the emperor; who eluded the vigilance of the enemy, to inform him of the progress made by the Arabs, and to desire speedy succours. This so alarmed that prince, that he immediately g gave orders for the march of the army he had then on foot, consisting of 100,000 men, a under the conduct of one Werdân, who refused at first to accept of the commission, as apprehending himself slighted, because he had not been employed at the beginning of the war, to the relief of Damascus. However, at last he took upon him the command of the army; and, after he had taken leave of the emperor and several of the nobility, who attended him part of the way, he marched towards Damascus with the utmost expedition; the emperor having above all things recommended it to him, to cut off all supplies from the Moslem army that lay then encamped before the town <sup>2</sup>.

<sup>y</sup> AL WAKED. ubi sup. ISM. ABU'LFED. in geogr. GOLII notæ ad Alfragan. p. 120, 121, 128. HADR. RELAND. in Palest. illustrat. p. 314, 324.

In the mean time the garison of Damascus was reduced to such extremity, that the citizens offered 1,000 ounces of gold, and 200 suits of silk, to the enemy, provided they would immediately raise the siege. But this Khâled absolutely refused to do, unless they would either embrace Islamism, or become tributaries to the Khalîf. Which inflexible firmness of the Moslem general was really surprizing, as both he and Abu Obeidah had been but just before greatly alarmed by a courier, who had brought them advice, that the imperial army was advanced almost as far as Ajnadîn. Upon the arrival of this news, Khâled proposed marching with all his forces, and giving the enemy battle; but this was opposed by Abu Obeidah, as such a measure would enable the inhabitants of Damascus to procure fresh supplies both of arms and provisions, and consequently render more difficult the reduction of that place. In about six weeks time, the approach of the Christian army was sufficiently notified to the besiegers, by the acclamations and other expressions of joy they could perceive in the town; upon which, Khâled was again desirous of fighting the Greeks; but Abu Obeidah still persisted in his former opinion. It was, therefore, at last agreed to detach a body of troops under the command of Derâr Ebn Al Azwâr, an excellent officer, but a most implacable enemy of the Christians (as, indeed, were all the rest of the Moslem generals, except Abu Obeidah), to attack the enemy; whilst Khâled and Abu Obeidah, with the rest of the Arab forces, continued the siege. It is intimated by some of the oriental writers, that every gate of Damascus had a Moslem commander posted with a body of troops before it; and that these commanders were all so attentive to the motions of the besieged, that they were repulsed in every sally they made <sup>3</sup>.

KHALED fearing least Derâr's intemperate zeal, and violent aversion to the Christians, should prove prejudicial, if not fatal, to his troops, told him, before his departure in quest of the Greeks, that tho' they were commanded to fight for the propagation of their religion, yet they were not allowed to throw away the lives of their men; and therefore ordered him to retire to the main body of the army, in case he found himself pushed by a superior force. But Derâr being deaf to this salutary admonition, with his small body engaged the whole Christian army, notwithstanding the vast disproportion of numbers; Rasî Ebn Omeirab telling his soldiers, who were struck with terror at the approach of such a multitude, that "the Moslems had frequently defeated very formidable armies with a handful of men." He charged the enemy with such bravery, that he penetrated to the spot where the general gave his orders, killed a man by his side, laid his standard-bearer dead at his feet, and carried off the standard itself, that had a cross in it richly adorned with precious stones. Nay, he would, in all probability, have put Werdân's army to the rout, had not his son, the commandant of Hems, arrived in the heat of the engagement with a body of 10,000 men, and fallen upon the Moslems with such fury, that he forced them to retire, and took Derâr prisoner. This so discouraged them, that they would have taken to their heels, had not Rasî Ebn Omeirab endeavoured to animate them with the following words. "What! don't you know, that whosoever turns his back upon his enemies offends God, and his prophet? And that the prophet declared, that the gates of paradise should be open to none but such as fought for religion? Come on! I'll go before you. If your captain be dead, or taken prisoner, yet your God is alive, and sees what you do." After which exhortation, they returned to the charge with greater fierceness than ever, and maintained their ground, notwithstanding all the efforts of the enemy, till succours arrived, with unparalleled bravery. In the mean time, Khâled being informed of Derâr's fate, and that the Moslems under his command were upon the point of being ruined, after having consulted with Abu Obeidah, hastened to their relief with all possible expedition; having left Meisarah Ebn Mesruk, in conjunction with Abu Obeidah, by the direction of the latter, with a considerable body of infantry and 1,000 horse, to repel all the sallies of the besieged. The arrival of a fresh reinforcement, with so able a general as Khâled at the head of it, so intimidated the enemy, that a party of them lately come from Hems went over in a body to the Arabs; upon which, the imperial forces immediately began to give ground, and at last betook themselves to a precipitate flight. Nor did Derâr himself, tho' a captive, fail of partaking of the good fortune of this auspicious day. For Khâled receiving intelligence, that Werdân had ordered him to be conducted to Hems by a party of 100 horse, to be presented to the emperor, he immediately sent after him a strong detachment, which coming up with him at Wadi'l Hoyât, defeated the escorte, and carried him off in triumph to the Moslem army, at that time in full pursuit of the Greeks. However, the imperial general having rallied his shatter'd troops at Ajnadin, and received a reinforcement from the emperor, upon a review, found his army to consist of 70,000 effective men. With these forces, in a council of war, it was resolved to advance towards Damascus, and make a second attempt to force the enemy to abandon the siege. Said Ebn Batrík, or Euty chius, gives us an account of a conference held between Amru, whom he wrongly calls Omar, Ebn Al As, one of the Moslem commanders, and Patricius, the general who commanded the imperial troops at Gaza; as also of a design formed by the latter to assassinate the former, which was discovered by Werdán or Wordán, a boy that attended Amru to the Christian camp; but it is so indistinct and confused, and withal so repugnant to what has been advanced by Al Wakedi, whose authority is preferable to that of Euty chius in the point before us, that it merits not the least attention <sup>b</sup>.

<sup>2</sup> AL WAKED. ubi sup. AL MAKIN, hist. Saracen. lib. i. c. 2. p. 17. not. ad Alfragan. p. 130.

<sup>3</sup> AL WAKEDI, ubi sup. GOLII

The garison of Damascus repulsed in a vigorous sally they made, with great loss.

KHALED having received advice, that the Christian army was soon to be in motion, in order to relieve Damascus, sent a circular letter to Yezid Ebn Abu Sofián, then at Balka, a territory upon the confines of Syria; Serjabil Ebn Hasana, in Palestine; Meád, in Harrán; Nooman Ebn Al Mondar, at Tadmor; and Amru Ebn Al As, in Irák; with orders to repair to Ajnadin at the head of their respective forces. The purport of this letter was to the following effect. “In the name of the most merciful God. From Kháled Ebn Al Walíd to Amru Ebn Al As, &c. health and happiness. Know that thy brethren the Moslems intend to advance to Ajnadin, where there is an army of 70,000 Greeks, who are upon the point of marching against us, that they may extinguish the light of God with their mouths; but God preserveth his light in spite of the infidels. As soon, therefore, as this letter of mine reacheth thee, come with those that are with thee to Ajnadin, where thou shalt find us, if it pleases the most high God.” Then, in pursuance of his plan, Kháled raised the siege of Damascus, and put himself in march for Ajnadin, with a full resolution to offer the enemy battle. Immediately after Kháled's departure, the garison of Damascus issued out of the place in a body, consisting of 10,000 foot and 6,000 horse, under the conduct of two officers, called Peter and Paul, the latter of whom commanded the cavalry, and the former the infantry. Paul fell upon Abu Obeidah, and the rear of the Moslem army, with so much courage, that he put them into disorder; whilst Peter seized upon the women, children, wealth, and baggage, which all had a place assigned them in the rear. Kháled being apprized of this, after a short reflection upon the advice he had before given to Abu Obeidah, detached Rafi Ebn Omeirah, Kais Ebn Hobeirah, Abd'alrahmán, and Derár Ebn Al Azwár, with a body of 8,000 horse, to sustain Abu Obeidah; which they did so effectually, that the Christian cavalry were all cut to pieces, except about 100 men, who with great difficulty escaped into the town. As for Peter, with the infantry, he was so far from supporting Paul, as he ought to have done, that, after he had pillaged the Arabs, he left him intirely to himself, and made no diversion in his favour. Paul was taken prisoner in the action, and would have been immediately put the sword, had not the Moslems been afraid that this barbarity would have been retaliated upon their wives and children, who had all been carried off by Peter. Amongst these there were several women of the tribe of Hamyar, who rode on horseback, and fought after the manner of the ancient Amazons; as also Kharwlab, the sister of Derár, a woman of great courage and beauty. Peter fell desperately in love with this lady. But she was so far from complying with the proposals he made her, that, at the head of the female prisoners, with Ofeirah, one of the most resolute of them, she prepared to attack him and his men with some tent-poles they had procured; which so exasperated Peter, that he commanded them all to be put to the sword. But when these Arabian Amazons were at the last extremity, they had the good fortune to be rescued by Kháled and Derár; who, after a very brisk action, killed Peter and 3,000 of the Greek infantry upon the spot, and pursued the rest to the very gates of Damascus. Then they immediately rejoined Abu Obeidah, to prevent his being insulted by Werdán. After Kháled had shewn Peter's head to Paul, which is said to have drawn tears from him, the barbarian insisted upon his renouncing the Christian faith; and, upon his refusing to do this, commanded him instantly to be beheaded. In the mean time, Yezid Ebn Abu Sofián arrived from Balka, Serjabil Ebn Hasanah from Palestine, Meád from Harrán, Amru Ebn Al As from Irák, and Nooman Ebn Al Mondar from Tadmor, in the neighbourhood of Ajnadin, with their respective forces, all the very same day, being Friday, July 13th, in the year of CHRIST 633, or of the Hejra 12, according to Al Wakedi; though, from several circumstances, and particularly from the day Damascus was taken, which was the very same day on which Abu Becr died, that event indisputably appears to have happened the following year. To which we may

<sup>b</sup> AL WAKED. ubi sup. EUTYCH. ubi sup. p. 260—265.

- a add, that the express testimony of Al Makin may likewise be produced in support of this opinion. It will not be improper here to remark, that Balka, or Albelkan, is a tract of a considerable extent, belonging to Syria, whose principal city is Amman, or Ammon, a place that we have already taken notice of. The river Zerkaa passes by it, and the lake Zaira is about a day's journey distant from it. Many remains of antiquity are still visible about Ammon, which the inhabitants believe to have been built by Lot; who certainly, if he really was the founder of it, chose one of the finest spots of ground in the world for its situation. As for Harrân, Cherrân, Haran, Charræ, or Arran, for it went by all these names, it is a very ancient city of Diyar-Modar, supposed to have been the first that was built after the deluge; its vicinity to Ararat, on which the ark rested, giving some countenance to such
- b a notion. It stood about one day's journey from Edeffa, and two from Racca, or Aracca, upon the Euphrates. The eastern writers tell us, that this city was the principal seat of the Sabians. Abu'lfeda makes its longitude  $68^{\circ}$ , and latitude  $37^{\circ} 50'$ , as we find in the copious description he has given us of it. Another town of the same name, called the Lesser Charrân, or Harrân, by some of the oriental geographers, is situated in the province of Babrein. In the district of the city we are now upon, there is a small tract called Bettan, or Bittân, famous for the birth of Mohammed Ebn Jabbar Ebn Senân, surnamed from this place Albettani, or Al Battani, the Sabian, whose works, as well as those of Thabet Ebn Korra, born at, or in the neighbourhood of, Harrân, are so well known in Europe. Harrân was lately inhabited by only a few Turks and Jews, who had rendered themselves infamous
- c by their robberies and depredations; it having been in a great measure ruined by Hulaku, or Holagu, the Tartar, after he had made himself master of Baghdâd. Tadmor, Tadmora, or Tamor, the other city here mentioned, stands in the deserts of Sham, or Syria, about five days journey from Aleppo, two from the Upper Syria, and one from the Euphrates. The Greeks called it Palmyra, which name seems very well to correspond in signification with that of Tadmor, or rather Tamor. This place was the residence of Zenobia, which rendered it famous to all succeeding ages. Some suppose it to have been built by Solomon the son of David, king of Israel; which notion seems to be strongly countenanced by Scripture; but others take it still to be of an earlier date. For a further account of this town, which, according to Abu'lfeda, is situated in long.  $52^{\circ}$ , and lat.  $34^{\circ}$ , as well as the noble remains
- d of antiquity still visible amongst the ruins of it, we must beg leave to refer our curious readers to the authors cited here <sup>c</sup>.

- AFTER the junction of all the Moslem forces, the imperial troops likewise appearing to The Christian the number of 70,000 men, the two armies faced each other at a small distance from Ajna- and Moslem dîn. The Arabs were struck with terror, at the sight of so numerous a body; tho' all their commanders, and Khâled in particular, animated them to the utmost of their power, <sup>armies prepare for an engagement.</sup> and exhorted them by all the motives they could suggest to behave like men on the present occasion. Khâled told them, that "if they could defeat this army, the Greeks would never afterwards be able to make head against them; that if the enemy put them to flight, they would most certainly be damned for their pusillanimity; that they were not to begin
- e "the attack till a proper signal was given; and that they must behave with the utmost "bravery." Then he detached Derâr with a small party to reconnoitre them more fully, that he might have a better account of their countenance and numbers. Derâr, upon his approach, was attacked by a detachment of 30 horse, that Werdân had sent to bring him off to the Christian camp, and with great difficulty made his escape; notwithstanding which, he assured Khâled of success, telling him that the enemy would not stand before him. Upon this, that general immediately drew up his army in order of battle; at the same time intreating Khawlah, Ofeirah, and the other Arabian women of distinction, as well as those of an inferior rank, not only to be active themselves, but likewise to make use of all their influence, in order to induce the men to exert themselves in the approaching engagement.
- f This they all promised faithfully to do, declaring that they were ready to lose their lives for the sake of their religion, as well as in defence of every thing else that was dear to them. Mcâd Ebn Jabal and Noomân Ebn Al Mokarren led the right wing; Said Ebn Amer and Serjabil Ebn Hasanah the left; Yezid Ebn Abu Sofiân guarded the baggage, women, and children, all posted in the rear, with a body of 4,000 horse; and Khâled himself, with Amru Ebn Al As, Abd'alrahmân, the Khalîf's son, Kais Ebn Hobeirah, Rafi Ebn Omeirah, and other superior officers, commanded the main body. Before the beginning of the action, a venerable old man, belonging to the Christian army, had a conference with

<sup>c</sup> AL WAKED. ubi sup. ISM. ABU'LFED. in geograph. GOLI notæ ad Alfragan. p. 249, 250. JOSEPH. antiquit. lib. 8. c. 6. 2 CHRON. viii. 4. 1 KIN. ix. 18. APPIAN. ALEXANDER. de bel. Syr. p. 201. AL AZIZI, apud Abu'lfed. ubi sup. Vide etiam ind. geograph. in vit. Saladin. ab Alberto Schult. edit. Lugduni Batavorum, 1732. LOWTHORP'S Philosph. Transact. abr. vol. iii. p. 492—527. SELLERS'S antiquities of Palmyra, aliàs Tadmor, &c. Lond. 1705. Inscript. Græc. Palmyren. cum vers. Latin. & schol. EDWARDI SMITHI, &c. Rotterd. 1716.

Khâled, wherein he endeavoured to dissuade the Moslem general from engaging the imperial forces, and consequently to prevent the effusion of human blood; but without effect. The Arab was determined, unless the Christians would renounce their faith, or submit to pay an annual tribute, to leave the decision of the present dispute between the Khalîf and the Roman emperor intirely to the sword<sup>d</sup>.

The Moslems
too hard for the Greeks.

THE Greeks, finding Khâled so averse to an accommodation, made the proper dispositions on their part for an engagement. Werdân endeavoured to inspire his men with courage, by representing to them, that they were now to fight for their wives, children, properties, and religion, in fine for every thing that could be esteemed dear and valuable to them; and that if they were overthrown, they must inevitably become slaves to the vilest of enthusiasts and barbarians. Nor did he fail to remind them, that they were more than double the number of the enemy; and that therefore nothing could be more ignominious, or render them more contemptible, than a defeat. After which, the Armenian archers began the battle by a general discharge of their arrows, which killed and wounded a great number of the Moslems. However, the latter charged the Greeks with so much bravery, being animated by the hopes of receiving a crown of martyrdom, and terrified by the apprehension of future eternal punishment, that they forced them to give ground, and would have intirely routed them, had not Werdân, by a stratagem, prevailed upon Khâled to sound a retreat. As the action hitherto was extremely hot, many of the Moslems, but more of the Christians, were slain. Of the stratagem just mentioned, tho' it may rather be considered as an instance of the Arab genius than a real fact, we shall here beg leave to give our curious readers a short and succinct relation<sup>e</sup>.

Werdân's
stratagem.

WERDÂN finding his men not capable of coping with the Arabs, dispatched a messenger, called David, to Khâled, to desire that the two generals might have an interview the next morning at an appointed place, in order to settle the preliminaries of a future treaty, and thereby prevent the farther effusion of human blood; and, to facilitate this, that the action might be suspended till next morning. In the mean time, Werdân, as he was perfectly acquainted with the nature of the place he proposed to Khâled on this occasion, posted an ambuscade of ten men to seize upon the Arab as soon as he should appear; of which David, who was chiefly instrumental in the deception and circumvention of Khâled, had been previously apprized. But this faithless wretch opened the whole affair to the Moslem general, who surprized Werdân's ambuscade, and placed ten of his own men on the spot they had occupied, that very evening, and the next morning met Werdân, as he had desired. Khâled first told the imperial commander, that he had received orders not to grant him a peace, but upon condition that he either consented to pay the Khalîf an annual tribute, or prevailed upon the people committed to his care, that is, the emperor's Syrian subjects, to embrace Mohammedism. But Werdân refusing to listen to such ignominious terms as these, Khâled shook him, and treated him with great indignity; upon which, he immediately called out to the ambuscade, not knowing that it consisted of Arabs, to come and rescue him. His words were scarce uttered, when Derâr, with only a pair of breeches on, attended by his nine companions, appeared, seized upon him, and struck off his head. Then they stripped him, carried off the costly garments, gold chains, and jewels, with which he was adorned; and, with his head fixed upon the point of a lance, advanced towards the Moslem army. The Arabs at first mistook them for Werdân and his men, marching in triumph with Khâled's head towards them; but were immediately undeceived by Abu Obeidah, who knew Khâled and Derâr at a considerable distance. This is the substance of the account given us of the affair in view by Al Wakedi, though stript of all the most improbable, not to say fabulous, incidents with which it has been so beautifully embellished by that historian<sup>f</sup>.

Khâled defeats the Christian
army.

ABU OBEIDAH, who commanded in Khâled's absence, immediately informing his troops of what had happened; they fell upon the Greeks with such fury that they almost instantly put them to flight, and made a terrible slaughter of them. Al Wakedi relates, that, in this fatal battle, the Moslems killed 50,000 of the enemy upon the spot; and that the rest escaped to Cæsarea, Antioch, and Damascus. The Arabs, according to the same author, took an immense quantity of plunder of inestimable value, consisting chiefly of banners, crosses of gold and silver, precious stones, gold and silver chains, and arms without number; of all which Khâled proposed to make a proper division, after the reduction of Damascus. As for the Moslems, if Al Wakedi may be credited, they lost only 474 men on this occasion; as will more fully appear from the letter Khâled wrote the Khalîf immediately after the action, which has been transmitted down to us by that historian, and is to the following effect. "IN THE NAME OF THE MOST MERCIFUL GOD. From Khâled Ebn Al Walid to the successor of the apostle of God, upon whom be the divine benediction. I g

<sup>d</sup> AL WAKED. ubi sup. AL KOR. MOHAM. f. viii. v. 15, 16. MOHAM. ubi sup. & alib. GAGN. la vie de Mahom. tom. ii. liv. vii. c. xv p. 380, 381. ubi sup.

<sup>e</sup> AL WAKED. ubi sup. AL KOR. <sup>f</sup> AL WAKEDI.

- a " praise God, who is the only God, and there is none other besides him. I pray also for " his prophet Mohammed, upon whom be the divine benediction. I praise him likewise, " and give thanks to him still more, for delivering the true believers, destroying the idola-
 " ters, and extinguishing the light of those that err. I acquaint thee, O emperor of the " faithful, that we met with the Grecian army under the conduct of Werdân, the prefect of " Hems, who swore by CHRIST, that they would either conquer or die. However, we fell " upon them, calling on and trusting in God, who supported us, and gave us a complete " victory. As it was decreed, that our enemies should be overcome, we slew them on all " sides, to the number of 50,000 men. The loss we sustained amounted to no more than " 474 men. I date this letter on the 30th of the former Jomâda, whilst on my march b " from Ajnadin to Damascus. Pray for our farther prosperity and success. Farewell. The " peace and blessing of God be upon thee, and all true Moslems." The Khalif, upon the arrival of the courier with this great news, prostrated himself; adored ALMIGHTY GOD; and returned him, in the most devout manner, thanks for the divine blessing that had so manifestly attended his arms. Then he read the letter over to himself, and afterwards communicated the contents of it to the grandees of his court. This had such an effect upon the Arabs, and particularly the Koreish, that many of that tribe, as well as a vast number of others, pressed the Khalif for leave to share with their brethren the glory and riches acquired in the Syrian expedition. This at last, though with considerable reluctance, he granted them, at the earnest request of Arak and Abu Sofiân, who engaged in the most c solemn manner, to distinguish themselves for the cause of God, and the propagation of their religion. Of this Abu Becr informed Khâled, in the answer he wrote him; ordering him at the same time, after the arrival of the reinforcement under the command of Amru Ebn Maadi and Malec Al Ashtae, to lay siege again to Damascus, and, after the reduction of that place, to make himself master of Hems, Mearrah, and Antioch. He likewise enjoined him to think upon mortality, and to treat with kindness the Moslems. This letter was sealed with Mohammed's seal, according to Al Wakedi; though this must be a mistake, if we can depend upon what has been advanced by Al Jannâbi, who assures us, that the prophet's seal fell into the well of Aris from Othmân Ebn Affân's finger, and was never afterwards found. Be that as it will, the letter was carried to Khâled by Abd'alrahmân, the same courier
 d who had brought the Khalif's advice of the defeat of the Christian army, with all possible expedition<sup>e</sup>.

In the mean time, Khâled arrived with the Muslim army before Damascus, and formed a Khâled forms second time the siege of that important place. The first thing he did after his arrival was the siege of to assign the officers of his army their respective posts, in such a manner that the siege Damascus a might be carried on with the utmost vigour. Abu Sofiân was posted at the little gate; Ser- second time.
jabil Ebn Hasanah at the gate of St. Thomas, with a body of 2,000 horse; Amru Ebn Al As at the gate of paradise; and Kais Ebn Hobeirah at the gate called Kaisân. As for the gate of St. Mark, neither the Arabs nor the garison approached it; for which reason, amongst the former, it went under the name of Babo' Isalâmah, or the gate of peace. Khâled himself e pitched his tent before the east gate, and commanded Derâr, with a flying camp, consisting of 20,000 horse, to be in perpetual motion, in order to have an eye upon the enemy's parties, and prevent a surprize. The day after he had made these dispositions, that general received the Khalif's letter, and the besieged made a vigorous sally. The action was very hot, and continued almost the whole day; but the Moslems being flushed with their late success, and animated by their commanders, who promised them paradise, as well as all the riches of those parts of the East, repulsed the garison, and beat them back into the town with very considerable loss. After the end of the action, Khâled sent the letter brought him by the courier to the officers posted at the several gates, for their perusal, and particularly to Abu Obeidah; who had taken up his station before the gate named Al Jabiya, at f some distance from the city. This blow so intimidated the besieged, that they would immediately have proposed terms of capitulation to Khâled, had they not been diverted from their resolution by one Thomas; who, according to Al Wakedi, was the emperor's son-in-law, and an excellent soldier, tho' not at that time vested with any commission. He represented to them, that the Arabs were little better than a contemptible rabble, and much inferior to them in point of conduct, military discipline, and personal bravery. This, however, at first made little impression upon them; they having been witnesses of their surprizing intrepidity on several occasions. But at last it was agreed, that the next morning, under his command, they should sally out of the place, and make a vigorous effort to carry the enemy's camp<sup>h</sup>.

THE Arabs, at the time the sally was made, were preparing to make a general assault;
 but Thomas, at the head of his troops, did not only prevent them from carrying that design

<sup>e</sup> Idem ibid. AL JANNAB. p. 305, & seq. GAGN. ubi sup. p. 402.
 notæ ad Alfragan. p. 129, 130.

<sup>h</sup> AL WAKED. ubi sup. GOLII

into execution, but likewise drove them from the posts they had occupied with very great a slaughter. He killed many of the enemy with his own hand, and, amongst the rest, one of their commanders, named Abân Ebn Said, whom, as the Arabs say, he shot with a poisoned arrow. This so incensed a virago, to whom Abân had been lately married at Ajnadin, that she shot the standard-bearer of the Christians in the hand upon the very spot where Abân was slain. Upon which, the standard fell into the hands of the Moslems; who instantly carried it off. Nor could Thomas afterwards recover it, tho' he attacked Serjabil, in whose possession it was, with unparalleled bravery. For, notwithstanding the military engines from the walls greatly favoured him, having received a wound in the eye from Abân's widow, who levelled an arrow at him, he found himself obliged to retire into the city. The Arabs very closely followed him for some time, and cut off 300 of his men in b the pursuit; but the engines planted on the walls kept them in awe, and, by plying them with repeated vollies of arrows and stones, destroyed abundance of them. This forced them at last to retreat, and permit the besieged to repose themselves after the fatigues they had sustained <sup>i</sup>.

The besieged make another sally, but are repulsed.

HOWEVER, Thomas resolved to make another effort to force the besiegers trenches, and oblige them to abandon the siege. Having, therefore, dressed his wound, and left a detachment of the garison to defend the gates and the walls, he ordered all the gates to be opened at the same instant; and, at the head of the rest, without any noise, sallied out upon the enemy. As he imagined that part of the camp where Serjabil was posted to be the most exposed, he attacked the Arabs stationed there with so much courage, that he soon forced c them to give way; and would have taken Serjabil himself prisoner, or put him to the sword, had not Abd'alrahmân and Abân Ebn Othmân advanced to his relief with a body of horse. This checked the fury of the Greeks, and gave the Moslem troops that had been thrown into confusion time to rally. In the mean time, Abu Obeidah, who was posted at the gate Al Jabiyah, as has been already remarked, observing what had happened, possessed himself of a spot of ground between that body of the Christian forces which issued out of the last-mentioned gate and the town, which enabled him to cut off their retreat. The body, therefore, being charged and surrounded on all sides, could neither sustain the shock of the enemy, nor retreat; so that not a single man of it escaped. The other bodies likewise of the Christians, engaged in different parts, were at last every-where repulsed, and driven back d into the town. The loss of the Greeks in this vigorous action was computed by the Arabs, according to Al Wakedi, to amount to several thousand men <sup>k</sup>.

They agree to surrender to Abu Obeidah.

THIS last defeat so disheartened the Christians, who had lost above half of their men since the beginning of the siege, that they pressed Thomas, in order to prevent their total destruction, to permit them to beat a parley; but that commander prevailed upon them to defend the place till he had given the emperor an account of their situation, and learned from him whether or no they were to expect any succours. In the mean time, the Arabs pushed the siege, and the garison, greatly dejected by the bad success that attended the emperor's arms, made but a feeble defence. Nay, the troops that composed it desired Khâled for the present to discontinue his attacks, and give them time to come to some resolution about the e surrender of the town. But that general being desirous of carrying the place by storm, that the inhabitants might be all put to the sword, and the city plundered by his troops, refused to comply with their request. However, Abu Obeidah, a man of quite a different disposition, readily listened to their proposal. For having one night sent a messenger out of the gate before which he was posted, and offered to become tributaries to the Khalif, he dispatched to them Abu Hobeirah, a person in whom he could confide, to let them know that he accepted of their offer. The officers of the garison then asked this Arab whether or no he had been one of the prophet's companions, as they entertained a great opinion of them, and thought that they might absolutely depend upon their veracity. To this he replied in the affirmative; but at the same time told them, that they might have equally depended f upon the faith of the meanest slave in the camp. "For," said he, "we all of us think " ourselves under the strictest obligation to perform and make good all the engagements " we enter into; this being enjoined every one of us by the Korân." Upon this, an hundred of the clergy, and other principal citizens, went to the Moslem camp, and were conducted to Abu Obeidah; who took them into his tent, and treated them in a very polite manner. They begged to be continued in the possession of their churches, in return for the tribute they had agreed to pay to the Khalif; but Abu Obeidah would not promise them the use of above seven of them. To this they found themselves obliged to submit; and Abu Obeidah delivered them an instrument, drawn up by his secretary, tho' without either his name, or those of any witnesses, affixed to it, as he was not the commander in chief. He g then demanded hostages of the garison, and sent a detachment of an hundred men to take a possession of one part of the town. We must beg leave to observe here, that Al Wakedi seems to be mistaken in the name of the person whom Abu Obeidab sent to communicate his intentions to the besieged, or at least that his text has been corrupted by some transcriber here. For we are not told by any other Arab writer, that Abu Hobeirah was the name of one of Mohammed's companions; whereas 'tis very well known, that Abu Horeira was one of the most celebrated of them. We would, therefore, if our learned readers would give us leave, emend either Al Wakedi, or his translator, by substituting Abu Horeira for Abu Hobeirah here <sup>1</sup>.

<sup>i</sup> AL WAKED. ubi sup.

<sup>k</sup> Idem ibid.

b WHILST matters were in this situation; Khâled Ebn Said was killed by a poisoned arrow, Damascus that came from the town; which so exasperated Khâled, the Moslem general, that he instantly resolved to make a general assault. In the mean time, one Jostas, a priest, made his escape to the camp, and informed Khâled, that the prophet Daniel had predicted the future greatness of the Moslem empire, and offered to introduce him into the city, if he would take him and his family under his protection. To which Khâled readily agreed, and sent with him a detachment of an hundred Hamyarites, whose tribe was one of the most warlike of the Arabs, with orders to open the gates, immediately after they had taken post in the town, to the Moslem army. This they did without the least opposition; so that Khâled made himself master of the place without the loss of a single man; notwithstanding which, he put a great part of the garison, together with a vast number of the citizens, to the sword, and pursued the rest to St. Mary's church, where Abu Obeidab had before posted himself with the troops under his command. As soon as Khâled came up, Abu Obeidab said to him aloud, God has saved the believers the trouble of fighting, by delivering the city into my hands in a pacific manner. At which Khâled was extremely incensed, and declared, that as he had taken the place by storm, all the inhabitants, and the garrison, should be put to the sword. This occasioned no small bickering between the two commanders; Abu Obeidab insisting, that the agreement between him and the citizens should be executed in every part, and Khâled, on the other hand, refusing his consent to what was done without his participation. However, several of the officers inclining to the merciful side, as considering that many towns were still to be reduced, which would be defended to the last drop of blood, if it was once known that the Moslems violated a treaty they had concluded. Abu Obeidab in a great measure carried his point. For it was determined, that Khâled should have the disposal of that part of the town which he took sword in hand, and Abu Obeidab that of the other which surrendered to him upon terms, at least till the Khalif himself had decided the affair. After this, Abu Obeidab prevailed upon Khâled to give quarter to every one of the citizens and soldiers of the garrison that survived the late carnage, not excepting even Thomas and Herbîs themselves, who were the most disagreeable to him. We must not forget to inform our readers, that Khâled forced the east gate at his attack, and that Damascus was taken on the tenth of Rajeb, after six months siege; or, according to Al Makin, on the twenty-third of the latter Jomada, and the thirteenth year of the Hejra, or of CHRIST 634 <sup>m</sup>.

c THE reduction of Damascus was not only of great importance in itself, but likewise opened a way to farther conquests, and added a new lustre to the Moslem arms. However, the Arabs sustained a very considerable loss at this juncture, by the death of Abu Becr, who died the same day that Damascus was taken. With regard to the cause of his death, authors are not perfectly agreed. Some say, that he was poisoned by the Jews, together with Hareth Ebn Khaldab, about a year before he died; but, according to Ayesha, he got a fever, by bathing himself on a cold day, which carried him off in fifteen days; during which time, Omar officiated for him publicly in the mosque. Abu'l-Faraj affirms, that he departed this life on Monday, the eighth of the latter Jomada; which runs counter to what we find asserted by Al Makin. Be that as it will, a little before he expired, the Khalif ordered f his secretary, Othmân Ebn Affân, to draw up his last will and testament in the following terms <sup>n</sup>.

“ IN THE NAME OF THE MOST MERCIFUL GOD. This is the testament of Abd'allah His last “ Ebn Abu Kohâfa, when he was in the last hour of this world, and the first of the next; <sup>testament.</sup>
 “ an hour in which the infidel shall believe, the wicked person be assured of the reality of “ those things that he denied, and the liar speak truth. I appoint Omar Ebn Al Khattâb
 “ my successor; therefore hearken to him, and obey him. If he acts right, he will answer
 “ the opinion I have always entertained of him; if otherwise, he must be accountable “ for his own conduct. My intention herein is good, but I cannot foresee future events.

<sup>1</sup> Idem ibid. Al Kor. MOHAM. f. v. ISM. ABU'LFED. de vit. Moham. c. lxxii. p. 158. Vide etiam GAGN. la vie de Mahom. tom. ii. c. v. p. 339.

<sup>m</sup> AL WAKED. ubi sup. GREG. ABU'L FAR. ubi sup. p. 174. GEORG. AL MAKIN, ubi sup. p. 17, 18. GOLII not. ad Alfragan. ubi sup. p. 130.

<sup>n</sup> AYESHA, AL WAKED. ubi sup. ABU'LFED. in hist. gen. AHMED EBN MOHAMMED EBN ABDI RABIHI, AL MAKIN, ubi sup. p. 18. GREG. ABU'L FAR. ubi sup. p. 174. MS. Arab. Pocock. Oxon. num. 362.

“ However,

“ However, those who do ill shall hereafter be made fully sensible of the consequences a
 “ of their behaviour. Fare ye well, and may ye always be attended by the divine mercy “ and benediction.” After the Khalif had dictated this will to Othmân, he fainted away; but as soon as he came to himself, he asked his secretary whose name he had inserted in the instrument just written? who replied, that of Omar. “ Then,” said Abu Becr, “ you “ have punctually observed my directions; tho’ had you inserted your own, I should not “ have had an unworthy successor.” Omar was no sooner apprized of the Khalif’s intention to nominate him, than he discovered an uncommon aversion to the supreme authority with which he was soon to be vested; however, he was at last prevailed upon to acquiesce in what Abu Becr had done. Before the Khalif expired, he prayed to God to bless the b choice he had made; to inspire the Moslems with sentiments of concord and unanimity; to render their affairs prosperous and flourishing; and to enable them to propagate the doctrines of the Korân in the most effectual manner, as by the prophet Mohammed, in his last moments, they had been most strictly enjoined °.

When, and by whom, the Korân was digested into its present form.

WHEN Mohammed died, he left his pretended revelations in great disorder, and not digested into the method in which we now find them. This, according to Abu Jaafar, was the work of his immediate successor Abu Becr. That prince considering, after the defeat of Moseilama, that many of those who could read and repeat the Korân had been slain in Yamâma, was afraid lest any part of it should be lost; and therefore ordered the whole to c be collected, not only from the palm-leaves and skins on which they had been written, and which were kept between two boards or covers, but also from the mouths of such as had gotten them by heart. This transcript formed a considerable volume, called by the Arabs Al Moshâf, which, in their language, signifies a book or volume. It was probably penned by Othmân Ebn Affân and Zeid Ebn Thabet under the inspection of Omar Ebn Al Khattâb, who succeeded Abu Becr. The whole, when completed, was committed to the custody of Hafsa, one of the prophet’s widows, as has been already observed. This work seems to have been begun in the first year of Abu Becr, soon after the defeat of Moseilama, as may be inferred from Al Makîn; though in all likelihood it was not finished long before the death of that prince. Nor does it appear from the Moslem historians, that Abu Becr did any thing more than range the chapters of the Korân in their present order; which he probably did without d any regard to time, the longest being generally placed first; though some have imagined, that he was really the compiler of that book. Mohammed himself perhaps left every chapter, or Sûra, as complete as we now have it, excepting such passages as his successor might add or correct, from those who had gotten them by heart. Soon after Abu Becr had finished his transcript of the Korân, many copies of that book found their way into Irâk, as well as those parts of Syria, or Shâm, that bordered upon Arabia °.

BUT notwithstanding this, the original, in the care of Hafsa, the daughter of Omar, was not published by authority, according to Abu’lfeda, till the Khalifat of Othmân. That prince observing the great disagreement in the copies of the Korân, in the several provinces of the Moslem empire, those of Irâk, for example, following the reading of Abu Musa Al Asbari, and the Syrians that of Macdâd Ebn Aswad, he by advice of the companions of the prophet, e ordered a great number of copies to be transcribed from that of Abu Becr. This was done under the inspection of Zeid Ebn Thâbet, who had been before employed by Abu Becr on a similar occasion, as has been already remarked, Abd’allah Ebn Zobair, Saïd Ebn Al As, and Abd’alrahmân Ebn Al Hâreth, the Makbzumite; whom the Khalif directed, where-ever they disagreed about any word, to write it in the dialect of the Koreish, in which it was at first delivered. These copies, when made, were dispersed, by Othmân’s command, in the several provinces of the empire, and the old ones burnt and suppressed. Tho’ many things in Hafsa’s copy were corrected by the above-mentioned supervisors, yet some few various readings still occur. The Korân thus emended, by the care of Othmân, came out first in the thirtieth year of the Hejra; which seems to have given occasion to Eutychius, as well as f Joannes Andreas, an eminent Moslem doctor of Sciatinia, in the kingdom of Valencia, who became a convert to the Christian religion in the year of our Lord 1487, to assert, that the chapters of the Korân were then first collected into one volume. But this can by no means be admitted, as it runs counter to the express testimony of Abu’lfeda, an author of superior credit; nor will it easily be believed, that a work of such importance could have possibly escaped the diligence and zeal of Othmân’s two predecessors. To which we may add, that Abu Jaafar and Al Makîn, as cited above, put the point now insisted on beyond dispute °.

° GREG. ABU’L FAR. ubi sup. p. 75. MS. Arab. Pocock. Oxon. num. 362. ubi sup. EUTYCH. patriarch.
 Alexandrin. annal. tom. ii. p. 264, 265. AL MAKÎN, ubi sup.

P ISM. ABU’LFED. in vitis Abu Becr & Othmân. ABU JAAFAR, AL TABAR. apud Georg. Al Makîn, ubi sup. p. 18. ut et ipse AL MAKÎN, ibid.

° ISM. ABU’LFED. in vit. Abu Becr & Othmân, GAGN. ubi sup. tom. i. p. 349, 350. ABU JAAFAR & AL
 MAKÎN, ubi sup. EUTYCH. ubi sup. OCKLEY’S hist. of the Sarac. &c. vol. i. p. 118. JOANNES ANDREAS, SALE’S preliminary discours. p. 65, 66.

a As it is impossible to entertain just sentiments of the Mohammedan worship, and consequently to have a proper and adequate idea of many things related by the Moslem historians, without being acquainted with the genius, spirit, and design of the Korân; we shall here beg leave once for all to lay down a brief and succinct account of the peculiarities, doctrines, precepts, and institutions of that famous book. Nor will, we persuade ourselves, so useful and necessary a digression, tho' for some time it will interrupt the thread of the Arab history, prove unacceptable to our learned and curious readers.

As for the word Korân, derived from the verb karaa, to read, it signifies properly, in Arabic, the reading, or rather, that which ought to be read; by which name the Mohammedans denote not only the entire book or volume of the Korân, but also any particular chapter or section of it; just as the Jews call either the whole Scripture, or any part of it, by the name of Karâb, or Mikra, a word of the same origin and import. The Moslems also call the collection of moral traditions of the sayings and actions of their prophet, which is a sort of supplement to the Korân, directing the observance of several things omitted in that book, the Sonna; in like manner as the Jews have denominated the book containing their oral traditions the Mishna, which answers to the former piece, wrote in imitation of it, both in name and design. It may not be amiss to observe, that the Korân is stiled by the generality of Christian writers the Alcoran, or Alkoran; tho' this manner of writing does not so well become one even moderately versed in the Arabic language. For, the syllable Al in that word is only to be considered as the Arabic article, signifying the; and therefore it ought to be omitted when the English article is prefixed.

c THE Mohammedans likewise imitate the Jews in the division of their sacred volumes into Divisions. Sûras, Sowar, or chapters, and verses; as also in pointing out the various readings. There was lately, at least, if it be not still, extant a MS. of the Korân, written in this curious and accurate manner by Mohammed Ebn Mahmud Ebn Mohammed, of Samarkand, who flourished about the year of the Hejra 754, or of CHRIST 1353, according to Marracci. The Korân is sometimes honoured with the appellation of Al Forkân, from the verb faraka, to divide, or distinguish; in the same notion that the Jews use the word Perek, or Pirka, from the same root, to denote a section, or portion of Scripture. At other times it is called Al Moshâf, the volume, and Al Kitab, the book, by way of eminence, which answers to the Biblia of the Greeks; and Al Dbikr, the commemoration, or admonition, because the words of God are preserved from oblivion, and men admonished, by it. Several of the Moslems likewise frequently stile it THE WORD OF GOD, as we Christians do the sacred writings of the Old and New Testament. Other titles also it is distinguished by, which it would be superfluous and unnecessary to enumerate here.

It has been observed by Reland and Marracci, that the Mohammedans, in imitation of the Jewish Masorites, have numbered not only the words but even the letters of the Korân, in order to prevent any corruption or depravation of the text. They have likewise in some MSS. distinguished the word God with a red mark; which not a little contributes to the discovery of the sense and meaning of the passage wherein it occurs. As for the general, or primary, division of the Korân, this is made into 114 larger portions of very unequal length, which we call chapters, but the Arabs Sowar, in the singular Sura, a word rarely used on any other occasion, and properly signifying a row, order, or regular series; as a course of bricks in building, or a rank of soldiers in an army. It is the same in use and import with the Sûra, or Tora, of the Jews, who also call the fifty-three sections of the Pentateuch Sedârim, a word of the same signification. The first chapter of the Korân, stiled Al Fâtibat, is held in great veneration by the Mohammedans, who give it several honourable titles; as the chapter of prayer, of praise, of thanksgiving, of treasure, &c. They esteem it as the quintessence of the whole Korân, and often repeat it, as the Christians do the Lord's prayer, both in their public and private devotions. It is divided into seven parts, or verses, and repeated in prayer at every incurvation.

f It appears from the title Al Fâtibat, that the chapter last-mentioned is only a sort of preface or introduction to the rest; which seems to be the reason why the said title was neither taken from the matter treated of, nor the divine person mentioned therein, nor yet from the first word of note, in the same manner as the Jews named their Sedârim, as were those of the other chapters, by which they are distinguished in the manuscript copies, and not by their numerical order. It must here be remarked, that some of the chapters having been revealed, according to the impostor, at Mecca, and others at Medina, the noting the different places that were the scenes of Mohammed's pretended revelations makes a part of the titles of several chapters. Some of the chapters are said to have been revealed partly at Mecca, and partly at Medina; but as to others, the commentators on the Korân have not been able to determine to which place of the two they belong. Every chapter is subdivided into smaller portions, of very unequal length also, which we customarily call verses; but the Arabic word is Ayât, the same with the Hebrew Oloth, and signifies signs, or wonders; such as are the secrets of God, his attributes, works, judgments, and ordinances, delivered in those verses. Many of these have their particular titles also, imposed in the same manner as those of the chapters. The first chapter of the Korân is so celebrated amongst the Mohammedans, that whole treatises have been written upon it, as we are informed by Reland, who met with a book that pretended to point out all the mysteries it contains <sup>a</sup>.

<sup>r</sup> LUDOVICUS MARRACC. de Alcoran. c. i. p. 33. Patavii, 1698. NEHEM. viii. SIMON. hist. crit. de vieux Test. lib. i. c. 9. SALE, ubi sup. p. 56, 57.

<sup>s</sup> GOL. in append. ad. gram. Arab. Erpen. 175, 177. MOHAMMED EBN MAHMUD EBN MOHAMMED AL SAMARKAND. apud Marracc. ubi sup. MAIMON. præf. in Seder Zeraim, p. 57. AL KOR. MOHAM. f. xxv. Vide etiam LUDOVIC MARRACC. ubi sup.

<sup>t</sup> HADRIAN. RELAND. de relig. Mohammedic. lib. i. p. 24, 25. Trajecti ad Rhenum, 1717. MARRACC. ubi sup. GOL. ubi sup. 177. MAIMON. ubi sup. p. 55. AL KOR. MOHAM. f. i. ALBERTUS BOBOVIUS, de precib. Mahom. p. 3, & seq. AL HASAN, AL BEIDAWI, AL ZAMAKHSHAR. &c.

Editions.

THE principal editions, or ancient copies, of the Korân may be reduced to seven; two of which were published and used at Medina, a third at Mecca, a fourth at Câfâ, a fifth at Basra, a sixth in Syria, and a seventh called the common or vulgar edition. Of these editions, the first makes the whole number of the verses 6000; the second and fifth, 6214; the third, 6219; the fourth, 6236; the sixth, 6226; and the last, 6225. But they are all said to contain the same number of words, namely, 77639; and the same number of letters, viz. 323015. It must here be observed, that the Mohammedans have not only imitated the Jews in superstitiously numbering the very words and letters of their law, but have likewise taken pains to compute the number of times each particular letter occurs in the Korân. Of this Reland, from a manuscript in his possession, has given us an evident proof. That manuscript makes the number of words contained in the Korân to amount to 99464. The difference of the copies has prefixed to some chapters two or more titles. The Moslems believe, that not only every chapter and verse, but likewise every word of the Korân, had a divine original <sup>w</sup>.

Inequality of the chapters, auspiciary
form, &c.

SOME of the chapters of the Korân are so short, that they do not consist of above three or four verses; tho' others contain three hundred, and in general they are of a sufficient length. But besides the foregoing unequal divisions of chapter and verse, the Mohammedans have also divided that book into sixty equal portions, which they call Ahzâb, in the singular Hizb, each subdivided into four equal parts, in imitation of the Jewish division of the Mishna into sixty portions, called Massiêloth. However, the most usual division of the Korân is into thirty sections only, named Ajzâ, from the singular Joz, each of twice the length of the former, and in the like manner subdivided into four parts. At the head of every Sûra, except the ninth, is prefixed the following solemn form, by the Mohammedans called the Bismillab, IN THE NAME OF THE MOST MERCIFUL GOD; which form they constantly place at the beginning of all their books and writings in general, as a peculiar mark or distinguishing characteristic of their religion, it being accounted a sort of impiety to omit it. The Jews for the same purpose used the expression, IN THE NAME OF THE GREAT GOD, or, IN THE NAME OF THE LORD; and the eastern Christians, that of, IN THE NAME OF THE FATHER, AND OF THE SON, AND OF THE HOLY GHOST. But Mohammed seems to have derived his form from that of the ancient Persians, prefixed to their books, especially those of the highest antiquity amongst them, Benâm Yezdân bakhaïshgher dâdâr, that is, IN THE NAME OF THE MOST MERCIFUL JUST GOD. This may be inferred not only from the similitude, or rather identity, of expression observable in both forms, but likewise from the word YEZDAN, answering to the Arabic ALLAH, which was a name held in great veneration anciently amongst the Persians, and appropriated by them to the Supreme Being alone <sup>x</sup>.

IN relation to the authority of the auspiciary form above-mentioned, as well as that of the titles of the chapters, the Moslem doctors differ in their opinions. The more moderate consider them only as human additions; whereas the more staunch and rigid part of them think, that they are no less the word of God than the text itself. The same origin they seem to assign to certain letters of the alphabet, with which twenty-nine chapters of the Korân begin, some with a single one, others with more. These the Mohammedans believe to be the peculiar marks of the Korân, and to conceal several profound mysteries, which were perfectly understood by no one but their prophet. However, several conjectures, the uncertainty of which sufficiently appears from their disagreement, have been offered upon them. As the signification, therefore, of these characters, which are not always the same, has not hitherto been determined, and as the more sober Mohammedans confess that God alone knows the meaning of those prefixed to the seventh chapter of the Korân;

<sup>a</sup> LUDOVIC. MARRACC. not. & refutat. in sur. prim. Alcoran. p. 1, 2, 3. Patavii, 1698. HADRIAN. RELAND. ubi sup. p. 89. Vide etiam MARRACC. prodr. par. prim. p. 34.

MARRACC. de Alcoran, c. i. p. 33, 34.

MAIMON. ubi sup. p. 57. HYDE, hist. rel. vet. Pers. c. i. p. 14. & c. xi. p. 177.

<sup>w</sup> RELAND. ubi sup. p. 25, 26, 27.

<sup>x</sup> HADRIAN, RELAND. ubi sup. GOL. ubi sup. p. 178.

a it would be altogether superfluous, if not wholly impertinent, to expatiate farther upon them here <sup>y</sup>.

THE Arabs give us very pompous descriptions of the stile of the Korân, which is gene- Stile.
rally taken to be beautiful and fluent, or, as we would rather chuse to express it, calculated to please the ear, especially where it imitates the prophetic manner, and Scripture phrases; which are, however, not seldom very improperly applied. That the author of the Korân affected the prophetic stile, not only in the words he chose, but likewise in the sentences he sometimes thought proper to select, as also in the change of tenses and persons that frequently there appears, must be allowed by every one who reads that book, and is but moderately versed in the sacred writings. He uses the preterperfect and future tenses reciprocally for each other; and passes from the third person to the first, as well as the second, and vice versâ from the first to the third, as we find done by the prophets of the Old Testament. The stile is concise, and often obscure, adorned with bold figures, after the eastern taste, enlivened with florid and sententious expressions, and in many places, especially where the majesty and attributes of God are described, sublime and magnificent. Tho' the book be written in prose, yet the sentences generally conclude in a long continue rime, for the sake of which the sense is often interrupted, and unnecessary repetitions too frequently made; the Arabs being so mightily delighted with this jingling, that they employ it in their most elaborate compositions, which they also embellish with frequent passages of and allusions to the Korân. It is next to impossible, therefore, to understand them, without being tolerably well acquainted with that book, which is written with the utmost elegance, as the critics in this kind of literature assert, in the dialect of the tribe of Korcish, the most noble and polite of all the Arabians, but with some mixture, tho' very rarely, of other dialects. It is looked upon to be the standard of the Arabic tongue, and inimitable by any human pen; tho' some sectaries have been of a different opinion. However, as these are considered as a sort of heretics, the orthodox Moslems insist upon the Korân's being a permanent miracle, greater than that of raising the dead, and alone sufficient to convince the world of its divine original. Al Ghazâli maintains, that it subsisted in the essence of God from all eternity; and Ahmed Ebn Abd'albalim, that it contains all other sacred books, and all times, past, present, and to come. The generality of the Mohammedans esteem it as infinitely superior to the production of any created being, which is, indeed, asserted in the Korân itself; tho' some of them mentioned by Ismael Shabinshab, Shabar Settani, and others, are of a different opinion. But of these, and the principal tenets they maintain, we shall speak more fully hereafter <sup>z</sup>.

THE principal, or grand, article of faith insisted on in the Korân, as has been already Disfig.
observed, is the unity of God; to restore which point Mohammed pretended was the chief end of his mission. In the belief of this he proposed to unite the Christian, Jewish, and pagan Arabs; the last of which were by far the most numerous and powerful. The worship of one eternal invisible God he established under the sanction of certain laws, and the outward signs of certain ceremonies, partly of ancient and partly of novel institution. These he enforced by setting before his followers rewards and punishments, both temporal and eternal; obliging them at the same time to pay obedience to him, as the prophet and ambassador of God, who, after the repeated admonitions, promises, and threats of former ages, was at last to establish and propagate God's religion on earth by force of arms, and to be acknowledged chief pontif in spiritual matters, as well as supreme prince in temporal. He maintained, that there never was, nor ever can be, more than one true orthodox religion; since tho' particular laws, or ceremonies, are subject to alteration, yet the substance of it, being eternal truth, is not liable to change, but continues immutably the same. He moreover taught that whenever this religion became neglected, or corrupted in essentials, God reformed and readmonished mankind thereof, by several prophets, of whom Moses and Jesus
f were the most distinguished, till the appearance of Mohammed, who is their seal, no other being to be expected after him. And the more effectually to engage the Moslems to hearken to him, a great part of the Korân is employed in relating examples of dreadful punishments formerly inflicted by God on those who rejected and abused his messengers; several of which stories, or some circumstances of them, are taken from the Old and New Testament, but many more from the apocryphal books and traditions of the Jews and Christians of those ages, set up in the Korân as truths in opposition to the Scriptures, which the Jews and Christians are charged with having altered. Such are the histories of Adam and Eve, of Cain and Abel, of Enoch, of Noah, of Abraham Isaac and Jacob, of Ismael, of Moses and Pharoah, of Saul David and Solomon, of Ezra, of Jesus Christ and the blessed Virgin Mary, &c. as also of the seven Sleepers, of the martyrs under the tyrant Dunaan, &c. To which may be added those of Alexander the great, Æsop, and others extracted from profane authors. A considerable part of the Korân is likewise taken up in giving necessary laws and directions, in frequent admonitions to moral and divine virtues, and above all to the worshipping and reverencing of the only true God, and resignation to his will. Besides which, there are a great number of passages which are occasional, and relate to particular emergencies. For, whenever any thing happened which perplexed and gravelled Mohammed, he had constant recourse to a new revelation, as an infallible expedient in all nice cases; and he found the success of this method answer all, even his most sanguine expectations. It was certainly a politic contrivance of his to bring down the whole Korân at once to the lowest heaven only, and not to the earth; for if the whole had been published at once, innumerable objections might have been made, which it would have been very hard, if not impossible, for him to solve. But as he pretended to have received it by parcels, as God saw proper that they should be published for the conversion and instruction of the people, he had a sure way to answer all emergencies, and to extricate himself with honour from any difficulty which might occur. This shews him to have been a man of genius and art, and to have answered at least in part the character already given of him. In his descriptions of the joys of paradise, of the torments of hell, and of the day of judgment, he is pretty prolix; tho' these are chiefly made up of most absurd and ridiculous fables. He enjoins in the strongest terms frequent prayer, alms, the pilgrimage to Mecca, the fast of Ramadân, and, in fine, an observance of all his other rites and institutions. The points in the Korân that relate to moral and theological virtues he undoubtedly borrowed of the Christians and Jews; the former of which he treated with more lenity than the latter. In several places of this book, he is very severe upon those who had incurred his displeasure, and especially such of these delinquents as were his own relations. However, amongst the articles it contains, many excellent things occur, which seem not unworthy of even a Christian's perusal. According to Al Zamakhshari, the matter of the Korân is divided into assimilated and wisely disposed; the former of which contains every thing obscure; parabolical, ænigmatical, and abrogated by God, that is to be met with in this book; and the latter every thing clear, open, indisputable, free from all doubt, of standing and perpetual obligation <sup>a</sup>.

<sup>y</sup> GOTTUS, in append. ad gram. Arab. p. 182. SALE's prelim. discours. p. 59, 60. LUDOVIC. MARRACC. not. & refutat. in sur. sept. Alcoran. p. 275.

<sup>z</sup> LUDOVIC. MARRACC. de Alcoran. c. ii. p. 34. AHMED EBN ABD'ALHALIM, apud Marracc. de Alcoran. c. vi. p. 43. AL GHAZAL. apud Marracc. ubi sup. p. 44. ISM. SHABINSH. SHAHAR. SETTAN. alique scriptor. apud Marracc. ibid. Vide etiam GREG. ABUL FAR. & SALE's prelim. disc. sect. iii. &c.

The author.

Tho' Mohammed was undoubtedly the principal author, and chief contriver, of the Korân; yet that he had no small assistance both in the formation and execution of his design from others, is beyond dispute. This the Meccans failed not to object to him, when he insisted, as a proof of its divine original, that a man so utterly unacquainted with learning as himself could not possibly compose such a book. They urged, as an objection to its authority, that he had one or more assistants in the forgery; tho' he had taken his measures so well, that they found it extremely difficult to discover the person, or persons, suspected of this confederacy. One says it was Jabar, or Habar, a Greek, servant to Amer Ebn Al Hadrami, who could read and write well; another, that they were Jabar, or Habar, and Yesâr, two slaves, who followed the trade of sword-cutlers at Mecca, used to read the Pentateuch and Gospel, and had often Mohammed for their auditor, when he passed that way. Another tells us, that it was one Aish, or Yâish, a domestic of Al Haweiteb Ebn Abd Al Uzza, who was a man of some learning, and had embraced Mohammedism. Another supposes it was one Kais, a Christian, whose house Mohammed frequented. Another, that it was Addâs, a servant of Otha Ebn Rabiâ; and another, that it was Salmân the Persian, as has been already observed. So far the commentators on the Korân, whose traditions differ greatly in this affair. Nor are the Christian writers less divided in their opinions, in relation to the person, or persons, who enabled Mohammed to draw up a plan of, and compose the Korân. Some of them pretend, that Abd'allah Abn Salâm, the Jew, who was so intimate with Mohammed, and whom Dr. Prideaux confounds with Salmân, the Persian, a very different man, was assisting to him in compiling his pretended revelations. The greatest part of them, however, maintain, that the chief help Mohammed had in contriving the Korân, was from a Nestorian monk, named Sergius, supposed to be the same person with the monk Bokeira, with whom Mohammed in his younger years had some conference at Bosra, a city of Syria Damascena, where Bokeira then resided. Mr. Sale, indeed offers a frivolous objection to this opinion, of no manner of weight; which we have already answered in the life of Mohammed, and therefore shall pass it over here. Nor can any thing be more weak than what the impostor himself advances in opposition to this notion, viz. that neither the Jews, nor the Christians could afford him any assistance in the composition of the Korân, since both of them spoke a foreign language; whereas the person who composed this piece, drew it up in the most

<sup>a</sup> GOLIUS, in append. ad gram. Arab. Erpen. p. 176. LUDOVIC. MARRAC. de Alcoran. c. iii. p. 34, 35. AL ZAMAKHSHAR. apud Marracc. ibid.

- a elegant Arabic, and consequently must have been an Arabian. For, tho' the language made use of in the Korân be the pure, perspicuous, or, as the Moslems stile it, the defecated Arabic; yet the tenets and sentiments therein contained might have been derived from a foreigner, as, for the most part, they undoubtedly were, who was even a stranger to the beauties and elegancies at least of the Arabic tongue, if not to the very rudiments and first principles of it. In fine, there were both Christians and Jews amongst the Arabs themselves, when Mohammed first entered upon his mission; some of whom might either have translated into the politest Arabic the materials sent by Bohcira, or, in conjunction with that monk, furnished the pretended prophet with materials for the Korân. Nay, it may be inferred from even what has been admitted by Mr. Sale, that Warakab Ebn Nawfal, a Christian Arab, who could write in the Hebrew character, and was tolerably well versed in the Scriptures, Khadijah's cousin, was at least one of Mohammed's coadjutors in framing the book of the Moslem law. For, in confirmation of what Mohammed had declared to Khadijah concerning his mission, he assured her, that the same angel, who had formerly appeared unto Moses, was then sent to Mohammed. From whence it appears, that from the very beginning he acted a part with Mohammed in the propagation of his imposture; and therefore may be justly suspected to have had a hand in the Korân. To what has been said we may add, that, according to Al Zamakhshari, Abu Fakiah affirmed Nodbar Ebn Hareth Ebn Abd Al Dar, an Arab of some learning, to have instructed Mohammed himself in the tenets and doctrines of the Korân; which, if admitted, will amount to an evident proof, that
- c the pretended prophet was not the author of every part of that book. Nay, some of the Arab writers themselves have allowed, that the monk Sergius, or Boheira, instructed Mohammed in the principles both of the law and the gospel. We are told by St. John of Damascus, who flourished about an hundred years after Mohammed, and lived at Damascus, in his days the residence of the Khalifs, that Mohammed had, and therefore received from others, a thorough knowlege of the holy Scriptures, both of the Old and New Testament. He also relates, that the impostor formed the plan of his new religion from the conferences and conversations he had with the Arians of that time <sup>b</sup>.

- But however this may be, the Mohammedans, at least the generality of them, deny that the Korân was either composed by their prophet, or any other mortal for him. They believe
- d it to be of divine original, nay eternal and uncreated; maintaining that the first transcript <sup>Manner of publishing the Korân.</sup> of it has been from everlasting by God's throne, written on a table of vast bigness, called the preserved table, on which are also recorded the divine decrees past and future. They also affirm, that a copy of the Korân from this table, in one volume on paper, was by the ministry of the angel Gabriel sent down to the lowest heaven, in the month of Ramadân, on the night of power; from whence Gabriel, according to them, revealed it to Mohammed by parcels, some at Mecca, and some at Medina, at different times, during the space of twenty-three years, as the exigency of affairs required. However, he had the whole shewed him, which they tell us was bound in silk, and adorned with gold and precious stones of paradise, once a year; but in the last year of his life he had the favour to see it
- e twice. Many of the aforesaid parcels consisted only of a few verses, say they, brought by Gabriel at once from the lowest heaven, or, in the stile of the Arabs, the orb of the moon; which were afterwards written down from time to time by Mohammed's amanuenses, in such or such a part of such or such a chapter, till they were completed, according to the directions of the angel himself. The ninth and hundred-and-fifth chapters only are supposed to have been delivered whole to Mohammed; so that it is not to be wondered at that little or no connection should be visible between the parts of the others. As for the twenty-second chapter, the eleventh and twelfth verses of it were said to be revealed at Medina, and the others at Mecca. There are many repetitions in the Korân, which render it very disagreeable to an elegant ear. The want of connection, so visible almost throughout the
- f whole, gives a great degree of incertitude to many expressions, makes several passages appear little better than down right jargon, and introduces into various parts of this book a strange mixture of absurdity and confusion. The first parcel pretended to be revealed, is generally agreed to have been the first five verses of the ninety-sixth chapter. The confusion above-mentioned, which is acknowledged by an eminent Mohammedan writer, amounts to a sufficient proof, that some passages of the Korân at least are so absolutely unintelligible as not to admit of an exposition <sup>c</sup>.

<sup>b</sup> AL ZAMAKHSHAR. AL BEIDAWI, Liber Agar, GUADAGNOL, tract. c. x. sect. 1. JOANNES ANDREAS, de confusio. sectæ Moham. c. i. BELLONIUS, lib. iii. c. 2. AL KOR. MOHAM. f. xvi. & f. xxv. YAHYA, JALLALO'DDIN, RICARDI confutat. legis Saracenicæ, c. xiii. PRID. life of Mahom. p. 23—29. Lond. 1718. GAGN. not. in Abu'lfed. de vit. Moham. p. 74. AL MASUDI, ABU'1 HASAN AL BECRI, in Kor. Vide etiam LUDOVIC. MARRACC. de Alcoran. c. iv. p. 35—42. & SALE's notes on the Koran, p. 223, 224. JOAN. DAMASCEN. lib. de hæresib. <sup>c</sup> AL KOR. MOHAM. f. xcvi. JALLALO'DDIN, AL BEIDAWI, AL ZAMAKHSHAR. AL GHAZAL. ABU JA'AFAR apud Al Makin, YAHYA, MOHAM. ERN AED'AILAH ZEMANIN, AL 'LABAR. apud Marraccium, de Alcoran. p. 39, 40 ut & i. se MARRACC. ibid. & p. 41—45.

Not only the prophet's amanuenses, but likewise several of his followers, took copies <sup>a</sup> of the revealed passages, after they had been communicated by him to the former of these, for their private use; but the far greater number of the Moslems got them by heart. The originals, when returned, were put promiscuously into a chest, without any order of time; for which reason it is uncertain when many passages were said to be revealed. The Korân does not only contain many articles extracted out of the sacred writings of the Old and New Testament, but many fictions likewise out of the Talmud, as well as some out of Mohammed's own brain; so that he was supplied with materials for it by the Christians, Jews, idolatrous Arabs, and his own fertile imagination. That the devil also, after he had transformed himself into an angel of light, or at least assumed the form of such an angel, and taken the name of Gabriel, might have suggested some points to him, is judged not improbable by Marracci <sup>d</sup>. b

Various readings.

BESIDES the variations in the copies of the Korân already mentioned, there are others occasioned by the different manner of reading of the Mekri's, or readers, whose peculiar study and profession it was to read the Korân with its proper vowels. This the want of vowels in the Arabic character, when the prophet's pretended revelations were first committed to writing, rendered absolutely necessary. The greatest part of the variations at present observable in the copies of the Korân are such as have arisen from the diversity of vowels affixed to the same words by different readers, seven of whom especially are in great repute amongst the commentators on the Korân. For the characters, or marks, of the Arabic vowels were not used till several years after Mohammed. We must beg leave here to remark, that the Korân was first penned in the Cufic character; and that par. of this book in that character on vellum <sup>c</sup> was brought from Egypt by Mr. Greaves, which is still preserved in the Bodleian library at Oxford <sup>e</sup>.

Passages abrogated.

As there are many passages in the Korân, which are manifestly contradictory, and destructive of each other, in order to obviate any objection that may be drawn from thence to the authority of that book, the Moslem doctors are obliged to have recourse, how absurd soever this may be, to the doctrine of abrogation. They pretend, that God, in the Korân, commanded several things, which were afterwards, for good reasons, abrogated and revoked; all which have been collected in one small volume by the Imâm, Abu Hashem Hebatallah, who, in the preface to his work, has given us a particular account of the nature of them. That author distinguishes them into three kinds: the first, where the letter and the sense <sup>d</sup> are both abrogated; the second, where the letter only is abrogated, but the sense remains; and the third, where the sense is abrogated, tho' the letter remains. In this manner do they endeavour to fix the inconsistencies and absurdities of their own capricious and most infamous impostor upon that Divine Being, who is the source and fountain of all truth, which is ever uniform and consistent with itself, and with whom is no variableness, neither shadow of turning <sup>f</sup>.

Of the first kind of abrogated passages were several verses, which, by the tradition of Ans Ebn Malec, were, in the pretended prophet's life-time, read in the chapter of repentance, but are not now extant; for a farther account of which we must beg leave to refer our curious readers to the aforesaid Imâm, Abu Hashem Hebatallah, and Marracci. Of the <sup>e</sup> second kind is a verse called the verse of stoning, which according to the tradition of Omar, afterwards Khalif, was extant while Mohammed was living, tho' it be not now to be found; for the words of which the curious may have recourse to the above-mentioned authors. Of the last kind are observed several verses in sixty-three different chapters, to the number of 225; all of which have been enumerated by the above-mentioned Imâm. It must be here observed, that tho' for the most part the abrogated passages precede those that revoke them, as in the order of nature they ought to do, yet there are not wanting instances in the Korân of passages abrogating those that follow them; of which two, contained in the second and thirty-third chapters, are particularly eminent. This, which by the way Mr. Sale, with his usual ingenuity, has thought fit not to touch upon, is as absurd as if a prince should repeal a law before <sup>f</sup> he had enacted it, or at least before the promulgation of it. No good reason, certainly, can be assigned either why some of Mohammed's moral decisions, perfectly right and rational in themselves, as they undoubtedly were, should have been cancelled, or why the preposterous method of abrogation here mentioned should have been observed. But these are only a taste of the numerous absurdities with which the book of the Mohammedan law, however it may have been cried up by some pretended Christians in this wicked and licentious age, abounds <sup>g</sup>.

Disputes concerning the creation of the Korân.

BUT notwithstanding this, the Korân is held in the highest reverence and esteem amongst the Mohammedans. They stile it, by way of eminence the book of God, as the Christians

<sup>a</sup> AL MAKIN & ABU'LFED. ubi sup. MARRACC. ubi sup. c. iii. p. 34, 35, 38, 41, &c. <sup>e</sup> SALE's prelimin. disc. p. 66. Anc. Hist. vol. vii. p. 254, 255. <sup>f</sup> ABU HASHEM HEBATALLAH, apud Ludovic. Marracc. ubi sup. p. 42, 43. ut & ipse MARRACC. ibid. JAM. 17. <sup>g</sup> ABU HASHEM HEBATALLAH & MARRACC. ubi sup. Al Kor. MOHAM. f. ii. xxxiii. SALE's prelimin. disc. p. 66, 67.

- a do their bibles, believing that every part, nay every word, of it came from heaven. They call it the true book, the book sent by God, the rule void of all obliquity, the director of men and demons, the perpetual miracle, the greatest of miracles, the most excellent of all holy books, the most elegant of compositions; and honour it with many other very extraordinary appellations. Nay, Ahmed Abd'alhalim affirms the Korân to be the quintessence of all other sacred books; and Abu Mohammed Mostafa Ebn Al Sayyed Hasan, surnamed Al Jannâbi, says it contains 60,000 miracles. However, tho' it is the belief of the Sunnites, that the Korân is uncreated, and Mohammed himself is said to have pronounced him an infidel who asserted the contrary; yet the sect of the Motâzalites, and the followers of Isa Ebn Sobeih Abu Mîsa, surnamed Al Mozdâr, accused those who maintained that opinion of infidelity, looking upon them as
- b assertors of two eternal beings. Nay, this point was controverted with so much heat, that it occasioned a sort of persecution under some of the Khalîfs of the family of Abbâs; Al Mamûn making a public edict, declaring the Korân to be created, which was confirmed by his successors Al Môtâsem and Al Wâthek, who whipt, imprisoned, and put to death those of the contrary opinion. But at length Al Motawakkel, who succeeded Al Wâthek, revoked the former edict, released those who were imprisoned on that account, and permitted every man to believe what he pleased in the point before us. Al Ghazâlî intimates that the original idea of the Korân only was really in God, and consequently co-essential and co-eternal with him; but that the copies of it were created, and the work of man; by which he seems to have reconciled, however difficult at first sight that may appear to be, both the foregoing
- c opinions <sup>h</sup>.

- It must likewise be here observed, that Ismael Shabînsab and Shabar Settani assure us, that the Motâzalites, together with their leader Al Mozdâr, and Ibrahim Al Nodbâm, asserted the Korân to have nothing miraculous in it, in respect to stile or composition, excepting only the prophetic relations of things past, and predictions of things to come. Nay, they scrupled not to maintain, that had God left men to the guidance and direction of their own natural faculties and powers, the Arabs might have composed something even superior to the Korân in eloquence, method, and purity of language. However, these sectaries, or rather heretics, are censured by the afore said writers, as well as the body of Sunnites, for holding such impious tenets. Al Jahedh, the chief of a sect bearing his name, used to term the Korân
- d a body, which might sometimes be turned into a man, and sometimes into a beast; which seems to agree with the notion of those who assert the Korân to have two faces, one of a man, the other of a beast; thereby probably alluding to the double interpretation it will admit of, according to the letter or the spirit. It was Ahmed Ebn Abu David Ebn Abd'al-malec, his Visîr or Wazîr, who excited the Khalîf Al Wâthek to the cruelties above-mentioned <sup>i</sup>.

- We must beg leave here farther to remark, that Al Mozdâr had two disciples, who had both the name of Jaafar, and who settled the point relating to the creation of the Korân in the following manner. God, said they, created the Korân on the preserved table, from whence it cannot be transferred any whither else, since it is impossible for the same thing to be in two places at once. But the copies of the Korân read by the Moslems are written by
- e human hands. Which seems equivalent to what has been advanced by Al Ghazâlî, who tells us, that the Korân is read and pronounced with the tongue, written in books, and kept in the memory; and yet is eternal, subsisting in God's essence, and not possible to be separated thence by any transmissiion into mens memories, or the leaves of books. But this amounts to no more than a bare assertion, that the original idea of the Korân was in the divine mind from all eternity; which may, with equal truth and propriety, be affirmed of the original ideas of all created beings, and therefore infers no superior excellency in that book. The foregoing distinction of the contents of the Korân into assimilated and wisely disposed, or, in other words, allegorical and literal, is admitted by all the orthodox Mohammedans. The former comprehends the more obscure, parabolical, and ænigmatical passages, as well
- f as such as are repealed or abrogated; the latter those which are plain, perspicuous, liable to no doubt, and in full force. For the explication of these the knowledge of many things is requisite; as namely, whether the passage was revealed at Mecca, or at Medina; whether it be abrogated, or does itself abrogate any other passage; whether it be anticipated in order of time, or postponed; whether it be distinct from the context, or depends thereon; whether it be particular or general; and, lastly, whether it be implicit by intention, or explicit in words. But for a farther account of the rules observed by the commentators on the Korân, in their expositions of that celebrated book, our curious readers may have recourse to the writers cited by Marracci, which we have pointed out here, who will give them full and ample satisfaction in this affair <sup>k</sup>.

<sup>h</sup> AL JANNÂB. & AHMED BEN ABD'ALHALIM apud Marracc. ubi sup. p. 43, 44. AL GHAZAL. ibid. AL SHAHRESTAN. apud Pocock. not. in spec. hist. Arab. p. 220. ut & ipse Pocock. ibid. ISM. ABU'LFED. ubi sup. & Pocock. p. 219. GREG. ABU'L FAR. p. 245, 253, 257, 262. AL MAKIN, in vit. Al Mamûn. AL GHAZAL. in prof. fid. Vide etiam ABU JAAFAR AL TAEAR. apud Al Makin, ubi sup. & MARRACC. ubi sup. p. 43, 44, 45.

<sup>i</sup> ISMAEL SHABINSHAH & SHABAR SETTANI, apud Marracc. ubi sup. 44. ut & ipse MARRACC. ibid. ABU'LFED. & AL SHAHRESTAN. apud Pocock. ubi sup. p. 222. AL JAHEDH. apud Marracc. ubi sup. AL MAKIN, ubi sup.

*The honour
accrued to it.*

As the Mohammedans are taught to believe such extraordinary things of the Korân, 'tis no wonder they should hold it in so exceeding high a veneration. They will not suffer it to be read, possessed, or even touched by any of a different persuasion; so that if it is found in the possession of either a Jew or a Christian, it may prove of fatal consequence to him. Nor do the Moslems themselves so much as touch it without being first washed or legally purified; which lest they should do by inadvertence, they write these words on the cover or label, "Let none touch it, but they who are clean." They read it with great care and respect, never holding it below their girdles. They swear by it, consult it on all weighty occasions, carry it with them to war, write sentences of it in their banners, as they formerly at least did upon their coins, and adorn it with gold and precious stones. In fine, they consider it as the most perfect composition that ever appeared in the world; as predicted by the law and the gospel, and corroboratory of both; as preserved in a particular manner by the immediate hand of providence, and as containing mysteries that are fully comprehended and understood by God alone. But notwithstanding these exalted notions, they are so far from thinking the Korân to be either profaned or debased by a translation, that they have taken care to have it translated into the Persian, Malayan, and other tongues; tho', out of respect to the original Arabic, these versions are generally, if not always, interlineary. However, they entertain by far the highest sentiments of the original Arabic; believing, that God will never suffer it to receive the least addition, defect, or alteration <sup>l</sup>.

*Islâm the proper name of the Mohamme-
dan religion.*

BEFORE we take upon us to particularize the doctrines and positive precepts of the Korân, which relate to faith and religious duties, we must beg leave to inform our readers, that Mohammed gave to his religion the name of Islâm, or, as 'tis frequently termed by Christians, Islamism; which word properly denotes resignation, or submission, to the service and commands of God. Some, however, interpret it the saving religion, and derive it from the Arabic word Aflama, the fourth conjugation of Salama, importing to enter into a state of salvation. From which root is likewise deduced the word Moslem, denoting, in the Arabic language, a true believer, or professor of Islamism. Some of the Mohammedans pretend, that the true religion was generally professed till Abel was murdered; but others, that it remained till the days of Noah. They also believe that Islamism was the religion of all the prophets; and that it universally prevailed in Arabia till the time of Amru Ebn Lokai, king of Hejâz, the great introducer of idolatry in that country <sup>m</sup>.

The division and fundamental points of Islamism.

It has been already observed, that Mohammed comprehended the whole substance of his doctrine under these two propositions, or articles of faith; viz. that there is but one God, and that himself was the apostle of God. By virtue of the latter of which articles all such ordinances, as he thought fit to establish, are received by his followers as of divine institution. The Moslems divide their religion into two parts; Imân, i. e. faith, or theory, and Dîn, i. e. religion, or practice. The former consists of the two articles, or propositions, above-mentioned; which include in them the six following particulars: a belief in God; in his angels; in his scriptures; in his prophets; in the resurrection, and day of judgment; and in God's absolute decree and predetermination both of good and evil. The points relating to practice are prayer, as well as every thing relative and preparatory to it; zacât, or alms, the payment of which Mohammed very artfully made one main article of his religion, as it enabled him always to keep on foot a considerable body of troops; fasting in the month of Ramadân; and the pilgrimage to Mecca. The definition of Islamism laid down here, as it includes both the Imâm and Dîn, is no other than that given by Mohammed, as the Moslems pretend, to the angel Gabriel. Which definition, or description, according to them, was likewise approved of, and rendered absolutely authentic, by the testimony of that angel <sup>n</sup>.

The existence of angels asserted in the Korân.

A BELIEF of the existence of angels, and their purity, is strongly insisted on in the Korân. Nor can he escape the imputation of infidelity, who either denies that there are such beings, or hates any of them, or asserts any distinction of sexes amongst them. They believe them to be the servants of God, that are constantly employed in his immediate presence, and execute his commands on all occasions. Their pure and subtil bodies, they think, were created originally of fire, or rather light, and are free from those animal functions that distinguish the inhabitants of this terraqueous globe from those of the aerial regions. They maintain, that these excellent beings can assume various forms; that some of them a adore God in different postures, whilst others either sing praises to him, or intercede for mankind. They likewise believe, that they are of different orders; but that the highest of these ought not to be considered as objects of worship. Some of them, according to the Moslems, are deputed to take an account of our actions here, others to convey the souls of men to the places assigned them after their departure out of this world, and others to preside over hell, and keep guard against the devils there. They moreover hold, that some of them carry the throne of God; and that, in general, they are impeccable. Al Beidawi relates, that the tribes of Khozâab and Kenâna, in particular, denominated the angels the daughters of God <sup>a</sup>.

<sup>k</sup> AL MAKIN, ubi sup. AL GHAZAL, ubi sup. AL ZAMAKHSHAR, AL KOR. MOHAM. f. iii. AHMED EBN MOH. AL THALEBI, in princip. expos. AL YAHYA EBN SALAM AL BASRI, in princip. expos. MARRACC. ubi sup. 44, 45.

<sup>l</sup> LUDOVICUS MARRACCIUS, ubi sup. p. 45. HADRIAN. RELAND. de relig. Mohammedic. p. 265. & p. 25, 26, 27. SALE's prelim. disc. p. 69. <sup>m</sup> JALLALO'DDIN, AL BEIDAWI, Poc. not. in spec. hist. Arab. p. 50. Vide etiam AL KOR. MOHAM. f. ii. & f. xxxvi. GOLII lex. Arab. in voce Salama, & PRID. life of Mahom. p. 11.

<sup>n</sup> AL KOR. MOHAM. pass. HADR. RELAND. ubi sup. et alib. SALE, ubi sup. p. 71.

b THE principal of these angels, according to the Mohammedans, are Gabriel, Michael, Azraïl, and Israfil. Gabriel they call the holy spirit, and the angel of revelations, because he appeared to Mohammed sometimes in his own and sometimes in a human form, and revealed to him the Korân. Michael they take to be the friend and protector of the Jews; which notion is not only countenanced, but even confirmed by the prophet Daniel. Azraïl they denominate the angel of death, because he is supposed to separate mens souls from their bodies; and they apply the name of Israfil to the angel whose office it will be to sound the trumpet on the day of the resurrection. It is to be observed, that the offices of these four angels are described almost in the same manner in the apocryphal gospel of Barnabas, only the two last are there called Raphael and Uriel. The Orientals believe Michael to be one of the Cherubim, which Dr. Hyde takes to have been the same order of angels with that of the Seraphim; though from the Psalmist we may possibly infer the truth of the contrary opinion. Be that as it will, this learned gentleman seems not to be much mistaken, when he insinuates, that the Seraphim of the Hebrews answered to the Teraphim of the Chaldees; the Schin of the former frequently corresponding with the Thau of the latter. The Teraphim were probably images of the angels, which the ancient Chaldees and Syrians carried about with them. These the Arabs denominated Israfin; and one of their authors has defined them to be the angels of figures, or images, i. e. angels of whom the aforesaid nations made themselves images, which they considered as a sort of tutelary deities, and consulted them on all extraordinary occasions <sup>b</sup>.

c THE Mohammedans also believe, that two guardian angels attend on every man, to observe and write down his actions; and that they are changed every day. Which notion, as well as almost every other concerning angels, their prophet and his disciples seem to have borrowed from the Jews; who, according to the Jerusalem Talmud, learned the names and offices of those beings from the Persians. This last nation, from the remotest antiquity, acknowledged the ministry of angels, and their superintendency over the affairs of the world. Gabriel they called Sorûsh and Revân bakhsh, or the giver of souls; Azraïl went amongst them by the name of Mordâd, or the giver of death; and to Michael they assigned that of Beshter, supposing him to provide sustenance for mankind. The usual appellation given by the Moslems to the devil is Eblis, which Mr. Reland deduces from a word signifying despair; though we are rather inclined to believe it a corruption of the Greek name Diabolos. Some of the Mohammedan writers pretend, that he worshipped God 80,000 years before the creation of Adam, but was then infected both with envy and infidelity. He was expelled heaven, according to the Korân, for refusing to pay homage to Adam at the command of God. The first name of Eblis, whilst in a state of innocence, was Azazil, derived, as should seem, from the Hebrew word azazel, signifying a goat; which has induced Reland to imagine, that Mohammed received that name from the Jews; and that therefore this people looked upon goat as an animal sacred to the devil. Eblis is sometimes also stiled Al Skeitan, or Satan, in the Korân; which name is likewise applied by Al Jaubari to the rebellious Genii, whom the Arabs take to be distinct from devils, wicked men, and even the most obstinate of brutes themselves <sup>c</sup>.

f THE Genii here mentioned, according to the Moslem notion of them, are an intermediate order of creatures, created of fire, but of a grosser fabric than angels. These the Mohammedans suppose to be mortal, to eat and drink, and even to propagate their species. Some of them, we are told, were converted on hearing the Korân; Mohammed having pretended to be sent for their conversion, as well as that of men. Some of the Orientals believe them to have inhabited the world for many ages before Adam was created, and relate many fabulous particulars of them, and their princes. The Arabs imagine, that these Genii, whom they call Jin, haunt all solitudes and deserts in the evening; so that, when they find themselves in such places at that time, they generally address themselves to the chief of these Genii in the following terms: I fly for refuge to the Lord of this valley, that he may defend me from the foolish amongst his people. Hence it appears, that the Arabs believe the Genii, some of whom, or at least of a species similar to them, they call Peri, or fairies, some Div, or giants, and others Tacwîns, or fates, to be placed at a very small distance from the surface of the earth, if they may not be considered as proper inhabitants of it. That Mohammed and his followers borrowed their notions of these beings also from the Jews, appears from hence, that the latter entertain almost the very same sentiments of a sort of demons called Shedim that the Moslems do of their Jin, or Genii; as also of their Peri, Div, and Tacwîns <sup>a</sup>.

<sup>a</sup> Al KOR. MOHAM. f. ii. & xxxviii. JALLALO'DDIN, AL ZAMAKHSHAR. YAHYA, AL BEIDAWI, HADR. RELAND. ubi sup. p. 13—17. <sup>b</sup> Al KOR. MOHAM. f. ii, vi, xiii, lxxxvi. JALLALO'DDIN, AL BEIDAWI, HYDE, hist. rel. vet. Perf. p. 262, 271, 272. DAN. x. 13, 20, 21. TARG ad Psalm. cxxvii. 7. MENAGIAN. tom. iv. p. 353.

<sup>c</sup> Al KOR. MOHAM. f. x. TALMUD HIEROS. in Rosh nashana. HYDE, ubi sup. c. xix, xx. HADR. RELAND. ubi sup. p. 189, 190, 193. SHAHABODDIN ABU'L ABBAS AHMED, apud HADR. Reland. ibid. Al KOR. MOHAM. f. xv, xviii. ABU'L KASEM, in observ. MSis ad Alcoran. apud Reland. ubi sup. p. 194. Al KOR. MOHAM. f. vii, viii. AL JAUBARI. AL BEIDAWI.

Of the Scriptures.

THE Moslems hold it necessary for a believer to admit, that God vouchsafed mankind several revelations of his will that preceded the Korân. All which revelations, or, in other words, the books that contained them, they consider as the word of God, and consequently assign them a divine original. The number of these sacred books were, according to them, an hundred and four; of which ten were given to Adam, and not twenty-one, as we find intimated by Hottinger and Marracci, the authors followed by them seeming only to assert, that the first book revealed to Adam consisted of one-and-twenty leaves. Fifty of them were revealed to Seth; thirty to Enoch, from his knowlege surnamed Edris, supposed by Abd'allah Mohammed Ebn Sokeiker Anbaswâli to have been translated to heaven on the tenth day of the month Al Moharram; ten to Abraham; one, comprehending the Pentateuch, to Moses; one, containing the Psalms, to David; another, or the Gospel, to Jesus; and the last, after which no more revelations are to be expected, by his followers denominated the Korân, to Mohammed. All which divine books, except the four last, they agree to be now intirely lost, and their contents unknown; though they stigmatize with the name of infidel every person who entertains the least doubt of their real existence in former ages. The Pentateuch, the Psalms, and the Gospel, they say, have been so grossly corrupted by the Jews and the Christians, that the copies of those books at present in their hands are by no means to be depended upon. The principal reasons urged in support of this opinion may be seen in the beginning of Ismael Ebn Ali's history, and the Prodromus of Marracci; but as they have been all fully answered by the last author, and several others, it would be superfluous to enumerate them here. The Jews, in particular, are frequently reflected on in the Korân for falsifying and corrupting their copies of the Law; several instances of such pretended falsifications and corruptions being hinted at in that book. Some of the Mohammedan writers also, and particularly Ahmed Ebn Zin Alabeddin, a noble Persian, who penned a treatise in Persic against the Christian religion, assert, that not only the Pentateuch, but the Psalms likewise, and even the Gospel, have undergone many alterations; but herein they follow merely their own prejudices, and the fabulous accounts of spurious legends. The Moslems have an Arabic and a Persic version of the Psalms of David, translated, according to Mr. Reland, from some of our copies; to which are added certain prayers of Moses, Jonas, and others; but Mr. D'Herbelot considers this version as a manifest and palpable corruption of that sacred book whose name it bears. We are told by an eminent traveller, that a copy of the Pentateuch, though very much corrupted, is to be found amongst them; the truth of which seems to be doubted by Mr. Sale. Be this, however, as it will, they most certainly have a Gospel in Arabic, attributed to St. Barnabas, wherein the history of Jesus Christ is related in a manner very different from what we meet with in the true Gospels, and corresponded to those traditions which Mohammed has followed in his Korân. From these, or some other forgeries of the same stamp, the Mohammedans quote several passages, of which there are not the least foot-steps in the New Testament. As for the Korân, they believe this not so liable to corruption as the Pentateuch and the Gospel have always been, and defy both men and genii to produce a chapter like any part of it <sup>b</sup>.

Of the prophets.

THE prophets, or messengers of God to mankind, were, according to the Moslems, endued with a power of performing miracles, free from great sins, and errors of a pernicious nature, professors of one and the same religion, that is Islâm, notwithstanding the different laws and institutions they observed. They communicated to mankind the knowlege of several occult points, relating to the divine nature and attributes, to the resurrection, to future rewards and punishments, &c. that God was pleased to reveal to them, for the instruction and edi-

<sup>a</sup> AL KOR. MOHAM. f. iv. JALLALO'DDIN, in AL KOR. f. ii. & xviii. ut & ipse AL KOR. f. iv, lxxii, lxxiv, &c. D'HERBEL. biblioth. Orient. p. 369, 820, &c. AL BEIDAWI, Lib. ZOHAR. Vide etiam GEMARA, in Hagiga. <sup>b</sup> HADR. RELAND. ubi sup. c. iv. p. 17—29. HOTTINGER. hist. Orient. p. 22. MARRACC. in prodrom. AL-CORAN. p. 80. KESSÆUS, JALLALO'DDIN, ISMAEL EBN ALI, in princip. sue hist. & apud Marracc. in prodrom. p. 12, 13, 14, ut & ipse MARRACC. ibid. AHMED EBN ZIN ALABEDDIN, apud Marracc. ubi sup. p. 14. D'HERBEL. biblioth. Orient. p. 924. TERRY'S voyage to the East Indies, p. 277. SAÏE'S preliu. diic. p. 74. MENAGIAN. tom. iv. p. 321, &c. AL KOR. MOHAM. f. xvii.

- a fication of his people. Some of these they allow to have been more excellent than others, though the lowest of them they believe to have arrived at a degree of perfection not attainable by any but those who were honoured with the prophetic function. The number of the prophets sent at various times into the world amounted, says one of the Moslem traditions, to no less than 224,000, or, as another will have it, to 124,000. Of these 313 were apostles, and six brought new laws or dispensations, which successively abrogated the preceding, viz. Adam, Noah, Abraham, Moses, Jesus, and Mohammed. The first place they give to the revealers and establisers of new dispensations, and the next to the apostles. Mohammed, according to them, was the most noble of the prophets, and the first of all creatures. The most excellent of men, next to the order of prophets, in the opinion of the
- b Turks, Arabs, and Moors, who are Sunnites, was Abu Becr, then Omar, then Othmân, and, lastly, Ali; but the Persians, the Indians, and some other Moslems subject to the Persians, who are Shiites, place Ali immediately after Mohammed. The next to these, in point of rank and dignity, according to the Mohammedans, were the six chief companions of the prophet, Talha Ebn Obeid'allah, Al Zobeir Ebn Al Awwâm, Saad Ebn Abi Wakkâs, Zeid Ebn Saba, Abd'alrahmân Ebn Araf, and Abu Obeidab. These are succeeded by Mohammed's other companions, and they by that generation of men to whom the Arab prophet was more immediately sent, who, in the order of saints, are followed by Al Ghazâlî, and all the other Moslems, celebrated for their piety and good works. The Mohammedans take notice of the writings of Daniel, and several other prophets, which they cite on certain occasions, but esteem them as
- c inferior in point of authority to the sacred books above-mentioned<sup>1</sup>.

- As the Moslems are not agreed in their opinion of the precise number of the prophets, so a belief of any particular number of those holy men is not required of them as an article of faith. But whoever either denies the veracity of any of these prophets, or even doubts of it, or hates the meanest of them, is considered as an infidel. Nor is this to be wondered at, as Mohammed acknowledged the divine authority of the Pentateuch, wherein the names of some of these prophets are to be found, as well as of the Psalms and the Gospels, which likewise mention several of them. Nay, he often appeals to the agreement of the Korân with those sacred writings, and to the prophecies which he pretended were therein concerning himself, as proofs of his mission. His followers also failed not to produce several texts
- d even from our present copies of the Old and New Testament, in support of their master's cause. But, for a perfect account of these, we must beg leave to refer our curious readers to Dr. Prideaux and Marracci, who in this point will give them full and ample satisfaction<sup>2</sup>.

- THE Mohammedans believe a general resurrection and a future judgment, as has been already observed. Some of them also maintain, that not only the whole race of mankind, but that likewise of genii, shall die, and then be raised again. They acknowledge an intermediate state both of the body and of the soul after death. As soon as the former is laid in the grave, they say it is received by an angel, who gives it notice of the approach of two terrible angels, named Monker and Nakîr, who order the dead person to sit upright, examine him concerning his faith, as to the unity of God, and the mission of Mohammed, and punish him in a dreadful manner, if he does not give a satisfactory account of his belief in both those particulars. This notion, called by the Moslems the examination of the sepulchre, was certainly borrowed by Mohammed from the Jews, amongst whom it was very anciently received. It is not only founded on an express tradition of the prophet, but also plainly hinted at, though not directly taught, in the Korân, as the commentators agree; and yet it is utterly rejected by the Motâzalites, or the followers of Wâsel Ebn Atâ, the scholar of Hasan of Basra. With regard to the soul, they hold that when it is separated from the body by the angel of death, who performs his office with ease and gentleness towards the good, and with violence towards the wicked, it enters into that state which they call
- e Al Barzakh, or the interval between death and the resurrection. The word Barzakh, or Barzakh, primarily signifies any partition, or interstice, which divides one thing from another; but is used by the Arabs not always in the same, and sometimes in an obscure sense. They seem generally to express by it what the Greeks did by the word Hades; one while using it for the place of the dead, another while for the time of their continuance in that state, and another while for the state itself. It is defined by their critics to be the interval, or space, between this world and the next, or between death and the resurrection. If the departed person was a good believer, they say two angels convey his soul to heaven, that a place may be assigned it there, according to its degree and merit. For they distinguish the souls of the pious faithful into three classes; the first of prophets, whose souls are admitted into paradise immediately; the second of martyrs, whose spirits, according to a tradition of a Mohammed, rest in the crops of green birds, which eat of the fruits and drink of the rivers of paradise; and the third of others, concerning the state of whose souls before the resurrection, there is a variety of opinions. We must beg leave here to remark, that infidels only, according to the Moslem notion of a future distribution of rewards and punishments, will remain for ever in hell; and consequently, that not a single believer, however vicious and abandoned his course of life may have been, shall perish everlastingly. However, they believe, that the wicked amongst the faithful, if that term may be allowed, shall be punished hereafter in one of the stories, or apartments, of hell, in proportion to the number and guilt of the sins they committed here; after which they are to enter paradise, where they will be for ever inconceivably happy. The Moslem doctors maintain, that a person b who either desires not paradise, or fears not hell, or has not an awful sense of the resurrection, is guilty of a most malignant and damnable species of infidelity w.
- f

<sup>1</sup> RELAND. ubi sup. c. v. p. 29—47. AL KOR. MOHAM. f. ii. & alib. SAÏE. ubi sup. p. 75, 76. <sup>2</sup> RELAND. ubi sup. p. 47. PRID. life of Mahom. p. 92—95. AL SHAHRESTAN. & SAFIODDIN, apud Pocock, in not. ad spec. hist. Arab. p. 183. AL JANNAB. apud Pocockium, ubi sup. p. 185. ut & ipse Pocock. ibid. p. 183—186. LUDOVIC. MARRACC. prodr. ad refut. Alcoran. p. 14—31.

THOUGH some of the Mohammedans, and particularly Ebn Sina, have thought that the resurrection will be merely spiritual, and others, who allow man to consist of body only, that it will be merely corporeal; the received opinion is, that both body and soul will be raised. As to the manner of the resurrection, concerning which their doctors dispute with great subtilty, and the ridiculous notion of the incorruption, or rather incorruptibility, of the bone called by the Arabs Al Ajb, which we name the os coccygis, or rump-bone, we shall beg leave to refer our curious readers to the learned Dr. Pococke, for a farther account of c them. It may not, however, be improper to observe, that Mohammed was supplied with the foregoing notion by the Jews; who report almost the same things of the bone Luz, that the Arab prophet does of his Al Ajb. The time of the resurrection, according to the Moslems, is known to God alone. However, they say the approach of that day may be known by certain signs which are to precede it. These signs they distinguish into two sorts, the lesser and the greater; the former of which are in number eight, and the latter seventeen; a most particular and satisfactory account of which may be met with in Mr. Salé's Preliminary Discourse, extracted by Dr. Pococke from the best Oriental authors. We must not omit remarking, that, according to the Mohammedan belief, the irrational animals will also be restored to life at the resurrection, that they may be brought to judgment, and have d vengeance taken on them for the injuries they did one another whilst in this world; as also that Azraël, the angel of death, together with all the other angels, men, and brutes, then remaining, will die, the very moment Israfil shall sound the trumpet the second time at the resurrection. The first blast of this trumpet, which they believe will be sounded three times, the Moslems call the blast of consternation; at the hearing of which all creatures in heaven and earth shall be struck with terror, except those whom God shall please to exempt from it. The second they denominate the blast of exanimation; when all creatures both in heaven and earth shall die, or be annihilated, except those which God shall please to exempt from the common fate. These, some say, will be the angels Gabriel, Michael, Israfil, and the angel of death, who yet will afterwards die, at the command of God. Some, however, suppose, that the creatures destined not to taste of death, which e are mentioned in the Korân, are the angels who bear the throne of God; as also the black-eyed damsels, and other inhabitants of paradise. The space between the second and third blasts, according to Tâbya, will be forty days: though others believe it will amount to as many years. The third and last blast the Moslems term the blast of resurrection, when Israfil, who, together with Gabriel and Michael, will be previously restored to life, and standing on the rock of the temple of Jerusalem, shall, at God's command, call together all the dry and rotten bones, and other dispersed parts of the bodies, even the very hairs themselves, to judgment. This angel likewise having set the trumpet to his mouth, and called together the souls from all parts, will throw them into his trumpet, from whence, on his giving the last sound, they will fly forth like bees, and fill the whole space between heaven f and earth, and then repair to their respective bodies, which the opening earth will suffer to arise; and the first who shall so arise, according to a tradition of Mohammed, will be himself. Nothing, according to some of the Moslems, shall survive the general exanimation, preceding the resurrection, except God alone, with paradise and hell, the inhabitants of those two places, and the throne of glory. Notwithstanding what has been advanced, the Korân seems to intimate, that Israfil's trumpet will sound but twice; however, in relation to this point, the commentators are divided in their opinions. To the creatures that shall be exempted from death some add the spirit who bears the waters on which the throne of God is placed, the preserved table, wherein are registered the divine decrees, and the pen

w AL GHAZAL. Poc. not. in port. Mosis, p. 241, &c. AL KOR. MOHAM. f. viii, xlvii, &c. HYDE, in notis ad Albertum Bobovium, de visit. agrot. p. 19, 20. AL SHAHRESTAN. & AUTOR SHARH AL MAWAKEF, apud Poc. not. in spec. hist. Arab. p. 211, 212. EBN KHALECAN, in vita Waeli. AL BEHAWI, Poc. not. in port. Mosis, p. 247. 248. EBN MARUF, apud Gol. lex. Arab. col. 254. AL KOR. MOHAM. f. xxiii. HYDE, in not. ad Bobov. ubi sup. p. 19. RELAND. ubi sup. c. vi. p. 47—61.

a wherewith they are written; all which things the Mohammedans imagine were created before the beginning of the world. Which notion, as well as most others relating to the resurrection, they have undoubtedly derived partly from some mistaken passages of Scripture, and partly from the Jewish Talmud. The throne of God, as they pretend, consists of gems of an inestimable value, being of a size and refulgency exceeding all description *.

THAT the day of judgment will come most inevitably, and with sudden violence, the Mohammedans infer from the beginning of the fifty-sixth chapter of the Korân. This day of judgment, &c. in that book is called the hour, as we find it termed by our Saviour himself in Scripture. That the resurrection preceding this judgment will be general, and extend to all creatures, angels, genii, men, and animals, according to the Moslem doctrine, has been already observed; b which doctrine they endeavour to support by the authority of the Korân. That passage, however, which is produced to prove the resurrection of brutes, has been otherwise interpreted by some of the commentators. Those who are destined to be partakers of eternal happiness will arise in honour and security; but those who are doomed to everlasting misery, in disgrace, and under dismal apprehensions. As to mankind, they say, that they will be raised perfect in their parts and members, and in the same state as they came out of their mother's womb, that is, bare-footed, naked, and uncircumcised. Others, however, allege the authority of their prophet for a contrary opinion. Mohammed is also said to have farther taught, that the whole race of mankind shall be assembled at the last day, distinguished into three classes. The first, of those who go on foot, consisting of such believers whose c good works have been few; the second, of those that ride, who are in greater honour with God, and more acceptable to him; the third, of those who creep groveling with their faces on the ground, which will be composed wholly of the infidels, whom God shall cause to make their appearance with their faces on the earth, blind, dumb, and deaf. The last of which classes will be subdivided, according to another tradition of Mohammed, into ten sorts of wicked men, on whom God shall on that day fix certain discretory marks. We must not forget to observe, that the resurrection seems to be called in the Korân the meeting of God, in agreement with an expression of the same import used by the apostle St. Paul; nor that many of the ancient Arabs, according to a manuscript of Levinus Warnerus, believed a future resurrection, as well as an universal judgment, before the birth of Mohammed †.

d THE Moslems maintain, that not only mankind, but the genii and irrational animals also, shall be judged on the great day of final retribution; when the unarmed cattle shall take vengeance on the horned, till intire satisfaction shall be given to the injured. With regard to men, they hold, that when they are assembled together, they will not be immediately brought to judgment, but the angels will keep them in their ranks and order while they attend for that purpose. Which attendance, some say, is to last forty years, others seventy, others 300, and, lastly, others no less than 50,000; each of them vouching their prophet's authority in support of his opinion. During this space, they will stand looking up to heaven, but without receiving any information or orders thence, and are to suffer grievous torments, both the just and the unjust, though with manifest difference. For the limbs of e the former, particularly those parts which they used to wash in making the ceremonial ablution before prayer, shall shine gloriously, and their sufferings shall be light in comparison, lasting no longer than the time necessary to say the appointed prayers; but the latter will have their faces obscured with blackness, and disfigured with all the marks of sorrow and deformity. After they have all waited the limited time, God will appear to judge them; Mohammed undertaking the office of intercessor, after it shall have been declined by Adam, Noah, Abraham, and Jesus, who shall beg deliverance only for their own souls. God, they say, will come on this solemn occasion in the clouds, surrounded by angels, and incircled with glory, will produce the books wherein the actions of every person are recorded by their guardian angels, and will command the prophets to bear witness against f those to whom they have been respectively sent. Then, continue they, every one will be examined concerning all his words and actions uttered and done by him in this life. They must then give an account of their time, how they spent it; of their wealth, by what means they acquired it, and how they employed it; of their bodies, wherein they exercised them; of their knowledge and learning, what use they made of them. It is said, however, that Mohammed has affirmed, that no less than 70,000 of his followers should be permitted to enter paradise without any previous examination; which seems to be contradictory to what has been advanced above. As to the length of the day of judgment, the Korân in one place tells us, that it will last a thousand years, and in another fifty thousand. To reconcile which apparent contradiction, the commentators are forced to have recourse to several absurd <sup>a</sup> expedients, and evasive shifts. The place where the angels, genii, men, &c. will be assembled to judgment, as the Moslems pretend, cannot be precisely determined. Both the Korân and the traditions of Mohammed suppose that it will be on the earth; but in what part neither of them has expressly declared. Some affirm, that the Arab prophet mentioned Syria for the place; others, a white and even tract of land, without inhabitants or any signs of buildings. Al Ghazâli imagines it will be a second earth, consisting, as he supposes, of silver; and others, an earth which has nothing in common with ours but the name. The two last notions may perhaps have been taken from the new heaven and the new earth mentioned in Scripture, or at least from some apocryphal book not unknown to the primitive Christians; such as the Revelation of St. Peter, where something similar to them is to be found. <sup>b</sup> An Arabic version of this last piece is to be met with in the Bodleian library at Oxford <sup>c</sup>.

* EEN SINA, five AVICENNA, Poc. ubi sup. p. 117—254, 255, &c. Bereshit Rabbah, &c. SALE's prelim. disc. p. 79—83. Al Kor. MOHAM. pass. RELAND. ubi sup. p. 47—61. YAHYA, TALMUD HIEROS. in Masfchet Pesachim. KESSÆUS, apud Hadr. Reland. ubi sup. p. 49, 50. ut & ipse RELAND. ibid. 7 Al Kor. MOHAM. f. lvi. & f. vi. JOHN v. 25, &c. SALE, ubi sup. p. 85, 86. 1 THES. iv. 17. HADR. RELAND. ubi sup. p. 271.

The fate of the beings to be judged.

BUT whatever length the day of judgment may be of, as well as the space assigned by the Mohammedans for the attendance of the resuscitated before their trial, they tell us the trial itself will last no longer than while an ewe may be milked, or at farthest than the space between the two milkings of a she-camel. Jallalo'ddin affirms, that God will judge all creatures in half a day; and others, that it will be done in less time than the twinkling of an eye. The balance, wherein all things shall be weighed on this great day of trial, is, according to the Moslem description of it, of so vast a size, that its two scales, one of which hangs over paradise, and the other over hell, are capacious enough to contain both heaven <sup>c</sup> and earth. This balance, if we may believe the Mohammedans, will then be held by the angel Gabriel; the books wherein the words and actions of the creatures to be judged are written, will also then, as they affirm, be thrown into the scales; and, according as those wherein the good or the evil actions are recorded shall preponderate, sentence will be given. Those whose balances laden with their good works shall be heavy will be saved, but those whose balances are light will be condemned. After this will follow that mutual retaliation, according to which every creature will take vengeance one of another, or have satisfaction made them for the injuries which they have suffered; the manner of giving which satisfaction will be, by taking away a proportionable part of the good works of him who offered the injury, and adding it to those of him who suffered it. This will be the method of God's dealing with mankind. As to brutes, after they shall have likewise taken vengeance <sup>d</sup> one of another, he will command them to be changed into dust; wicked men being reserved unto more grievous punishment. With regard to the genii, some of the Moslems maintain, that such of them as are true believers will have no other reward than the favour of being converted into dust; whilst others judge, that, as they are capable of putting themselves in the state of believers, as well as men, they must deserve to be amply rewarded for their faith, as well as to be punished for their infidelity. These, therefore, assign the believing genii a place near the confines of paradise, where they will enjoy sufficient felicity. But the unbelieving genii, it is universally agreed, will be punished in hell eternally, with the infidels of mortal race. It may not be improper to observe, that, under the denomination of unbelieving genii, the Mohammedans comprehend also the devil and his companions. This <sup>e</sup> sufficiently appears from the interpretation of the word genii given us by some of the commentators on the Korân, to omit other authorities that occur <sup>f</sup>.

The bridge Al
Sirât.

AFTER all created intelligent beings have had their respective fates allotted them, the Mohammedans hold, that those who are to be admitted into paradise will take the right-hand way, and those who are destined to hell-fire the left; but that both of them must first pass the bridge, called in Arabic Al Sirât, which they say is laid over the midst of hell, and describe to be finer than an hair, and sharper than the edge of a sword. Over this bridge the good will pass, say the orthodox Moslems, (for the Metazalites reject the whole notion as a fable) with wonderful ease and swiftness, like lightning, or the wind, Mohammed himself leading the way; whereas the wicked will soon miss their footing, and fall down headlong <sup>f</sup> into hell, which is gaping beneath to receive them. This ridiculous fiction Mohammed undoubtedly borrowed from the Magians; some of the Arabs in his time being of their religion, and Persia, where this prevailed, at a small distance from him. For they taught, that on the last day all mankind will be obliged to pass a bridge, which they call Pâl Tchînavar, that is, the strait bridge, leading directly into the other world; on the midst of which they supposed that two angels, named Mibr-Izâd and Reshn-Izâd, will stand, and require of every man a strict account of his actions, which they will weigh in the manner here mentioned. Nor are the Jews, after whom Mohammed so frequently copied, altogether silent as to

<sup>a</sup> Al Kor. MOHAM, f. vi. MAIMON. More Nev. par. iii. c. 17. SALE, ubi sup. p. 85, 87, 88. AL GHAZAL. MS. Hispano-Arab. apud RELAND. ubi sup. p. 56, 57. Al Kor. MOHAM. f. xxxii, lxxix. AL BEIDAWI, AL ZAMAKSHAR. REV. xvi. 1. JOAN. GAGN. in not. ad Ism. Abu'lfed. de vit. Mahom. c. xix. p. 37, 38. <sup>b</sup> AL ZAMAKSHAR. YAHYA, Poc. not. in Port. Mos. p. 278—282. Al Kor. MOHAM. f. ii, vi, xviii. JALLALO'DDIN. AL BEIDAWI, SALE's prelim. disc. p. 89, 90. &c.

- a this bridge; tho' what the Persian Magi believe of the balance held by the angel Mibr, wherein mens actions will be weighed at the day of judgment, comes nearer to the Mohammedan opinion than the Jewish notion, from whence some have imagined it to be derived. However, the Magi seem not to have been intirely consistent with themselves in what they have related of the angels posted on the bridge Pál Tchínawar, Tchínawad Pál, or simply Tchínawad, Tchína-war, and Tchínár, for it went by all these names; or at least Dr. Hyde has given us a confused and indistinct account of their sentiments in this particular. In one place we are told, that Mibr will hold the balance, and Sorísh, Surísh, or Ujrísh, the other angel, supposed to be more fierce than Mibr, will precipitate the condemned souls from the bridge into hell; in another, that the latter angel takes care of the balance, and the former inspects the weight of mens actions, determines the fate of every individual of the human race, and is in fine the proper dispenser of rewards and punishments. Neither of which accounts strictly agrees with the Sad-der, or liturgy of the ancient Persians, containing an ample and complete collection of the precepts and canons of Zerdusht; in which these two angels are denominated Mikr-Ízad and Reshu-Ízad, and have both the same office assigned them, viz. to weigh the actions of mankind in the balance of justice and equity, in order to make a true estimate of them. Notwithstanding which, Dr. Hyde, without naming his guide, ventures to affirm, in direct opposition to the Sad-der, that Mibr, who represents the divine mercy, will hold the balance in his hand, and Sorísh, who represents God's justice, will precipitate those that are condemned from the bridge into hell; and has been followed herein by the learned Mr. Sale. But as the authority of the Sad-der is preferable to any other in the point before us, our curious readers will by no means be displeased that we adhere so closely to it here <sup>b</sup>.

- AMONGST the Moslems a tradition prevails, that at the last day hell will be dragged towards the divine tribunal by 70,000 halters, each halter being hawled by 70,000 angels; and that it will come with great roaring and fury. This notion, which represents the receptacle of damned spirits as a huge and monstrous animal, seems to have been taken from the author of the Apocalypse, who intimates, that, after the general judgment, death and hell, or Hades, shall be cast into the lake of fire. Be that as it will, the Mohammedans are taught, that hell is divided into seven stories, or apartments, one below another, designed for the reception of as many distinct classes of the damned. The first, which they call Jebennam, a name apparently deduced from the Gehenna of Scripture, they say, is destined for the wicked Mohammedans, who, after having been there punished according to their demerits, will at length be released. The second, named Ladbá, they assign to the Jews; the third, denominated Al Hotama, to the Christians; the fourth, named Al Sair, to the Sabians; the fifth, called Sakar, to the Magians; the sixth, by them termed Al Jakim, to the idolaters; and the seventh, which is the lowest and worst of all, going under the name of Al Háwiyat, to the hypocrites, or those who outwardly professed some religion, but in reality were of none. In these apartments, over each of which they believe there will be posted a guard of nineteen angels, the wicked, according to them, will suffer a variety of torments, both from intense heat and excessive cold. The degrees of these will also vary, in proportion to the crimes of the sufferer, and the apartment he is condemned to. It must be remarked, however, that, according to the Mohammedan system, the infidels alone will be liable to eternity of damnation; it being reckoned heretical amongst the Moslems to assert, that any one will in a future state be doomed to everlasting punishment, but such as die in their infidelity. The time which the believers shall be detained in hell, according to a tradition handed down from Mohammed, will not be less than 400 years, nor more than 7000; and at the end of their respective terms of punishment, they will be released by the mercy of God, at the intercession of their prophet. Hence it appears, that Mohammed by no means denied the reality of a place of future punishment, in the same manner as do our modern deists, as some Christian writers have maintained; as also, that he never held, with Origen and his followers, that devils and impenitent sinners should at last be saved, as others have believed. For most of the circumstances relating to hell, and the state of the damned, Mohammed seems to have been indebted to the Jews, and in part to the Magians; both of whom agree in making seven distinct apartments in hell, tho' they vary in other particulars. The former place an angel as a guard over each of these infernal apartments, and suppose he will intercede for the miserable wretches there imprisoned, as do the Mohammedans. They also teach, that the wicked will suffer a diversity of punishments, and that by intolerable cold as well as heat; and believe those of their own religion shall also be punished in hell hereafter, according to their crimes, but will soon be delivered thence, when they shall be sufficiently purged from their sins, by their father Abraham, or at the intercession of him or some other of the prophets. The Magians allow but one angel to a preside over all the seven hells, who is named by them Vanând Yezád, or, as those words are pronounced by the vulgar, Vunnund-Isud, and, as they teach, assigns punishments proportionate to each person's crimes; restraining also the tyranny and excessive cruelty of the devil, who would, if left to himself, torment the damned beyond their sentence. They also mention and describe various kinds of torments, wherewith the wicked will be punished in the next life; among which they reckon extreme cold to be one, not admitting fire, out of respect, as it seems, to that element, which they take to be the representation of the divine nature. However, they consider hell as a subterranean prison, full of smoke and darkness, where devils in human and hideous forms exercise the greatest cruelty upon the damned. They likewise affirm, that serpents, frogs, and crows, all which animals are extremely disagreeable to the Persians, will, by their perpetual hissing, and croaking, heighten the punishment to which those wretches must be for ever consigned <sup>c</sup>.

<sup>b</sup> Poc. ubi sup. p. 282—289. AL GHAZAL. AL MOSTRATAF, AL FIRAUZABAD. in KAM. GOLIUS, in lex. Arab. HYDE, de relig. vet. Persar. p. 245, 262, 263, 401, 402, 403, &c. Lib. SAD-DER, part. i. apud Hyd. ubi sup. p. 436. SALE, ubi sup. p. 89, 90.

Of the wall between paradise and hell.

BETWEEN hell and paradise the Moslems suppose a partition, called by them Al Orf, and more frequently, in the plural, Al Aráf, which is mentioned in the seventh chapter of the Korân. The word seems to be derived from the verb arafa, which signifies to distinguish between things, or to part them; tho' some of the commentators give another reason for the imposition of this name. Some of the Mohammedan writers imagine Al Aráf to be a sort of limbo, for the patriarchs and prophets, or for the martyrs and those who have been most eminent for sanctity, amongst whom they say there will be angels also in the form of men; tho' others of them are of a different opinion. From the foregoing chapter of the Korân it seems probable, that this intermediate partition is a sort of purgatory for those, who, tho' they deserve not to be sent to hell, yet have not merits sufficient to gain them immediate admittance into paradise, and will be tantalized here for a certain time with a bare view of the felicity of that place. The notions of the partition here described Mohammed must either have borrowed from the Jews, or have deduced from what we find related of the great gulph of separation in the Scripture <sup>d</sup>.

Of Moham-
med's pond.

BEFORE the righteous enter paradise, as the Mohammedans are taught to believe, they will be refreshed by drinking at the pond of their prophet; which he describes to be an exact square, of a month's journey in compass. The water of this pond is supplied by two pipes from Al Cawthar, one of the rivers of paradise, being whiter than milk, and more odoriferous than musk, with as many cups set around it as there are stars in the firmament. This water likewise, according to one of the prophet's traditions, is sweeter than honey, cooler than snow, and smoother than cream. Its banks are of chrysolites, and the vessels to drink thereout of silver; and those who drink of it shall never thirst. The word Cawthar signifies abundance, especially of good. 'Tis probable that the pond here mentioned, as well as the river Al Cawthar, its source, owed its origin to the pure river of water of life, clear as crystal, proceeding out of the throne of God, and of the Lamb, that occurs to us in the Apocalypse, in conjunction with the water given by our Saviour, of which those that drink shall never thirst. For the foregoing description both of this pond and the river Al Cawthar, we have been obliged to Al Ghazâli, an author in great repute amongst the Mohammedans <sup>e</sup>.

Of paradise.

WITH regard to paradise, tho' frequently mentioned in the Korân, the Moslems in their sentiments are not perfectly agreed. The Motazalites, and some other sectaries, assert, that this happy region, or delightful garden, will be created hereafter, and consequently suppose it to be different from the paradise from which Adam was expelled. But the orthodox maintain, that it was created before the world, and is situate above the seven heavens, directly under the throne of God; tho' Mohammed seems to have placed it in the seventh heaven, as may be inferred from the second chapter of the Korân. The earth of it, as some pretend, consists of the finest wheat flour, or of the purest musk, or, as others will have it, of saffron. Its stones, as the Moslems believe, are pearls and jacinths, the walls of its buildings enriched with gold and silver, and the trunks of all its trees are of gold; among which the most remarkable is the tree called Tûba, or the tree of happiness, concerning which many ridiculous things have been fabled by the commentators on the Korân. The rivers of paradise, according to Mohammed, are one of the principal ornaments thereof. Some of these rivers, f a his followers say, flow with water, some with milk, some with wine, and others with honey; all of them taking their rise from the root of the tree Tîba. The garden also, as they pretend, is watered by a great number of lesser springs and fountains, whose pebbles are rubies and emeralds, their earth of camphire, their beds of musk, and their sides of saffron. The Korân seems to insinuate, that one distinct paradise will be prepared for men, and another for genii; or, as some imagine, two gardens to each person, one as a reward due to his works, and the other as a free and superabundant gift. Some of the fruits of these gardens, we are told, will resemble those eaten here on earth; but others will be of a new and unknown species, such as mortal eye never beheld <sup>f</sup>.

<sup>c</sup> JALLALO'DDIN. REV. XX. 14. AL KOR. MOHAM. f. xv, xl, xliii, lxxiv. Poc. not. in Port. Mos. 289—291. RELAND. ubi sup. p. 60, 61. MACCOVIUS, in theol. polem. p. 119, & apud Reland. ubi sup. p. 174. ut & ipse RELAND. ibid. THOMAS A JESU, apud Reland. ubi sup. p. 196—198. ut & ipse RELAND. ibid. MILLIUS, de Mohammedismo ante Mohammed. p. 412. D'HERBEL. biblioth. Orient. p. 368, &c. Nishmat hayim, f. 32, 82, &c. Gemar. in Arubin, f. 19. Zohar, ad Exod. xix, xxvi. 2, &c. HYDE, de rel. vet. Pers. p. 245. Midrash, Yalkut Shemuni, par. xi. f. 8, 116. AL KOR. MOHAM. f. ii, iii. BARTOLOCCI bibliothec. Rabbini. tom. ii. p. 128. & tom. iii. p. 421. HYDE, ubi sup. p. 182, 399, 400, &c. <sup>d</sup> AL KOR. MOHAM. f. vii. JALLALO'DDIN, AL BEIDAWI, D'HERBEL. bibl. Orient. p. 121, &c. Midrash, Yalkut Sioni, f. 11. LUKE xvi. 26. HYDE, in not. ad Albertum Bobovium, de visitat. ægrotior. p. 19. Oxonii, 1690. <sup>e</sup> AL GHAZALI, AL BEIDAWI, JALLALO'DDIN, REV. xxii. 1. JOHN iv. 14. Vide etiam EUTHYM. ZICABEN. in panopl. dogmat. inter SYLEURGII Saracenic. p. 29.

BESIDES these delicious fruits, there will appear in the garden, or rather gardens of paradise, as we are taught by Mohammed in the fifty-fifth chapter of the Korân, vast numbers of agreeable and beauteous damsels, whom neither men nor genii have deflowered, kept in pavilions from public view, and called, from their large black eyes, Hûr al oyûn, the enjoyment of whose company will be one of the principal felicities of the faithful. These, they suppose, will lie on green cushions and beautiful carpets, having before been cleansed from all impurities incident to the sex. The happy mansion wherein these resplendent and ravishing girls reside, which is also to be the residence of all true believers, the Mohammedans call Al Jannat, or the garden; and sometimes Jannat al Ferdaws, the garden of paradise, Jannat Aden, the garden of Eden, Jannat al Mâwa, the garden of abode, Jannat al Naïm, the garden of pleasure, and the like. By which several appellations some understand so many different gardens, or at least places of different degrees of felicity, (for they reckon no less than an hundred such in all) the meanest of which will afford its inhabitants so many pleasures and delights, that no creature could sustain them which had not the abilities of an hundred men. And these, as Mohammed has declared, will be given by God to every believer hereafter, in order to qualify him for a full enjoyment of them. Some of the Moslem doctors, according to Jallalo'ddin, maintain, that these charming girls will be the proper inhabitants of paradise, as they will be produced originally there; whilst others of them are of opinion, that they will be translated from this globe we are seated upon to that blessed place <sup>g</sup>.

AFTER the righteous have refreshed themselves by drinking at Mohammed's pond, they will arrive, if we will believe Al Ghazâlî, at two fountains, springing from under a certain tree d near the gate of paradise; of one of which they will drink, in order to purge their bodies, and carry off all excrementitious dregs, and wash themselves in the other. As soon as they present themselves before the gate itself, each person will there be met and saluted by the two beautiful youths, of celestial extraction, appointed to serve and wait upon him; as also by two angels, bearing the presents God has sent him. After this they shall enter paradise; tho' no person's good works, according to Mohammed's declaration, not even his own, will gain him admittance. No one will be saved by his own merits, but merely by the mercy of God. However, if any credit be due to the Korân, the felicity of each person will be proportioned to his deserts; and there will be abodes of different degrees of happiness. The most eminent of these will be reserved for the prophets, the second for the doctors and e teachers of God's worship, the next for the martyrs, and the lowest for the rest of the blessed, according to their several merits. Mohammed, as he himself says, will enter paradise first, and after him the poor, five hundred years before the rich. He also further informs us, that the majority of the inhabitants of paradise will consist of the poor, and the greater part of the wretches confined in hell of women. Immediately after their admission, as the Moslems fable, they will be entertained by God, who will reach out to them with his hand the whole earth, resembling a huge and monstrous loaf of bread, holding it like a cake. The 70,000 believers, who will be admitted into paradise without examination, as the generality of the commentators suppose, will feast upon the ox Balâm, and the fish Nûn, the lobes of whose livers, according to them, will suffice 70,000 men. This seems to intimate, that those believers only will be permitted to feed upon that part, which the Moslems f consider as the most elegant dish that can even in paradise be prepared. From this feast every one will be dismissed to the mansion designed for him, where he will enjoy such a profusion of delights as will vastly exceed both his expectation and comprehension. These will consist of seventy-two most lovely wives at least, a tent immensely rich, a prodigious number of servants, a surprizing variety of species of food served in dishes of gold, many sorts of the most delicious liquors brought them in vessels of the same metal, the richest wines void of an inebriating quality, most magnificent furniture, and garments answerable to the delicacy of their diet, a numerous train of attendants, and in fine every thing that a sensualist or voluptuary can desire. Every sense will be gratified, every passion indulged. g And that the pleasures of paradise may be tasted in their utmost height, the Moslems assert, that the inhabitants of that place will enjoy a perpetual youth, and be raised in their prime <sup>a</sup> and vigour, that is, with the strength of a person about thirty years of age; which, as they affirm, will likewise happen to the damned, that they may be the more sensible of that extreme torment they must to all eternity endure. The Mohammedans believe, that hell has seven gates, and paradise eight; the former of which may be shut, and the latter opened, by fasting a certain number of days. By virtue of which notion, such a fast is strictly enjoined by the Sonna; nor do the orthodox Moslems fail to have recourse to one of their prophet's oral traditions in support of this opinion <sup>b</sup>.

<sup>f</sup> Al Kor. MOHAM. f. ii, xlvi, lv. YAHYA, AL BEIDAWI, JALLALO'DDIN, RELAND. ubi sup. p. 13, 61, 199—205. <sup>g</sup> Al Kor. MOHAM. f. vi. AL BEIDAWI, JALLALO'DDIN.

As for those believers, whose sanctity was most transcendently conspicuous, and who arrived at an uncommon degree of perfection, in this world, an inexhaustible source of the most sublime and refined pleasures, infinitely superior to any thing hitherto described, <sup>b</sup> according to the Moslem opinion, will be prepared for them. These, the Moslems say, will enjoy such things as eye hath not seen, nor hath ear heard, nor hath it entered into the heart of man to conceive; an expression most certainly borrowed from Scripture. The Korân does not only intimate, but even expressly declare, notwithstanding what has been already advanced, that their reward shall be most excellent, and that they shall even receive a superabundant addition, or, in other words, that their reward will vastly exceed the merit of their good works. Which additional recompense Al Ghâzali supposes will be the beatific vision, or, as the Mohammedans sometimes term it, the favour of beholding God's face morning and evening; which will give such exquisite delight, that, in respect thereof, all the other pleasures of paradise, how great soever, will be lightly esteemed. This seems to imply, that <sup>c</sup> the more sober and rational Mohammedans believe the principal happiness of the blessed to consist in spiritual enjoyments; and that the sensual paradisaical pleasures mentioned in the Korân, and by the commentators on that book, are to be taken in an allegorical sense. That such a notion is consonant to the genius of all the wiser Moslems, Dr. Hyde owns himself convinced, from an answer he received to some queries relating to paradise from the Morocco ambassador, who therein assured him, that paradise bore not the least resemblance to any place here on earth. To which we may add, that Mr. D'Herbelot affirms Mohammed to have placed the summum bonum, or chief good, in the beatific vision, or the fruition of the immediate divine presence, to all eternity; and likewise to have maintained, that where- <sup>d</sup> ever that was, there must be paradise of course. Nay, some of the Arab philosophers assert, that as soon as a soul, arrived at an exalted degree of perfection, leaves the body, it immediately tastes an ineffable pleasure and inconceivable complacency resulting from its nature and disposition; and that such souls as these more or less resemble the divine nature itself in proportion to the higher or lower degree of perfection to which they attain. Notwithstanding which, the contrary is so evident from the whole tenor of the Korân, that altho' some Mohammedans, whose understandings are too refined to admit such gross conceptions, look on their prophet's descriptions of the pleasures of paradise as parabolical, and are willing to receive them in an allegorical or spiritual sense; yet the general and orthodox doctrine is, that the whole is strictly to be believed in the obvious and literal acceptation. Which truth is so apparent and clear, that even Mr. Sale himself, however prejudiced he <sup>e</sup> might have been in favour of the Mohammedan superstition, could not refuse his assent to it. Nor, indeed, would the depraved sensual taste of the Arabs, when Mohammed assumed the prophetic character, and set up for a legislator and reformer amongst them, permit him to appoint a spiritualized and intellectual paradise hereafter for his believers. He then found himself obliged to accommodate to the Arab disposition and constitutional bent his religious as well as his civil institutions. A point so clear as this could not be denied either by the count de Boulainvilliers or Mr. Sale, who have even endeavoured to defend the expediency of it, as has been already observed <sup>f</sup>.

THAT the Jews and Persian Magi supplied Mohammed with most of those notions relating to paradise, which his followers have all along embraced as undoubted truths, may be <sup>f</sup> easily evinced from some good authors. The former describe the future mansion of the just as a delicious garden reaching to the seventh heaven, having three gates and four rivers, answering to those of the garden of Eden, flowing with milk, wine, balsam, and honey. Their Behemoth and Leviathan, which they pretend will be slain for the entertainment of the blessed, are so apparently the Balâm and Nîn of Mohammed, that his followers themselves confess he is obliged to them for both. The Rabbins likewise mention seven different degrees of felicity, and say the highest will be of those who perpetually contemplate the face of God. The Per-

<sup>b</sup> AL GHAZALI, KENZ AL ASRAR, AL BEIDAWI; JALLALO'DDIN, AL KOR. MOHAM. ubi sup. & alib. SALE's prelim. disc. sect. iv. HADR. RELAND. de relig. Mohammedic. lib. i. c. xi. p. 109—113. <sup>i</sup> ISA. lxiv. 4.

<sup>j</sup> COR. ii. 9. AL GHAZALI, AL KOR. MOHAM. f. x. & POC. in not. ad Port. Mos. p. 305. RELAND. ubi sup. lib. ii. sect. xvii. p. 199—205. AL BEIDAWI, JALLALO'DDIN, HYDE, in not. ad Albertum Bobovium, de visitat. ægrotor. p. 21. D'HERBEL. & POCOCCIUS, apud Reland. ubi sup. p. 203, 204. SALE, ubi sup. p. 101, 102, 103. Monf. le Comte de BOULAINVILL. vie de Mahom. pass.

- a jian Magi committed the care of the Hurâni bebisht, or black-eyed nymphs of paradise, as well as all terrene affairs, to the angel Zamiyâd, who, amongst them, presided over the earth; and the twenty-eighth day of the month Isphendârmaz, which the Indo-Persians pronounce Spendarmoz, called from him Zamiyâd. We are told likewise by the Sad-der, that those who are liberal in giving of alms shall be hereafter rewarded in paradise with the possession of several such beautiful girls. From the Magians, therefore, Mohammed seems to have derived the notion of his Hûr al oyûn, or paradisaical ladies, whose charms have been represented as so attractive in the Korân. He also seems in some respect to have been obliged, for his accounts of the felicity of the faithful in the next life, to the sacred writings themselves; the penmen of which were necessitated sometimes to represent the celestial enjoyments by corporeal images, it being impossible to convey to the apprehensions of the generality of mankind an idea of spiritual pleasures, without introducing sensible objects. But then the descriptions given us by these writers, particularly that laid down by our Saviour of the future state of the blessed, and that exhibited to us by St. John of the mansions destined for their future residence, are void of the most distant intimation of sensual delights, and all the ridiculous absurdities relating to paradise, that so frequently occur in the Korân. On the contrary, our Lord utterly explodes all such preposterous notions; which are so far from becoming an inspired apostle, such as the Moslems take Mohammed to have been, that they are repugnant to the fundamental principles of even natural religion itself <sup>k</sup>.

- b WITH regard to women, tho' some of the most ignorant Mohammedans seem to exclude Whether women are excluded paradise. them from the joys of paradise, as not allowing them to have any souls, according to several Christian writers; yet that Mohammed himself entertained a far different opinion, and assigned some of them habitations in that delightful place, may be inferred from several passages of the Korân. Nay, that good women, after death, will have a mansion assigned them, different from that of the men, where they will enjoy all sorts of delights, is, according to Sir John Chardin and others, the prevailing opinion amongst the Mohammedans. In confirmation of which, we are assured by Dr. Hyde, that he was informed by a female captive, who had been made a prisoner at the reduction of Buda, and was at Oxford in May 1687, with whom he had a conference in Turkish, that the Moslems believed the souls of all the faithful, both men and women, after the dissolution of the vital union here, to be received into paradise. She also reprehended an ignorant Turkish youth, taken likewise at Buda, for presuming to differ from her in this particular. She farther declared, that, according to the Turkish doctrine, every individual of the human race should be hung over paradise and hell, at the resurrection, by a single hair only; and that, upon the rupture of this hair, the righteous should drop into the former, and the wicked into the latter of those places. The doctor also produces the testimony of Ali Beigh, a writer of good repute amongst the Moslems, in support of the same opinion <sup>l</sup>.

- c THE next article of faith, insisted on by the Korân, is God's absolute decree, and predestination both of good and evil. For the Sonnites maintain, that whatever hath or shall come to pass in this world, whether good or bad, proceedeth intirely from the divine will; and is irrevocably fixed and recorded from all eternity in the preserved table. The Motazalites, however, or followers of Wâsel Ebn Atâ, held that God was not the author of evil, but of good only, and that man was a free agent, (which was also one of the distinguishing tenets of the Kadarians) and consequently denied absolute predestination. Of the article here mentioned Mohammed made great use on several occasions, and particularly at the battle of Ohod, fought in the third year of the Hejra, in which he was vigorously repulsed by the Koreish. In order the more effectually to still the murmurs of his party on their defeat, he represented to them, after the end of the action, that the time of every man's death is decreed and predetermined by God; and that those who fell in that battle could not have avoided their fate, had they staid at home. In fine, nothing could be better calculated than this doctrine for the advancement of Mohammed's designs; since, by representing to his followers, that all their cautions could not avert their inevitable destiny, or prolong their lives for a moment, it encouraged them to fight without fear, and even desperately; for the propagation of their religion <sup>m</sup>.

<sup>k</sup> Gemar. Tâniith, f. 25. Beracoth, f. 34. & Midrash rabboth, f. 37. Megillah, Amkoth, p. 78. Midrash; Yalkut Shemuni. GEN. ii. 10, &c. Gemar. Bava Bathra, f. 78. Rashi, in Job i. Poc. not. in Port. Mos. p. 298. Nishmat hayim, f. 32. Midrash, Tehillim, f. 11. Sad-der, port. v. HYDE, de rel. vet. Persar. p. 258, 265, 266. Al Kor. MOHAM. f. x. LUKE xxii. 29, 30, &c. MATT. xxii. 30. REV. xxi. 10. & xxii. 1, 2. JOHN xiv. 2. HADR. RELAND. ubi sup. p. 199—205. SALE, ubi sup. p. 101, 102. <sup>l</sup> GRELOT, voyage de Constant. p. 275. RICAUT's present state of the Ottoman empire, l. ii. c. 21. HORNBEKIUS, in summa contror. p. 16. Al Kor. MOHAM. f. iii, iv, xiii, xvi, xl, xlviii, lvii, lx, lxvi. CHARD. voyag. tom. ii. p. 328. RELAND. ubi sup. p. 205—209. ALI BEIGH, apud Hyd. in not. ad Albertum Bobovium, ubi sup. p. 21. ut & ipse HYD. ibid. SALE, ubi sup. p. 102, 103. <sup>m</sup> Al Kor. MOHAM. f. xlv, xcvi. AL BEIDAWI, AL ZAMAKHSHAR. JALLALO'DDIN, Poc. not. in spec. hist. Arab. p. 238—241.

Of prayer, and the previous purifi-cations.

THE four fundamental points of religious practice, required by the Korân, are prayer, a giving of alms, fasting, and the pilgrimage to Mecca. Under prayer are comprehended those legal washings or purifications, which are preparatory thereto; of which there are two degrees, one called Ghoſſ, being a total immersion of the body in water, and the other Wodû, which is the washing of their faces, hands, and feet, after a certain manner. The first is required in some extraordinary cases only; the latter is the ordinary ablution in common cases, and before prayer, and must necessarily be used by every person before he can enter upon that duty. We have already observed, that Mohammed borrowed these purifications either from the Jews, or his own countrymen; it being certain, that the pagan Arabs, long before the birth of that impostor, used such lustrations. Some of the Moslems, however, pretend that they are as ancient as Abraham, who, they say, was enjoined by God b to observe them, and was shewed the manner of making the ablution by the angel Gabriel, in the form of a beautiful youth. Others deduce the matter higher, and imagine that these ceremonies were taught our first parents by the angels. Besides these washings, there is another purification, performed by defrication, enjoined in the fifth Sûra, or chapter, of the Korân. It is called Al Tayamom, which properly denotes the action of taking any thing from the surface, as fine sand or dust from the surface of the earth; whence it comes to signify the rubbing of the parts of the body with fine sand or dust, in lieu of water. The words of the Korân, injoining this ceremony, are the following: If ye be sick, or on a journey, or any of you cometh from the privy, or if ye have touched women, and ye find no water, take fine clean sand, and rub your faces and your hands therewith. Which passage, the Mohammedans say, was revealed during the war of Al Mostalek, in the sixth year of the Hejra; tho' c their pretended prophet seems not to have been so much indebted to his own cunning as to the example of the Jews, or perhaps that of the Persian Magi, for this expedient. The former of those nations prescribes lustration by dust or sand, where water cannot be had, in their Talmudical pandects; and the latter think a triple frication of their faces and hands with dust, when water is not at hand, before morning-prayer, is a duty incumbent on every person; tho', in order to a perfect purification, water must afterwards be used, and the morning-prayer repeated. But for a farther account of these and other particulars relative to the origin of this institution, we must beg leave to refer our curious readers to the Sad-der, as well as a learned author, whom we have frequently had occasion to cite in the d preceding part of this work <sup>n</sup>.

BESIDES the aforesaid purifications, the Mohammedans have another rite, which they consider likewise in a similar view, and that is circumcision. Tho' this be not directly required in the Korân, it is yet held by the Mohammedans to have been originally of divine institution. 'Tis probable this rite was derived from Ismael to his descendants, as well as the other Arabs, and particularly the Hamyarites, with whom they were intermixed. The Ismaelites, according to Josephus, were circumcised when about twelve or thirteen years old, at which time their father Ismael underwent that operation; nor do the Mohammedans circumcise their children before they can pronounce the profession of their faith; that is, somewhere between the ages of six and sixteen, or thereabouts. Tho' the prevailing opinion e amongst the Moslems is, that the precept injoining circumcision was originally given to Abraham; yet some of them have not scrupled to assert, that Adam was taught it by the angel Gabriel. It must here be remarked, that the females, as well as the males, are circumcised amongst the Mohammedans; which agrees with what we find related of the Arabian women, in this particular, by Strabo. According to Galen, the rite of circumcision was performed on the Egyptian girls by an incision of the nympha, in the same manner as it is upon those of the Mohammedans at this day. The Egyptians circumcised their children, both male and female, in the fourteenth year of their age. That the Moslems do not confine this operation, as some writers suggest, to the thirteenth year, because Ismael was circumcised at that time is evident from the example of Mohammed, the son of Sultan Morad III. upon whom the operation was f performed in the sixteenth year of his age; not to mention other instances of this kind that occur. The Moslems also think, that combing the hair, cutting the beard, paring the nails, pulling out the hairs of their arm-pits, and shaving their private parts, are all points of cleanliness, and necessary in order to internal purification; which induces them to make these, as well as the foregoing lustrations, likewise indispensable duties <sup>o</sup>.

As

<sup>n</sup> Al Kor. MOHAM. f. iv. & alib. RELAND. ubi sup. p. 66—87. Poc. not. in Port. Mos. p. 356, &c. MARK vii. 3, &c. HERODOT. lib. iii. c. 198. AL JANNAB. in vit. Abrah. Poc. not. in spec. hist. Arab. p. 503. Pseudevang. S. BARNAB. vers. Hispan. c. 29. AL KESSAI, Al Kor. MOHAM. f. v. v. 7. Cod. Berachoth. cap. ii. in Gemar. fol. 15. 1. Poc. not. miscel. ad Port. Mos. p. 389. GEO. CEDREN. hist. compend. p. 250. Lib. Sad-der, port. lxxxiv. apud Hyd. de relig. vet. Pers. p. 477. ISM. ABU'LFED. de vit. Mahom. cap. xliii. p. 83. ABU MOHAMMED ABD'ALLAH BEN ABI ZEID. in system. theol. MS. apud HADR. RELAND. ubi sup. p. 81, 82. JOAN. GAGN. not. ad ABU'LFED. ubi sup. p. 83, 84. <sup>o</sup> ALBERTUS BOBOVIUS, de circumcis. p. 22. PHILOSTORG. hist. eccl. lib. iii. JOSEPH. ant. lib. i. c. 23. GENES. xvii. 25. Pseudevang. BARNAB. vers. Hispan. c. 23. HADR.

- a As we have already given some account of the duty of prayer, we shall only touch here in a cursory manner on some of the most material particulars relating to it. With regard to public prayer, for the stated times of which Mohammed pretended to have received the divine command from the throne of God himself, when he took his night-journey to heaven, and which are frequently insisted on in the Korân, it must be performed by every conscientious Moslem at least five times a day, as has been already observed. At these times, of which public notice is given by the Muedhdins, or Criers, from the steeples of their mosques, every Mohammedan prepares himself for prayer, which he performs either in the mosque or any other place, provided it be clean, after a prescribed form, and with a certain number of praises or ejaculations. He uses also certain postures of worship; all which have been particularly
- b described by several authors. It is likewise requisite that he should turn his face, whilst he prays, towards the temple of Mecca; being directed thereto by a nich made within the mosque, called Al Mehrâb, and, without, by the situation of the doors opening into the galleries of the steeple. There are also tables calculated for the ready finding out the Keblah, or part to which he ought to pray, in places where there is no other direction. The Mohammedans, during the time of divine service, never appear in sumptuous apparel, tho' they are obliged to be decently cloathed, lest they should seem proud and arrogant. They oblige likewise their women to perform their devotions at home, or at least not to approach the mosques whilst the men are there. But notwithstanding the numerous particulars comprized in the Mohammedan institution of prayer, many of which, especially the appointment of the
- c Keblah, as has been already remarked, were borrowed from the Jews, the inward disposition of the heart, according to the Moslem doctors, is principally to be regarded in the discharge of this duty. This, they say, is the life and spirit of prayer; the most punctual observance of the external rites and ceremonies here mentioned being of little or no avail, if performed without due attention, reverence, devotion, and hope. We are told by an Arab writer that thirteen things are requisite in public prayer: the intention; the magnification, and its formula; the station, or erect posture of the body; the reading of the first chapter of the Korân; the incurvation of the body; the second erection of the body; adoration; the former session; the latter session; the latter confession, and its formula; and, lastly, the order to be observed in the performance of these acts of devotion. The principal
- d points relating to public prayer, mentioned in the Sonna, are a purification of the parts of the body from all kinds of pollutions; decent garments, proper to appear in on so solemn an occasion; the choice of a clean place to discharge this duty in; the knowlege of the stated time of public worship; the conversion towards the Keblah, or temple of Mecca; the former admonition, or of convening the people to prayer; the latter admonition; the former confession; and the form of the prayer to be used. For a perfect and complete knowlege of all which particulars, we must beg leave to refer our readers to the authors cited here. It may not be improper to remark, that the Turks and Tartars, who are Sonnites, perform the sacred ablution after a manner different from that of the Persians, who are Shiites; and that, according to Cedrenus, a Jew, at the point of death, was baptized by the Christians,
- e before the time of Mohammed, with sand in the Syrtes of Africa, where no water could be procured<sup>p</sup>.

f THE next fundamental duty required by the Mohammedan religion, and on which great Of alms. stress is laid in the Korân, is the giving of alms; which are of two sorts, legal and voluntary. The latter are left to every one's liberty, to give more or less, as he shall think fit; but the former are of a perpetual and indispensable obligation. The former kind of alms some think to be properly called Zacât, and the latter Sadakât; tho' this name be also frequently given to the legal alms. They are called Zacât, either because they increase a man's store, by drawing down a blessing thereon, and produce in his soul the virtue of liberality; or because they purify the remaining part of one's substance from pollution, and the soul from the filth of avarice. They seem to have obtained the name of Sadakât, because they are a proof of a man's sincerity in the worship of God. We are told, that the Khalif Omar Ebn Abd'alaziz used to say, that prayer carries us half-way to God, fasting brings us to the door of his palace, and alms procures us admission. And, indeed, this duty is often recommended, jointly with prayer, in the Korân; the former being held of great efficacy in causing the latter to be heard of God. Alms, according to the prescriptions of the Moham- medan law, are to be given of five things. 1. Of cattle, that is to say, of camels, kine, and sheep. 2. Of money. 3. Of corn. 4. Of fruits, viz. dates and raisins. And, 5. Of wares fold. In order to render alms efficacious, six things, as we are told by an Arab author, are requisite. 1. That the giver be a Moslem. 2. That he be free. 3. That he be the lawful possessor of that out of which he gives alms, 4. That he possess this in a proper quantity.

HADR. RELAND. ubi sup. p. 75. STRAB. lib. xvi. GALEN. de us. part. lib. xv. AMBROS. de patr. Abr. lib. xv. c. 11. POC. not. in spec. hist. Arab. p. 303. AL JANNAB. in vit. Abrah. AL GHAZALI, SALE, ubi sup. p. 106, 107. ORIGEN. in philocal. c. xxiii. p. 77.

<sup>p</sup> ISM. ABU'LFED. de vit. Moham. p. 38. ABU HOREIRA, Al Kor. MOHAM. f. ii, v, vii, xx, xxix, xxx, &c. JOAN. GAGN. not. ad Abu'lfed. ubi sup. p. 38, 39. ABU MOHAMMED ABD'ALLAH EBN ABI ZEID, in suo systemat. theologic. MS. IBRAHIM EBN MOHAMMED AL HALEBI, in suo systemat. MS. fol. 9 col. 2. HOTTING. hist. eccl. tom. viii. p. 470—529. ALBERT. BOBOV. in liturg. Turcic. p. 1, &c. GREL. voy. de Constant. p. 253—264. CHARDIN, voy. de Perse, tom. ii. p. 388, &c. SMITH, de morib. ac instit. Turcar. ep. i. p. 33, 40, &c. HYDE, de rel. vet. Pers. p. 8, 9, 126. AL GHAZALI, POC. not. in spec. hist. Arab. p. 305. GEMAR. Berachoth. GENES. xix. 27. xxiv. 63. xxviii. 11, &c. DAN. vi. 10. MILLIUS, de Mohammedismo ante Mohammed. p. 427, &c. HYDE, de rel. vet. Pers. p. 5, &c. MAIMONID. in epist. ad profelyt. relig. POC. ubi sup. p. 306. GEMAR. Bava Bathra, & Berachoth. 1 KIN. viii. 29, &c. ABU'LFED. ubi sup. p. 54. HADR. RELAND. ubi sup. p. 87—99. GEORG. CEDREN. historiæ. compend. p. 250.

 5. That he be in possession of it about a year. 6. That the cattle, of which alms are given, be either fed by the proprietor, or sent to pasture by him. The portion given in alms is usually about one part in forty, or two and an half per cent. of the value; tho' in some cases a much larger portion than this is reckoned due. At the end of the fast of Ramadân, every Moslem is obliged to give in alms for himself, and for every one of his family, if he has any, a measure of wheat, barley, dates, raisins, rice, or other provisions commonly eaten. The legal alms were at first collected by Mohammed himself, who employed them as he thought fit, to the relief of his poor relations and followers, but chiefly to the maintenance of those who served in his wars, and fought, as he termed it, for the cause of God.
 The Khalifs, his successors, for some time continued to do the same. The foregoing rules relating to alms seem to have been derived from the Jews, as well as many others of Mohammed's institutions; they being called by that people Sedaks, i. e. justice, or righteousness, greatly recommended by their Rabbins, and even preferred by them to sacrifices. A Sea is paid for every head, after the conclusion of the fast of Ramadân, whether they be free or slaves, infants or adults, men or women, according to Al'd'allab Ebn Abi Zeid. The Moslems rank giving of alms amongst those duties denominated by them Fard, or of divine institu- tion; so that it is more obligatory than any thing enjoined by the Sonna, or recommended to them by even the most authentic tradition. Mohammed is said, by Al Beidawi, and Jalla- lo'ddin, to have declared, that whoever pays not his legal contribution of alms duly, shall have a serpent twisted about his neck at the resurrection<sup>a</sup>.

Of fasting.

THE third fundamental point of religious practice, enjoined the Mohammedans, is fasting; a duty deemed of so great moment by their prophet, that he usually called it the gate of religion. It was also held in such esteem by that great Moslem doctor Al Ghazâlî, that he reckoned it one fourth part of the faith. According to the Mohammedan divines, there are three degrees of fasting. 1. The restraining the belly and other parts of the body from satisfying their lusts. 2. The restraining the ears, eyes, tongue, hands, feet, and other members, from sin. And, 3. The fasting of the heart from worldly cares, and restraining the thoughts from every thing besides God. The Moslems are obliged, by the express command of the Korân, to fast the whole month of Ramadân, because on that month, as they pretend, the Korân was sent down from heaven, from the time the new moon first appears, till the appearance of the next new moon; during which time they must abstain from eating, drinking, and women, from day-break till night, or sunset. In order to render the discharge of this duty effectual and meritorious, three things are requisite.
 1. That the person who fasts should be a Moslem, 2. That he should be arrived at puberty. And, 3. That he should not labour under any mental indisposition. The preceding injunction of the Korân, relative to the fast of Ramadân, the Mohammedans observe so strictly, that, while they fast, they suffer nothing to enter their mouths, or other parts of their body, esteeming the fast broken and null if they smell perfumes, take a clyster or injection, bathe, wash their face or hands, or even purposely swallow their spittle; some being so cautious that they will not even open their mouths to speak, lest they should breathe the air too freely. The fast is also deemed void, if a man kiss or touch a woman, by any accident emit seed, has any menstuous blood drop upon him, becomes mad, or apostatizes from the faith, during the season of fasting, or if he vomit designedly. We must not omit observing, that, in his ordinances concerning fasting, Mohammed seems to have followed the guidance of the Jews, no less than in the foregoing particulars; and that, besides the fast of Ramadân, some others are commanded by certain authentic traditions.
 The extraordinary favour of God, on the day of the resurrection, is promised to those persons who fast only one day in the month of Shaabân, by the Sonna<sup>r</sup>.

<sup>a</sup> AL KOR. MOHAM. f. ii, & alibi pass. LUKE xi. 41. D'HERBEL. bibl. Orient. p. 5. ABD'ALLAH EBN ABU ZEID, HADR. RELAND. ubi sup. p. 99—109. CHARDIN, voy. de Perse, tom. ii. p. 415. &c. MATTH. vi. 1. (ed. Steph.) 2 Cor. ix. 10. Gemar. in Bava Bath'a, in Gittin, & in Rosh hashan. LEVIT. xix. 9, 10. DEUT. xxiv. 19, &c. Gemar Hierosol. in Pe'ah, & MAIMON. in Halachoth Matanoth Aniyyim, c. vi. Confer Luke Avoth, v. 9. LUKE xix. 8. AL BEIDAWI, JALLALO'DDIN, SALE, ubi sup. p. 109, 110, 111. <sup>r</sup> AL GHAZALI, AL MOSTATRAF, AL KOR. MOHAMMED. f. ii. AL BEIDAWI, AL ZAMAKHSHAR. JALLALO'DDIN, Poc. not. in carmen Tograi, p. 89, &c. Siphra, fol. 252. 2. Tosephoth ad Gemar. Yoma, fol. 34. & MAIMON. in Halachoth Tanioth, c. v. f. 5. Gemar. Tanith, f. 12. & Yoma, fol. 83. & Es Hayim, Tanith, c. i. RELAND. ubi sup. lib. i. c. xi. p. 109—113. SALE, ubi sup. p. 111—114.

- a WITH regard to the fourth point of practice, or the pilgrimage to Mecca, this is esteemed by the Moslems as so necessary and indispensable a duty, that, in their opinion, he who dies without performing it, cannot possibly be in a state of salvation. Of the time and manner of this pilgrimage, as well as of the temple of Mecca, the chief scene of the Mohammedan worship, we have already given a full and ample account in the life of Mohammed; and therefore an enumeration of the ceremonies used on that occasion must necessarily be deemed superfluous here. However, it may not be improper to observe, that they were almost all of them derived from the pagan Arabs, to whom they were known many ages before the Moslem prophet made his appearance in the world, particularly the compassing of the Caaba, the running between Safâ and Merwâ, and the throwing of the stones in Mina; which were confirmed by Mohammed, tho' with some alterations in such points as seemed the most liable to exception. These rites are still most religiously observed by the Mohammedans. However, it is acknowledged that the greater part of them are of no intrinsic worth, neither affecting the soul, nor agreeing with natural reason, but altogether arbitrary, and commanded merely to try the obedience of mankind, without any farther view; and are therefore to be complied with, not because they are good in themselves, but because God has so appointed. This was Mohammed's declaration, which his followers consider as a decision of infinite and unerring wisdom itself. Notwithstanding which, it must be owned, that the ceremonies prescribed to those who perform the pilgrimage to Mecca, are both silly and ridiculous in themselves, and to be condemned as relics of idolatrous superstition. However, it cannot be denied, considering the nature of mankind, that Mohammed acted like a consummate politician, when he yielded some points of less moment to the Arabs, in order to gain the principal. And for this reason it was, that he found it much easier to abolish idolatry itself, than to eradicate the superstitious bigotry with which the Arabs in general, if we except only the tribes of Tay and Khatbâim, and some of the posterity of Al Hareth Ebn Caab, who used not to go in pilgrimage thereto, were addicted to the temple of Mecca, and the rites performed there. After several fruitless trials, therefore, to wean them from that place of worship, which was held by them in such excessive veneration, especially by the people of Mecca, who had a particular interest to support that veneration, he found himself obliged to compromise the matter, and, rather than to frustrate his whole design, to allow them to perform the pilgrimage thither, and, after the example of their pagan ancestors, to direct their prayers to the Caaba. The Moslems pretend, that God shewed Abraham the spot where the sacred house at first stood, and also the model of the old building, which had been taken up to heaven at the flood. They likewise believe, that the origin of the Caaba, as a place of religious worship, is clearly revealed in the second and twenty-second chapters of the Korân <sup>s</sup>.
- b
- c
- d

- HAVING thus given a brief description of the positive precepts contained in the Korân, we must now beg leave to touch upon some of the principal of those of a negative kind that occur in this celebrated book. The first of these is the prohibition relating to the drinking of wine, under which name all sorts of strong and inebriating liquors are comprehended, which we meet with in several passages of the Korân. Some, however, suppose, that only drinking to excess is there forbidden; and that a moderate use of wine is allowed by the Mohammedan law. But the more received opinion is, that even the smallest quantity of wine, or other strong liquors going under that name, ought not to be drunk by any Moslem. Nay, the more conscientious Mohammedans are so strict in this particular, especially if they have performed the pilgrimage to Mecca, that they hold it unlawful not only to taste wine, but to press grapes for the making of it, to buy or to sell it, or even to maintain themselves with the money arising from the sale of that liquor. Some of the more rigid Moslems assert, that coffee comes under the prohibition that declares the use of wine to be unlawful, as the fumes of it have a certain effect upon the imagination. The generality, however, of the orientals (at least this seems to appear from their constant practice) are of a different opinion. This drink, which was first publicly used at Aden, in Arabia Felix, or Yaman, about the middle of the ninth century of the Hejra, and thence gradually introduced into Mecca, Medina, Egypt, Syria, and other parts of the Levant, has been the occasion of great disputes and disorders, having been sometimes publicly condemned and forbidden, and again declared lawful and allowed. It has been frequently found by experience, in Constantinople and other larger cities of the Ottoman empire, that the use of coffee has proved of pernicious consequence to the state, the persons drinking it having often been engaged in plots, and forming schemes against the government; for which reason it has sometimes been there forbidden, even when the drinking of wine itself has been connived at by the people in power. However, the use of coffee is at present tolerated, and prevails almost intirely throughout the east, as well as that of tobacco; tho' the more religious make a scruple of taking the latter, not only because it inebriates, but also out of respect to a traditional saying, or rather prediction, of their prophet. Opium also and beng, or the leaves of hemp in pills or conserve, are esteemed unlawful by the rigid Mohammedans, because they intoxicate as wine does, tho' not so much as mentioned in the Korân. Several reasons have been assigned for the prohibition of inebriating liquors, so much insisted on by the Mohammedan law; but the following is that given in the Korân, viz. because the ill qualities of these liquors surpass their good ones, the common effects thereof being quarrels and disturbances in company, and neglect, or at least indecencies, in the performance of religious duties. Some of the Moslems abstain from wine only during the month of Ramadân; and others again drink it copiously in that month, tho' so solemnly appointed for a fast by the Korân. Some of the Mohammedan doctors maintain, that their prophet only prohibited the immoderate use of the strongest or most generous wines, and that therefore all his followers may drink these in moderation, and the thinner or weaker wines in what quantities they please, provided they do not injure their health by such indulgence, without running counter to any of the negative precepts of the Korân. Be this, however, as it will, the Persians, as well as the Turks, are very fond of wine, and on this account, as well as for some political reasons, indulge themselves in the use of it. They are likewise so extremely addicted to coffee and tobacco, that the Turks say, a dish of coffee and a pipe of tobacco are a complete entertainment; and the Persians have a proverb, that coffee without tobacco is meat without salt. We are told by Abd'alkâder Mohammed Al Ansâri Al Ghezîri Al Hanbali, a manuscript copy of whose treatise concerning coffee is lodged in the French king's library, that the liquor extracted from that plant was common from times immemorial in Ethiopia. What that author has written about the origin and progress of the drink of coffee was taken, if he may be credited, from Shahaboddin Ebn Abd'aljaasar Al Maleki, another Arab author, who lived near the time that coffee was first used at Mecca, and wrote upon the same subject. From the Arabic MS. of Levinus Warnerus, cited by Spanhemius, and by us already referred to, it sufficiently appears, that the more devout pagan Arabs totally abstained from wine long before the birth of Mohammed.
- e
- f

<sup>s</sup> Poc. not. in spec. hist. Arab. p. 310, & seq. AL GHAZALI, ABU JAAFAR EBN TOFAIL, in vit. Hai Ebn Yokdhân, p. 151. edit. Pocock. AL KOR. MOHAM. f. ii. AL FAIK, de tempor. ignor. Arabum, apud Millium, de Mohammedismo ante Mohammed. p. 322. ISAI. lxiv. 6. AL SHAHRESTANI, AL BEIDAWI, JALLAI'OD-DIN, GREG. ABU'L FAR. hist. dynast. p. 171, RELAND. ubi sup. c. xii. p. 113—122. SALE, ubi sup. p. 114—122.

Of the prohibition of gaming.

GAMING also, as well as the use of all intoxicating liquors, is expressly condemned in the second and fifth chapters of the Korân. The original word Al Meisar, which there occurs, properly denotes a particular game performed with arrows, and much in vogue amongst the pagan Arabs. But by lots there we are plainly to understand all games whatsoever, which are subject to chance or hazard, as dice, cards, &c. For a full account of the game Al Meisar, or the manner of casting lots by arrows, performed by the division of a young camel into ten or twenty-eight parts, our curious readers may consult the authors here referred to. The games prohibited by the Korân are reckoned so ill in themselves, that the testimony of him who plays at them is by the more rigid Mohammedans judged to be of no validity in a court of justice. Chess is almost the only game allowed by the Mohammedan doctors to be lawful (tho' this has not been admitted by some of them) as depending wholly on skill and management, and not at all on chance. But then it is allowed under the following restrictions, viz. that it be no hindrance to the regular performance of their devotions; and that no money or other thing be played for or betted; which last the Turks and Sunnites religiously observe, but the Persians and Moguls do not. Al Beidawi expounds a passage of the Korân, relating to the prohibition of gaming, of idols, and is followed herein by several other commentators; but others, with more probability, of the carved pieces, or men, with which the pagan Arabs played at chess, being little figures of men, elephants, horses, and dromedaries; and this is supposed to have been the only thing which Mohammed disliked in that game; for which reason the Sunnites play with plain pieces of wood, or ivory; but the Persians and Indians, who are not so scrupulous, still make use of the carved ones. The better sort of the Mohammedans easily comply with the prohibition of gaming, as they are in their own disposition little addicted to it; but the common people amongst the Turks are more frequently, and those amongst the Persians sometimes, guilty of it. From a passage in the second chapter of the Korân, some of the Moslem doctors infer, that only too

* AL KOR. MOHAM. s. ii, iv, v, xvi, & alib. AL BEIDAWI, JALLALO'DDIN, AL ZAMAKHSHARI, D'HERBEL. bibl. Orient. p. 696. SMITH, de morib. & institut. Turcar. ep. ii. p. 28, &c. CHARDIN, ubi sup. p. 212, 344, &c. RELAND. ubi sup. p. 78, 79, 80. ABD'ALKADER MOHAM. AL ANSARI, apud D'Herbel. art. Cabacab. V. Le Traité historique de l'origine & du progres du Café, a la fin du voy. de l'Arabie heure. de la Roque. RELAND. ubi sup. p. 80. & in disert. miscell. tom. ii. p. 280. CHARD. ubi sup. tom. ii. p. 14, 66, 68, &c. D'HERBEL. ubi sup. p. 200. PRID. life of Mahom. p. 62, &c. AL KODAI, Poc. not. in spec. hist. Arab. p. 175. FORTALIT. fid. lib. iv. confid. 5. BUSBEQ. epist. iii. p. 255. MAUNDEVILLE'S travels, p. 170. ABD'ALKADER MOHAM. AL ANSARI AL GHEZIRI AL HANBALI, MS. in biblioth. Gallor. reg. M. LEVIN. WARNER. & SPANHEM. introduct. ad histor. Nov. Testament. sec. vii.

frequent

<sup>a</sup> frequent gaming is prohibited in that book; which yet the generality of the Mohammedans will by no means admit. Amongst the commentators on the Korân, Jallalo'ddin and Al Zamakhshari are the chief that maintain the former opinion <sup>a</sup>.

<sup>b</sup> DIVINATION by arrows, a practice in vogue amongst the pagan Arabs before the birth of Mohammed, is likewise condemned in express terms by the Korân. The arrows used by them for this purpose were like those with which they cast lots, being without heads or feathers, and were kept in the temple of some idol, in whose presence they were consulted. Some such arrows as these the image of Ishmael in the Caaba had in its hand, when it was destroyed by Mohammed in the eighth year of the Hejra. Sometimes in divination the ancient Arabs made use of seven arrows, but generally of three only. On one of these, which were all put into a sack, was written, Command me, LORD; on another, Forbid me, LORD; and the third was a blank. If the first was drawn, they looked on it as an approbation of the enterprize in question; if the second, they made a contrary conclusion; but if the third happened to be drawn, they mixed them, and drew over again, till a decisive answer was given by one of the others. These divining arrows were generally consulted before any thing of moment was undertaken; as when a man was about to marry, or to go a journey, or the like. This superstitious practice was used by the Babylonians, as well as the Arabs, as may be inferred from St. Jerom, in conjunction with Scripture. It was practised also by the Greeks, as appears from some good authors. The ancient Germans consulted their gods, and used divination, by a branch of a fruit-tree, cut into several pieces, on which they inscribed certain characters, and threw them all into a white sheet. The Scythians pretended to arrive at the knowledge of future events by means of branches of trees and faggots, as we learn from Herodotus, and the Scholiast on Nicander. The Alans, or Alani, of Scythian extraction, divined by rods in the time of Ammianus Marcellinus. The same sort of divination was also practised by the Medes and Affyrians, according to Dio, and Phœnix Colophonius, in Athenæus. The Persian Magi used divination by stirring up the fire; and the ancient Etruscans predicted future events by the singing, flight, and feeding of birds, as well as by the effects and phænomena that attended lightning. Father Calmet is guilty of a great mistake, when he asserts, that the Arabs, AT THIS DAY, consult divining arrows in the presence of their god Hobal; since both the worship of that false deity and this kind of divination were expelled <sup>c</sup> Arabia by Mohammed, and have never since appeared in that country. As little is he to be depended upon, when he cites M. D'Herbelot under the word Aidad, in support of this opinion; no such name as Aidad, however strange this may appear, occurring in that author <sup>d</sup>.

WITH regard to a distinction of meats, so generally observed by the eastern nations, 'tis no wonder that Mohammed, in imitation of his chief guides the Jews, made some regulations in that matter. The Korân, therefore, prohibits the eating of blood, and swines flesh, and whatever dies of itself, or is slain in the name or honour of any idol, or is strangled, or killed by a blow, or a fall, or by any other beast. In cases of necessity, however, where a man may be in danger of starving, he is allowed by the Mohammedan law to eat any of the said prohibited kinds of food. But notwithstanding the Moslem prophet so closely adhered to the Jewish law in this particular, yet 'tis certain he allowed some things to be eaten which Moses did not, as camels flesh, which the Moslems are permitted to use as food by the Korân. The prohibition relating to the eating of blood, and what dies of itself, was levelled by Mohammed at the pagan Arabs of his time, who, as well as their ancestors, used to eat both. With regard to the former, it was a common custom with some of them to draw blood from a live camel into a gut, which they either boiled or broiled in the fire, and then eat it. This food they called Moswadd, from Aswad, which signifies black; the same nearly resembling our black-puddings, in name as well as composition. Laonicus Chalcocondylas and Euthymius Zigabenus assert, that tho' the Mohammedans abstain from swines flesh, they feed upon that of dogs, wolves, and other unclean animals. But this is a great mistake, <sup>e</sup> <sup>f</sup>

<sup>a</sup> Al Kor. MOHAM. ubi sup. f. ii, v. JALLALO'DDIN, AL BEIDAWI, AL ZAMAKHSHARI, AL SHIRAZI, in orat. AL HARIRI, &c. AL FIRAUZABAD. Poc. not. in spec. hist. Arab. p. 324, &c. HYDE, de ludis Orient. in proleg. ad Shahiludium, & in hist. Shahiludii, p. 135, &c. SOKEIKER AL DIMISHKI, & Autor lib. AL MOSTATRAF, apud Hyde, ubi sup. p. 8. KHONDEMIR, apud eund. ibid. p. 41. HADR. RELAND. ubi sup. p. 78. SALE, ubi sup. p. 124, 125, 126. <sup>w</sup> Al Kor. MOHAM. f. v. EBN AL ATHIR, AL JANNABI, AL BEIDAWI, AL ZAMAKHSHARI, AL MOSTATRAF, Poc. not. in spec. hist. Arab. p. 327, &c. D'HERBEL. bibl. Orient. art. Acadab. POTTER's antiq. of Greece, vol. i. p. 334. EZEK. xxi. 21. & HIERONYM. in loc. Poc. not. in spec. hist. Arab. p. 329, &c. TACIT. de mor. Germanor. HERODOT. lib. iv. c. 67. Schol. in NICAND. AMMIAN. MARCELLIN. lib. xxxi. DIO, PHOENIX COLOPHON. apud Athen. deipnosoph. lib. xii. p. 530, 531. Lugduni, 1657. DEMPST. de Etrur. regal. lib. iii. c. 1. p. 239—251. Florentiæ, 1723. ANTON. FRAN. GOR. in Mus. Etrusc. pass. Florentiæ, 1737. Dissertazione di BINDO SIMONE PERUZZI, gentiluomo Fiorentino, sopra l'aruspicina Toscana, in Saggi di dissertazioni accademiche pubblicamente lette nella nobile accademia Etrusca dell' antichissima città di Cortona, tom. i. p. 43—53. In Roma, MDCCXLII. CALMET, in comment. litteral. sur Ezek. c. xxi. 21. tom. vi. p. 463. A Paris, MDCCXXVI.

as appears not only from Busbequius and Sir John Chardin, but likewise from Abu Shosjaa <sup>a</sup> Ahmed Ebn Al Hasan Al Isfabani, Shahaboddin Abu'l Abbas Ebn Yusefa, and other Moslem authors, whose testimony in this point will be of great weight with the learned <sup>x</sup>.

Of usury.

MOHAMMED also, in farther imitation of the Jews, strictly prohibited usury, in the second and thirtieth chapters of the Korân. The original word, in the latter of those chapters denoting usury, includes in it likewise every species of extortion or illicit gain <sup>y</sup>.

Superstitious customs relating to cattle abolished.

THE pagan Arabs entertained several superstitious notions relating to cattle, and particularly to certain camels or sheep, denominated Babîra, Saïba, Wasîla, and Hâmi, in the Korân. These animals were for some particular reasons left at free liberty, and not made use of as other cattle of the same kind. The Babîra, so called from the sitting of her ear, was a she-camel, or a sheep, that had born young ten times; after which the Arabs used to slit her <sup>b</sup> ear, and turn her loose to feed at full liberty. When she died, her flesh was eaten by the men only, the women not being permitted to taste thereof. Or the Babîra was a she-camel turned loose to feed, whose fifth young one, if it proved a male, was killed and eaten by the women as well as the men; but if a female, had its ear slit, and was dismissed to free pasture, none being suffered to use it on any occasion; tho' the women were allowed to eat the flesh of it, when it died. The female young of the Saïba, used in the same manner as its dam, and even an ewe, which had yeaned five times, was sometimes taken from the Babîra. These are the sentiments of Al Firauzabadi; tho' the author of the book Al Mostatraf, Al Zamakhshari, and Al Beidawi, are of a different opinion. But for a farther account of the Babîra, we must beg leave to refer our curious readers to the learned Dr. Pococke, who <sup>c</sup> has given us an ample and copious description of her <sup>z</sup>.

THE word Saïba signifies a she-camel turned loose to go where she will. This happened, when she had brought forth females ten times together, in satisfaction of a vow, when a man had recovered from sickness, returned safe from a journey, his camel had escaped some signal danger, and on various other occasions. The mark of such a camel's dismissal from all kinds of business was, the loss of one of the vertebræ, or joints of the back bone, that was taken from her. We are told, that the milk of the Saïba was not to be drank by any but her young one, or a guest, till she died; and then her flesh was eaten by men as well as women. The appellation Al Saïba was not confined by the Arabs to a she-camel in any of the aforesaid situations. It was sometimes by them applied to the male, <sup>d</sup> when his young one had begotten another young one; and even to all animals which the Arabs used to turn loose in honour of their idols, allowing the women only to make use of them after that event. Nay, it appears both from Al Firauzabadi and Al Jawhari, that sometimes a servant set at liberty, or manumitted, by his master, went by that name. Some of the Arabs, according to Al Motarrezzi, called the female young one of the Babîra, and others of them the dam of that animal, Al Saïba. It has been already observed, that the Saïba is expressly mentioned in the Korân <sup>a</sup>.

THE word Wasîla was applied by Al Firauzabadi both to a she-camel which had brought forth ten times, and an ewe which had yeaned seven times, and every time twins; and if the seventh time she brought forth a male and female, they said, Wosilat akhâba, i. e. she <sup>e</sup> is joined to, or was brought forth with, her brother. After this, men could only drink the dam's milk, and she was used as Al Saïba. When an ewe brought forth a female, the Arabs took it to themselves; when a male, they consecrated it to their gods; but when a male and female together, they said, She is joined to her brother, and did not sacrifice the male to their gods: in which case, the dam was also denominated Al Wasîla. That name was moreover sometimes appropriated to an ewe which brought forth first a male, and afterwards a female; on whose account, because she followed her brother, the male was not killed. This we learn from Al Zamakhshari, as well as the author last mentioned. Al Jawhari relates, that the ewe called Al Wasîla brought forth twins seven times together, and the eighth time a male, which the Arabs sacrificed to their gods; but if the eighth time <sup>f</sup> she brought both forth a male and a female, they spared the former for the sake of the latter, and permitted not the dam's milk to be drank by women. Another writer informs us, that Al Wasîla was an ewe, which having yeaned seven times, if that which was brought forth the seventh time was a male, the Arabs sacrificed it; but if a female, it was suffered to go loose, and was made use of by women only; and if the seventh time she brought forth

<sup>x</sup> Al Kor. MOHAM. f. ii, iii, v, vi, xvi. AL BEIDAWI, LEVIT. xi. 4. JALLALO'DDIN, NOTHR AL DORR, AL FIRAUZABAD. AL ZAMAKHSHAR. Poc. not. in spec. hist. Arab. p. 320, 321. EUTHYM. ZIGABEN. p. 33. LAONIC. CHALCOCONDYL. de reb. Turcic. lib. iii. p. 65. BUSBEQ. in legat. Turcic. ep. cxi. p. 178. CHARD. ubi sup. tom. vii. p. 229. ABU SHOSJAA AHMED EBN AL HASAN AL ISFAHANI & SHAHABODDIN ABU'L ABBAS AHMED EBN YUSAFI, in lib. MSS. Vide etiam HADR. RELAND. ubi sup. p. 225—229. <sup>y</sup> Al Kor. MOHAM. f. ii, xxx.

<sup>z</sup> Al Kor. MOHAM. JALLALO'DDIN, MOHAM. AL FIRAUZABAD. AL ZAMAKHSHAR. AL BEIDAWI, Autor lib. AL MOSTATRAF, EBN AL ATHIR, Poc. not. in spec. hist. Arab. p. 330, 331, 332, &c. <sup>a</sup> EBN AL ATHIR, AL FIRAUZABAD. AL ZAMAKHSHAR. AL JAWHARI, AL MOTARREZZI, in lib. MOGEE, Al Kor. MOHAM. sur. v. Poc. ubi sup. p. 332, 333, &c.

- a both a male and a female, they were both held sacred; and men only were allowed to make any use of them, or to drink the milk of the female. Al Motarrezzi describes Al Wasila to have been, in the times of ignorance, an ewe which brought forth ten females at five births, as twins, one after another; and that whatever this ewe brought forth afterwards was allowed to men only. Al Bokhari informs us, that Al Wasila was a she-camel of the first birth, that was sent out to a free pasture in company with another she-camel, and not permitted to associate with any male <sup>b</sup>.

- b HAMI, if any credit be due to two of the former authors, was a male camel used for a stallion; which, after the females had conceived ten times by him, was freed from labour. He was let go loose, and no one suffered to receive any benefit from him. Al Bokhari, as he is cited by Marracci, seems to intimate, that Hami was a male camel set at liberty, after he had propagated his species for a certain time, without specifying how many females he was to impregnate, or how many times it was necessary the same female should have conceived by him <sup>c</sup>.

THE pagan Arabs exempted the camels here mentioned from common services in some particular cases; and this they did in honour of their false divinities. But this part of the worship they paid their fictitious deities is considered by the Korân as nothing more than the invention of foolish men, and condemned in express terms by that book as a practice intirely made up of impious superstitions <sup>d</sup>.

- c THE last negative precept of the Korân we shall take notice of here, is that prohibiting the inhuman custom which prevailed amongst many of the Arabs, and particularly the tribes of Koreish and Kendab, of burying their daughters alive, so soon as they were born, if they apprehended they could not maintain them; or else offering them to their idols, at the instigation of those who had the custody of their temples. The manner of both these unnatural operations is differently related by the Moslem authors, as may be inferred from Al Zamakhshari and other commentators on the Korân. The Koreish, who, before the time of Mohammed, were very much addicted to this barbarous practice, used to bury their daughters alive in mount Abu Dalâma, near Mecca. Sâsua, grandfather to the celebrated poet Al Farazdak, frequently redeemed female children from death, giving for every one two she-camels big with young, and a he-camel; to which Al Farazdak himself alluded, when, d vaunting himself before one of the Khalifs of the family of Ommeyya, he said, I am the grandson of the giver of life to the dead; for which expression being censured, he excused himself by alleging a passage of the fifth chapter of the Korân. 'Tis no wonder, therefore, that the Arabs should receive the news of the birth of a daughter with a sorrowful countenance, and compliment a bride in the following terms, May your labour be easy every time you are delivered, and all your children boys. For several reasons here hinted at, it may easily be conceived, that the death of a daughter was considered by the Arabs, on some occasions, as a great happiness, and even a signal mark of the divine favour. Nor were the Arabs singular in the practice of thus treating infants, and putting them to death; many other nations, and even the Greeks themselves, having been guilty of the same unnatural crime in the earlier ages. e The custom likewise of sacrificing their children to their idols was by no means peculiar to the Arabs; it having prevailed amongst some of the neighbouring nations, as may be clearly evinced both from sacred and profane history. The poorer sort of people amongst the Chinese frequently put their children, the females especially, to death, with impunity, at this very day. The author of this history himself was in company at Leghorn with a Savoyard priest, who had been a missionary at Pe-king above twenty years, and whose sole business was to baptize the children exposed every morning in the streets by the poorer sort of the inhabitants of that city, in the year 1733. Which infants, if any credit be due to the authority of that priest, who seemed not at all addicted to fable and romance, amounted every week to a very considerable number <sup>e</sup> (A).

<sup>b</sup> MOHAM. AL FIRAUZABAD. AL JAWHAR. EBN AL ATHIR. ubi sup. NOTR AL DORR, NODHM AL DORR, AL ZAMAKHSHAR. AL MOTARREZZI, ubi sup. AL BOKHARI, AL MOSTATRAF, Poc. ubi sup. <sup>c</sup> AL FIRAUZABAD. & AL JAWHAR. ubi sup. AL BOKHAR. apud Marracc. in refutat. Alcoran. sur. v. p. 238. ut & ipse MARRACC. ibid. Poc. ubi sup. <sup>d</sup> JALLALO'DDIN, in Al Kor. MOHAM. f. v, vi. Poc. ubi sup. p. 330—334. SALE's preliminary discourse p. 128—131. <sup>e</sup> AL BEIDAWI, AL ZAMAKHSHAR. AL MOSTATRAF, Al Kor. MOHAM. f. vi, xvi, lxxxi. AL MEIDANI, AL JALLALANI, POETA FARAZDAK, apud Pocockium, in not. ad spec. hist. Arab. p. 334, 335. ut et ipse Pocock. ibid. AL FIRAUZABAD. in Kam. AL JAWHAR. NODM AL DORR, EBN AL ATHIR, AL SHAHRESTAN. apud Pocockium, ubi sup. p. 337. EBN KHALECAN, in vit. Al Farazdak. STRAB. lib. xvii. DIOD. SIC. lib. i. c. 80. PLUTARCH. in Lycurg. POTTER's antiq. of Greece, vol. ii. p. 333. PUFFENDORF. de jure nat. et gent. l. vi. c. 7. § 6. LEV. xx. 2, 3, 4. 2 KINGS xxiii. 10. JEREM. xxxii. 35. DU HALDE's descript. of China, &c. vol. i. p. 277, 278. Lond. 1738.

(A) This priest also farther related, that in Pe-king, and, as he believed, in some of the other larger cities of China, there was an officer appointed by authority, whose province it was to destroy every morning the poor infants that were thus exposed in the streets of that metropolis. This officer has been, however, passed over in silence by Du Halde; tho' the Savoyard declared, that his office, and every thing relating to the inhuman custom here mentioned, had been fully described by a Portuguese writer (1).

(1) Du Halde's descript. of China, &c. vol. i. p. 277, 278. Lond. 1738.

WITH regard to the institutions of the Korân in civil affairs, we shall only beg leave to present our readers with a summary view of the principal of them; as the limits we must prescribe ourselves here will not permit us to enter minutely into a detail of particulars. Nor shall we deem any thing more on that head requisite than what will be barely sufficient to enable our readers to understand some passages of the Moslem writers, whose meaning they would not otherwise so easily comprehend, that we shall be obliged sometimes to follow in the sequel of this history.

Of the laws of marriage and divorce.

POLYGAMY the Korân allows, though with certain limitations that have not hitherto by Christians been sufficiently attended to. According to the express words of the Mohammedan law, no man can have more than four women, whether wives or concubines; and if a man apprehend any inconvenience from even that number of ingenuous wives, he is advised to marry one only; or, if he cannot be contented with one, to take up with his she-slaves, though not exceeding the limited number. This most clearly appears from the fourth chapter of the Korân; and therefore we must pay no regard to what has been advanced to the contrary by P. Greg. Tholosanus, Olearius, and other Christian writers. In this particular, Mohammed followed the Jewish doctors, and was absolutely directed by one of their decisions. The Persian monarchs are of the meanest extraction on the mother's side; as are also the Turkish emperors, who have constantly made use of slaves, in order to continue the Ottoman line<sup>f</sup>.

DIVORCE likewise, as well as polygamy, is allowed by the Korân. However, a Moslem may repudiate his wife twice, without being obliged to separate himself from her, if he should happen to repent of what he has done; but if he divorces her a third time, it is not lawful for him to take her again till she has been married and bedded by another man, and divorced by such second husband. Which precaution has had so good an effect, that the Mohammedans are seldom known to proceed to the extremity of divorce, notwithstanding the liberty given them. In these particulars the Mohammedan divorce differs from that allowed by the Mosaic law, which did not permit a man to take again, on any terms, a woman that he had divorced. Notwithstanding which, the Moslem prophet must naturally be supposed to have had Moses in his eye, when he first obliged his followers to an observance of this institution. The women, even after the first and second repudiations, are not suffered to separate themselves from their husbands, unless it be for ill usage, want of proper maintenance, neglect of conjugal duty, impotency, or some other cause of equal import; and even after their third divorce, they must wait till they have had their courses thrice, or, if too young to have them, three months, before they marry another. After the expiration of that term, they may dispose of themselves as they please, if not with child; but in case that should happen, they must stay till they be delivered. The whole term of waiting they are to be maintained at the expence of their husbands, if they be not guilty of any dishonesty. A woman divorced before consummation waits no particular time; nor is the husband obliged to give her more than one half of her dower. If the repudiated woman has a young child, she is to suckle it till it be two years old, and be intirely maintained at her father's expence. A widow is obliged to do the same thing, and to wait four months and ten days before she can marry again. If a woman, in a state of divorce, leaves her husband for any of the aforesaid causes, she loses her dowry; which does not happen, if she be divorced by her husband, unless she has been guilty of disloyalty to his bed, or notorious disobedience. Al Beidâwi supposes, that husbands are commanded by a passage in the fifty-sixth chapter of the Korân to divorce their wives while they are clean; and says, that this passage was revealed on account of Ebn Omar, who divorced his wife when she had her courses upon her; and was therefore obliged to take her again. It appears from the Jewish writers, that Mohammed copied from his old guides the Jews most of the above-mentioned particulars<sup>g</sup>.

THE punishment allotted whoredom in the beginning of Mohammedism was to be immured till death; but afterwards this cruel doom was mitigated, and might be avoided by undergoing the punishment ordained in its stead by the Sonna; according to which, the maidens

<sup>f</sup> Al Kor. Moham. f. iv. NIC. CUSANUS, in cribrat. Alcoran. lib. ii. c. 19. OLEARIUS, in itinerar. P. GREG. THOLOSANUS, in synt. juris, lib. ix. c. 2. §. 22. SEPTEMCASTRENSIS, de morib. Turcar. p. 24. RYCAUT's present state of the Ottoman empire, book iii. chap. 21. MARRACC. in prodr. ad refut. Alcor. par. iv. p. 52, & 71. PRID life of Mahom. p. 86. CHARD. voy. de Perse, tom. i. p. 166. DU RYER, sommaire de la rel. des Turcs. PUFFENDORF. de jure nat. et gent. l. vi. c. 1. §. 18. GAGN. not. ad Abu'lfed. de vit. Moham. p. 150. MAUNDEVILLE's travels, p. 164. SELDEN. ux. Hebr. l. i. c. 9. MAIMON. in Halachoth Ishoth, c. 14. BELLON. in observat. lib. iii. c. 8, 16. HADR. RELAND. ubi sup. p. 243—251. <sup>g</sup> Al Kor. MOHAM. f. ii. DEUT. xxiv. 1, 3, 4. JEREM. iii. 1. SELDEN. ubi sup. lib. i. c. 11. lib. iii. c. 21, & alib. pass. RYCAUT's state of the Ottoman empire, b. ii. c. 21. LEO MODEN. hist. de gli riti Hebr. par. i. c. 6. BUSBEQ. epist. iii. p. 184. SMITH, de morib. et institut. Turcar. ep. ii. p. 52. CHARD. voy. de Perse, tom. i. p. 169. Al Kor. MOHAM. f. iv. xxxiii. lxxv. AL BEIDAWI, in Al Kor. f. lxxv. Mishn. Gemar. Jos. KARO, in Shylhân Aruch, c. l. f. 2. & MAIMONID. pass. SALE, ubi sup. p. 133, 134, 135.

- a are to be scourged with an hundred stripes, and to be banished for a full year; and the married women to be stoned. In order to convict a woman of adultery, the charge must be supported by four male witnesses, according to the commentators on the Korân; and if a man accuse a woman falsely of that crime, or even fornication only, he is to receive eighty stripes, and his testimony is to be held invalid for the future. But then the woman so calumniated must be a free woman, of ripe age, having her understanding perfect, and of the Mohammedan religion. Fornication, in either sex, is to be punished with an hundred stripes; and the she-slaves are to receive but half the punishment of free women, in case of adultery. The reason of which is, because the former are not presumed to have had so good an education as the latter. In case of adultery, therefore, a slave is to have fifty
- b stripes, and to be banished for half a year; but she shall not be stoned, because it is a punishment which cannot be inflicted by halves. If a man accuse his wife of infidelity, upon insufficient evidence, but will swear four times that it is true, and the fifth time imprecate God's vengeance on him if it be false, she is to be looked upon as convicted, unless she will take the same oaths, and make the like imprecation, in testimony of her innocence; which if she do, she is free from punishment. But notwithstanding this, the marriage ought to be declared void by the judge; because it is not fit they should continue together after they have come to such extremities. The Moslems are forbidden, by a particular passage in the twenty-fourth chapter of the Korân, to compel their maid-servants to prostitute themselves; the revelation of which passage was occasioned by Abd'allah Ebn
- c Obba's laying a certain tax on six women-slaves, which he obliged them to earn by the prostitution of their bodies. In most of the last-mentioned particulars Mohammed had the Jews likewise for his guides, and closely adhered to their decisions. The determinations also of the Korân relating to the pollution of women during their courses, the taking of slaves to wife, and the prohibiting of marriage within certain degrees, have no small affinity with the Mosaic institutions. As to the last article, the pagan Arabs, for the most part, abstained from marrying their mothers, daughters, aunts both on the father's side and the mother's, two sisters, and their father's wives; though the Magians were frequently guilty of such incestuous marriages, which were allowed them by their prophet Zerduشت. With regard to Mohammed himself, he pretended to the privilege of marrying as many wives,
- d and taking as many concubines, as he pleased, without being confined to any particular number; which, as he asserted, had been allowed all the prophets before him. He moreover altered the turns of his wives, taking such of them to his bed as he thought fit, without being tied to that order and equality which others are obliged to observe; nor did he permit any man to marry such of his wives as he in his life-time divorced, or left widows at his death: which last particular exactly agrees with what the Jewish doctors have determined concerning the wives of their princes. Some of the commentators on the Korân, however, are of opinion, that the first privilege of the prophet here mentioned was limited by certain restrictions. Abu'l Kasem Hebatallah thinks, that the passage in the thirty-third chapter of the Korân, prohibiting the prophet to make any farther addition to the number
- e of his wives, was abrogated by the two preceding passages of that chapter. The words of that writer, containing in them nothing more than a pitiful evasion, or rather a fruitless attempt to reconcile a contradiction, are produced by Marracci <sup>h</sup>.

THE laws relating to inheritances, contained in the fourth chapter of the Korân, in several respects resemble those of the Jews, though principally designed to abolish a custom of the pagan Arabs, who denied widows and orphans any share in the inheritances of their husbands and fathers, on pretence that those only should inherit them who were able to go to war. But for a particular account of the distribution of the estate and effects of the deceased, we must beg leave to refer our readers to the aforesaid chapter, as well as to Al Beidâwi, Jallalo'ddin, and other commentators on the Korân <sup>i</sup>.

- f It may not be improper however, to observe, that, in general, a male is to have twice as much as a female; though to this rule there are some few exceptions, which are pointed out to us in the fourth chapter of the Korân. The particular proportions, in several cases, sufficiently declare the intention of Mohammed; whose decisions seem to be pretty equitable, preferring a man's children first, and then his nearest relations. In order to render a man's disposition of any part of his estate by will valid, two witnesses at least, and those of his own tribe, and of the Mohammedan religion, if such can be had, are required to attest that disposition. The Moslem doctors do not approve of a person's leaving any part of his substance from his family, except in some legacies for pious uses; and even these are to be but a reasonable part in proportion to the whole. The heirs, on the other hand, in case nothing is bequeathed for charitable uses, on the distribution of the estate, if the value of it will permit, are directed to bestow something on the poor. With regard to the children of the deceased, those of his concubines or slaves are esteemed equally legitimate with those of his legal and ingenuous wives; none being accounted bastards, except such only as are born of common women, and whose fathers are unknown. For a more perfect notion of the matters here only just hinted at, the curious may have recourse to what has been advanced by Jallalo'ddin, Al Zamakhshari, and Yahya, in their expositions of the fourth chapter of the Korân, either in the original Arabic, or as they are cited and explained by Marracci; from whence they will receive, on this head, as well as in many other points, full and ample satisfaction <sup>k</sup>.

<sup>h</sup> Al Kor. MOHAM. f. iv. JALLALO'DDIN, AL BEIDAWI, Al Kor. MOHAM. f. xxiv. SELD. ux. Hebr. lib. iii. c. 12. AL ZAMAKHSHAR. LEV. xx. 10. DEUT. xxii. 22, 23, 24, 13—19. xix. 15. xvii. 6. LEV. xix. 20. NUM. v. 11, &c. xxxv. 30. SELD. ubi sup. LEO MODEN. ubi sup. par. iv. c. 6. LEV. xv. 24. xviii. 19. xx. 18. EXOD. xxi. 8—11. DEUT. xxi. 10—14. ABU'LFED. hist. gen. AL SHAHRESTAN. apud Pocockium, not. in spec. hist. Arab. p. 321, 337, 338. AL BEIDAWI, Al Kor. MOHAM. f. xxxiii, lxvi. AL ZAMAKHSHAR. YAHYA, GAGN. not. ad Abu'lfed. de vit. Mahom. p. 150. Mishn. tit. Sanhedr. c. 2. & Gemar. in eund. tit. Maimon. Halachoth Melachim, c. 2. SELD. ux. Hebr. lib. i. c. 10. ABU'L KASEM HEBATALLAH, apud Marracc. in refutat. Alcoran. sur. xxxiii. p. 561. Vide etiam ipse MARRACC. ibid. <sup>i</sup> Al Kor. MOHAM. f. iv. AL BEIDAWI, JALLALO'DDIN, NODHM AL DORR, NOTHR AL DORR, AL MOSTATRAF, AL SHAHRESTAN. apud Pocockium, not. in hist. spec. Arab. p. 337.

Of private contracts.

THE conscientious performance of contracts is frequently recommended by the Korân. In order to prevent disputes, all contracts are directed to be made before witnesses; and, if not immediately executed, to be reduced into writing in the presence of two men of the Mohammedan religion, or, if they cannot be had, of one man and two women. The same method is also directed to be taken for the security of debts, to be paid at a future day; and where a writer is not to be found, pledges are to be taken. The performance of contracts is the most strongly insisted upon in the beginning of the fifth chapter of the Korân; which, for that reason, or rather because the word contracts occurs in the first verse, is sometimes called the chapter of contracts. We find an uncommon reward annexed to the reading of this chapter by Al Zamakhshari, which has been intirely omitted by all the other commentators <sup>l</sup>.

Of murder and manslaughter.

WILFUL murder, though one of the most enormous crimes that can be committed, is yet allowed to be compounded for, on payment of a fine to the family of the deceased, and freeing a Moslem from captivity, by the Korân. However, the next of kin, or, in the language of the Pentateuch, the revenger of blood, may either accept of such satisfaction, or refuse it, and insist on having the murderer delivered into his hands, to be put to death in such manner as he shall think fit. In this particular, Mohammed has gone against the express letter of the Mosaic law, which declares, that no satisfaction shall be taken for the life of a murderer. Here, therefore, he seems to have had principally in view a restriction of the vindictive temper of the Arabs, who, in their revenge of murder, sometimes committed great excesses. Manslaughter must be redeemed by fine, and the freeing of a captive; which if a man be not able to do, he is to fast two months together, by way of penance. The fine for a man's blood is set in the Sonna at an hundred camels; and is to be distributed amongst the relations of the deceased, according to the laws of inheritances; unless the person slain by a Moslem of a nation or party at enmity, or not in confederacy, with those to whom the slayer belongs: in which case, the redemption of a captive is declared a sufficient penalty. The punishment to be inflicted on a person guilty of manslaughter, where a Moslem is concerned, is settled by a passage in the fourth chapter of the Korân; which, as the commentators pretend, was revealed to decide the case of Ayâsh Ebn Abi Rabia, the brother, by the mother's side, of Abu Jahl, who meeting Hareth Ebn Zeid on the road, and not knowing that he had embraced Mohammedism, slew him. The crimes of a more heinous nature, amongst which murder is reckoned one of the chief, according to Ebn Abbâs, amount to seven hundred. We must beg leave to remark here, that Mr. Sale seems to intimate, that Mohammed, in his laws relating to murder, discovered an intention to restrain the vindictive disposition of the Arabs; and that yet, almost in the same breath, he declares, that Mohammed, in his regulations about manslaughter, in some degree, humoured the revengeful temper of his countrymen. Does not that learned gentleman appear a little inconsistent with himself in those two jarring particulars <sup>m</sup>?

Of theft.

THEFT is ordered to be punished by cutting off the offending part, the hand. But the commentators suppose, that those who murder and rob too are to be crucified; those who rob without committing murder, to have their right hand and left foot cut off; and they who assault persons on the road to be banished. The punishment appointed for common theft is not to be inflicted, according to the Sonna, unless the value of the things stolen a amount to four dinârs, or about fifty shillings. As to injuries done men in their persons; the law of retaliation, which was ordained by the law of Moses, is also approved by the Korân; tho' this law is seldom put in execution, the punishment being generally converted into a mulct or fine, which is paid to the party injured. In crimes of an inferior nature, where a pecuniary compensation will not do; the Mohammedans, according to the practice of the Jews in the like case, have recourse to stripes, or drubbing; the cudgel, which, for its virtue and efficacy in keeping their people in good order, they say came down from heaven, being the instrument wherewith the judge's sentence is generally executed on such occasions<sup>n</sup>.

<sup>k</sup> AL KOR. MOHAM. f. iv, v. CHARDIN, voy. de Perse, tom. ii. p. 293. AL BEIDAWI, JALLALO'DDIN. AL ZAMAKHSHAR. YAHYA. Vide etiam LUDOVIC. MARRACC. refut. Alcoran. in sur. iv, &c. <sup>l</sup> AL KOR. MOHAM. f. ii, v. xvii. CHARD. voy. de Perse, tom. ii. p. 294. AL ZAMAKHSHAR. apud Marracc. in refutat. Alcoran. in sur. v. p. 194. ut & ipse MARRACC. ibid. <sup>m</sup> AL KOR. MOHAM. f. iv, ii, xvii. AL BEIDAWI, AL ZAMAKHSHAR. NUM. xxxv. 19, 31. AL BOKHAR. JALLALO'DDIN, EBN ABBAS, apud Marracc, ubi sup. p. 157. ut & ipse MARRACC. ibid. SALE's prelim. disc. p. 159, 140.

b THE Mohammedans; in general, regard the Korân as the fundamental part of their civil law; and the decisions of the Sonna amongst the Turks, and of the Imâms amongst those of the Persian sect, with the explications of their several doctors, are usually followed in judicial determinations. Notwithstanding which, the secular tribunals do not think themselves obliged to observe the same in all cases, but frequently give judgment against those decisions; which are not always consonant to equity and reason. Hence arises a distinction between the written civil law of the Mohammedans, as administered in the ecclesiastical courts, and the law of nature, or common law, which takes place in the secular courts, and has the executive power on its side. Under the head of civil laws may be comprehended the injunction of warring against infidels, which is repeated in several passages of the Korân, and declared to be of high merit in the fight of God; those who are slain fighting in defence of the faith being esteemed as martyrs, and promised immediate admission into paradise. And on the other hand, desertion, or refusing to serve in these holy wars, or to contribute towards the carrying them on, if a man has ability; is accounted a most heinous crime; being frequently declaimed against in the Korân. The effects of which doctrines were clearly perceived at the battles of Bedr and Mûta; and in the erection of the Moslem empire under Mohammed and his successors, which was in a great measure owing to them. Nor have they, in conjunction with the doctrine of absolute predestination, had less influence in the formation and extension of the Ottoman empire, which at this day comprehends so considerable a part of the habitable world. It appears from Al Beidâwi, that Mohammed did not renounce all league with those who would not receive him as the apostle of God, or submit to become tributary to him, till after he was arrived at a great degree of power. The pretext he then made use of; was the treachery he had met with amongst the Jewish and idolatrous Arabs; scarce any; as he pretended, keeping faith with him, except the Banu Damra, Banu Kenâna, and a few others. From whence it most evidently appears, that his great passiveness and moderation, in the beginning of his mission, was intirely owing to his want of power, and the great superiority of his opposers; which is, indeed, acknowledged by his admirer Mr. Sale himself<sup>o</sup>.

c IN the infancy of Mohammedism, all the enemies of that religion taken in battle were doomed to death without mercy; but this was judged too severe to be put in practice when it was sufficiently established. The Mohammedans afterwards, at their declaration of war against any people of a different faith, gave them their choice of three offers, viz. either to embrace Mohammedism; or to submit, and pay tribute; or else to decide the quarrel by the sword. In the first case; they became not only secure in their persons, families, and fortunes, but intitled to all the privileges of other Moslems; in the second, they were allowed to profess their own religion, provided it was not gross idolatry, or against the moral law; and in the last, if the Moslems prevailed, their women and children, being made captives, became absolute slaves; the men at the same time taken in the battle being either slain, unless they turned Mohammedans, or otherwise disposed of at the pleasure of the prince. The severity first mentioned seems to be enjoined in the beginning of the forty-seventh chapter of the Korân. But the Hanifites judge this law, or injunction, to be abrogated, or to relate particularly to the war of Bedr; for the severity there commanded, which was necessary in the beginning of Mohammedism, they think too rigorous to be put in practice in its flourishing state. But the Persians, and some others, hold the command to be still in full force: for, according to them, all the men of full age, who are taken in battle, are to be slain, if they refuse to embrace the Mohammedan faith; and those who fall into the hands of the Moslems after the battle are not to be slain, but may either be set at liberty gratis, or on payment of a certain ransom; or be exchanged for Mohammedan prisoners, or condemned to slavery, at the pleasure of the Imâm<sup>p</sup>.

<sup>n</sup> Al Kor. MOHAM. f. v. AL BEIDAWI, JALLALO'DDIN, EXOD. xxi, &c. LEV. xxiv. 20. DEUT. xix. 21. GROTIUS de jure belli & pacis, lib. i. c. 2. sect. 8. CHARD. ubi sup. tom. ii. p. 299. A. GELL. noct. Attic. l. xx. c. 1. FESTUS in voce Talio. DEUT. xxv. 2, 3. GRELOT, voy. de Constant. p. 220. CHARD. ubi sup. p. 302.

<sup>o</sup> CHARD. ubi sup. p. 290, &c. Al Kor. MOHAM. f. ii. iii, iv, viii, ix, xxii, xlvii, lxi, &c. HADR. RELAND. de jur. militar. Mohammedan. p. 5, &c. AL BEIDAWI. Vide etiam SALE, ubi sup. p. 48, 49, 141, 142.

<sup>p</sup> Al Kor. MOHAM. f. xlvii, iv, v, ix, &c. AL BEIDAWI, JALLALO'DDIN, RELAND. ubi sup. p. 32.

It has been observed by some persons of profound erudition, that there is no small affinity between the military laws of the Mohammedans and those of the Jews. The opposers of Mohammedism were at first put to the sword by the express command of the Moslem prophet; and the same sentence of excision was pronounced not only against the seven nations of Canaan, but likewise against the Amalekites and Midianites, who endeavoured to cut the Israelites off in their passage thither. With the three offers above-mentioned correspond the laws of war given to the Israelites, at their entrance into the land of Canaan, which relate to the nations not devoted to destruction; Joshua being said to have sent to the inhabitants of that country, before he entered it, three schedules, in one of which was written, Let him fly, who will; in the second, Let him surrender, who will; and in the third, Let him fight, who will. Some affinity is likewise discernible between the first regulation made by Mohammed, in relation to the distribution of the spoil, and David's determination with regard to the spoils recovered from the Amalekites. The dispute amongst Mohammed's men about sharing the booty at Bedr arose on the same occasion as did that of David's soldiers at the time of the aforesaid determination. Those who had been in the action insisted, that they who tarried by the stuff should have no part of the spoil; and the same decision was given in both cases, which became a sort of law for the future, to wit, that they should part alike. The parallel might be carried farther still in several other particulars, would the limits we are here obliged to prescribe ourselves permit <sup>a</sup>.

As we have already given a pretty full account of the law, or injunction, relating to the division of the spoil taken from an enemy, contained in the eighth chapter of the Korân, there will be no manner of occasion for us to be prolix on that head here. It will be sufficient, therefore, at present to observe, that, according to the law now before us, a fifth part of the spoils is appropriated to the particular uses therein mentioned, and the other four fifths are to be equally divided amongst those who were present at the action; but in what manner, or to whom, the first fifth is to be distributed, the Mohammedan doctors differ. The principal of these were Al Shâfeî, Malec Ebn Ans, Abu'l Aliya, and Abu Hanîfa, whose opinions have been produced at large by the learned Mr. Reland and Mr. Sale; to whom we must beg leave to refer our curious and inquisitive readers for their farther information in this matter <sup>c</sup>.

The old Arabs observed four months in the year as sacred.

It has been already observed, that four months in the year were esteemed as sacred by all the pagan Arabs, except the tribes of Tay and Khatbâam, and some of the descendents of Al Hareth Ebn Caab, during which they ceased from incursions and other hostilities. This institution, which prevailed for many ages, was so religiously observed, that there are not above four, or as some say six, instances of its having been transgressed; the wars which were carried on without regard thereto being therefore termed impious. The principal of these seems to have been that between the tribes of Koreish and Kais Ailân, where Mohammed himself served under his uncles, being then fourteen, or as others say, twenty years old. The first day of this war, or rather that on which the commencement of the quarrel occasioning it happened, is termed by the Arabs the day Al Fajar, or the wicked day, because then a custom that had been long held sacred amongst the Arabs was wickedly and impiously violated. This served the Arabs, who computed their time from it, for an æra, till the time of the Hejra, and was by them stiled the æra of the impious, or illicit, war. The months held sacred amongst the ancient Arabs were Al Moharram, Rajeb, Dhu'lkaada, and Dhu'l-hajja; the first, the seventh, the eleventh, and the twelfth, in the year. Dhu'l-hajja was the month wherein the pagan Arabs performed the pilgrimage to Mecca, the great feast, or, as the Arabs sometimes call it, the feast of oblation, having been celebrated at the Caaba on the tenth day of that month. This pilgrimage, and the rites attending it, the Arabs denominated Alhajja, i. e. the feast, or solemn festivity; so that Dhu'l-hajja properly denotes the month of such feast, or festivity. That every one might safely, and without interruption, pass and repass to and from the festival, the preceding month Dhu'lkaada, and the following one Al Moharram, were likewise kept inviolable. As for Rajeb, this is said to have been more strictly observed than any of the other three; probably because in that month the pagan Arabs used to fast; Ramadân, which was afterwards set apart by Mohammed for that purpose, being, in the times of ignorance, dedicated to drinking in excess. The observance of these months seeming so reasonable to the Moslem prophet, as to merit his approbation, the same is confirmed and enforced by several passages in the Korân. As for the transferring the observance of a sacred to that of a profane month, termed by the Arabs Al Nasî, and first introduced by Jonâda Ebn A'wîf, of the tribe of Kenâna, we shall take the liberty <sup>d</sup> <sup>e</sup> <sup>f</sup>.

<sup>a</sup> Al Kor. MOHAM. ubi sup. & alib. DEUT. xx. 16—18. xxv. 17—19. NUMB. xxxi. 17. DEUT. xx. 10—15. Talmud Hierosol. apud MAIMONID. Halach. Melachim. c. 6. f. 5. R. BECHAI, ex lib. Siph. SELB de jure nat. et gent. sec. Hebr. l. vi. c. 13, 14. SCHICKARD. jus regium Hebr. c. 5. theor. 16. JOSH. xi. 20. Al Kor. MOHAM. f. viii. AL BEIDAWI, JALLALO'DDIN, 1 SAM. xxx. 21—25. RELAND. ubi sup. pass. Vide etiam SALE, ubi. sup. p. 143—147. <sup>c</sup> Al Kor. MOHAM. f. viii. AL BEIDAWI, RELAND. & SALE, ubi sup.

a to omit it here; as our readers will find a full and ample description of it already given in another place. However, it may not be improper to remark, that the Nasî is stiled by the Korân AN ADDITIONAL INFIDELITY; and that, according to Abu'lfeda, the ordinances relating to the sacred months, contained in the second and ninth chapters of that book, were promulgated by Mohammed himself at the pilgrimage of valediction <sup>s</sup>.

SEVERAL reasons are assigned why Friday, or the sixth day of the week, was more peculiarly set apart by Mohammed for the public worship of Almighty God. Some imagine this was done, because the prophet on that day arrived at Medina, and made his public entry there. Others say, that Friday was preferred to any other day of the week for the aforefaid purpose, because on that day God finished the creation. But the true reason seems to have been, because Caab Ebn Lowa, one of Mohammed's ancestors, gave the day its present name, Yawm al joma, i. e. the day of the assembly, or congregation; since, on that day, the people used to be assembled before him. Be that as it will, Friday goes under that denomination in the Korân; tho' its ancient name was Arûba. Some of the Mohammedan writers call it the prince of days, and the most excellent day on which the sun rises; pretending also, that it will be the day whereon the last judgment will be solemnized. The Moslems do not hold themselves obliged to observe the day of their public assembly with the same strictness as the Christians and Jews do their respective sabbaths; or particularly to abstain from work, after they have performed their devotions; there being a permission, as is generally supposed, in the Korân, allowing them to return to their diversions, or employments. Some, however, from a tradition of their prophet, are of opinion, that works of charity, and religious exercises, which may draw down the blessing of God, are recommended in that passage. We must not omit informing our readers, that the names of the days of the week amongst the pagan Arabs, as appears from the verses of a very ancient poet, cited by Goliûs, were Eurvel, Babûn, Gebâr, Debâr, Mûmis, Arûba, and Shijâr. From whence we may conclude, that the Arabs, as well as the Hebrews, at first computed their time by hebdomadal periods, in memory of the creation of our system. Friday then is the Mohammedan weekly feast, and enough has been said of it here. As for the principal annual feasts of the Moslems, called by the Turks the two Beirâms, or holidays, we shall only remark of them, that the first is stiled, in Arabic, Id al fetr, i. e. the feast of breaking the fast, beginning the first of Shawâl, and immediately succeeding the fast of Ramadân; and the other, Id al korbân, or Id al adbhâ; i. e. the feast of the sacrifice, beginning on the tenth of Dhu'l-hajja, when the victims are slain at the pilgrimage of Mecca. Our readers will meet with a particular description of them in the authors here referred to. In the mean time, after so long, though absolutely necessary, an interruption, we must beg leave to proceed to a narration of facts, and resume, without any farther delay, the thread of our history <sup>s</sup>.

<sup>s</sup> AL KAZWINI, apud Goliûm in not. ad Alfragan. p. 4, 5, 6, 9, &c. ut & ipse GOL. ibid. AL SHAHRESTANI, apud Pocock. in not. ad spec. hist. Arab. p. 122, 311, &c. AL JAWHAR. AL MOGHOLTAI, ISM. ABU'LFED. vit. Mohammed. p. 11. AL KODAI & AL FIRAUZABAD. apud Pocockium, ubi sup. p. 174. AHMED EBN YUSEF, apud Pocockium, ubi sup. ut & ipse POCOCK. ibid. GOL. lex Arab. col. 601. RELAND. ubi sup. p. 5. AL MAKRIÏ, apud Pocock. ubi sup. Autor NESHK AL AZHAR, ibid. SHARIF AL EDRISI, apud Pocockium, ubi sup. p. 127. AL KOR. MOHAM. f. ii, iv, v, ix, &c. ABU'LFED. ubi sup. p. 132. AL BEIDAWI. SALE, ubi sup. p. 147, 148, 149. AL KOR. MOHAM. f. lxxv. AL BEIDAWI, JALLALO'DDIN, GOLII notæ ad Alfragan. p. 15, 16. EBN AL ATHIR & AL GHAZALI, apud Pocockium, in not. ad spec. hist. Arab. p. 317. & ipse POCOCK. ibid. ABU SHOSJAIN AHMED EBN AL HASAN, AL KESSAI, Poet. Antiquiss. apud Goliûm, ubi sup. RELAND. de relig. Moham. p. 97, 109. GOL. in lex. Arab. D'HERBEL. bibl. Orient. art. Beirâm, HYDE, in not. ad Albertum, Bobovium de peregrinat. Maccan, p. 16. CHARD. voy. de Perse, tom. ii. p. 450. Vide etiam SALE, ubi sup. p. 150, 151.

S E C T. II.

f ABU BECR, at his death, was about sixty-three years of age, and died of a consumption, according to Al Makîn, notwithstanding what has been advanced to the contrary by other writers. He was a tall lean man, with a thin beard, and of a swarthy complexion. His hair and beard were tinged with a sort of paint, extracted from Al Henna, or the cyprus tree, and a plant called by the Arabs Al Catam, which gave them a very beautiful red colour. This practice was likewise observed by Mohammed himself, as it is by many of his followers, and particularly the Scenite Arabs, in the eastern countries, at this day. Abu Becr was very abstemious, as well as regular in the performance of his devotions, and set little value on those things which are always the most esteemed by worldly-minded men. He had money in such contempt, that he left behind him in the treasury not above three dirbems; and those he begged Aysha, one of the prophet's widows, to restore to the Moslems after his decease. Nor were all his effects valued at more than five of those pieces of money. Which when Omar was told, he is reported to have said, "May God have mercy on the soul of Abu Becr; but he has left his successor a difficult pattern to follow."

Among other sayings of Abu Becr, the two following very remarkable ones have been handed down to us by an Arabic author: "Good actions are a guard against the blows of adversity;" and "Death is the easiest of all things after it, and the hardest of all things before it." He reigned two years, three months, and nine days, if we will believe Al Makin; tho' the duration of his Khalifât is drawn out to two years and four months, within eight days, by Abu'l-Faraj <sup>a</sup>.

Several remarkable events happened in the last year of Abu Becr.

WE are told by Al Makin, that Amru Ebn Al As, in the thirteenth year of the Hejra, or the last of Abu Becr, laid siege to Gaza, with a body of the Moslem forces, and pursued the garison, whom he defeated in a pitched battle, as far as the gates of Cæsarea and Jerusalem; but that he could not make himself master of either of those places. The same author likewise informs us, that Palestine was afflicted this year with a terrible earthquake, whose shocks continued, tho' with great intermission, for thirty days together; and that this earthquake was succeeded by a pestilence, which carried off abundance of people. It also appears from Theophanes and Cedrenus, that a comet, in the form of a fiery beam, was seen about the same time; tho' Dionysius Telmarenensis, the Jacobite patriarch, who flourished in the year of CHRIST 775, makes this comet to have preceded the birth of Mohammed. Theophanes pretends, that Sergius, the commandant of Gaza, engaged the Arabs with only 300 men, who, together with their general, who fell in the beginning of the action, were all put to the sword; as also, that Amru obliged the inhabitants of the whole tract extending from Gaza to mount Sinai, and the borders of the desert, to submit to the Khalif. He likewise relates, that the aforesaid comet stretched itself out from south to north, and remained visible for thirty days, sometimes exhibiting the appearance of a flaming sword. Both that historian and Cedrenus affirm, that, after the death of Abu Becr, Bostra, with all the other cities situated between that place and Gabatha, or Gabitha, to which he penetrated, and even Damascus itself, with the whole province of Phœnicia, were reduced by Omar; with whom Eutychius, Al Makin, and Abu'l Faraj, seem to agree. But this must be a mistake, if any credit be due to what has been advanced by Al Wakedi, in his history of the Khalifât of Abu Becr, so often cited here <sup>b</sup>.

He is succeeded by Omar;

THE same day that Abu Becr died, Omar Ebn Al Khattâb Ebn Nofail Ebn Abd'alaziz Ebn Riyab Ebn Ada Ebn Caab, surnamed Abu Hafs, was invested with the regal and pontifical dignity. The title first assigned him was, The Khalif of the Khalif of the Apostle of God; or, in other words, The successor of the successor of Mohammed. But the Arabs considering, that this title, by the addition to be annexed to it at the accession of every future Khalif, would be too long, they, by universal consent, saluted him The Emperor of the Believers. Which illustrious title, at this juncture conferred on Omar, descended afterwards, by a sort of incontestable right, to all the successors of that prince <sup>c</sup>.

who speaks to the people.

OMAR no sooner found his authority recognized by the people, than he made a speech to them out of the pulpit, to the following effect: "That he should not have undertaken such an arduous province, had he not been convinced of their intention to persevere in their duty; and had he not always entertained the most favourable sentiments of them." This, however, was not done till public thanks had been returned to God for his elevation to the Moslem throne, and that without the least opposition or obstruction from any quarter whatsoever <sup>d</sup>.

His troops defeat the Persians in several engagements.

As soon as the new Khalif was settled in the government, he sent Abu Obeid Ebn Masûd, at the head of a detachment of a thousand men, to make an irruption into Irâk; joining to him Al Mothanna Ebn Harethba, Amru Ebn Hazem, and Salit Ebn Kis, in the command of those forces. Abu Obeid having received his orders, advanced to Al Thalabiya, and incamped on the bank of a river at a small distance from that place. Al Thalabiya, according to Abu'lfeda, is a small town, or village, in the deserts of Irâk, on the confines of Syria, surrounded by a wall, and plentifully supplied with water. This river Abu Obeid thought proper to pass, contrary to the advice of Salit and Al Mothanna, who were for continuing in their camp till they had received a reinforcement from the Khalif, in order to attack the Persians, who had taken post on the opposite bank with a numerous army. Abu Obeid having marched his small force over a bridge he had ordered to be made for that purpose, immediately fell upon the Persians, and charged them with such bravery, that he put them to flight, and made a considerable slaughter. But the Persian general soon rallying his troops, returned to the charge with so much vigour, that he forced the Arabs in their turn to retire, <sup>e</sup>

<sup>a</sup> AL MAKIN, hist. Sar. lib. i. c. ii. p. 18. ISM. ABU'LFED. de vit. Moham. c. lxxv. p. 143. JOAN. GAGN. not. ad Abu'lfed. ibid. GREG. ABU'L FAR. hist. dynast. p. 174. NISABUR. MS. Arab. Poc. in bibl. Bodl. Oxon. N° 62. Vide etiam EUTHYM. annal. tom. ii. p. 264, 265. <sup>w</sup> AL MAKIN, ubi sup. p. 19, 20. THEOPHAN. chronograph. p. 279, Parisiis, 1655. GEORG. CEDREN. historiar. compend. p. 425. Parisiis, 1647. DIONYS. TELMARENS. apud Joseph. Simon. Asseman in biblioth. Oriental. Clementino-Vatican. tom. ii. p. 102, ut & ipse ASSEMAN. ibid. Romæ, 1721. AL WAKEDI. & ABU'LFED. in vit. Abu Bec. <sup>x</sup> AL MAKIN, ubi sup. p. 20. ABU'L FAR. ubi sup. p. 175. EUTYCH. ubi sup. p. 266, 267. <sup>y</sup> GREG. ABU'L FAR. ubi sup.

- a and put a good number of them to the sword. Abu Obeid himself was killed in the beginning of the action, which occasioned the defeat of his troops; notwithstanding which, Al Mothanna made an excellent retreat, and repassed the river without any considerable loss. After this, he fortified himself in his camp, where he remained till he was reinforced by a body of troops, sent to his assistance by the Khalif, under the command of Jarir Ebn Abd'allah, who joined him in the camp of Al Thalabiya. After this junction, the Moslem army marched to Dir Hind, where they pitched their tents; and from thence made frequent excursions, ravaging all that part of Irak which lay next to the Euphrates. Arzemi-dokht, queen of the Persians, receiving advice of the depredations committed by the Arabs in her dominions, sent a body of 12,000 chosen horse, under the conduct of Mabran, her general, to drive them out of Irak. This brought on a general action in the neighbourhood of Hira, which, after a sharp and most obstinate dispute, ended in the defeat of the Persians. At first Mabran seemed to have the advantage, and forced the Arabs to give ground; but Al Mothanna soon restored the battle, which lasted with incredible fury from noon till sun-set, neither party shewing the least inclination to retire. But Al Mothanna at last engaging Mabran in single combat, gave him such a blow on his shoulder as laid him dead at his feet; which struck the Persians with such terror, that they immediately took to their heels, and fled to Al Madiyen, a town seated on the Tigris, about a day's journey distance from Baghdad. The Arabs, having sustained great fatigues in the engagement, did not pursue the enemy far; but contented themselves with remaining masters of the field of battle, curing their wounded, and burying their dead. The Persians, exasperated at such a continued series of ill success, which they attributed to a male-administration, immediately deposed their queen, and placed in her room Yazdegerd, the last king of Persia, of the ancient royal line, upon the throne. But this by no means retrieved the glory of the Persian arms. Al Mothanna overthrew Rustam, the Persian general sent against him by Yazdegerd with a powerful army, at Hira, where he was at that time posted; and Abu Musa Al Ashari, another of Omar's commanders, defeated a formidable body of troops, headed by Al Harzaman, a noble Persian, at Abwaz. In these two decisive actions, both the Persian generals were killed, and a great part of both their armies, which were intirely dispersed, put to the sword. We are told by the Persian historians, that the aforesaid princess, whom they call
- d Azurmi Dokht, was assassinated by one of her subjects; as also, that she was succeeded by Ferokhzad, her nephew, who soon made way for Yazdegerd. The first engagement between the Arabs and the Persians, mentioned here, happened on a Saturday, in the month of Ramadan, and the thirteenth year of the Hejra, if Abu'l Faraj may be believed; and the battles of Hira and Buwaibik, which were soon after fought, according to Al Makin, the very same year. But that both those historians, in the point before us, run counter to fact, and introduce into the Arabic history an anachronism that ought to be thence expunged, sufficiently appears from hence, that the æra of Yazdegerd, which commenced at the very beginning of his reign, bears date from the eleventh year of the Hejra, when that prince ascended the Persian throne, and the beginning of the Khalifat of Abu Becr, as has been already observed.
- e Besides, it appears very plainly, even from Abu'l Faraj and Al Makin themselves, from whom we have extracted the preceding relation of Omar's invasion of Irak, that Khaled Ebn Al Walid reduced Hira, and at least the greatest part of Irak, in the 12th year of the Hejra, or rather the beginning of Abu Becr's reign. To which we may add, that, according to the express testimony of Eutychius, Yazdegerd ascended the Persian throne in the first year of Abu Becr, and even not long after Mohammed's death. As therefore both Abu'l Faraj and Al Makin are inconsistent with themselves in this particular, and as their testimony herein runs counter to that of Al Wakedi, and some other writers of the best authority; we must beg leave to dissent from them in the point before us, and intimate to our readers, that the events mentioned here happened in the beginning of Abu Becr's reign. Which if we admit, it will
- f give a sort of sanction to Al Wakedi's authority; and consequently induce us to believe, that Damascus was taken in the thirteenth year of the Hejra, as he affirms, and not the fourteenth, as we find asserted by other writers. The preceding anachronism, therefore, may be expunged by placing the transactions taken notice of here in the first year of Abu Becr, wherein they most certainly happened; tho', out of deference to Abu'l Faraj and Al Makin, whom we shall frequently find ourselves obliged to follow, we have thought fit to insert the foregoing account of them in the beginning of Omar's reign <sup>2</sup>.

THE garrison of Damascus having capitulated, and obtained honourable terms by the interposition of Abu Obeidah, the besieged were left at liberty to retire to what place they thought fit to chuse, by one of the articles of the capitulation. However, Khâled, the Moslem general, gave them to understand, that, as soon as they entered upon the imperial territories, they were to be considered as no longer under his protection; tho' he promised not to pursue them till the expiration of three days after their departure from his camp. He also supplied them with some provisions, to enable them to continue their march, and granted them a few arms to defend themselves with, in case of any unexpected attack. The greatest part of the citizens and the garison, with Thomas and Herbîs, the two chief commanders, at their head, soon after the signing of the capitulation, left the place, and were permitted to carry along with them the best of their valuable effects, viz. their plate, jewels, silk, &c. besides the emperor's wardrobe, that contained above 300 loads of dyed silks and cloth of gold, of almost inestimable value. The emperor Heraclius's daughter likewise, according to Al Wakedi, who was in Damascus when it was obliged to surrender to the Arabs, took the same route with the other Christians, who were thus expelled their native country. Derâr, one of the Moslem commanders, seeing such a number of people escape, reflected upon Abu Obeidab for preventing the effusion of so much infidel blood; for which he was reprimanded by Athi Ebn Ammâr, another of them, of a more merciful disposition, who applauded Abu Obeidab for the lenity he had shewn, for being sparing of Moslem blood, and for giving the true believers rest from their labours: to which he added, that God had made the hearts of the faithful the seat of mercy, and those of the infidels that of cruelty; as also, that Abu Obeidab's conduct was agreeable to the tenets of the Korân, and other inspired writings. This, however, did not satisfy Derâr, who declared, that he should never think it a crime to spill the blood of the associators, or those who asserted that God had a son, and joined a partner with him. We must beg leave to observe, that Thomas and Herbîs punctually paid the sum stipulated between them and Abu Obeidab, for the redemption of their lives and liberties, before their departure; and that they left some few Christians behind them, who paid the usual tribute to the Moslems, for the free exercise of their religion. It must here be remarked, that the Mohammedans stile the Christians ASSOCIATORS, because they profess a belief of the Holy Trinity, and assert that three persons subsist in the divine nature, which doctrine is condemned in express terms by the Korân<sup>a</sup>.

<sup>2</sup> GREG. ABU'L FAR. & AL MAKIN, ubi sup. ISM. ABU'LFED. descript. penins. Arab. edit. Gagn. p. 45. LEBTARIKH, MIRKHOND, L'HERBEL. bibl. Orient. art. Tauran Dokht, &c. GOLII not. ad Alfragan. p. 30, 31. GRAVII epoch. celebrior. KUSHIAN GILÆUS, apud Gol. ubi sup. EUTYCH. patriarch. Alexandrin. annal. tom. ii. p. 256, 257. edit. Pocock. Oxoniæ, 1656. AL WAKED. in vit. Abu Bec. THEOPHAN. & CEDREN. ubi sup. EUTYCH. ubi sup. p. 270—284, &c.

Khâled pillages the Greeks after their departure from Damascus.

AFTER Thomas and Herbîs had left the place, a dispute arose in Damascus between Khâled and Abu Obeidab, about the large quantity of wheat and barley, which the citizens, who had surrendered to the latter, claimed as their property, by virtue of the capitulation. They were supported in their claim by Abu Obeidab; but Khâled insisted upon the corn's being distributed amongst the Moslems; so that it was agreed to write to Abu Becr, the news of whose death was not yet arrived in the camp, to desire him to determine this affair. In the mean time Khâled, at the sollicitation of one Jonas, who had been taken prisoner by a party of the Arabs, and, in order to save his life, had turned Mohammedan, resolved to pursue the Christians who had lately left Damascus, and endeavour to make himself master of all the riches and valuable effects they had carried off with them. Jonas's motive to this undertaking was the recovery of his wife, who, as soon as she was informed of his apostasy, came to a determination to leave both her husband and native place, and to seek for a sanctuary with the people attending Thomas and Herbîs in some other part of the imperial dominions. In order to render successful this expedition, Khâled put himself at the head of a detachment of 4000 horse, which were the flower of his cavalry, clothed, at Jonas's request, in the habit of the Christian Arabs, that they might the more easily pass through the enemy's country, without being discovered, and went in quest of the Christians, four days after they had evacuated the town. After a long and tedious march, wherein his men sustained uncommon fatigues, he advanced into the neighbourhood of Laodicea, or, as the Arabs pronounce it, Ladikiâ, and Jabalab, but durst not enter either of those cities; and at last, having been greatly encouraged by Abd'alrahmân's interpretation of a dream in his favour, he came up with the Damascenes, whom he found reposing themselves in a meadow. Upon this, he divided his detachment into four regiments; assigning the command of the first to Derâr Ebn Al Azwar, that of the second to Rafi Ebn Omeirah, that of the third to Abd'alrahmân, said by Al Wakedi to have been the son of Abu Becr, and that of the fourth he took upon himself. Every one of these regiments, or smaller detachments, he posted at some distance from the others, leaving thereby a vacant space between every two of them; and charged his officers to make their appearance gradually, that by this means they might strike the greater terror into the enemy. Which disposition of their forces was frequently made by the Arabs, both in their pitched battles, and when they invested a town. He ordered the other commanders not to charge the Christians till they saw him actually engaged, and not to suffer any of their men to touch the least particle of plunder till after the end a of the action. Thomas and Herbís likewise on the other side drew up their troops in order of battle, in as proper a manner as the nature of the ground, and the short time allowed them to do this in, would permit. Those two generals, on this occasion, seem to have divided into two bodies the Christian forces; which in number must have been much superior to Kháled's detachment, since the body commanded by Thomas only consisted of 5000 men. Notwithstanding which, Kháled engaged the imperial troops with great resolution; and, after a sharp dispute, defeated the forces under the order of Thomas, and put that general himself to the sword. He no sooner fell than Abd'alrahmán alighted off his horse, cut off his head, and fixed it upon the point of the standard of the cross; saying aloud to the Greeks, "Woe to you, you Grecian dogs, behold your master's head." Which had b such an effect upon them, that scarce any resistance was afterwards made. Herbís, the other Christian commander, was likewise slain; and not a soul of those who had left Damascus, escaped either the carnage or captivity, except a single person who directed Kháled to Herbís, whose blood he thirsted after, and who having for that reason been set at liberty by the Moslem general, after he had refused to renounce the Christian faith, took the rout of Constantinople. The emperor's daughter, according to Al Wakedi, was taken prisoner in the action by Rafi Ebn Omeirah, after a vigorous resistance; she having killed the Arab's horse before he could oblige her to surrender to him. This lady was a most celebrated beauty, dressed in the richest manner, and adorned with a vast variety of jewels, of inestimable value, that she wore about her head. Her husband Thomas being slain, Rafi made a present of her to Jonas, whose wife chose to stab herself rather than cohabit with him after she had fallen into his hands. This so affected that apostate, that he continued a widower the remainder of his days; and the princess was, by his consent, returned to the emperor, her father, without any ransom. The Arabs having thus met with greater success than even the most sanguine of them could expect, returned triumphantly to Damascus, loaded with the immense riches and most valuable spoils they had acquired in this expedition <sup>b</sup>.

<sup>a</sup> AL WAKEDI, ubi sup. AL KOR. MOHAM. c. iv. AL BEIDAWI, JALLAI'ODDIN, YAHYA, AL MAKIN, ubi sup. p. 26, 27. EUTYCH. ubi sup. p. 266—280. AHMED EBN ABDA'L HALIM. SALEM. p. 111. disc. p. 35.

THE accounts of the siege of Damascus, as well as of some other occurrences consequential to that event, handed down to us by the Christian writers, and particularly Eutychius, differ from what has been related on these heads by Al Wakedi in several particulars. We are told by Eutychius, that the emperor Heracius, who resided at Hems when the Arabs
d invested Damascus, assembled a body of Arab troops, drawn from the tribes of Ghassan, Jedam, Calb, Lakbm, and others, who acknowledged the sovereignty of that prince, and sent them under the command of one Mahan to Damascus; at the same time dispatching an order to Mansúr, the commandant of that place, to distribute a sum of money amongst those troops, in order to retain them in his service. But Mansúr, being either unwilling to part with any money, or a traitor to the emperor, refused to supply the Arabs with the sum demanded of him. And being informed, that Mahan, after his departure from Damascus, was incamped at the ford, or river, Wadi Al Ramad, in a place called Al Jawlan, about two days journey from that city, he marched from thence with a great multitude of people e attending him, carrying lamps and torches in their hands, beating their drums, and playing on their military musical instruments, in the night time, towards Mahan's camp; which so terrified the troops under that general's command, who were not apprized before-hand of his approach, that they immediately betook themselves to flight, thinking that a body of the Moslems was behind them, and even upon the point of surrounding them. Many, therefore, of Mahan's men were drowned in the Wadi Al Ramad, which was a very large torrent, or river, and the rest fled to Damascus, Jerusalem, Cæsarea, and other places. Mahan, after this disaster, dreading the emperor's resentment, prevailed upon some monks, seated on mount Sinai, to admit him into their convent, put on the habit of a religious, took the name of Anastásius, and wrote a commentary on the sixth psalm. After which, continues our author, the four principal officers of the Moslem army took post before the town with all their f forces; Kháled pitching his tent near the east gate, Abu Obeidab his near the gate Al Jabiyah, Amru Ebn Al As his at the gate of St. Thomas, and Yezid Ebn Abu Sofián his at the little gate, his troops at the same time extending to the gate Kisan, or Kaisán. The Greeks made continual sallies through the whole course of the siege, but were always repulsed, and sometimes with very considerable loss. After the Moslems had carried on their approaches for near six months, Mansúr, the governor, capitulated, and agreed to put the Moslem troops in possession of the gates; Kháled at the same time engaging to support the inhabitants in the possession of their privileges, and the free exercise of their religion. But notwithstanding this convention, the Moslems enter'd the town sword in hand, and attacked the garison, which had been left at the mercy of the Arabs by Mansúr, upon which a very fierce conflict g ensued at the gate of St. Thomas, and great numbers on both sides were put to the sword.

<sup>b</sup> AL WAKEDI, ubi sup. OCKLEY's hist. of the Sarac. vol. i. p. 131—153. GOLII notæ ad Alfragan. p. 298, 299.

However, at last, Abu Obeidah, Anru Ebn Al As, and Yezid Ebn Abu Sofiân, as well as Khâled, signed the capitulation in that part of the town called Al Ziyânain, and the slaughter immediately ceased. Some few of the soldiers belonging to the garison made their escape to Antioch, at that time the residence of the emperor Heraclius; who, when he received advice of the surrender of Damascus, is reported to have said in Greek, “ Farewell, Syria ;” that is, “ Farewell, Damascus, the capital of Syria.” Heraclius some time after, according the same historian, went to Constantinople; and Mansûr, for the misfortune and calamities he had brought upon the Christian world, by his villainous conduct, was anathematized by all the patriarchs and bishops of the empire <sup>a</sup>.

Khâled informs the Khalif of the success of his arms.

UPON his arrival at Damascus, Khâled divided the spoils and riches he had brought thither with him amongst the troops employed in the late expedition, after having reserved the fifth part of them for the Khalif, to be put into the public treasury, conformably to the injunction contained in the 8th chapter of the Korân. As Jonas, who, before he fell into the hands of the Moslems, was a person of rank, and even of noble extraction, had greatly distinguished himself on the late occasion, Khâled made him a present of a very considerable sum of money, to enable him to purchase another wife, in the room of her he had lost through her unparalleled obstinacy. Jonas took the money, and professed a grateful sense of the favour done him; but at the same time declared, that he persisted in his intention of never cohabiting with any woman in this world, being determined to wait for the enjoyment of the black-eyed girls of paradise in the next. Khâled then dispatched a courier with a letter he had written to Abu Becr, of whose death he had received no advice, to Medina. In that letter he gave the Khalif a long detail of the advantages gained over the infidels by the Moslem arms, including a particular account of the reduction of Damascus, of the recovery of the spoil the inhabitants of that place were permitted to carry away, and of the controversy that had happened between him and Abu Obeidah, relating to the surrender of the town, and the corn claimed by the citizens after that event, which he begged him as soon as possible to decide. Eutychius seems to intimate, though this must be allowed to be inconsistent with what has been advanced by Al Wakedi in the point before us, that the aforesaid courier arrived at Medina within the space of seven days after the capitulation was signed <sup>d</sup>.

Omar confers
the command of the Moslem army in Syria upon
Abu Obeidah.

UPON his arrival there, he was greatly surprized to find Omar advanced to the throne in the room of Abu Becr, of whose death they had received no advice in Syria. The truth of the matter is, Omar, immediately after his elevation to the Khalifat, had sent an express to Abu Obeidah, with an account of what had happened, and an order to him to take upon himself the command of the Moslem forces that acted in Syria, out of regard to his eminent piety, in the room of Khâled, whose cruel disposition had rendered him very disagreeable to the new Khalif; but Abu Obeidah not having the least spark of ambition, and entertaining an high opinion of Khâled's abilities as a general, had kept the intelligence and order he had received a profound secret from the army, and not in the least opposed Khâled's intention of writing to Abu Becr. This being now discovered by Omar, he made an harangue one day from the pulpit to the people, it being usual for the Khalifs to talk of the public affairs, on some occasions, in a familiar manner there; wherein he told them, that he had deprived Khâled of his commission, and conferred the command of his army in Syria upon Abu Obeidah. Upon which, a young man then present expressed great concern at such an indignity's being offered to a general, whose conduct and bravery had procured such singular advantages to the Moslems; observing at the same time, that when Abu Becr was pressed to dismiss Khâled from his employment by some of his courtiers, he made answer, “ That he would not lay aside, nor sheath, that sword, which God had drawn for the assistance and support of the true religion :” which was designed as a reflection upon the opposite conduct of Omar. However, this made not the least impression upon the Khalif, who, the next day, in another speech from the same place, resolutely declared to his subjects, “ That as the supreme management and direction of the Moslem affairs was devolved upon him, by his predecessor's death, and the united suffrages of the believers, he would always take care to reward and prefer his officers according to their merit; and that, in consequence of this resolution, he was determined to put Abu Obeidah the generalissimo over Khâled; the former being of a gentle merciful disposition, always kind to the Moslems; the latter of a fierce untractable temper, greedy of plunder, and one who had committed many enormous depredations. However,” continued he, “ the deposition of so fierce a general as Khâled will be of no advantage to our enemies, as God himself will conduct the enterprizes formed by so good a man as Abu Obeidah, and assist him in all his mild councils.” He then came down from the pulpit, signed Abu Obeidah's commission, and wrote him a letter of good advice; commanding him therein not to be too modest, nor to

<sup>a</sup> EUTYCH. patriarch. Alexandrin. annal. tom. ii. p. 270—283. AL MAKIN, ubi sup. p. 21, 27, 28. GREG. ABU' L FAR. ubi sup. p. 178 GOLII notæ ad Alfragan p. 128—130. <sup>d</sup> AL WAKEDI, ubi sup. EUTYCH. ubi sup. p. 282, 283.

- a expose the Moslems, for the sake of plunder, to unnecessary dangers. By which last words, he apparently glanced at Khâled's pursuit of the Christians, after the reduction of Damascus. He also ordered Abu Obeidab to confirm the citizens in the possession of their wheat and barley, which had been the subject of so much contention, and pronounced the city taken by capitulation, not by storm; however, he declared the gold and silver to be the property of the Moslems after the reduction of the fifth part, in conformity to the injunction contained in the eighth chapter of the Korân. With regard to Khâled's last expedition, after the surrender of Damascus, the Khalîf observed, that it was a rash action; and that had not God been more merciful than he deserved, he might have sustained great loss in it. Omar likewise condemned Khâled for his dismissal of the emperor's daughter without any ransom, as the sum of money
- b he might have lawfully acquired on such an occasion would have been of great service to the Moslems. The persons to whom the care of the letter, conceived in these terms, was committed, were Shaddâd Ebn Aws and Amru Ebn Abi Wakkâs; who, upon their arrival at Damascus, caused it to be read; after which, Abu Obeidab took possession of his new post, and Shaddâd Ebn Aws was proclaimed Omar's Khalîfab, or the Moslem governor, of Damascus, in compliance with the Khalîf's order. This happened on the first of October, in the year of our Lord 634, and the thirteenth of the Hejra. Khâled bore his disgrace with great magnanimity; swearing, when the disagreeable news of Abu Obeidab's advancement arrived, that, tho' he had always had the highest regard for Abu Becr, and the utmost aversion to Omar, he would submit to God's will, and obey the commands of the new Khalîf, as those of the lawful successor of
- c Mohammed. Nor did he afterwards fail, in pursuance of this resolution, to distinguish himself, as will soon more fully appear. The Khalîf, about this time, commanded his new general, Abu Obeidab, to have his eye upon Palestine, and to attempt the conquest of that fine country, as soon as a favourable opportunity of invading it offered<sup>e</sup>.

Not long after the reduction of Damascus, the Khalîf ordered Saad Ebn Abu Wakkâs, who The battle of commanded in Irâk, to dislodge the Persians from some districts they possessed in the neigh- Kadefia. bourhood of the Euphrates. Saad having drawn together a body of 12,000 men, advanced to Kadefia, a city bordering upon the deserts of Irâk, where he engaged an army of 30,000 Persians, under the conduct of one Rustem, or Rostam, a Persian general; but with what success we are not told by Al Makîn, who is the principal Arabic historian that gives us

d any account of this war. However, he intimates, that it produced several battles between the Arabs and the Persians; the last of which was decisive, continuing from morning till noon, and ended in the intire defeat of the Persians. The day on which one of these engagements happened was called by the Arabs THE DAY OF SUCCOURS, because in the heat of it, when they were much pressed, a reinforcement of 6000 men very luckily joined them. The day on which the last battle was fought they denominated THE DAY OF CONCUSSION, because the glorious success of that day shook the whole Persian power. The Persian army consisted of one hundred and twenty thousand men, above sixty thousand of whom perished in this decisive action, which was afterwards called by the Arabs the battle of Kadefia. The e Moslem forces did not amount to above 30,000 men, about 7,500 of whom fell on the field of battle. Some of the Persian historians call Yazdegerd's general Ferokhzad; and inform us, that he was that prince's prime minister. They also relate, that he at first contented himself with harassing the Arabs in their march, and declined coming to a general action with them till he had posted himself in a very advantageous manner, in the plains of Kadefia. Some of the Oriental historians make this battle to have been as famous as that of Arbela; and affirm, that it lasted three days and three nights. Be that as it will, the Persians were at length intirely defeated; upon which, their capital city, and the greatest part of their dominions, fell into the hands of the Arabs. Rustem, or Rostam, as the Persian commander in chief is denominated by some of the eastern writers, seems to be a title of honour, or a common name for all the champions of that country. Hormozan, a noble Persian, who had

f possessed himself of Khûzestân, after this complete victory, surrendered that province to the Khalîf; and embraced, at his request, the Mohammedan religion. Yazdegerd, in order to avoid the fury of the Arabs, fled as far as the banks of the Fibun; upon which, Saad pillaged the opulent and superb city of Al Madâyen, and made himself master of all Yazdegerd's treasure there. Notwithstanding what is advanced to the contrary by Al Makîn, the battle of Kadefia, according to the Oriental authors followed by M. D'Herbelot, was fought in the 15th year of the Hejra<sup>f</sup>.

In the mean time, the Moslem forces in Syria made all the proper dispositions for improv- The Arabs me- ing the late advantages they had gained, and even for spreading the terror of their arms ditate further over every district of that region. Khâled, notwithstanding the indignity that had lately been conquests. offered him, was still as desirous of propagating and extending the Mohammedan faith as ever, and distinguished himself as much in the action of Dair Abi'l Kodos, or the monastery of the holy father, of which we shall give our readers here a clear and succinct relation, as on any former occasion. By which it plainly appears, that the Moslems, at this juncture, were actuated by such a spirit of enthusiasm as nothing could subdue; and that even the grossest affronts, which would have cooled the ardour of others, served only the more effectually to animate them, and engage them to behave with the greater bravery, in support of their new religion <sup>a</sup>.

<sup>e</sup> AL WAKED. ubi sup. EUTYCH. patriarch. Alexandrin. annal. tom. ii. p. 282, 283. AL MAKIN, hist. Sarac. lib. i. c. iii. p. 21.

<sup>f</sup> AL MAKIN, ubi sup. GOLII not. ad Alfragan. p. 223. LEBTARIKH, KHONDEMIR, GREG. ABUL FAR. ubi sup. p. 173. D'HERBEL. biblioth. Orient. p. 226.

Abd'allah
Ebn Jaafar advances to Dair Abi'l Kodos.

IN the monastery of Dair Abi'l Kodos, there lived a priest, so eminent for his learning, sanctity, and austerity of life, that the neighbouring Christians of all orders and denominations frequently resorted to him for his blessing and instruction. When any person of distinction married, he took his new spouse with him to the aforesaid monastery, in order to receive this holy father's benediction. The fame of his sanctity drew such numbers of people thither every Easter, that there was a great fair then kept annually at his house, to which were brought vast quantities of the richest silks, sattins, plate, jewels, and other valuable effects. Of this Abu Obeidah being apprized, and that Dair Abi'l Kodos was seated between Tripoli and Harran, about thirty miles from Damascus, he sent a detachment of 200 horse, under the command of Abd'allah Ebn Jaafar, whose mother, after his father's death, was married to the late Khalif, to plunder the Christians assembled there. The Christian, who had brought Abu Obeidah advice of this fair, attended Abd'allah in his march, and undertook to conduct him to Dair Abi'l Kodos without any loss. When the Arabs drew near the place, they were informed, that the prefect, or governor, of Tripoli had lately married his daughter to a person of great distinction, who had carried his lady to the monastery, in order to present her to the holy father above-mentioned, and that she might have an opportunity of receiving the communion at his hands. To which the person bringing the intelligence added, that the Jews, Greeks, Copts, or Coptis, and Armenians, then at Dair Abi'l Kodos, amounted to at least 10,000 men; and that, besides these, the lady had for her escorte a body of 5000 horse. Notwithstanding which, Abd'allah resolved either to carry off all the riches of the Christians, or to die in the attempt. Having therefore divided his troops into five small detachments, he ordered them to charge the enemy in five different places at once; and, by the advice of Omar Ebn Rabiya, to begin the attack the next morning, after the fair was actually begun. We find it intimated by Al Makin, that, this year, the Moslems surrounded with a wall, by the command of Omar, both Cufa and Basra <sup>b</sup>.

And, in conjunction with Khâled defeats the Christians there.

AT the appointed time, after Abd'allah had animated his men, by assuring them, that paradise was under the shadow of swords, and that they should either possess the riches of the Christians, or enjoy the pleasures of paradise, he commanded them to cry out ALLAH ACBAR, GOD is great, and immediately to fall upon the enemy. This they did, notwithstanding their small number, with such unparalleled bravery, that at first they bore down all before them, and put many of those that resisted them to the sword. But the Christians, soon perceiving that they were but a handful of men, returned to the charge, hemmed them in on all sides, and resolved to make them pay dear for their temerity and presumption. This being observed by Abd'allah Ebn Anis, who saw his countrymen engaged with a numerous enemy, appearing, to use an Arab simile, like a white spot in a black camel's skin, he cut his way through the enemy, and instantly posted away to Damascus, with the bad news; where, upon his arrival, he told Abu Obeidah, that his troops were engaged with the Christians, whose regular forces amounted to above 5000 men; and that unless they were immediately succoured, they would all infallibly be cut to pieces. In this distress, the general was obliged to have recourse to Khâled, as the only person that could effectually extricate the Moslems out of the difficulties in which they were involved; who, notwithstanding the indignity that had been lately offered him, very readily agreed to march to the relief of Abd'allah Ebn Jaafar. Having, therefore, put on the coat of mail which he took from the false prophet Moseilama, and the cap that had received Mohammed's benediction, called for that reason the blessed cap, he instantly marched at the head of a strong detachment, consisting intirely of cavalry, to Dair Abi'l Kodos; where he found the Moslem troops fighting like men in despair, and reduced to the last extremity. The sight of Khâled at so critical a conjuncture revived the drooping spirits of Abd'allah, who thereupon attacked the monastery afresh with so much vigour, that he soon made himself master of it. In the mean time, Derâr Ebn Al Azwâr defeated a considerable body of troops, commanded the prefect of Tripoli, whom he killed upon the spot; and Khâled routed another body of the Christian forces, that opposed him, and pursued them as far as a river between Tripoli and the place where the action happened. In fine, the Arabs having absolutely dispersed the enemy, and insulted the poor priest above-mentioned, Khâled telling him, that had he not been forbidden by the Apostle of GOD, he would have put him to a most cruel death, <sup>c</sup> <sup>d</sup> <sup>e</sup> <sup>f</sup> <sup>g</sup>

<sup>a</sup> AL WAKED. & EUTYCH. ubi sup.

<sup>b</sup> AL WAKED. AL MAKIN, ubi sup.

a returned to Damascus, to the great joy of Abu Obeidah, who was expecting them with vast impatience. They carried off with them not only the jewels, rich furniture, and immense wealth, brought to the fair by the Christians and Jews above-mentioned, but likewise the young lady, whose father, the governor of Tripoli, had been killed in the late action; and forty maids that waited upon her. The situation of Dair Abi'l Kodos we find not precisely determined by any of the eastern geographers. However, it may not be improper to observe, that the word Dair, in Arabic, signifies a monastery; and that near 200 places, whose proper names begin with that word, particularly Dair Errahib, the monastery of the religious, the name of a village in Palestine, not a little resembling Dair Abi'l Kodos, the monastery of the holy father, in signification, &c. have been mentioned by the Oriental writers<sup>1</sup>.

AMONGST the valuable merchandize and spoils taken at Dair Abi'l Kodos, there were many rich garments curiously wrought, and one particularly adorned with the effigies of our Blessed Saviour; all of which were sold for ten times their weight in gold to some of the opulent Arabs of Yaman. To Derâr Ebn Al Azwâr, who had killed the prefect of Tripoli, Abu Obeidah gave that officer's horse and saddle; together with the trappings, which, as well as the saddle, were embellished with precious stones; as a reward for his valour. These he made a present of to his sister Kawlah, who divided the jewels amongst the ladies of her acquaintance. The prefect's daughter Abu Obeidah, by the Khalif's order, bestowed on Abd'allah, who kept her till Yezid's reign. The advantage gained by the Moslem was notified to Omar by a courier, which Abu Obeidah dispatched to that prince at Medina, on this occasion. In his letter the Moslem general also informed the Khalif, that his men had learned to drink wine in Syria; which so exasperated the Arab pontiff, that, by the advice of Ali, to whom he communicated the contents of Abu Obeidah's letter, he commanded the latter to punish every person, who had drank that prohibited liquor; with eighty stripes upon the soles of his feet. Upon the arrival of the courier, Abu Obeidah imparted to the officers of his army the substance of the Khalif's letter; and particularly the order relating to the punishment of the foregoing offenders. After which, he exhorted such of his men as were conscious of their guilt in the above-mentioned particular to make a voluntary confession of their crime; and, in order to demonstrate the sincerity of their repentance, cheerfully to submit to the chastisement inflicted upon them by the Khalif. In consequence of which exhortation, many of the Arab soldiers confessed their guilt; and underwent the punishment allotted them, who had never been suspected of the aforesaid crime, and who consequently had none but their own consciences to accuse them. With regard to the future scene of action, the Khalif left this intirely to the discretion of Abu Obeidah, whom he honoured with an absolute and unlimited commission to act as he should think fit; for the good of his service. That general, therefore, having called a council of war, informed his officers, that his design was first to reduce Haleb, or Aleppo, and afterwards Antioch. Having completed his preparations for this expedition, he detached Khâled, to whom he gave the black eagle, the flag before assigned him by Abu Becr, at the head of the vanguard, attended by Rafi Ebn Omeirah, Derâr, and other experienced officers, to ravage the country about Hems and Kinnisrîn; whilst he himself, with the main body, moved towards Baalbec. It may not be improper to inform our readers here, that Hems is the Arabic name of Emessa, or Eniissa, a city of Syria, frequently taken notice of by the ancients; and that Kinnisrîn is one of the principal cities of Syria, about a day's journey from Haleb, or Aleppo, on the road from the latter of those places to Hems. The district in which it is seated is called Jiund Kinnisrîn, or Jiund Kinnisrîn, by the Oriental geographers, and at least in part answers to the Cyrbestica of Cicero, Ptolemy, and Strabo. The town of Kinnisrîn, at a small distance from which runs the river Kowaik, that washes the suburbs of Aleppo, is upon good grounds supposed by some to be the Gindarus of Strabo, which was a fortified town, and at the same, or nearly the same, distance from Beræa that Kinnisrîn is from Aleppo; since it can scarce be doubted but that the last-mentioned city is situated upon the same spot of ground that was occupied by the Beræa of the ancients, Baalbec is a superb and splendid city of Syria, abounding with stately palaces; built for the most part of stone, in an elegant taste, and supported by marble pillars, about three days journey from Damascus. It is situated on a mountain, adorned with great numbers of beautiful trees, refreshed with rivers, wells, &c. and enjoys a vast plenty of all the necessaries, and many of the elegancies, of life. Amongst other remains of antiquity, still preserved here, there is to be seen, according to Al Azizi, a chapel, or temple of the Sun, held in great veneration by the Sabians; which, as they pretend, was erected by their ancestors. Baalbec, from the foregoing description, which we have extracted from the Oriental geographers, seems to be the Heliopolis ad Libanum of Pliny,

<sup>1</sup> AL WAKED. ubi sup. ALBERT. SCHULT. ind. geographic. in vit. Salad. Vide etiam ejusd. vit. Salad. p. 192. Lugdani Batavor. 1732.

Ptolemy, and Strabo; near which, according to the first of those writers, the river Orontes had its source <sup>k</sup>.

He presents himself before Hems;

ABU OBEIDAH having left a garison of 500 horse at Damascus, and made Safwân Ebn Amîr commandant of that town, ordered his forces to begin their march for the place of their destination. The first town of note to which he advanced, was Jushiyah, the governor of which concluded a truce with him for one year, upon condition that if he reduced Baalbec, Hems, and Labwah, within that term, Jushiyah should likewise at the end of it surrender to him; that he should pay him down instantly four thousand pieces of gold; and that he should also make him a present of fifty silk vests. Then the Moslem general resumed his march for Baalbec, which he had not continued long before he was overtaken by a courier, who brought him a letter from the Khalif, the purport of which was to the following effect: "In the name of the most merciful God. From the servant of God, Omar Ebn Al Kbattâb, to his lieutenant greeting. I praise the only God, besides whom there is no other; I pray also for his prophet Mohammed, upon whom be the divine benediction. The divine decree cannot be reversed; so that every one written an INFIDEL in the secret book must necessarily be void of faith. This reflection is occasioned by the conduct of Jabalab Ebn Al Ayham, of the tribe of Ghassân, who, with his relations and the chief men of his tribe, after a kind reception from me, embraced the true religion, performed with me the pilgrimage to Mecca, and went seven times in procession round the Caaba. During the performance of this ceremony, a man of the tribe of Fezârah accidentally trod upon his vest; so that it fell from his shoulders; upon which, tho' the man swore he did not design to affront him, Jabalab boxed him, broke his nose, and beat out four of his fore-teeth. I asked Jabalab, after he had been brought before me, upon the injured person's complaint, what could induce him to use a brother Moslem so cruelly? To which he replied, that the man had trod upon his vest, and uncovered his back; and that, had it not been for the reverence he bore the place, he would have killed him. Upon this I told him, that, as he had confessed his crime, I must execute the law of retaliation upon him, unless the Fezârahite would forgive him. To which he answered, that he was a king, and the other a peasant. To this I replied, that they were both Moslems, and consequently in that respect equal; however, upon his desiring it, and the other's agreeing to it, I suspended his punishment till the next day. But, in the night, Jabalab and his companions made their escape to the Grecian dog; over whom, I hope, God will render thee victorious. Sit down before Hems, invest that town, and send thy spies towards Antioch, for fear of the Christian Arabs. Health, happiness, and the blessing of God be upon thee and all the Moslems." After the perusal of this letter, Abu Obeidah communicated the contents of it to the Moslem forces, and then immediately directed his march, in pursuance of the orders he had received, towards Hems; before which place he presented himself in November, the same year, that is, the fourteenth of the Hejra, or of our Lord 635. To what has been already said of Hems we may add, that it is a very famous, large and walled town, with a strong citadel in the southern part of it, erected upon a hill. It stands on a plain between Damascus and Aleppo, tho' nearer the former of those places, and abounds with most delicious gardens. The air of Hems is very salubrious, and its soil extremely rich. The inhabitants are never infested by any venomous creatures, no species of which will live here. Nay, we are told by an eastern writer, that no poisonous animal will approach any person that wears a garment washed with the water of the Orontes, near which this city is situated, and whose banks are embellished with most beautiful spots covered with trees, shrubs, plants, &c. of various kinds. The Orontes is stiled by the Arabs the refractory and the inverted river, because the neighbouring soil is irrigated by its water, raised, and, as it were, refracted or broken back from the bed of the river by the force of wheels, and because its current is, as it were, inverted, or moves in a direction from south to north, contrary to that of all the other rivers of Asia. The Arabs suppose Hems to have been built by an Amalekite of the same name. Its citizens are famous for their fine complexion. The emperor Heliogabalus is said to have been born at Hems, which we find placed by Abu'lfeda in long. 61°, and lat. 34° 20' <sup>l</sup>.

and grants a truce for a year to the inhabitants;

BEFORE Abu Obeidah's arrival at Hems, the body of troops commanded by Khâled had reached that town; and the very day of their appearance before it the governor died. This

<sup>k</sup> AL WAKED. ubi sup. ISM. ABU'LFED. in geogr. EBN HAWKEL, PTOL, in Syr. STRAB. lib. xvi. CIC. ad Attic. lib. v. ep. 18. PLIN. lib. v. c. 22, 23. FESTUS AVIEN. v. 1084. ZOSIM. lib. i. c. 10, & alib. STEPH. BYZANT. HERODIAN. lib. v. c. 3. FLAVIUS VOPISCUS, in vit. Aurelian. c. 25. AMMIAN. MARCELLIN. lib. xiv. c. 8. edit. Vales. SOZOMEN. lib. i. c. 8. & lib. v. c. 10. YACUT. AL FIRAUAZABAD. in Kam. AL AZIZI, apud Abu'lfed. ubi sup. GOLII notæ ad Alfragan. p. 127, 276, &c. SHARIF AL EDRISI, p. 118. Vide etiam ALBERT. SCHULT. ubi sup.

<sup>l</sup> AL WAKED. ubi sup. MOHAMMED. AL FIRAUAZABAD. EBN HAWK. ISM. ABU'LFED. & AL AZIZI, ubi sup. GOLII not. ad Alfragan. p. 127. SHARIF AL EDRISI, ubi sup. Vide etiam HERODIAN. lib. v. & CLAUD. SALMAS. ad Æl. Lamprid. in Anton. Heliogab.

- a unexpected visit not a little alarmed the inhabitants, as they could not believe that the Arab forces were so near. But when they perceived, that Abu Obeidab had taken post before the town with the main body of the Moslem army, they were struck with inexpressible terror and consternation. They imagined, that he would have made himself master of Baalbec before he had advanced to Hems; and were therefore not in a proper situation to receive him, nor to sustain the fatigues of a siege. This induced them to apply to Abu Obeidab for a truce, which he readily granted them, upon condition that they paid him down immediately 10,000 pieces of gold, and presented him with 200 silk vests. This truce was to commence on the first day of Dbu'lhajja, and to expire on the last day of Shawwâl, in the following year, being the fifteenth of the Hejra. The garrison likewise agreed to surrender to the
- b Khalif's forces, upon the expiration of the truce; in case by that time they could overthrow the Greeks, and reduce Albâdir, Kinnisrîn, and Aleppo. In the mean time, Mesab Ebn Mobârib, with the Arabian cavalry, foraged all over the adjacent territory; and, after he had pillaged the emperor's subjects there, returned to the Moslem camp loaded with spoil, consisting of sheep, oxen, and other valuable effects, besides at least 400 prisoners. Abu Obeidab commiserating the unhappy condition of these poor wretches, not only gave them their liberty, but restored them likewise their cattle, and every thing else of which they had been plundered by Ebn Mobârib. However, as they absolutely refused to profess the Mohammedan religion, he, in conformity to what had been enjoined by Omar, settled a capitation of four dinârs upon every head; imposed an annual tribute upon them, and
- c obliged all the citizens to assist the Moslems in their respective capacities, as opportunity should serve. Both the tribute and the capitation he extended to all the inhabitants of the neighbouring district; and, for the better regulation of this affair, inserted in a book, kept for that purpose, both their names and the places of their habitation. This lenity of Abu Obeidab had the desired effect, and greatly facilitated the conquest of Syria. It also prevented an effusion of the Moslem blood, as it hindered the Greeks from fighting like men animated by despair; and conciliated the affections of all orders and degrees of men in that country to the Arabs. It is intimated by Abu'l Faraj, that, about this time, Tiberias, Cæsarea, and Misan, followed the example of Hems; the inhabitants of those places obtaining a truce for a year, by submitting to a capitation, and the payment of a stipulated sum, exacted of
- d them as a tribute by the Moslems <sup>m</sup>.

- THE imperial governor of Albâdir and Kinnisrîn, whom some of the Arab writers call Luke, <sup>as also to the governor of Kinnisrîn.</sup> and others Matthias, receiving advice of what had happened to Jushiyah and Hems, dispatched Astachar, a priest perfectly well acquainted with the Arabic language, and thoroughly versed both in the Jewish and Christian theology, with a letter to Abu Obeidab; wherein he desired such a truce as had already been granted to the cities above-mentioned by the Moslem general. Astachar being arrived at Hems, was immediately introduced to Abu Obeidab; whom he found with all his officers at prayers, and imparted to him the affair with which he was charged by the governor of Albâdir and Kinnisrîn. To induce him the more readily to listen to which, he assured him, that the emperor would soon have a numerous army on foot at Tyre, which
- e would advance to the relief of Syria; but that notwithstanding this, his master would confine himself and his troops within the walls of Kinnisrîn, and not commit any hostilities against the Moslems, even after the arrival of the imperial forces, provided a truce for one year only could be agreed upon. He likewise probably engaged to surrender, if not succoured, after the expiration of this truce, to the Arabs. Abu Obeidab having complied with the governor's request, Astachar told him, that the Greeks would erect a pillar, on the top of which they intended to place an effigies of the emperor Heraclius sitting upon his throne; and that this, by his permission, should serve as a boundary, limiting their respective territories on that side, beyond which none of his cavalry should be suffered to forage. To which Abu Obeidab likewise gave his consent. Soon after the erection of this column,
- f a party of Arab horse passing by it, one of them accidentally struck out one of the emperor's eyes with the iron fixed in the lower end of his lance; which so incensed the governor of Kinnisrîn, that he sent a messenger to Abu Obeidab to expostulate with him thereupon, and to insist upon a proper satisfaction being given for so daring an affront, which he considered as a manifest violation of the late treaty. Nor could any other expedient be discovered for accommodating the difference arisen between them from this unexpected accident, than that one of Heraclius's subjects should be permitted to treat a statue of the Khalif in the same manner. Which being granted, the good understanding just established was perfectly restored, and the commission of hostilities prevented, when both sides were upon the point of coming to an open rupture. Eutychius relates, that the Arab's name, who put out the emperor's eye, was Abu Handal Ebn Sabel Ebn Amru, and that this was done without any sinister design; as also that the Moslems, who then passed by the pillar, were only exercising themselves in horsemanship, when the accident happened. We must not forget to observe, that Kbâled Ebn Al Walid did his utmost to traverse the negotiation carried on between Abu Obeidah and the governor of Kinnisrîn; but, happily for the latter, without effect. That fierce commander thirsted after Christian blood, and was therefore desirous of taking every one of the imperial fortresses in Syria by storm; which scheme could he have succeeded in, he would have had an opportunity of putting all the Christians therein to the sword <sup>a</sup>.

<sup>m</sup> AL WAKED. ubi sup. EUTYCH. patriarch. Alexandrin. annal. tom. ii. p. 282, 283. GREG. ABU'L FAR. hist. dynast. p. 178.

Abu Obeidah <sup>for some time remains in a state of inaction at Hems;</sup> NOTWITHSTANDING the deplorable situation of the Christians at this time in Syria, dissensions still there reigned amongst them. The governors of Kinnisrîn and Aleppo were at such variance, that they could not be prevailed upon, even by the emperor himself, to concur heartily, with all their forces, in support of the common cause; which had they done, they might probably in some measure have stopped the rapid progress of the Moslem arms. This we learn from an Arab historian of good authority, tho' the quarrel here mentioned has not been taken the least notice of by any of the Christian writers. Had Abu Obeidah, therefore, not religiously observed the engagements he lately entered into, he might, at this juncture, have still farther extended his conquests in Syria. But he considered his hands as tied up by the cessation of arms he had granted to the cities above-mentioned, and therefore continued for some time at Hems in a state of inaction. This was by no means apreeable to the Moslem troops; nor was the Khalif himself better pleased with it, as more clearly appears from the following letter sent by him to Abu Obeidah, which the army looked upon as a reprehension of that general for his last point of conduct, and which induced him heartily to repent of the measures he had taken <sup>c</sup>.

“ IN the name of the most merciful God. From Omar Ebn Al Khattâb, to Abu Obeidah Ebn Al Jerah, his lieutenant in Syria, greeting. I praise God, besides whom there is no other; and I pray for his prophet Mohammed, upon whom be the divine benediction. I command thee to put thy trust in God, and to take care that thou be not one of them concerning whom God says: Say, if your fathers, and your sons, and your brethren, and your wives, and your relations, and your substance which ye have acquired, and your merchandize which ye apprehend may not be sold off, and your dwellings wherein ye delight, be more dear unto you than God, and his apostle, and the advancement of his religion; wait, until God shall send his command: for God directeth not the ungodly people.” Upon the communication of the contents of this letter to the troops, they insisted upon a vigorous prosecution of the war, and demanded to be led forth to fight the battles of the LORD. They also desired Abu Obeidah immediately to resume the military operations, and to lay siege either to Antioch or Aleppo. As the truce, therefore, granted those cities was upon the point of expiring, he made the proper dispositions for leaving Hems. However, before his departure, he appointed Salmah, one of his experienced officers, to remain at that place, and assigned him a body of horse, sufficient to secure him from any insult that might be apprehended on the part of the enemy <sup>d</sup>.

Abu Obeidah <sup>grants a truce to the people of Hamah;</sup> IN pursuance of the plan he had formed, Abu Obeidah took his leave of Hems, and marched first to Arrestân; from whence he advanced to Hamah, or Hamata, known in the sacred writings by the name of Hamath, or Chamath, one of the principal cities of Syria. The inhabitants of this place, afterwards the seat of the famous Abu'lfeda, were taken under the protection of the Moslems, of whom they obtained a truce, upon the same terms as that which had been granted to the citizens of Hems and Kinnisrîn; in the district of the former of which cities Hamah stands. On the northern and eastern sides it is washed by the Orontes, consists of lofty beautiful houses, built in an elegant taste, has a strong citadel, and abounds with water-mills, as well as water-engines, by the assistance of which the gardens are irrigated, and all the houses of the city plentifully supplied with water. Hamah, which, with other districts, was given to Taki'oddin, or Taki'addin, Abu'lfeda's ancestor, by the famous Salûb'addin, or Saladin, is about half a day's journey from Shaizar, and double that distance from Hems. Abu'lfeda was descended in the fifth generation from Taki'addin; whose name, with his title prefixed to it, written at length, is Al Malec Al Modhaffir Taki'addin Omar Ebn Shâbinshâh Ebn Ayûb. From whence it appears, that Abu'lfeda, the prince of Hamah, as well as of the Arab geographers and historians, was of the house of Ayûb, or the illustrious family of the Rubidæ, which, for a certain period, made so considerable a figure in the east. But of the heroes of this house our readers may expect a full and ample account <sup>e</sup>.

<sup>a</sup> AL WAKED. ubi sup. AL MAKIN, ubi sup. p. 22. GOLII not. ad Alfragan. p. 278. EUTYCH. patriarch. Alexandrin. annal. tom. ii. p. 292, 293, 294, 295. <sup>b</sup> AL WAKED, ubi sup. <sup>c</sup> AL KOR. MOHAM. f. ix. v. 24. AL BEIDAWI, AL WAKED, ubi sup.

a hereafter. Abu'lfeda places Hamah, or, as he calls it, Haniata, in long.  $61^{\circ} 15'$ , and lat.  $34^{\circ} 45'$  <sup>a</sup>.

FROM Hamah Ebn Obeidah, at the head of the Moslem forces, moved to Shaizar, which followed the example of Hamah. Shaizar, or Sjaizar, according to Abu'lfeda, is nine miles distant from Hamah, thirty-three from Hems, and thirty-six from Antioch. According to some modern writers of good authority, it answers to the Larissa ad Orontem of the ancients. It abounds with trees, gardens, and fruits of all kinds, especially pomegranates. The northern part of it is washed by the Orontes, which runs through the town, and its castle is extremely strong. As the word Shaizar, or rather Alshaizar, is not very remote from Larissa, perhaps the former of these was the ancient, or even original, name, and converted by the Macedonians into the latter. But this conjecture cannot, it must be owned, be absolutely depended upon; tho' the high antiquity of the Arabic language, and the few alterations it has undergone even from the earliest ages to the present time, must be allowed to give no small countenance to such a notion. Abu'lfeda makes Shaizar to be in long.  $61^{\circ} 10'$ , and lat.  $34^{\circ} 50'$  <sup>r</sup>.

Soon after Abu Obeidah's arrival at Shaizar, he received advice, that the governor of Kinnisrin expected to be joined by a strong reinforcement of Arab troops; under the command of Jabalab Ebn Al Ayham, king of Ghassan, who had some time before made his escape to Constantinople from Mecca. This defection extremely exasperated Omar, who had before apprized his general of it, and commanded him to have a watchful eye upon the motions of that apostate, whom he expected the imperial court would soon send to act against him. This intelligence, therefore, determined the Moslem general to defer the siege of Aleppo, whither he proposed marching with all possible expedition, to a more favourable opportunity, and to advance to Kinnisrin, in order to lay siege to that place. Nor was such a resolution improper at this juncture, as the truce granted the governor of Kinnisrin was within a month of expiring. Besides, the Moslems looked upon that truce as violated; since the governor of Kinnisrin had not only written to the emperor for succours, but likewise intended actually to admit those succours into the town. Abu Obeidah was, therefore, resolved to sit down before the place; tho' he had such regard to his engagements, notwithstanding the governor's manifest infraction of the aforesaid treaty, that he did not design to begin his military operations against the city before the expiration of the truce. In the mean time, he sent Khaled with a small detachment to reconnoitre the enemy, and to intercept some of their parties, in order to get farther intelligence of their motions. Khaled having received his instructions, set out on the enterprize assigned him; and soon fell in with a considerable body of the imperial troops, commanded by the governor of Kinnisrin himself and the prefect of Ammouriyah, who were upon their march to meet Jabalab, in order to conduct him to Kinnisrin. The Christians seeing such a small party of the Arabs, doubted not but they should give a good account of them. The action, therefore, immediately began; and the Moslems were hemmed in on all sides. However, Khaled fought like a man in despair, and killed the governor of Kinnisrin with his own hands. Notwithstanding which, the Christians must, by dint of numbers, as Al Wakedi pretends, have finally prevailed, had not Abu Obeidah sent out a considerable body of men, either to support Khaled or to favour his retreat; which arrived at the critical moment, carried off that commander, and the surviving part of his detachment, when they were upon the very point of being all put to the sword <sup>s</sup>.

ABU OBEIDAH having detached a party of horse to lay the country waste about Kinnisrin, made the necessary dispositions for attacking that place with all his forces. The prisoners brought to the camp by that detachment, after the general's orders had been executed, were sent to the Khalif; who, in obedience to one of Mohammed's injunctions, commanded some of his Moslems to teach the boys amongst them to write. The inhabitants of Kinnisrin were so terrified at Abu Obeidah's approach, having before lost their governor, who was killed in the late action, and being destitute of all manner of relief, that they opened their gates to him, and sued for his protection. This he granted them, upon condition that they should pay the usual capitation of four dinars a head, submit to an annual tribute, and consider themselves thenceforth as the subjects of the Khalif. After the reduction of Kinnisrin, Abu Obeidah called a council of war, wherein it was unanimously agreed, that the main body of the Moslem forces should without loss of time form the siege of Baalbec; and a that Khaled should be sent with a large detachment to invest the city of Hems. In the mean time a Moslem party intercepted one of the enemy's caravans, with 400 loads of silks and sugars, besides a very considerable quantity of other valuable merchandize, on its return to Baalbec. The members of this caravan not bearing arms, they were permitted to ransom themselves, after which, some of them posted away to Baalbec, and informed the citizens of what had happened. This so incensed Herbis, the governor, that he immediately put himself at the head of 6000 horse, and went in quest of the plunderers, attended by a numerous rabble, or undisciplined multitude, who imagining that the Moslem army was still at Hems, and that the caravan had been plundered by only a party of foragers, expected easily to recover every thing that had been lost. But their want of intelligence in b this point had like to have proved fatal to them. For when Herbis expected to have met with only a small detachment, he fell in with the main body of the Moslem forces, then in full march for Baalbec, by which he was most rudely handled. Not being able to make head against so formidable a power, he was easily overthrown, great numbers of his men put to the sword, and he himself with the utmost difficulty, after having received seven wounds, at last escaped into the town <sup>1</sup>.

<sup>a</sup> AL WAKED. ubi sup. ISM. ABU'LFED. in hist. gen. & in geograph. JEREM. xlix. 23. AM. vi. 2. SAM. BOCH. Phal. lib. iv. c. 36. p. 307. LUGD. BATAVOR. 1692. HADR. RELAND. Pal. illustrat. tom. i. p. 119, 120. Traject. Batavor. 1714. CHRISTOPH. CELLAR. geograph. antiq. tom. ii. p. 461, 462. Lipsiæ, 1706. ALBERT. SCHULT. ubi sup. JOAN. GAGN. in præfat. ad Ism. Abu'lfed. de vit. Moham. Oxon. 1723. Vide etiam BOHADIN EBN SJEDDAD, in vit. & reb. gest. Salad. ab Albert. Schult. edit. pass. LUGD. BATAV. 1732. <sup>r</sup> AL WAKED. ubi sup. ISM. ABU'LFED. in geograph. APPIAN. de bel. Syr. p. 201. BOHADIN EBN SJEDDAD, ubi sup. p. 123. & alib. ALBERT. SCHULT. ubi sup. <sup>s</sup> AL WAKED. ubi sup. Poc. not. in fec. hist. Arab. p. 77. SALE's prelim. disc. p. 11.

Who lays siege to Baalbec.

Soon after Abu Obeidab had taken post before Baalbec, Maid Ebn Jabal assured him, that he had reason to believe the city was so full of people that it could scarce contain them; which, he was persuaded, would greatly facilitate the reduction of the place. But, notwithstanding this, as the city had been amply supplied with all sorts of provisions and military c stores, and the governor was a man of distinguished bravery, Abu Obeidab expected to meet with a vigorous resistance from the besieged. The day after he had pitched his tents before the town, he sent a letter to Herbis, offering his protection to him and all the citizens, together with the regular troops in garison there, provided they would accept of the terms on which Kinnisrin had submitted to him; adding, that God had already blessed with many victories the true believers, insomuch that nothing could stand before them. But Herbis was so far from paying any regard to this letter, tho' a considerable part of the garison, as well as the townsmen, were inclined to surrender, that he tore it to pieces, and commanded the messenger who brought it to depart instantly out of the town. This so enraged the Moslem general, that he immediately ordered a general assault to be made; but the besieged played d their engines upon the Arabs with such dexterity and success, that they soon forced them to retire, and to abandon several posts which they had occupied, with very considerable loss. The next day Abu Obeidab intended to renew the assault; and, in order to this, commanded his troops, after the morning-prayers were over, to refresh themselves. But, in the midst of their repast, a party of the garison made a vigorous sally, surprized them with the meat in their mouths, dislodged them from their several posts, and at last retired with a good number of prisoners, and a considerable quantity of plunder, into the town. This brisk action on the part of the besieged so intimidated the Moslems, that the general found himself obliged to raise their spirits, by assuring them, "that the damage they had e "sustained was decreed by God, who was pleased to honour the persons slain by the unbelievers with martyrdom." Then he commanded them to remove their tents to a greater distance from the city; that they might not be so much exposed to the insults of the enemy. He also assigned Said Ebn Zeid the command of a body of 500 horse, and 300 foot, to keep the Greeks in awe at the gate facing the mountains; and ordered Derâr at the same time, with 300 horse and 200 foot, to post himself before the gate of Damascus. We must beg leave to observe here, that Baalbec was seated on a mountain, surrounded by a wall, and rendered more defensible by a citadel of considerable strength. This sufficiently appears from the description given us of it by Abu'lfeda, who places it in long. 60°, and lat. 38° 50' <sup>u</sup>.

The besieged make a vigorous sally, but are repulsed by the Arabs.

BUT notwithstanding all Abu Obeidab's precautions, and the disposition made by him for carrying on the siege with success, the next morning, about break of day, Herbis, with f a strong party of the garison, sallied out at the gate before which the Moslem general himself was posted. He had before endeavoured to animate his men, by putting them in mind that they were going to fight for their religion, wives, children, properties, and, in fine, for every thing that was dear and valuable to them. Flushed, therefore, with their late success, they charged the Arabs with such fury, that they bore down all before them. However, as Abu Obeidab had promised paradise to his men, and assured them, that God would crown the endeavours of those who persevered to the end with success, the Arabs rallied and maintained their ground for some time with unparalleled bravery. But at last Sohail Ebn Sabab, an officer of great distinction, being wounded in the right arm,

<sup>1</sup> AL WAKED. ubi sup. AL MAKIN, ubi sup. p. 22. EUTYCH. patriarch. Alexandrin. annal. ubi sup. p. 292, 293. <sup>u</sup> AL WAKED. ubi sup. AL AZIZI, apud Ism. Abu'lfed. in geograph. ut & ipse ABU'LFED. ibid. Vide etiam ALBERT. SCHULT. ubi sup.

- a and thereby rendered incapable of using his sword, was obliged to dismount, and clamber up a neighbouring hill; which threw the Moslem troops under his command into such a panic, that they began to break, tho' Abu Obeidah did all that could be expected from the most consummate general to persuade them to keep their ranks, repel the efforts of the enemy, and drive them back again into the town. At this juncture Sobail observing from the summit of the hill, on which he had placed himself, that the troops under Abu Obeidah were very much pressed, whilst those commanded by Derâr and Said Ebn Zeid, posted before the gate of Damascus, and that facing the mountains, had no enemy to contend with; he immediately lighted a fire on the top of the mountain; which, with the smoke ascending from it, served as a signal for those generals to advance to the relief of their brethren, who were
- b upon the point of being cut to pieces by the Greeks. Derâr and Said Ebn Zeid understood the meaning of this signal, and instantly hastened to the assistance of Abu Obeidah; who, by so seasonable a reinforcement, was enabled to repulse the enemy in his turn, and even to drive them into a deserted monastery on the top of a neighbouring hill, where they were closely besieged. But Herbis perceiving that the besiegers were reduced to a small number, he resolved to make an effort to force his way into the town; and therefore, when they least expected it, he sallied out of the monastery, and fell upon them with such fury, that he forced them to abandon their posts, and had carried his point, had not a reinforcement of 100 archers, sent from the Moslem camp, come up in the very nick of time to sustain them. These, being commanded by Derâr and Said; enabled the besiegers to rally, re-occupy
- c their former posts, and fairly beat back Herbis into the monastery, out of which he had endeavoured to make his escape. However, Mesab Ebn Adi, who gave notice to Abu Obeidah of the danger the besiegers were in, and had been present in most of the battles fought since the commencement of this war, declared, that he never saw a more vigorous action, and that no troops could behave better than did those of the Greeks on this occasion. Sobail Ebn Sobab, Said Ebn Zeid, and Derâr, though the victory was wholly owing to them, received a gentle reprimand from the general, who ordered them never for the future to desert the posts assigned them by the commander in chief. But this he did purely to keep up the credit of military discipline amongst his troops, and to preserve a due regard to the authority with which the lieutenant of the Khalif was invested; since he afterwards declared himself
- d extremely well satisfied with those officers conduct. The Arabs lost abundance of men in this obstinate dispute, tho' ample amends was made them for this loss by the success with which their bravery was crowned. The action here described, which happened in that year, and was followed by the surrender of Baalbec, was so remarkable; that it seems to have been one of those battles which Al Makin tells us were fought in the fifteenth year of the Hejra <sup>w</sup>.

- THE ardor of the besieged being now pretty well cooled, Abu Obeidah ordered his troops to pitch their tents round the city, and left Said Ebn Zeid to starve Herbis, the go- <sup>They surren-</sup> vernor, whom he now considered as in his power, to a surrender. Herbis soon found him- <sup>der to Abu</sup> self reduced to such extremities, that he was obliged to capitulate; and, in order to <sup>Obeidah.</sup> procure the better terms for himself, he proposed to prevail upon the town to be included
- e in the capitulation. This, tho' not without some difficulty, he at last effected; and, after several conferences with Abu Obeidah, he thought fit to agree to the following articles, which were signed both by him and the Moslem general. 1. The citizens of Baalbec shall pay immediately to the Arabs 2000 ounces of gold, and 4000 ounces of silver. 2. They shall likewise at the same time supply them with 2000 silk vests. 3. They shall deliver up into their hands 1000 swords, besides all the arms carried by Herbis and his men into the deserted monastery where they had been besieged by Said Ebn Zeid. 4. They shall submit to the same capitation and tribute that had been imposed upon the inhabitants of Kinnisrin. 5. They shall renounce all allegiance to the emperor, never write to him for assistance, nor ever either directly or indirectly attempt any thing against the Khalif. 6. They shall never hereafter
- f erect any churches or monasteries within the territory of Baalbec. 7. In consideration of their acquiescence in the preceding articles, the new Arab governor of Baalbec shall not enter the city, but receive the tribute imposed upon the citizens without the walls. These articles, tho' at last agreed to, appeared at first so intolerable to the people of Baalbec, that they could not be prevailed upon to give their consent to them, before Herbis had engaged himself to pay the fourth part of the gold and silver demanded by the Moslems. Nor could this be collected in less than twelve days, tho' Herbis himself had used all the means that could be thought of for that purpose, and even left the men besieged with him in the monastery as hostages in the Moslem camp, till his return out of the town; which demonstrates the straits to which the inhabitants of Baalbec must have been reduced, before they submitted to the capitu-
- g lation. However, they a little recovered themselves by the assistance of the Arabs, who were now become their masters. For, when, in pursuance of his instructions, the commanding officer at Baalbec had plundered the people of the neighbouring districts, who had not obtained a truce from Abu Obeidah, all the spoils acquired by his depredations were brought to Baalbec, and sold for a trifle to the citizens. This induced Herbîs, according to some of the Moslem historians, to think of reimbursing himself the expence he had been at, in order to procure the concurrence of the people on the late occasion; which he imagined would be done, could he persuade his fellow-citizens, for he had then no command over them, to permit him to come in for a share of the gain proceeding from that lucrative commerce with the Arabs, which then began to enrich them. This, by his artful behaviour and insinuating address, he found it no difficult matter to obtain; but not being content with the share assigned him, which was yet very considerable, he made such a voracious and unreasonable proposal to them, that they could no longer bear with his insatiable disposition. A considerable number of them, therefore, unanimously rushed upon him, and killed him in an instant. After which, they desired Rafi Ebn Abd'allah, who had been left by Abu Obeidah with a body of 900 men, to superintend the Moslem affairs at Baalbec, to take possession of the town; which he absolutely refused to do, till he had written to the general, who was on his march for Hems, as this was directly contrary to one of the articles of the capitulation. It has been already observed, that Baalbec seems to stand on the same spot of ground that was formerly occupied by the Heliopolis ad Libanum of the ancients. To which we shall here beg leave to add, that as the great god Baal of the Syrians answered to the Helios of the Greeks, or the Sun, and the word becca, in Arabic, denotes a place of great concourse, and consequently seems to imply, that the city was called Baalbec, from the vast numbers of people who repaired thither to worship the Sun; the words Heliopolis and Baalbec appear manifestly to be of the same import in different languages; and of course, if we attend to what has been before remarked of the situation, to point out the very same town. Be that, however, as it will, by the death of Herbîs, the Moslems became absolute masters of Baalbec, and obtained the immediate possession of it, however contrary this might seem to one of the articles of the capitulation that Abu Obeidah himself had signed. For, Rafi Ebn Abd'allah having been ordered by the general, to whom on this occasion he wrote, to comply with the people's request; he, with the body of troops under his command, as soon as the express with an answer to his letter arrived, in the fifteenth year of the Hejra, entered the town<sup>a</sup>.

<sup>w</sup> AL WAKED. ubi sup. AL MAKIN, ubi sup.

Abu Obeidah, by a stratagem, deprives the people of Hems of their provisions.

As soon as the foregoing capitulation was signed by Abu Obeidah and Herbîs in the Moslem camp before Baalbec, the former marched with his army to reduce the city of Hems. The truce granted to the inhabitants of that place, by virtue of which they were intitled to the protection of the Arabs, was now expired; so that Abu Obeidah was at full liberty to lay siege to the town, if the citizens did not prevent such a violent measure by their timely submission to the Khalif. The party of horse left under the command of Salmah at Hems, after the departure of Abu Obeidah from thence to Kinnisrîn, had been recalled, in order to rejoin the Moslem forces carrying on the siege of Baalbec; so that for some time no obstruction had been given the people of Hems in the dispositions they had, or might have, made for a vigorous defence. The Moslem general, before hostilities commenced, wrote a letter to the imperial governor, wherein he magnified his own strength, and invited him to embrace the Mohammedan religion; or, in case he should not think fit to accept of this invitation, to come to the Moslem camp, and settle with him the tribute and capitation to be exacted of the people over whom he presided. But if neither of the foregoing offers should please him, he insisted upon his meeting him in the open field, and leaving the quarrel between them to the decision of the sword. The governor, expecting speedy succours from the emperor, was so far from paying any regard to Abu Obeidah's letter, or even returning him an answer to it, that, immediately after he had received it, he made a sally upon the Arabs. The dispute between the contending parties, who seemed to be greatly exasperated against each other, on this occasion, was extremely obstinate and bloody; though at last the Arabs fairly beat the Greeks back into the town. However, the former sustained so very considerable a loss in this action, that, for the present, they laid aside all thoughts of reducing the place by force; and therefore Abu Obeidah was obliged to have recourse to a stratagem, suggested to him by a Moslem officer of great sagacity and penetration; which had the desired effect. In order to deprive the citizens of Hems of their provisions, that he might have the fairer opportunity of surprizing them, Abu Obeidah pretended to have formed a design of attacking some of the principal fortresses in Syria; and therefore he offered to raise the siege of Hems, provided the inhabitants would supply his troops with all the provisions

<sup>a</sup> AL WAKED. ubi sup. ISM. ABU'LFED. in geogr. STRAB. geogr. lib. xvi. p. 518. PTOL. geogr. PLIN. lib. v. c. 22. SOZOMEN. lib. i. c. 8. MACROB. Saturn. lib. i. c. 23. p. 215, 216, 217. Lond. 1694. FEST. AVIEN. v. 1083. CLAUD. SALMAS. not. ad Flav. Vopisc. in Div. Aurelian. pass. GOLII. not. ad Alfragan. p. 99. ALBERT. SCHULT. ubi sup. SALE's prelim. disc. p. 3. Vide etiam AL AZIZ apud Abu'lfed. ubi sup.

a visions they could spare. This so pleased both the imperial garison and the people of the town; who were very desirous of getting rid of such troublesome guests, that they immediately stripped their magazines, and brought all the provisions they were not in-present want of to the Moslem camp. Abu Obeidah having now carried his point, advanced at the head of his troops to Arrestân, a strong place, well watered and full of soldiers which he summoned to surrender. In the mean time, some of the imperial spies in the Moslem camp observing the gates of Hems to be open to the Arabs, when the provisions were presented to Abu Obeidah, before he began his march to Arrestân, they spread a report, that the fortress itself had surrendered to him. This produced a very bad effect, as it struck all the emperor's subjects in those parts with terror; and consequently rendered several cities less capable of b defending themselves, when the Moslem forces sat down before them<sup>1</sup>.

THE governor of Arrestân, or rather of the castle there, paying no regard to Abu Obeidah's He takes summons, the Moslem general desired leave to deposit some of his heavy baggage, which he Arrestân. pretended would retard his march, in the citadel. This, for the same reason that the commandant of Hems had parted with his provisions, the governor, not suspecting any treachery, readily granted. This baggage consisted of twenty chests, every one of which inclosed an Arab soldier, having locks, to prevent all suspicion, put on the outside, and a bottom so contrived as to slip backward and forward, as the person within pleased. These being received into the castle, Khâled posted himself in ambuscade, near the gates of the city, with a considerable detachment, in order to support the soldiers concealed in them, if a c favourable opportunity offered. Soon after Abu Obeidah, with his forces, had disappeared, the governor and people of Arrestân went to church, to give thanks for the departure of the enemy, and were heard singing a psalm by Derâr, Abd'alrahmân, Abd'allah, and the other Arabs, confined in the manner here related; who finding every thing secure, immediately sallied out of the chests, seized upon the governor's lady, from whom they forced the keys of the gates, and then easily surprized the unarmed multitude at church in the midst of their devotions. This first step having succeeded so well, Abd'allah Ebn Jaafar, who commanded the party, sent five of his men with the keys, to open the gates; which being done, they instantly cried out ALLAH ACBAR, and Khâled advancing at the same time with his detachment to sustain them, Arrestân was taken by this stratagem without opposition<sup>2</sup>.

d ABU OBEIDAH having left a garison of 2000 men at Arrestân, which he judged sufficient and Shaizar. to defend the place, moved with his army to Skaizar, where there is a bridge over the Orontes, that runs through the town, which has been taken notice of by some of the eastern geographers. The reduction of Arrestân, some of whose inhabitants embraced Mohammedism, tho' by far the greatest part of them persevered in the Christian faith; and retired to Hems, Baalbec, Damascus, Alhâdir, Kinnisrîn, Bostra, and even, as was supposed, of Hems itself, so alarmed the inhabitants of Sbaizar, that many of them were inclined to surrender both the town and the citadel to the Arabs, at the first summons; thinking neither of them tenable against so formidable a power. The governor, however, himself, being a e man of courage, was of another opinion. He rejected the summons sent him by Abu Obeidah, and seemed determined to defend the place to the last drop of blood. But the principal men of the city being intimidated by what they had heard of the achievements of the Arabs, which had been greatly amplified and exaggerated to them, refused to concur with him in taking the necessary measures for the defence of the place. This so exasperated him, that he gave them reproachful language, ordered his servants to beat them, and treated them in the most opprobrious manner. Which they not being able to bear, drew their swords, cut him and his whole party to pieces, and then opened their gates to the Moslems. Abu Obeidah received them with open arms, gave them thanks for putting him in possession of their city without any effusion of blood; telling them at the same time, that as they had preferred his master's government to that of the emperor, he would not dismiss them without f some distinguishing mark of favour. In fine, he assured them, that if they would become converts to the Mohammedan faith, they should be exempted from all taxes and customs paid by those of that religion for two years; and that if they chose to continue Christians, they should pay no tribute for the following year. Thus the Moslems made themselves masters of Sbaizar merely by the fame of their arms, and the pusillanimity of the emperor's subjects. For the place was not inferior to many of the inferior fortresses of Syria, either in the number of its soldiers, or the strength of its situation<sup>3</sup>.

g AFTER Abu Obeidah had secured his conquest, he returned at the head of his forces to Hems, and once more sat down before that city. The governor now plainly perceived that he had been outwitted by the Arabs; and that it would be impossible for him, as he was in a manner destitute of provisions, long to defend the town. Being grieved, therefore, at as also Hems.

<sup>1</sup> AL WAKED. ubi sup. AL KOR. MOHAM. f. ix, & alib. AL BEIDAWI, HADR. RELAND. de jur. militar. Mohammedanor. SALE's prelim. disc. sect. vi. p. 144. <sup>2</sup> AL WAKED. ubi sup. <sup>3</sup> AL WAKED. ubi sup. IEM. ARU'LFED. in geograph. ubi sup. Vide etiam ALBERT. SCHULT. ind. geograph. in vit. Salad. ubi sup.

his own weakness, he upbraided the Moslem general with perfidy and breach of promise, and sent a messenger to expostulate with him. Abu Obeidah, in his own vindication, replied, that, by the former agreement, he was not to undertake the siege of Hems before he had taken some of the other fortresses of Syria; and that consequently, since he had reduced Arrestân and Shaizar, he was now at liberty to oblige Hems likewise to submit to the domination of the Khalif. The inhabitants finding in what dismal perplexities their credulity had involved them, and that they were not able to sustain a siege, at the instigation of their governor resolved to try their fortune in the field. That night he received the holy communion at St. George's church, since converted into a mosque, whither the people also repaired to prayers, to implore the divine assistance on this melancholy occasion. One of the Arab writers affirms, that the governor eat a whole roasted kid for supper, after his return from the holy communion, and sat up drinking wine all night; but this seems not to merit the attention of our impartial and unprejudiced readers. In the morning he sallied out of the town at the head of 5000 horse, and fell upon the Arabs with such fury, that he forced them to give way, and even at last to betake themselves to a precipitate flight. Khâled, endeavouring to restore the battle, narrowly escaped being killed by a Greek, whom he engaged in single combat, his sword breaking in his hand; though at last, according to Al Wakedi, he closed with his antagonist, and threw him dead from his horse. However, about noon, Mirkâl and Meisarah, two Moslem commanders, rallied the fugitives, and made an impression upon the Christians right wing, as Kais Ebn Hobeirah, another of the Arab officers, did on their left. Ikrimah, Khâled's cousin, likewise greatly distinguished himself on this occasion; crying out aloud, in order to animate his companions, who were vastly dispirited at the superiority of the Greeks, "Methinks I see one of the black-eyed girls of paradise, so beautiful that all mankind would die for the love of her, could they but see her. She offers me with one hand an handkerchief of green silk, and a cap made of precious stones, of inestimable value; with the other she beckons to me, at the same time declaring that she loves me." Then charging the Christians like a man in despair, he cut his way through great numbers of them, and even at last penetrated almost to the spot where the governor himself was posted. But here he found that which he seemed so ardently to desire, being pierced through with a lance; and consequently met with the proper reward of his temerity and presumption. Nor could the Arabs recover themselves, till the approach of the night obliged the Christians to retire; which, however, they did with a full resolution to renew the fight the next day. Abu Obeidah finding he could not possess himself of the place by force, was obliged to have recourse to another stratagem, suggested to him by Khâled, which enabled him to carry his point. Early the next morning, he drew his forces off from before the town, and marched in such disorder, that his retreat looked like a precipitate flight. This he did to amuse the Greeks, make his loss appear to them much more considerable than it really was, and convince them that his men durst not look them in the face; and it had the desired effect. For a great part of the garison observing this sudden and unexpected motion of the enemy, rushed out all at once upon them, without any order or precaution; which being perceived by the Arabs, they rallied in an instant, hemmed the Greeks in on all sides, and had put every man of them to the sword, had not their brethren in the city opportunely made a vigorous sally, in order to favour their retreat. In fine, the imperial troops suffered so much in this action, that, notwithstanding the advantage they had gained the day before, they found themselves obliged to surrender Hems to the Moslems; though this conquest was not at present of any great service to the latter. For, having received advice, that a very formidable imperial army was in full march to attack them, they could not spare a sufficient number of troops to garison the place, which was large and of a very considerable extent; so that Abu Obeidah did not think fit at that time to take possession of it. But after the famous battle of Yermouk, of which we shall now give our readers a succinct and circumstantial relation, the Arabs expelled the Christians from Hems. That battle determined the fate of Syria; the imperial forces being never able to make head against the Moslems afterwards in that country. We must not forget to inform our readers, that the Arabs lost only 235 men in the last engagement before Hems; whereas the Greeks had above sixteen hundred men, together with the governor himself, killed upon the spot.

Heraclius sends a great army against
the Arabs.

THE emperor Heraclius receiving advice of the progress made by the Arabs in Syria, and of the ravages committed by those barbarians there, resolved once for all to send such an army against them as should drive them into their own dominions, and effectually secure the repose of his subjects in that country. The general he appointed to command these forces was an Armenian, called Mabân by Al Wakedi, but Manuel by the Greek historians. He also reinforced the garisons of Cæsarea, Jaffa or Joppa, Acca or Ptolemaïs, Tyre or Sur,

* AL WAKED. ubi sup. GREG. ABU'L FAR. ubi sup. p. 178.

- a Sidon or Saida, Beirout Bairout or Berytus, Tripoli Tripolis Tarabolis or Trablous, Tiberias Tabberria or Taberya, and all the other fortresses left him by the Arabs. As he apprehended likewise, that Jerusalem might be attacked, or at least insulted, by the Arabs, he ordered a large body of troops to post themselves before that city; and, in fine, made all the necessary dispositions for securing his territories on that side from all attempts of the enemy. However, as he was sensible that his forces, how numerous soever they might be, could not execute his orders in the manner he desired, unless the divine blessing attended their endeavours, he commanded them to behave as Christians, as well as soldiers, and to avoid all dissensions, which could not but prove fatal to them. Then he inquired of his officers and courtiers, what could be the reason that the Arabs had hitherto met with such surprising success, when the Greeks were in number, strength, and discipline, so much superior to them? Upon which, a person of great piety rose up, and made him the following answer: “The Greeks have been every-where worsted by the Arabs, because they have for a long time walked unworthy of their Christian profession, corrupted their holy religion, injured and oppressed one another, been guilty of fornication, and fomented divisions and animosities amongst themselves.” Which was, indeed, but too true; as has been acknowledged by some of the Greek writers, particularly Theophanes, themselves; though it must be owned, that the vices of the Christians at this time, however flagrant they might have been, were not a little aggravated by the Arabic historians. The emperor was sensibly touched with the foregoing answer, and declared his intention of leaving the army, in order to withdraw to Constantinople. But, when some of his courtiers represented to him, how dishonourable it would be to abandon his troops at that juncture, and what matter of triumph it would prove to the Arabs; he seemed, at least for some time, to have laid aside that design. The grand imperial army consisted both of European and Asiatic troops, and was joined by a body of 60,000 Christian Arabs, under the command of Jabalab Ebn A' Ayham, king of Ghassîin; after which junction, the imperial forces, destined to act against the Moslems, according to Al Makîn, amounted to 240,000 men. The Christians Arabs Makân posted in front, thinking them the most capable of standing the first shock of their countrymen; and, indeed, the Moslems were the most afraid of them, as appears from the attempts made by Abu Obeidab, though in vain, to bring them to a neutrality. The Arab author we chiefly follow here informs us, that the Greeks committed great disorders in their march; that they gave their fellow-subjects every-where the most opprobrious language, and compelled them, contrary to their inclination, to attend them in this expedition against the Moslems. He also relates, that they treated particularly ill the inhabitants of those places that had been obliged to surrender to the Khalif's troops; though, as he insinuates, those poor people were absolutely incapable of defending themselves, and the officers of the imperial forces deserved the severest reprehension for not advancing sooner to their relief. But, notwithstanding we are supplied by this author with many materials necessary for the compiling of the history we are now upon, and consider him in the main as a tolerable good writer; yet we are far from thinking him in all respects, impartial, or that he always supports the character of a true and faithful historian<sup>c</sup>.

- THE news of the great military preparations of the emperor, and even of the near approach of the imperial army, reaching the ears of the Moslems in their camp before Hems, they were filled with the most terrible apprehensions, and knew not what measures to pursue at this critical juncture. Some would have persuaded Abu Obeidab to return home, in order to meet with a more speedy reinforcement, and to avoid the fatal effects of a famine, which so numerous an host must necessarily carry along with it. But this advice was opposed by that general; as such a conduct would be imputed to cowardice, and be highly disapproved of by the Khalif. Others proposed to wait for the enemy in the camp; where they doubted not but the Greeks, in case of an attack, would meet with a proper reception. But Kbâled thought this by no means adviseable; as the emperor's son lay incamped at Cæsarea, which he took to be too near Hems, with a body of 40,000 men. He therefore, offered it as his advice, that the army should march to Yermouk, where they might, better than in any other place, expect assistance from the Khalif. As this seemed likewise to Abu Obeidab to be the most salutary advice, the army immediately decamped, and advanced to that place, where the Moslems again pitched their tents. Soon after the departure of the Arabs from Hems, the emperor's son wrote a sharp letter to Makân, reproaching him for suffering the enemy to slip out of his hands. In the mean time, Makân, in pursuance of the emperor's orders, made some overtures of peace to Abu Obeidab; which, notwithstanding the apparent inferiority of the Moslem forces, were rejected by that general. Kbâled finding it impossible to detach Jabalab Ebn Al Ayham, with his Arabs, from the enemy, resolved to attack him without loss of time; taking it for granted, that if he could disperse the body he commanded, the imperial forces would be easily overthrown. He, therefore, put himself at the head of a select body of troops, composed of Ansârs and Mobâjerîn, and fell upon Jabalab's Arabs with such fury, that he put them into disorder, and forced them to retire. However, the action was very hot, and Khâled had several of his men killed upon the spot, besides five taken prisoners, three of whom were persons of great distinction, viz. Yezid Ebn Abu Sofiân, Rafi Ebn Omeirah, and Derâr Ebn Al Azwâr. The king of Ghassân sustained a much greater loss. But this action was by no means decisive; nor did either side reap any great benefit from it. Besides, as Khâled's corps contained a greater number of Ansârs than Mobâjerîn, that general disgusted the whole body of the Mobâjerîn by his partiality to the Ansârs; and was affronted by one of them called Katbib. This might have proved of ill consequence to the Moslems, had not Abu Obeidah, with his usual prudence, brought about between Khâled and Katbib a reconciliation. Notwithstanding which, the ill blood produced by this accident remained for some time after it happened. Our readers will remember here, that the Mobâjerîn were the refugees who fled from Mecca, in the infancy of Mohammedisn, for the sake of their new religion; and that the Ansârs were the helpers, or the Arabs of Medina, who received Mohammed and his followers, when they fled thither, into their protection<sup>d</sup>.

<sup>c</sup> AL WAKED. ubi sup. GOLII not. ad Alfragan, p. 134, 131, 132, 130. 288, 282, 283, & alib. ALBERT. SCHULT. ubi sup. THEOPHAN. chronograph. p. 276. Parisiis, 1655. AL MAKÎN, ubi sup. p. 22.

The Moslems
terrified at the approach of the imperial army.

THE approach of the imperial army, which was much larger than any that had ever been seen in Syria since the first irruption of the Moslems into that country, gave great uneasiness to Abu Obeidah. He, therefore, sent Abd'allah Ebn Kort express to Omar, to give him an account of the present situation of his troops, and to desire a speedy reinforcement of Unitarians, a title the Mohammedans lay claim to, as taking themselves to be the only assertors of the unity of the divine nature. The Khalîf and his court was extremely surprized at the news brought them by Abd'allah; but comforted themselves, says our author, with the promises made to them in the Korân, which seemed now to be all they had to depend upon. To encourage the people, Omar ascended the pulpit, and descanted much upon the excellency of suffering martyrdom, and distinguishing themselves for the cause of God. Then he returned an answer to Abu Obeidah, full of such spiritual comfort as could be afforded by the Korân. He commanded Abd'allah, when he first came within sight of the camp, to cry out, GOOD NEWS, that he might comfort the Moslems, and free them from some of their distracting apprehensions. Having received the letter, message, and the Khalîf's benediction, Abd'allah set out for the army; but recollecting, that he had not paid his devoirs to Mohammed's tomb, which he might possibly never see again, if he did not take this opportunity of visiting it, he posted with all possible celerity to Medina. Upon his arrival there, he hastened to the tomb, where he found Ali and Abbâs, with Ali's two sons, Hasan and Hossein. Having obtained the prayers of Ali, and all the others there present, for a safe and expeditious journey to Syria, he took his leave of Medina, and returned to the camp with such incredible speed, that all the Arabs there were filled with admiration. But their wonder ceased, when he informed them of Omar's blessing, and Ali's prayers at Mohammed's tomb; which they thought capable of producing the most miraculous effect. It has been already observed, that the Mohammedans condemn the orthodox Christians for maintaining the equality of three persons in the divine nature, calling them on that account Associators, as they associate with the Father, whom the Moslems consider as the only true God, the Son and the Holy Ghost; and that the belief of the Trinity is strictly forbidden in the Korân<sup>e</sup>.

The Khalîf
sends 5000 recruits to the army in Syria.

NOTWITHSTANDING the Khalîf was extremely alarmed at the advice he had received of the enemy's motions, he instantly ordered a proper number of recruits to be raised, being determined to carry on the war with all possible vigour in Syria. The command of these recruits he conferred upon Said Ebn Amir, honoured him with a flag of red silk, and, after giving him some good advice, dispatched him at the head of them to the Moslem army. Said losing his way, fell in with a body of 5000 Greeks, commanded by the prefect of Amman, whom he immediately attacked. After a sharp dispute, he cut all the foot to pieces, and put the horse to flight. However, they were met by a party of the Arab cavalry, sent out from the camp to forage, who put every one of them to the sword. Zobeir, who commanded the Arabs, killed the prefect with his own hand, by piercing him through with a lance. His men cut off all the heads of the Greeks they had slain, flayed them, and carried them fixed on the points of their lances, to the great terror of the country through which they passed, in triumph to the Moslem camp. Upon their arrival there, they animated their countrymen, by a relation of the advantage they had gained; and the joy occasioned by this was soon after heightened by an account of the victory obtained by

<sup>d</sup> AL WAKED. ubi sup. GOLII not. ad Alfragan. p. 134. AL KOR. MOHAM. f. ix. AL BEIDAWI, ISM. ABU'I-FED. de vit. Moham. c. xvii. & alib. <sup>e</sup> AL WAKED. ubi sup. AL KOR. MOHAM. f. iv. & alib. AL BEIDAWI, JALLALO'DDIN, YAHYA, SALE's prelim. disc. p. 39.

- a the new levies commanded by Said Ebn Amir. For, Zobeir had scarce ended his relation, when Said appeared, imparted the good news of the prefect's defeat to Abu Obeidah, and reinforced his army with a body of 8000 men<sup>f</sup>.

THIS accession of strength inspired the Moslem soldiery with fresh resolution, as thinking themselves now capable of coping with any number of men the enemy could bring into the field. But still they were very uneasy at the loss of the five Arabs or distinction taken prisoners by Jabalab Ebn Al Ayham, king of Ghassân, in the late action between Khâled and that prince. To ransom their Khâled was sent, at his own desire, by Abu Obeidah, escorted by a guard of 100 men, being the best soldiers in the Moslem army. Both he and his men were examined by Jabalab Ebn Al Ayham himself, before they could be introduced to the imperial general. Mabân, as the Arab writers call that commander, at first insisted upon Khâled's dismissing his escorte; which the Arab absolutely refused to do, as representing the lieutenant of the Khalif. Then he commanded all the Moslems, as they approached, to dismount, and deliver up their swords; but with this order likewise not one of them would comply. Upon which, they were brought into Mabân's presence, and had seats prepared for them. These they removed from them, and chose to sit upon the ground; which when Mabân desired to know the reason of, Khâled told him, that what God had prepared for men to sit down on was purer than his finest tapestries; and supported what he had advanced by a passage out of the Korân. Then the general began to expostulate with Khâled upon the irruption of the Moslems into Syria, and the hostilities they had committed there. To which Khâled replied in such terms as seemed to satisfy Mabân; who told him, that heretofore he had entertained a very wrong notion of the Arabs, looking upon them as a foolish ignorant people. To which Khâled made answer, that they formerly were so, before God sent Mohammed to reform them, and enable them to distinguish truth from error. The conference was pretty long, and not carried on throughout with the same temper. For, tho' sometimes they reasoned coolly, at others they suffered a violent transport of passion to take place. Khâled once told the general, that he should one day see him led with a rope about his neck to Omar, to be beheaded. To which Mabân replied, that tho' the law of nations secured ambassadors themselves from violence, which he supposed encouraged him to take that indecent freedom; yet he would chastize his insolence in the persons of the five prisoners, whom he would cause instantly to be beheaded. Upon this, Khâled swore by God, by Mohammed, and by the Caaba, that if he put that menace in execution, he would dispatch him with his own hands; and that every one of the Arabs that attended him should kill his man, whatever the consequences of such an action might be. Then rising up, he drew his sword; and every one of his attendants did the like. But Mabân not intending to come to such extremities as he had threatened, calmed him again, and made him a present of the five prisoners, whose liberty he so earnestly desired. Khâled, by way of return, gave the general his scarlet tent, which he had brought with him; and then, with the prisoners that had been released by Mabân, and his escorte, rejoined the Moslem army. This conference being a clear and lively description of the fierce and savage disposition of Khâled, as well as of the nation to which he belonged, and abundantly confirming what has been advanced concerning that disposition by several authors, and particularly in our Ancient History of the Arabs, we could not prevail upon ourselves to pass it over intirely in silence here<sup>g</sup>.

THE two armies, after several movements, coming in sight of each other, both sides made the necessary dispositions for an engagement. How the Greeks were drawn up, or what were their tactics on this occasion, our author informs us not; but with regard to the method of fighting observed by the Arabs, and their behaviour in the battle of Yermouk, he has handed down to us the following particulars. Khâled being indisputably the best officer in the Moslem army, both with respect to his courage and conduct, Abu Obeidah resigned to him the command of all the forces, and posted himself in the rear, under the yellow flag, or standard, that Abu Becr himself had given him when he first set out for Syria; being the same which Mohammed himself had fought under during the war of Khaibar. This was the place assigned him by Khâled, who imagined his presence there might prevent the Arabs from flying, if they should be pressed by the Greeks. For the same reason, he posted the women likewise there. The Greeks, animated by their numbers, fell upon the right wing of the Moslem horse with such fury that they broke it, quite bore it down, and separated it from the main body of the army. But the fugitives were so warmly received by the women, and loaded by them with such reproaches, that, in order to avoid this storm, they were obliged to return to the charge. Notwithstanding which, the Greeks forced them again to give ground; and were upon the point of putting them to the route, though their generals, before the beginning of the action, had told them, that paradise was before them, and the devil and hell-fire behind them. Abu Sofiân, in particular, who had used that very expression, was obliged to retreat; and one of the women that stood near him gave him a violent blow on the face with a tent-pole, for being deficient in his duty. That day the Moslems were thrice repulsed, and as often rallied by the women, who exerted themselves in an extraordinary manner on this occasion. At last, night parted the two contending armies, though victory seemed to incline to the Arabs. Abu Obeidah said at once those prayers that belonged to two several hours, in order to procure his men the longer repose. He was extremely tender of them, especially those that were wounded, binding up their wounds with his own hands, and assuring them, that their enemies suffered the same pain, without being intitled to the same reward. The next day, or at least another day not long after, the fight was renewed, and the Christian archers did such execution, that 700 of the Arabs lost either one or both of their eyes, which they considered as a particular mark of the divine favour. For this reason, the Moslems stiled that day the day of blinding. The troops on both sides behaved now with such bravery, that Abd'allah Ebn Kort, who had been in all the wars of Syria, declared, that he never saw any victory more obstinately disputed. Though the Moslem generals, as well as the soldiers, greatly distinguished themselves on this auspicious day, their efforts would have proved ineffectual, if the women, by their unparalleled bravery, had not rendered them successful. Kaulab, Derâr's sister, was wounded, though not mortally, and beat down, by a Greek; whose head was immediately struck off by Oscirab, another Arabian lady, and one of her companions. The enemy being pushed on all sides, notwithstanding the inequality of numbers, were forced to abandon the field of battle, and in the night to betake themselves to a precipitate flight. To add to this misfortune of the Greeks, at this melancholy juncture, a gentleman of Yermouk, whose wife some Christian officers had abused, and cut off his little son's head, tho' he had entertained them in a very hospitable manner, decoyed a body of their cavalry into a large water, very deep, and fordable only in one place, by favour of the night, and the assistance of a detachment of 500 Arab horse; where, plunging in, the greatest part of them perished. In fine, the Greeks were intirely defeated, had 150,000 men killed, and 40,000 taken prisoners; whereas the whole loss sustained by the Moslems on this occasion, according to the account sent by Abu Obeidah to the Khalif, did not amount to above 4030 men. However, it can scarce be doubted, but the Arab author, whom we have followed in this relation, greatly diminishes the loss of the Moslems, and as much amplifies that of the Christians. This is perfectly agreeable to the Arab genius and character. However, that the emperor's forces were overthrown in this most bloody engagement, and that the consequence of the victory now gained by the Arabs was the total expulsion of the Christians, at least of their power and authority, out of Syria, is a melancholy truth too apparent to be denied. It has been owned by a Christian historian himself, who lived about 150 years after the time of this war. Such was the battle, or rather battles of Yermouk, fought in the month of November 636, or the fifteenth of the Hejra; which, as has been just observed, determined the fate of Syria<sup>a</sup>.

<sup>f</sup> AL WAKFID, ubi sup.

<sup>g</sup> Idem ibid. DIODOR. SIC. HERODOT. STRAB. PLUTARCH. ARRIAN. DIO. APPIAN. AMMIAN. MARCELLIN. See also UNIV. HIST. vol. vii. part i. p. 262.

Abu Obeidah sends the Khalif advice of the victory he had gained. AFTER the dispersion of the imperial troops, Abu Obeidah wrote a short letter to the Khalif, wherein he transmitted him a brief and succinct account of the late glorious actions, and of some of the immediate consequences of them, with regard to the Moslems. He informed him, that, since the defeat of the Greeks, Noomân Ebn Al Kamah had killed Mahân, their general, at Damascus; that Abu Joaid, who belonged to them before they were overthrown by the Moslems, and came from Hems, drowned a vast number of them, known only to God himself; and that he had destroyed all those of the enemy who had taken refuge in the deserts and mountains. He likewise begged the Khalif to compose a difference that had happened between two Moslems of rank, whose names he thought proper to conceal, that neither party might think himself ill used by the Khalif's decision, or have the least reason hereafter to complain. Those Moslems were Serjabil Ebn Shabhnab, who had formerly been secretary to the prophet, and Derâr, an officer of distinction, frequently mentioned in this history. The former having engaged in single combat an officer of the Christian army, and being rendered weak by watching and fasting, to which he had wholly given up himself, would have lost his life, had not the latter interposed, and killed his antagonist, when he was upon the point of dispatching him. This happened in the heat of the action, and, after the conclusion of it, both Serjabil and Derâr demanded the spoil of this officer; the one as having engaged and tired him, the other as having slain him in the field of battle. He also informed the Khalif of several other single combats that had been fought, whilst both armies were engaged. The letter was dated from Damascus,

<sup>a</sup> AL WAKED. ubi sup. AL MAKIN, in hist. Saracen. lib. i. c. 3. p. 22. THEOPHAN. chronograph. p. 276, & p. 280.

a to which place the Arabs thought proper to move after they had defeated the Greeks. Here they refreshed themselves a month; before the expiration of which term Abu Obeidah received an answer from the Khalif, wherein he expressed great satisfaction at the glorious progress of his arms, thanked his troops for their bravery, and commanded the general to remain at Damascus till farther orders. He also adjudged the spoil above-mentioned to Derâr, tho' his name had been concealed, as he had killed an infidel, and saved the life of a Moslem; which put an end to the foregoing dispute. With regard to the division of the spoil in general, as Omar had taken no notice of it, Abu Obeidah imagined that it was left intirely to his own discretion. He, therefore, gave to every horseman thrice as much as to a footman; and twice as much to every soldier whose horse was of the true Arabian breed, which b was judged to be by far the best, as to him whose beast was produced in a foreign country, or at least came by descent from thence. This not pleasing the troops, Abu Obeidah told them, that the prophet himself had made the same division after the expedition of Khaibar; which being afterwards, upon an appeal made to him, confirmed by Omar, every one acquiesced in what the general had done. It ought to be remarked here, that Mr. Ockley must be mistaken, or at least the author he follows, when he mentions the BATTLE of Khaibar. For it appears from Abu'l feda, not to insist upon the testimony of other Arab historians, that there was no battle fought in the war of Khaibar. Mohammed, with those that attended him to Al Hodeibiya, made himself master of Khaibar, and all the castles and strongholds belonging to it, without ever bringing the enemy to a general action. He likewise
c divided the spoils, which were of an immense value, amongst those, and those only, who were present at that expedition. That learned man seems to have been misled by Al Makin, whose authority in this point appears inferior to that of Abu'l feda; especially, as this last writer is supported by Abu'l Faraj, Al Jannabi, and others. Nor does the text of Al Makin absolutely imply, that there was a general action in the war of Khaibar, whatever at first sight it may seem to do. For a full account of the expedition undertaken against Khaibar, we must beg leave to refer our readers to what has been said of it in our description of Mohammed's exploits during the seventh year of the Hejra <sup>1</sup>.

Soon after the arrival of the last courier from Omar, Abu Obeidah dispatched another, to He also takes know whether he should attack Cesarea or Jerusalem; as he thought it would be for the Jerusalem.
d good of the Khalif's service to make himself master of both those places. Ali being with Omar, when the courier arrived, persuaded him to send his forces first against the latter of those cities; telling him, that such an expedition would be more conformable to the sentiments of the prophet, which he had formerly imparted to him. It being, therefore, resolved by the Khalif, to lay siege first to Jerusalem, orders were directly sent to Abu Obeidah, to begin immediately the military operations against that city. Abu Obeidah, in pursuance of these orders, instantly detached Yezid Ebn Abu Sofiân, with a body of 5000 men, to invest that town; and then, for five days successively, commanded considerable numbers of his men to file off after him, under such officers as he thought fit to appoint. The principal of these were Ayyad Ebn Ghanem, Moâwiyah Ebn Abu Sofiân, Amru Ebn Al e As, and his son Abd'allah. The inhabitants of Jerusalem were not at all intimidated at the approach of the Moslem troops under the command of Yezid Ebn Abu Sofiân; but planted their engines upon the walls, and made all the necessary dispositions for a vigorous defence. Upon his arrival before the town, Yezid, by an interpreter, summoned the soldiers of the garison to surrender the place, and proposed to them the usual terms; which were rejected by them with scorn. This incensing the troops under his command, they desired to be led on instantly to the attack, in order to make the besieged feel the effects of their temerity and presumption. But Yezid not having orders to fight, contented himself at present with sitting down before the city. However, he sent an express to Abu Obeidah, to let him know the ardour of the troops, and to receive farther orders. Whereupon the general permitted f him immediately to begin the siege. Having, therefore, assigned his men their proper posts, the next morning, after prayers were over, he made a general assault, which continued till evening, when he was obliged to desist from his attempt. In this manner continued he to harass the besieged, for ten days together, with reiterated attacks; but without effect. In these conflicts the garison galled his troops terribly with showers of arrows, and destroyed him abundance of men. On the eleventh day the general himself, with the main body of the army, presented himself before the city, and sent a letter to the besieged; requiring them either to embrace Mohammedism, or to pay tribute to the Moslems; threatening the garison and inhabitants otherwise with final excision, and their children with perpetual slavery. That this menace might make the deeper impression upon them, he farther told them, that his men loved death better than they did either wine or hogs flesh; which he intended as a reflection upon them, in common with other Christians, for allowing themselves the use of food and liquors that were prohibited by the Korân. But, notwithstanding this, the besieged retained their former courage, and defended themselves for four months with all possible bravery; scarce a day passing, during that term, without an action; wherein the besiegers generally sustained the greatest loss. However, being, at the conclusion of it, reduced to the last extremity, and finding the Moslems resolved to carry the town, cost what it would; they prevailed upon Sophronius, the patriarch, to have a conference with Abu Obeidab, and endeavour to settle with that general the terms of an honourable capitulation. This the patriarch undertook, and, by the help of an interpreter, first told him, “that whoever came into the Holy Land, and before Jerusalem, the Holy City, “with any hostile intent, would render himself obnoxious to the divine displeasure.” To which Abu Obeidab answered, “that they knew Jerusalem to be a noble city; but that the “Moslems were more worthy of the possession of it than the Christians, as it was the mine “of the prophets, whose sepulchres lay in it, and as Mohammed himself went from it in “one night to heaven, where he was suffered to approach within two bow-shots of his “Lord, or nearer, the Khalif was determined to continue the siege, till the place was delivered into his hands.” After several conferences between the patriarch, who had placed himself on the top of the wall for that purpose, and the Moslem general, it was finally agreed, that the city should be surrendered to the Arabs, on condition that the inhabitants should receive from the Khalif’s own hands the articles of their security and protection. Omar having approved of the terms granted the besieged by Abu Obeidab, resolved to visit Jerusalem in person, and immediately made the proper preparations for a journey to the HOLY CITY. This Othmân endeavoured to dissuade him from undertaking, but without effect; he chusing to follow the advice of Ali, who was of a different opinion. The reduction of Jerusalem was the first consequence of the battle of Yermouk, the Arabs now having no enemy in the field to oppose them. According to Theophanes, the armies engaged in that decisive action were equal as to their numbers, tho’ the Arab writers positively assert the contrary, each of them amounting to 40,000 men. Al Makin affirms, that the imperial forces consisted of 240,000 men, and those of the Arabs of only 36,000; and from what has been related by Al Wakedi we may infer, that the Christian troops were vastly more numerous than those of the Moslems. Be that, however, as it will, the historians on both sides own the intire defeat of the imperial army; and their own writers themselves acknowledge, that the loss the Christians sustained on this occasion was very considerable. Theophanes says, that the wind blew full in the faces of the Christians, and covered them with dust; which greatly contributed to the fatal overthrow received. He also relates, that vast numbers of them were drowned in the river Yermochtha, or Yermouchtha, which probably derived its name from the town or village of Yermouk, called by him Yermoucha, or Yermouka, near which the battle was fought; which very well corresponds with what has been transmitted down to us on this head by a celebrated Moslem historian. In fine, the loss of this battle put Egypt, as well as Syria, including Palestine, into the hands of the Arabs, as will soon more fully appear<sup>k</sup>.

<sup>1</sup> AL WAKED. ubi sup. OCKLEY's hist. of the Sarac. vol. i. p. 235—243, &c. ISM. ABU'LFED. de vit. Moham. c. xlv. p. 87—92. ABU'L RABI, in lib. Splendor. EBN ISHAK, AL BOKHAR. AUCL. libr. MO'ALEM AL TANZIL, AL JANNAB. AL MAKIN. ubi sup. p. 7. GREG. ABU'L FAR. hist. dynast. p. 163. SALE'S notes on the Kor. f. xlviii. p. 414.

Omar sets out for that place. THE Khalif having now got every thing in readiness for his intended journey to Jerusalem, after he had performed his devotions in the mosque he always frequented, visited Mohammed’s tomb, and constituted Ali his lieutenant at Medina, set out, attended by a numerous retinue, the greatest part of which afterwards returned home, for that city. He rode upon a red camel, and carried with him two sacks; one of which contained his Sawik, a sort of provision consisting of barley, rice, or wheat, sodden and unhusked, in use amongst the Arabs, and the other fruits. Before him he had a leather-bottle, very necessary in those desert countries to put water in, and behind him a wooden platter. Before he left the place where he had rested the preceding night, he constantly said the morning-prayer; after which, he addressed himself to his attendants in a devout strain, always uttering before them some pious ejaculations. Then he communicated his Sawik to them; every one of his fellow-travellers eating with him, out of the same platter, without distinction. His cloaths, according to Theophanes, were made of camels hair, and even in a very ragged and tatter’d condition; nor could any thing be more mean and sordid than the appearance he made. This that author mentions as an instance of his consummate, or rather, as he terms it, diabolical, hypocrisy; he having nothing more in view than, by this pretended humility and mortification, to impose upon his followers, and be thereby enabled to commit the most enormous and unjustifiable actions; such was the iniquitous invasion of the emperor’s territories, under the cloak of religion<sup>l</sup>!

<sup>k</sup> AL WAKED. ubi sup. AL MAKIN, ubi sup. p. 22. EUTYCH. patriarch. Alexandrin. annal. tom. ii. p. 282—285. THEOPHAN. chronograph, p. 280, &c. Parisiis, 1655. <sup>l</sup> AL WAKED. ubi sup. THEOPHAN. ubi sup. p. 281.

- a To carry on the farce, and make himself the more revered, not to say adored, by his subjects, he did several popular things, that had the appearance of justice, whilst on this journey. A man was brought before him for marrying two wives, that were sisters both by father and mother; which was considered as a very heinous crime by the Moslems. Such marriages had been deemed lawful amongst the Arabs in the times of ignorance, or idolatry; but they were abolished by Mohammed, and expressly prohibited in the Korân. The man being interrogated by Omar about it, and asked what religion he was of, said he was a Moslem; but swore he neither knew nor believed that his marriage was unlawful. Omar, in reply to this, swore that he lied, and that he would either oblige him to part with one of his wives, or strike off his head. To which the man made answer, in an angry tone, that
- b he wished he had never been of the Mohammedan religion, since he had never been the better for it in any respect. Upon which, the Khalif calling him a little nearer, gave him two blows upon the crown with his stick, and severely reprehended him for speaking with so much irreverence of Mohammedism. He then forced him to part with one of his wives, by casting lots; as he loved them both so well, that he would not tell which of them it was that he preferred to the other. After this, the Khalif assured him, that all who renounced Islamism were to be put to death; and that if he ever lay with the wife he had dismissed, he should be most certainly stoned. By which it appears, that Omar considered a person in those circumstances in the light of an adulterer, upon whom such a punishment is to be inflicted, according to a passage once extant in the Korân; and still by some supposed to be in force.
- c This passage was called the verse of stoning, which, according to the tradition of Omar, who at this time threatened the infliction of the punishment therein denounced, was extant whilst Mohammed was living, tho' it be not now to be found. The passage was couched in terms to the following effect: Abhor not your parents, for this would be ingratitude in you. If a man and a woman of reputation commit adultery, ye shall stone them both; it is a punishment ordained by God; for God is mighty and wise. Which words, tho' they have as to the letter been abrogated, as to the sense, according to some of the commentators on the Korân, still remain in force <sup>m</sup>.

- d Soon after, the Khalif observing some poor tributaries exposed to the heat of the sun, a very cruel punishment in those hot countries, for not being able to pay the sum demanded of them, he ordered them to be released; telling his attendants, that he once heard the apostle of God say, Do not afflict men in this world; for those who do so God shall punish in hell-fire at the day of judgment. This being perfectly oracular with Omar's followers, his orders were immediately executed, tho' to the great regret of the oppressors, and the Khalif continued his route. But before he got to his journey's end, another person was cited to appear before him. This was an old man, who had suffered a young one to be a partner with him in the fruition of his wife, they being to enjoy her alternately every twenty-four hours. Tho' they both professed Islam, they swore, upon their being examined by Omar, that they did not know such a partnership to be illicit, or forbidden by the law of God; which greatly exasperated the Khalif. The old man then was asked by Omar, what could induce him to consent to such a beastly practice? To which he answered, that as his strength failed him, and this young man was very serviceable to him, in assisting him to feed and water his camels, he found himself obliged to allow him access to his wife, not being able to recompense him in any other manner; but promised, that, as he found it to be unlawful, he would abstain from such a permission for the future. Upon which, Omar ordered him to take his wife by the hand, and told him, that nobody ought to approach her but himself; and then directing his discourse to the adulterer, he said, If ever I hear, young man, that you are concerned in such an unlawful commerce hereafter, I shall not fail to take off your head. Such acts of justice as these, from whatever motive they might proceed, attracted both the love and esteem of the Moslems, especially as Omar generally founded his decisions either upon
- f some of the sayings of the prophet, of which he had preserved a considerable store, or upon some of the precepts and institutions of the Korân <sup>n</sup>.

- g ABU OBEIDAH receiving advice of the Khalif's arrival on the confines of Syria, he went to meet him with an escorte at some distance from Jerusalem, where he was expected with great impatience by the inhabitants, who had sustained great fatigues during the siege. From thence he conducted him to the Moslem camp, where he was received amidst the universal acclamations of his subjects, and with all possible demonstrations of joy. The morning after his arrival, the Khalif said the usual prayers, and preached to the troops. In his sermon he produced the following passage out of the Korân: Whomsoever God shall direct, he shall be rightly directed; and whomsoever he shall cause to err, thou shalt not find any to defend or to direct. Upon which, a Christian priest rose up, and said aloud twice, God causes no one to

Distributes justice on the road.

Arrives in the Moslem camp before Jerusalem, and signs the capitulation.

<sup>m</sup> AL WAKED, ubi sup. AL KOR. MOHAM. l. iii. AL BEIDAWI, S. 115's prelim. disc. p. 67, 135, &c.

<sup>n</sup> AL

WAKED, ubi sup.

err. Omar made no answer to him, but ordered the Moslems near him to strike off the infidel's head, if he repeated those words again. This being heard by the priest, he took care not to interrupt the Khalif any more in his discourse. After the conclusion of his sermon, he pitched his tent, made of hair, within sight of the city. Then he signed the articles of the capitulation, by virtue of which the inhabitants were intitled to the free exercise of their religion, the possession of their properties, and his protection; and he to the sovereignty of the place and all the adjacent territory. These articles being the basis of most, if not all those of the same nature, that have been since granted by the Mohammedan princes to the Christians, our curious readers will not be displeased to find the substance of them inserted here <sup>o</sup>.

I. THE Christians of Jerusalem shall build no new churches either in that city, or the adjacent territory thereunto belonging, after the signing of the capitulation. b

II. THEY shall not refuse the Moslems admission into their churches, either by day or by night.

III. THEY shall set open the doors of their churches to all travellers and passengers whatsoever.

IV. If any Moslem should be upon a journey, they shall be obliged to entertain him gratis for the space of three days.

V. THEY shall not teach their children the Korân, talk openly of their religion, persuade any Moslem to be of it, nor hinder any of their relations from becoming Mohammedans, if at any time they should be inclined to prefer Islâm to their own religion. c

VI. THEY shall pay a proper deference and respect to the Moslems, and rise up to them whenever they are disposed to sit down.

VII. THEY shall never appear in the same dress as do the Moslems; their caps, shoes, turbans, parting of the hair, forms of salutation, and even names, shall be different from those of the true believers.

VIII. THEY shall not ride upon saddles, nor carry any sort of arms, nor use the Arabic tongue in any of the inscriptions engraven on their seals.

IX. THEY shall not sell wine, nor any other intoxicating liquors whatsoever.

X. THEY shall always wear the same sort of habit wheresoever they go, and keep their girdles at all times about their waists. d

XI. THEY shall erect no crosses upon their churches, nor exhibit either their crosses or their books in the streets openly to the Moslems.

XII. THEY shall not ring, but only toll their bells; nor take any servant that once belonged to the Moslems.

XIII. THEY shall not overlook the Moslems in their houses, nor in any respect act the part of spies upon them. To which some add, that Omar commanded the citizens of Jerusalem always to have the fore-parts of their heads shaven, and to ride upon their pannels side-ways, in a manner different from that of the Moslems.

XIV. THEY shall pay, with all possible punctuality, the capitation, as well as the usual tribute imposed by the true believers upon all the infidels in their situation. e

XV. THEY shall acknowledge the sovereignty of the Khalif Omar, and never in any respect act either directly or indirectly against him.

XVI. By virtue of their compliance with the preceding articles, the Khalif shall secure to them their lives, properties, and the free exercise of their religion. He shall also screen them from all insults and violences whatsoever, and take them in common with his other subjects into his perpetual and more immediate protection.

Thus fell Jerusalem, once the glory of all the east, into the hands of the Moslems, in which it has continued ever since; excepting only that interval of near ninety years, wherein it was possessed by the Christians in the holy war, who were finally driven from thence by Saladin. With regard to the manner of reducing it, and the circumstances attending that event, authors are not perfectly agreed; tho' it is allowed on all hands, that Omar took a journey thither at the request of the besieged. Al Wakedi intimates, that the place was reduced by the Moslems in about four months time, as has been already observed; but, according to Theophanes, at least two years were elapsed before they could force it to a capitulation <sup>p</sup>. f

Omar enters Jerusalem.

AFTER the preceding articles were signed, Omar, in pursuance of his engagements, gave the inhabitants of Jerusalem the following order, as a proper security against any violences that might be offered them, written with his own hand. In the name of the most merciful God. From Omar Ebn Al Khattâb to the inhabitants of Ælia, or Jerusalem. They shall be protected

<sup>o</sup> AL WAKED. ubi sup. AL KOR. MOHAM. f. xviii, v. 16. P OCKLEY's hist. of the Sarac. vol. i p. 257, 258, 259. MS. Arab. Pocock. in Bibl. Bodl. Oxon. num. 362. BOHADIN EBN SJEDDAD, in vit. Salad. ABU'LFED. in hist. gen. JALLALO'DDIN, MS. Arab. Huntington. in Bibl. Bodl. Oxon. AL WAKED. ubi sup. THEOPHAN. ubi sup.

- a and secured both in their lives and possessions. Their churches shall neither be demolished, nor made use of by any but themselves. After the delivery of the schedule, on which this was written, the Khalif had the gates opened to him, and with his attendants, entered the town. The patriarch Sophronius waited upon the Khalif, who conversed familiarly with him, and asked him many questions concerning the antiquities of the city. One of the first places they visited was the temple of the resurrection, in the midst of which Omar sat down; and, when the hour of prayer was come, told the patriarch he had a mind to pray; and therefore begged he would shew him a place where he might perform his devotions. Sophronius told him he might do that on the spot where he then was; but this he absolutely refused. Then the patriarch led him to St. Constantine's church, and spread a mat for him; but
- b there he likewise declined saying his usual prayer. At last he thought fit to kneel down alone at the east gate of the church, upon one of the steps, and pray there. After he had finished his prayer, he sat down, and asked Sophronius, whether he knew the reason of his refusing to pray in the church? To which when the patriarch answered in the negative, he said, "Had I prayed there, or in any other of your churches, the Moslems would most certainly have taken it from you. For, notwithstanding the engagements we have entered into, they would have said, Here Omar prayed, and therefore we will pray here too. Which had it happened, they would gradually have possessed themselves of your church; which would have been contrary both to your expectation and my intention. Nay, as this still may happen, unless I take all the necessary precautions to prevent it,
- c "give me some paper, that I may fortify you with a written order, which will have its effect upon my people." Then being supplied with pen, ink, and paper, he wrote down the following words: In the name of the most merciful God. From Omar Ebn Al Khattâb to the inhabitants of Ælia. The Moslems shall not pray on the steps of the church called St. Constantine's, in any numbers, but only one by one. They shall never meet there to go to prayers. The Muedhdhins, or criers, that call the people to prayers, shall never stand there. Having then given this paper to the patriarch, for the future security of the Christians, he asked him, according to Eutychius, whether he could not assign him a proper place to erect a mosque upon, for the celebration of the Mohammedan service? To which the patriarch replied, I will shew the emperor of the faithful a spot, where he may build a place of worship for himself and his subjects. Then he took the Khalif to the place where Jacob's stone lay, on which he slept when he saw his vision. Upon this spot, says Eutychius, which they held in the highest veneration, the Israelites afterwards erected a chapel, or oratory. Nor could they imagine any place to be more proper for the house of God to stand upon, than that which Jacob himself emphatically stiled the house of God, a place to be revered, and the gate of heaven. For which reason, continues the same author, the Israelites, wheresoever they were, prayed with their faces turned towards this place. However, adds Eutychius, before Sophronius complied with the Khalif's request, he obtained from him a written order, that no other mosque should be erected within the precincts of Jerusalem. When the Roman empire became Christian, and Helena, the mother of Constantine, had built several churches
- e in Jerusalem, that stone was slighted, and the oratory upon it, that had been demolished, was consequently not rebuilt. The reason of which, according to Eutychius, was, because our Saviour had predicted, that the habitations of the unbelieving Jews should be left unto them desolate; and, that there should not be left here one stone upon another that should not be thrown down. Wherefore, in order that this prophecy might have its full completion, the Christian emperors would not suffer any church, or other building, to be erected upon that stone; so that it was now quite covered with dirt. The Khalif, therefore, took as much of this as he could in his vest, and removed it. Which being perceived by the Moslems, they all hastened to assist him. Some filled their bucklers, some their vests, some pitchers, others baskets; inasmuch that they had soon removed all the dirt and rubbish from about
- f the stone. After this, Omar, leaving the churches to the Christians, built a new mosque on mount Moriah, in the place where Solomon's temple formerly stood; which was afterwards much enlarged, and greatly adorned with many beautiful and magnificent buildings, by the Khalif Abd'almalec Ebn Merwân, as will be seen in its proper place. We are told by Theophanes, that when Omar entered the temple or church of the resurrection, he appeared in such sordid and filthy attire, as gave great offence to the patriarch Scphronius; who, with much difficulty, at last prevailed upon the dirty barbarian to put on some clean linen and cloaths that he offered him, till his own filthy rags were washed. The same author relates, that when the patriarch first saw Omar in that place, he could not forbear breaking out into the following exclamation: This is of a truth the abomination of desolation, spoken of by Daniel,
- g the prophet, standing in the holy place! Which words, as Mr. Ockley imagines, the Moslems afterwards hearing, they inferred from thence, that the patriarch owned their conquest of Jerusalem to have been foretold by the prophet Daniel; and this enabled them to trump up a fabulous story of an ancient prophecy kept in Jerusalem concerning Omar; wherein his

his name and religion were specified, his person described, and he declared to be the only man that could then reduce that city. From what has been said, it will appear, that Omar acted in character, when he would not permit his Moslems to wear any of those rich silks that fell into their hands after the battle of Yermouk. From Jerusalem the Khalif went to Bethlehem, and prayed in a church there. This procured another written order from him, which he gave the patriarch, in order to preserve that church in the hands of the Christians, couched in the same terms as the former that he had drawn up at Jerusalem. But notwithstanding this precaution, the Moslems afterwards seized upon that church, as well as the other of St. Constantine at Jerusalem. Half of the porch, where were the steps on which Omar performed his devotions, belonging to the latter of these, they took first, and erected a mosque upon it, in which they included those steps. This, in the days of Eutychius, they denominated the mosque, or oratory, of Omar. We must not forget to inform our readers, that, according to Al Makin, the Arabs took Jerusalem in the sixteenth year of the Hejra; or, as appears from Al Wakedi, about April or May, in the year of our Lord 637<sup>a</sup>.

The Arabs meet with great success in the territories of Persia.

THE same year in which Abu Obeidab reduced Jerusalem, Saad Ebn Abi Wakkas, as we learn from Al Makin, another of Omar's generals, met with an uninterrupted course of success in the territories of Persia. He advanced with a body of Moslem troops to Al Madâyen, a city not far from the confluence of the Tigris and the Euphrates, and made himself master of that town. Here he found the Shâh, or king of Persia's treasury, which was immensely rich, and one of his principal magazines. He took out of the treasury, according to Al Makin, 3,000,000,000 dinârs; which appears almost incredible. From thence Saad found his way to that part of the royal palace where Khosrû's plate was deposited, and another full of camphire; both of which were plundered by the Moslems. The camphire they were not very well acquainted with the nature of, and therefore mixed it with their leaven; which rendered their bread bitter and disagreeable to the taste. Afterwards the Arab general met with Khosrû's crown, and his cloaths, adorned with gold and jewels of inestimable value; all which he carried off with him. He also plundered his armory, which was well stored with helmets, coats of mail, and weapons of various kinds. Then he ordered the roof of Khosrû's porch to be opened, where he found 1,000,000 methkâls, every one of which, says Al Makin, was worth ten dirbêms. He also discovered, amongst Khosrû's furniture, a piece of silk tapestry, sixty cubits square, which was adorned with a great variety of beautiful flowers, herbs, and plants, drawn to the life, and formed of silver, gold, and jewels, the most valuable that could be procured. This being brought to Omar, he cut it in pieces, and distributed it amongst the Moslems. That part of it which fell to Ali's share, which yet was none of the best, he sold for 20,000 dirbêms, or pieces of silver; from whence we may infer, that the whole must have been almost invaluable. Nine months after the reduction of Al Madâyen, the Arabs defeated the Persians in a great battle near Jaloûlah, and put a vast number of them to the sword. According to some of the eastern authors, the city of Al Madâyen was at this time the capital of the Persian dominions, and was now so pillaged, that it did not lift up its head again for many ages. Mr. D'Herbelot seems to adopt the opinion of some of the oriental writers, who place the battle of Kadesia, already mentioned, in this year. But this must by no means be allowed, as it confounds the battle of Kadesia with that of Jaloûlah; which runs counter to Al Makin, and is not supported by any of either the best Arab or Persian historians. Tazdejerd, or Khosrû Tazdejerd, Khosrû being a name common to many of the Shâhs, or kings, of Persia, as Ptolemy was to those of Egypt, and Cæsar to the Roman emperors, finding things every day to grow worse and worse, retired with great precipitation to Fargâna. It must here be observed, that Monsieur D'Herbelot is inconsistent with himself, when, in one part of his work, he makes the battle of Kadesia to have been fought whilst Abu Obeidab was carrying on the siege of Jerusalem, which he admits to have been in the sixteenth year of the Hejra, and yet, in another, asserts that decisive action to have happened the preceding year; but such inconsistencies as these are pretty numerous in that learned author. Al Makin relates, that Tazdejerd's plate at Al Madâyen, of exceeding great value, was put in baskets covered with lead. Fargâna, or Fargânab, is the capital of a large province of the same name, sometimes called Andojiân, or Andujiân, tho' the last is more properly the name of one of its dependencies. This province is one of the countries of the Transoxiana, or the Regio Transoxiana, and extends itself along the Sihûn, or the Jaxartes, in 92° long. and 42° 20' lat. according to Abu'l-feda, tho' a Persian geographer, according to Goliûs, places it in long. 102°. However, Ulugh Beigh, and another Persian geographer, assign it long. 101° 20', and lat. 52° 25'.

<sup>a</sup> AL MAKIN, ubi sup. EUTYCH. patriarch. Alexandrin. annal. tom. ii. p. 284—289. GEN xxviii. 16, 17. MAT. xxiii. 38. MAR. xiii. 2. THEOPHAN. ubi sup. GOLII not. ad Alfragan. p. 137—140. OCKLEY'S hist. of the Sarac. vol. i. p. 248, 249.

- a So that the oriental writers themselves are not perfectly agreed with regard to its situation: Some authors have imagined, that the capital of Fargānah had likewise the name of Akhsikat; which seems, according to Golius, to be derived from Akhsbid, an appellation peculiar to the kings of that country. This region, either contiguous to Turkestan, or a part of that country, is mountainous, and abounds with fountains of naphtha, as well as veins of gold and silver, turcoises, or stones of an azure colour, being a sort of jasper, an uncommon variety of the most excellent trees, shrubs, and plants, &c. that the earth brings forth spontaneously, without any manner of culture there. Fargāna has produced likewise a very considerable number of learned men, who have been rendered famous by their writings; and amongst others, Mohammed Ebn Kathir Al Fargāni, commonly called by the
- b Europeans Alfraganus, who wrote an astronomical treatise, intitled, ASTRONOMICAL ELEMENTS, OR THE ELEMENTS OF ASTRONOMY, published, with a Latin version, and some learned notes upon it, by the excellent Golius, at Amsterdam, in the year 1663. Al Bergendi places Fargāna in the fifth climate, and the neighbourhood of Al Shāsh, beyond the Jaxartes, and makes the city of Coba, from whence many grand personages have sprung, to be one of its dependencies; tho' others affirm that city to belong to Al Shāsh. Besides the mines of gold and silver above-mentioned, there are others in this extensive region, if some good oriental authors may be credited, of lead and iron. Several geographers have fixed here the cities of Khovakand, Khejiand, and Marghinan, as also the limits of Mohammedism on that side. But, for a farther account of this country, we must beg leave to refer our curious
- c readers to the learned Golius, who has endeavoured to reconcile the jarring accounts given us by the oriental geographers, of its situation. Into this remote tract Tazdejerd retired, after the defeat of his forces near Jaloūlak, and not to a city, or rather pitiful village, of Persia, of the same name, as Mr. Ockley suggests. This sufficiently appears from the eastern writers, and might be proved by some irrefragable arguments, would the limits we have here prescribed ourselves permit. That prince was never thoroughly subjugated by Omar, whatever may be insinuated to the contrary by certain authors, as has already been observed in our ancient history of the Persians; tho' the overthrow here mentioned seems to have given almost the finishing stroke to his affairs<sup>r</sup>.

- But to return to the affairs of Syria:—Omar remained ten days in the Moslem camp, after
- d the reduction of Jerusalem, in order to settle matters there. In a part of this interval, according to Al Wakedi, one Caab, a Jew, came to the Khalif to be instructed in the principles of the Mohammedan religion, and told him, that he had been informed by his father, who was perfectly well skilled in the law of Moses, that Mohammed was to be the seal of the prophets; and consequently, that, after him, the world must not expect any farther inspiration. He then demanded of Omar what account of Islamism was to be met with in the Korān? The Khalif, in order the more effectually to carry his point, cited such texts of that book as were suited to the palate of one who had been brought up a Jew; to some of which we shall beg leave to refer our learned readers. The Jew pretending to be convinced by some of these texts, that Mohammedism was in reality no other than the religion of Abraham and the
- e patriarchs, repeated instantly the Moslem confession of faith, There is but one God, and Mohammed is his apostle. This gave great satisfaction to Omar, who invited his new proselyte to go with him to Medina, to visit the prophet's tomb there; to which he very readily agreed. As the Arabs are very inaccurate in their chronology, as we have already demonstrated in a former part of this work, Mr. Ockley takes this Caab to have been the Jew of that name converted by Mohammed himself, about ten years before Jerusalem was taken by Omar. But that learned and ingenious gentleman has been led into this mistake by Dr. Prideaux, whom he has followed in the point before us relating to the Caab here last mentioned. For Dr. Prideaux has confounded Caab Ebn Al Ashraf, the Jew, who was really put to death by Mohammed, for being a most inveterate enemy to him and his new
- f religion, with Caab Ebn Al Zohair, a famous poet, but no Jew, who was pardoned by Mohammed for an enormous offence against him he had been guilty of, after he had determined to put him to death, and became a convert to Islamism. All conjectures, therefore, founded upon the truth of Dr. Prideaux's supposition, must fall to the ground of course. Besides, Mr. Ockley himself is almost as inaccurate in his chronology here as the Arabs, whom he condemns. For, according to Dr. Prideaux, whom he follows, the conversion of Caab, the Jew, happened in the second year of the Hejra, and consequently fourteen years, not about ten, as he imagines, before the reduction of Jerusalem by Omar. But Dr. Prideaux, however this may have escaped Mr. Ockley's notice, is here again mistaken. For, Caab Ebn Zohair, the person really pardoned by Mohammed for writing satirical verses upon him, embraced Islamism in the ninth year of the Hijra, and not the second, if we will believe Abu'lfeda, whose authority cannot certainly be disputed in this particular; and Caab Ebn Al Ashraf, the Jew, tho' never made a proselyte by Mohammed, was dispatched by Mohammed Ebn Moslema, the Ansâr, at the prophet's instigation, six or seven years before. These remarks we thought proper to make here, being desirous of setting our readers right as to the knowledge of some facts relative to the history we are now upon, that have not, at least till of late, been sufficiently understood even by those who were the best acquainted with oriental literature *.

<sup>r</sup> AL MAKIN, ubi sup. p. 22, 23. D'HERBEL. bibl. Orient. p. 226, 687, 996, &c. AL BERGENDI, ABU'LFED. ULUGH BEIGH, EBN HAWKEL, GOLII not. ad Alfragan. p. 168—171. OCKLEY, ubi sup. p. 265. Univ. Hist. vol. v. p. 403—406. Lond. 1747.

Omar returns to Medina.

BEFORE the Khalif took his leave of Syria, he thought fit to divide that country into two parts; one of which, that lay between Haurân, or Aurân, and Aleppo, and was not perfectly conquered, he committed to the management of Abu Obeidah, giving him the strictest orders to reduce it as soon as possible to his obedience. Yezid Ebn Abu Sofiân was commanded to take upon himself the care of the other, which comprehended Palestine and the sea-coast, and to make himself absolute master of it, having a body of troops assigned him for that purpose. Amru Ebn Al As, in pursuance of his instructions, was to invade Egypt, then in a very languishing condition, with a body of the Moslem forces. After he had made these dispositions for extending his conquests, Omar set out for Medina, where he arrived in perfect health. His presence there inspired the inhabitants with inexpressible joy; who, from his long stay at Jerusalem, concluded that he did not intend to return to their city. As Jerusalem was seated on a fertile spot of ground, had a most salubrious air, and was the principal habitation of the ancient prophets, as also taken by the Moslems to be the place where all mankind must be summoned together at the resurrection; they were afraid the Khalif would have fixed his residence there. Soon after his departure, Abu Obeidah exacted of the inhabitants of Albâdir and Kinnisrîn 5000 ounces of gold, as many of silver, 2000 suits of cloaths of various kinds of silk, and 500 ass-loads of figs and olives, for the refreshment of his troops. We are told by Eutychius, that he moved likewise about this time to Hems, in order probably to extort from the citizens a sum of money, and a proper quantity of provisions. But how he treated them, what he actually proposed to himself by the visit he made them, or what sort of a reception he met with from them, at this juncture, we have not been informed by any of the Arab historians †.

Abu Obeidah
moves towards Aleppo.

Soon after Omar had left Syria, Yezid Ebn Abu Sofiân advanced to Cæsarea, in order to besiege it; but, upon his approach to that town, he found it so well fortified, and the garison so strengthened by a reinforcement of 2000 men sent them lately by the emperor, that he judged such an attempt would be impracticable. Besides, the small body of troops he commanded was not large enough to form the siege of a place defended by so numerous a garison. Nor could he entertain the least hopes of starving them to a surrender, as they had lately been supplied with a vast store of all sorts of provisions by sea. He, therefore, was obliged to continue for some time in a state of inaction. In the mean time, Abu Obeidah having visited Haurân, or Aurân, the province called by Josephus Auranitis, and one of the extremities of that part of Syria over which he presided, he marched from thence towards Aleppo; which, conformably to the Khalif's orders, he proposed immediately to invest. Besides Tiberias, or Tabariyah, and Besra, or Besra, its capital in the province of Haurân, there were several other considerable towns. The castle of Aleppo was, at this time, as we learn from Al Wakedi, the strongest citadel in Syria †.

The governor of Aleppo defeats a body of Arabs.

THE citizens of Aleppo being informed of the surrender of Albâdir and Kinnisrîn, were struck with great terror and consternation, as expecting soon to see the Moslem army before the town. They had at that time two governors, who were brothers, and resided in the castle, which was not then within the city, but stood at a little distance from it. The names of these two governors, who were of very different dispositions, if we may believe Al Wakedi, so often cited here, were Youkinna and John. Their father, by the emperor Heraclius's appointment, presided over the whole tract situated between Aleppo and the Euphrates; and, after his death, Youkinna had the chief management of affairs, John spending his time in retirement, reading, and acts of charity. As he had therefore no notion of war, he would fain have prevailed upon his brother to have purchased a peace of the Arabs for a good round sum of money, and not made his country a scene of blood, ravages, and confusion. But this by no means suiting Youkinna's martial genius, he armed a considerable number of the citizens, amongst whom were several Christian Arabs, and distributed a sum of money amongst them. He then told his men, that he intended to act offensively against the Arabs, and even, if possible, to engage them, before they drew too near the district of Aleppo. In

* AL WAKED. ubi sup. AL KOR. MOHAM. f. ii. v. 126. f. iii. v. 60, 77, 78, 96. f. xxii. v. 77. CCKLEY ubi sup. PRID. life of Mahom. p. 59. Lond. 1713. ISM. ABU'LFED. de vit. Moham. c. xxx. p. 64, &c. c. lvi. p. 122. JOAN. GAGN. in not. ad Abu'lfed. ubi sup. SALE'S note on the Kor. c. iii. p. 46. † AL WAKED. ubi sup. EUTYCH. ubi sup. p. 292. " AL WAKED. ubi sup. ABU'LFED. HADR. RELAND. Pal. hist. p. 107. ALE. SCHULT. ubi sup. GOLL not. ad Al-Baghat. p. 153.

- a order to inspire them with the greater courage and resolution, he took the liberty to observe, that the grand army of the Arabs was divided into several bodies; one of which had orders to besiege Cæsarea, another to march to Damascus, and a third to invade Egypt. From whence he concluded, that Abu Obeidah's troops, of whose march towards Aleppo they had received some intelligence, could not be so formidable but that they might easily oppose them. Having thus animated his men, he put himself at the head of 12000 of them, and marched forwards to get advice of the enemy's motions. In the mean time, Abu Obeidah had sent before him Caab Ebn Damerah, with 1000 men, and given him express orders not to fight, till he had received certain information of the strength of the enemy. Zoukinna's spies discovered Caab and his men resting themselves, and watering their horses, quite
- b secure, and not in the least apprehensive of any danger. Zoukinna being apprized of this, posted one part of his troops in an ambuscade at a small distance from them, and with the other advanced to attack the Moslems. The dispute that happened on this occasion was sharp and bloody, and the Moslems at first repulsed the Christians with great bravery; but the troops that formed the ambuscade at last rushing upon them, they were forced to retire, had 170 of their men killed upon the spot, and most of the rest wounded. In fine, had they not been enabled by favour of the night, which then very opportunely approached, to make a tolerable retreat, they had every one of them been inevitably put to the sword *.

- AFTER Zoukinna's departure with his forces in quest of the Arabs, the wealthier part of
- c the citizens of Aleppo considering that they should be stripped of every thing valuable belonging to them, and perhaps be put to death likewise, if the Moslems carried the city by storm, they resolved, without farther delay, to submit to Abu Obeidah. They, therefore, sent a deputation, consisting of thirty of the chief of them, to that general, then at Kinnisrîn, and upon the point of beginning his march for Aleppo, in order to make proposals of submission to him. At first, Abu Obeidah seemed averse to a pacification, as not being perfectly convinced of the sincerity of their intentions; but at last they prevailed upon him to take them into his protection. Their submission was accepted upon the same terms as those upon which the Moslem general had before granted the Khalif's protection to the inhabitants of Albâdir and Kinnisrîn; excepting that the tribute and capitation imposed upon them did
- d not amount to above half the sum exacted of the citizens of Kinnisrîn. For that city was then in a much more flourishing condition than Aleppo, and consequently able to pay a much more considerable tribute and capitation. The merchants, on their return home, meeting with one of Zoukinna's officers, gave him an account of the whole transaction; which he immediately communicated to his master, who was then making the proper dispositions for pursuing Caab, as soon as the morning appeared, who had made his escape only by favour of the night. Zoukinna receiving this disagreeable news, was afraid lest any attempt should be made upon the castle in his absence; and therefore posted home with all possible expedition. This gave Caab an opportunity of rejoining the Moslem army, which soon after, with Khâled and Abu Obeidah at the head of it, arrived at the spot where the late action happened.
- e Immediately after their arrival, the Moslems buried the bodies of their countrymen that had been killed, whom they called martyrs, all bloody as they were, together with the arms that lay by them, and the cloaths with which they were covered. This was done by Abu Obeidah's command, who said, that he had frequently heard the apostle of God declare, that the martyrs, and those who die in the service of God, shall be raised at the day of judgment with their blood upon their throats. To which he added, that this should have the colour of blood, and the smell of musk; and that those on whom it appeared, should be led directly into paradise. The citizens of Aleppo's submission to Omar has been taken notice of by Eutychius; but he has transmitted down to us no particular and circumstantial account of that affair *.

- f IN the mean time Zoukinna arrived at Aleppo soon enough to secure the castle from all attempts the citizens might make upon it, and to put himself in a posture to receive the enemy. He was greatly incensed at the conduct of the deputies, who had lately concluded a treaty with Abu Obeidah, and threatened the inhabitants with present death, if they would not join him against the Arabs, disannul that treaty, and deliver into his hands the author of the late defection, that he might meet with condign punishment. The citizens not immediately complying with this demand, he fell upon them with great fury, killed about 300 of them, and amongst the rest his brother Jobn, whose head he caused to be cut off, charging him with being the contriver and abettor of the late pernicious scheme. Nor would he have stopped here, but had made a much greater slaughter of them, had not the Moslem
- g army at that instant arrived before the town; upon which he retired, and threw himself

* AL WAKED. ubi sup.
GOLII not. ad Alfragan. p. 277.

* Idem ibid. EUTYCH. patriarch. Alexandrin. annal. tom. ii. p. 283.

with a considerable body of troops, into the castle. But before this could be done, he was <sup>a</sup> obliged to sustain an attack from the Arabs, wherein, according to Al Wakedi, he lost 3000 men. The action was no sooner ended, than the inhabitants of Aleppo brought out forty of Youkinna's men, whom they had taken prisoners, and put them, as a proof of their fidelity to him, into Abu Obeidab's hands. Of these seven embraced Mohammedism, and the rest were beheaded. Aleppo, which the Moslems had now possessed themselves of, is situated on a fine open plain, about two days journey from the Euphrates; from whence, by means of certain subterranean canals, great plenty of water is derived to the town. It abounds with cotton, sesame, panic, and a vast variety of fruits; all which are the produce of the adjacent territory. For the irrigation of the circumjacent gardens, which are extremely pleasant, the inhabitants are obliged to the aforesaid canals, by whose assistance they are continually sup- <sup>b</sup> plied with proper quantities of water from the Euphrates. The soil is exceeding rich, and of a reddish colour, resembling Bolus Armeniaca, and in rainy weather, with which Aleppo in the spring season is very comfortably refreshed, emits a most grateful odour; whence it comes to pass, that the water drunk out of the cups made of this earth is esteemed to be more wholesome than any other. The river Kowaik, that derives its name from the croaking of frogs, which at a certain season of the year are seen in great numbers there, runs close by the town. It has its source to the north of the city, near the town of Aintâb, or Antâb, and passes by that gate of Aleppo, which is called the Antioch gate, towards Kinnisrîn; beyond which town it loses itself in a place, covered with rushes and reeds, called by Yacût Ebn Abd'allah the red meadow. Aleppo is a very large city, fortified with a wall and towers, all <sup>c</sup> made of stone. It had anciently eight gates only, but has at present ten. Amongst the principal curiosities of the place, may be reckoned the large high artificial mountain that stands in the middle of the town. The city and the suburbs near a century ago contained above thirty streets. Aleppo is seated in the province of Kinnisrîn, from the city of which name, according to Abu'lfeda, it is about twelve miles distant. The castle was looked upon to be almost impregnable when besieged by the forces of Omar, and considered as a place of great strength likewise in the days of Abu'lfeda. It is at present, as it has been for many years, one of the most celebrated empories of the east. That Aleppo was the Beræa of the ancients, sufficiently appears from Abu Nasr Ebn Hazir and Strabo. It stands about  $10^{\circ} 35'$  to the east of Alexandria in Egypt, and the latitude assigned it by Golius is  $39^{\circ} 46'$  N. tho', accord- <sup>d</sup> ing to Dr. Halley, this has been determined more accurately to be  $36^{\circ} 30'$  N. Its longitude has been differently defined by Ulugh Beigh and Abu'lfeda. For a fuller and more particular description of this city our readers may have recourse to Golius, D'Herbelot, several modern travellers of good note, and the eastern geographers <sup>e</sup>.

but in vain.

IMMEDIATELY after Youkinna had shut himself up in the castle, a council of war was held in the Moslem camp, wherein it was deliberated what measures were to be pursued on the present occasion; and all the principal officers of the army assisted at those deliberations. Some were of opinion, that the citadel should be besieged in form by one part of the army, whilst the other was sent out to forage. But Kbâled, whose judgment was generally follow- <sup>e</sup> ed, thought it most advisable to attack the castle with all the Arab forces, that they might be able to reduce it before any supplies could be sent from the emperor. In pursuance of this advice, Abu Obeidab caused the citadel to be invested, and soon after he had surrounded it with all his forces, he made a most vigorous assault. The besieged defended themselves with great bravery; and, after a very warm dispute, drove the enemy to their camp. As they threw a vast number of stones out of their military engines in this action, they destroyed abundance of the besiegers, and wounded many more. This encouraged Youkinna to make a sally with a strong part of the garison, in the dead of the following night. The fires being then out in the Moslem camp, and the besiegers not expecting so unseasonable a visit, Youkinna killed sixty of them upon the spot, and carried off with him fifty prisoners into the castle. However, being briskly attacked by Kbâled, who soon drew together a body of <sup>f</sup> troops to oppose him, in his retreat he lost about 100 men. The prisoners were beheaded by Youkinna's order, the next day, in sight of the Moslem camp. Youkinna then receiving advice, that a strong detachment of the Arabian cavalry was sent out to forage, ordered a body of his horse to drive them to their camp, and clear the country of them; which they did accordingly, killed 130 of them in the action, seized all their camels, horses, &c. and then retired to the mountains. Here they proposed to lie concealed till the following night, and then return to the castle. But Abu Obeidab being informed of what had happened by some of those who had escaped the fury of the Christians in the late engagement, he detached Kbâled and Derâr with a body of troops to pursue the Greeks, and revenge the

<sup>e</sup> AL WAKED. ubi sup. ABU'LFED. AL AZIZ. STRAB. ABU NASR EBN HAZIR, GOLII not. ad Alfragan. p. 270—276. D'HERBEL. bibl. Orient. p. 423. PH. LOSOPH. TRANSACT. N° 218. p. 173. LOWTHORP'S abridg. of the Philosph. Transact. vol. i. p. 652. & vol. iii. p. 525.

- a late affront. Kháled, therefore, was conducted by some of the fugitives to the place where the action happened, and received intelligence there of the route the Christians had taken. Upon this, he possessed himself of the only passage by which they could return to the castle, and posted there in ambuscade a party of his men, whose courage he could depend upon. The Greeks, not apprehensive of any danger, as being perfectly ignorant of the enemy's motions, advanced to this passage, when about a fourth part of the night was past, in order to rejoin their countrymen, who defended the castle; but, upon their arrival there, they were surprized by the Arabs, who fell upon them so briskly, that they took 300 of them prisoners, and put all the rest to the sword. The prisoners, in order to retaliate Youkinna's cruelty the day before, were all brought out the next morning before the castle, and beheaded in sight of the garison here. Some of the oriental writers believe, that Aleppo was built by the Amalekites, after they had been expelled their native country by Joshua; and that one of the principal of these founders was called Hakib, from whom the new city derived its name; but others are of a different opinion. Be that as it will, that this place is of a very high antiquity, and made a very considerable figure in antient times, is universally allowed<sup>a</sup>.

- NOTWITHSTANDING the late disaster, the garison made several sallies with good success, He continues: the siege; wherein they killed the besiegers a great number of men, and harassed them in such a manner, that Abu Obeidab found himself obliged, for his farther security, to remove his camp to about a mile's distance from the castle. He had likewise a farther view in this point of conduct. He imagined, that, after such a step was taken, Youkinna would be less upon his guard, and afford him an opportunity of taking the citadel by surprize. But the Greek commander, by the prudent measures he took, frustrated his expectations. Abu Obeidab perceiving all his designs unsuccessful, had a strong suspicion that he was betrayed by some Christian spies lurking about the camp, who gave the enemy secret intelligence of what was transacting there. This induced him to cause a strict search to be made. Upon which, Kháled, who assisted herein, discovered a Christian Arab, of the tribe of Ghassân, who, upon examination, appeared to be a spy, employed by Youkinna to procure him intelligence of the Moslems designs. In fine, he owned his crime, and confessed, that he had had several accomplices, who were returned to the castle; but avoided death by professing himself a Mohammedan. It may not be improper here to observe that the principal tribes of the Arabs that embraced Christianity, were those of Hamyar, Ghassân, Rabiâ, Taghlab, Babrá, Tonúch; part of the tribes of Tay and Kodâa, the inhabitants of Najrán, and the Arabs of Hira. The kings of Hira were lieutenants over the Arabs of Irâk for the kings of Persia; as the kings of Ghassân, the last of whom was Jabalab Ebn Al Ayham, mentioned above, were for the Roman emperors over those of Syria<sup>a</sup>.

- THO' the siege of the citadel continued above four months after the last-mentioned blow given by Kháled to the garison, the Moslem general had scarce any prospect of bringing it to a happy conclusion. Nor had he any thing material to write to the Khalif; which made the Arabian pontiff very uneasy. He, therefore, wrote to Abu Obeidab, to let him know, that he was extremely concerned at his long silence, and therefore ordered him to give him an account of the present situation of his affairs in Syria. That general, upon this, dispatched a courier to the Khalif, with advice, that Albâdir, Kinnifrîn, and the city of Aleppo, had surrendered to him; and that the citadel of Aleppo was the only place in that part of the country which held against him, before which he had lost a considerable number of men. This, continued he, had induced him to entertain thoughts of raising the siege, and moving with his army in that tract which lay between Antioch and Aleppo; but that he would remain in his camp till the return of the courier with farther orders. This news was by no means agreeable to the Khalif, who commanded him at all events to continue the siege, and sent him a reinforcement of Arab troops, together with seventy camels, to assist the foot in their march, with all possible expedition. This inspired new life into the Moslems, who began to be greatly dejected at the losses they had sustained. The Khalif was very well pleased with that part of Abu Obeidab's letter, which informed him of the surrender of Aleppo; which, he apprehended would facilitate the reduction of the castle. It is intimated by Golius, that Ayyad Ebn Ganem, either at this juncture, or at least somewhere about this time, took possession of that town; and afterwards made an irruption into Mesopotamia<sup>b</sup>.

- IN the body of troops sent by Omar to reinforce his army before the castle of Aleppo, At last he takes the citadel by a stratagem. there was an Arab of a gigantic size called Dames, who was a man of great courage and resolution. Tho' the Moslems, in pursuance of the Khalif's orders, had carried on the siege with all the vigour they were capable of, yet very little progress had been made therein for forty-seven days after Dames's arrival in the camp; which induced him to meditate the reduction of that fortress by a stratagem, as it seemed so difficult a thing to effect it by force.

<sup>a</sup> AL WAKED. ubi sup. ISM. ABU'LFED. AL AZIZ. GOLI not. ad Alfragan. p. 274. ALR. SCHULT. ubi sup.

<sup>b</sup> AL WAKED, ubi sup. AL MOSTATRAF, Poc. not. in spec. h. st. Arab. p. 137, & alib. PROCOPI. in Pers. apud Photium, p. 71, &c.

<sup>c</sup> AL WAKED, ubi sup. GOLI not. ad Alfragan. p. 273.

He, therefore, desired that Abu Obeidab would assign him the command of a party, consisting only of thirty men; which, at Khaled's request, was readily granted. Then he begged the general to raise the siege, and pitch his tents at about three miles distance from the castle; which petition likewise was immediately complied with. The following night, Dames, who had posted himself with his party very near the citadel, found means to seize a Greek belonging to the garison, from whom, by the assistance of a Christian Arab he had taken, who served him for an interpreter, he learned several agreeable particulars. The Greek informed him, that, after the siege was raised, Youkinna had exacted large sums of money of the citizens, in order to punish them for the treaty they had concluded with the Arabs; and that he was one of those who had endeavoured to make their escape from the oppression of such a tyrant, by leaping down from the wall. This man Dames took under his protection, by virtue of the submission made by the townsmen to Abu Obeidab; but beheaded five or six others, who fell into his hands, and could give no good account of themselves. He then covered his back and shoulders with a goat's skin, with which he had provided himself for that purpose, and took a dry crust in his hand, creeping gradually on the ground till he got close to the foot of the wall. If he heard any noise, or suspected any person to be near, in order to prevent being discovered, he made such a noise with his crust as a dog does when he is gnawing a bone; his companions sometimes walking, and sometimes creeping along after him in the same manner that he did. He had before dispatched two of his men to Abu Obeidab, to desire that a detachment of horse might be sent him by break of day, to support his small party, and facilitate the execution of the plan he had formed. At last Dames found an opportunity of raising seven men upon his shoulders, who stood upon one another's shoulders in such a manner that the highest of them reached the top of the wall. Here he soon placed himself, seized a watchman he found asleep, and threw him down amongst his companions, who immediately cut him to pieces. Two others in the same condition he stabbed with his dagger, and sent them after the former. Then he laid down his turbant, and drew up the second of his brethren, as they two did the third. By this method, at last, Dames himself, and the remainder of his men, were enabled to mount the wall. The commander having enjoined silence, went himself to see what posture the governor was in; and at last met with an opportunity of observing him, and that without being discovered himself, engaged in discourse with his officers, for whom he had prepared an entertainment, probably on account of Abu Obeidab's raising the siege of the castle, and not in the least apprehensive of any impending danger. Then Dames privately stabbed the centry posted at every gate, and, by favour of the night, put his men in possession of them all, without opposition. However, the soldiers of the garison were at last alarmed, and surrounded the Arabs. The latter defended themselves for some time with great bravery; but being bore down by the multitude of the former, they were upon the point of perishing; when Khaled, with a detachment of cavalry, advanced to their relief. As soon as that general, who was grown terrible to the Christians, appeared, the besieged threw down their arms, and surrendered at discretion. Youkinna, and some of the principal officers, in order to have their wives, children, and riches, restored to them, turned Mohammedans; tho' others chose rather to lose every thing that was dear and valuable to them, than to give their consciences a mortal wound, by preferring to the sublime truths of Christianity the crude absurdities and blasphemous effusions of a most infamous impostor. The castle being taken by storm, it was pillaged by the Moslems; Abu Obeidab reserving a fifth part of the spoil, which was very valuable, in compliance with an injunction in the Koran, and dividing the rest amongst his troops. Dames acquired great glory on this occasion; and, out of complaisance to him, the army did not decamp from Aleppo before he and his men were perfectly cured of their wounds. From the account of the aforesaid siege inserted here, it plainly appears, that the citadel of Aleppo was a place of very great strength; and this it continued to be in the days Ismael Abu'l-feda, as we learn from the express words of that celebrated historian.

The Moslems
take Aazáz.

AFTER the reduction of the citadel of Aleppo, Abu Obeidab intended to have marched with his army to Antioch, in order to oblige that city likewise, then the seat of the Greek emperor, to submit to the Khalif. But he was diverted from carrying that design into execution by Youkinna, who was now become a violent enemy of the Christians. He told the Moslem general, that his conquest of that part of the country would not be complete till he had taken the castle of Aazáz, a place of great importance, where Theodorus, his cousin-german, was then commandant. This fortress he proposed to make himself master of, by putting himself at the head of 100 Arab horse, dressed in the Greek habit, who were to attend him to Aazáz. Upon his arrival there, he was to assure his cousin Theodorus, that he was still in reality a Christian, and had taken that opportunity to escape from the Moslem camp. But to make his story appear more probable, Abu Obeidab was to send after him a detachment of 1000 horse, who were to pursue him as far as Akrab, a village in the neigh-

* AL WAKED. ubi sup. AL AZIZ. apud Ism. Abu'l-feda. in geograph. ut & ipse ABU'LFED. ibid.

- a bourhood of Aazáz, with orders to post themselves there; from whence, if such a measure should be judged necessary, they might easily advance to Aazáz, to facilitate the conquest of that place. Toukinna having prevailed upon Abu Obeidah to approve of his scheme, marched at the head of 100 Arab horse, who appeared like Greeks, to Aazáz, but was, with all his men, immediately taken prisoner by Theodorus, to whom the whole affair had been discovered by an Arab of the tribe of Ghassân, then a spy in the Moslem camp, by means of a pigeon that had carried a letter to him from thence, tied under one of its wings. To oppose the Moslems on this occasion, Theodorus had assembled a body of 3000 Greeks, and 10000 Christian Arabs, besides some other forces that marched to his assistance out of the neighbouring villages. He also expected a reinforcement of 500 horse from the governor of
- b Arrawendân, to whom he had sent an account of the intelligence he had received. With these troops he doubted not, but he should be able to make a stand against the Moslems. In the mean time, Abu Obeidah sent a detachment of 1000 horse under the command of Malec Al Ajbtari, after Toukinna, in the manner concerted between him and the Moslem general, which advanced to Morab. This village Malec found the inhabitants had abandoned at his approach; however, he intercepted a Christian Arab here, who informed him, that Theodorus was apprized of Toukinna's design, and made great preparations to oppose him. Soon after, Malec fell in with the five hundred Arrawendânian horse, sent to the assistance of the governor of Aazáz, and made them all, with Lucas, the prefect, at their head, prisoners. Then ordering his men to disguise themselves in their cloaths, and to take the Christian
- c colours in their hands, he advanced to Aazáz. But before he reached that fortress, he dispatched Tharik Al Ghassâni, the Arab he had intercepted, who, at his request, had professed himself a Moslem, to Theodorus, to inform him that the governor of Arrawendân was on his march, and would soon join him with a body of 500 horse. This, in all probability, of itself would have produced the desired effect; but Malec was introduced into the town by an accident altogether unforeseen, that rendered him master of Aazáz, without the least effusion of Moslem blood. Theodorus had committed Toukinna, and the other prisoners, to the care of his son Leon; who being desperately in love with Toukinna's daughter, whom he had sometimes visited at Aleppo, released them all, restored them their arms, and admitted Malec's detachment into the castle. His elder brother Lucas, at Leon's instigation, killed his father
- d Theodorus, at that time, as Al Walkedi relates, asleep and intoxicated with wine. It was no difficult matter for the Moslems, after this, to possess themselves of the castle of Aazáz. The two pious youths above-mentioned renounced the Christian faith, embraced Mohammedism, and were received by the Moslems with open arms. Nay, Malec himself caressed them both in an extraordinary manner, and was pleased to confer upon the parricide his particular benediction. The forces assembled by Theodorus, at the approach of the Arabs, had taken care to disperse themselves. However there still remained in the castle 1000 young men, 245 old men and monks, 1000 young women and girls, and 180 old women; all which the Moslems probably carried into captivity. Then leaving Saad Ebn Amer with a garison of 100 men at Aazáz, Malec marched with the spoil he had acquired in this expedition to Aleppo.
- e Nothing can give a more just portrait of Islamism, and the infernal disposition of its professors, at least in the time of Omar than the conduct of Malec on this occasion, which was authorized by the example of Mohammed himself. That impostor oftener than once, when other means failed, carried his point by assassinations, as has been already observed. The castle of Aazáz, mentioned here by Al Walkedi, seems to be the Ezzaza, or Azaza, of Abu'lfeda, a town with a citadel of considerable strength, situated in a very pleasant part of the territory of Aleppo, to the N. W. of that place. Another Arab author assures us, that in his time the inhabitants of this place breathed a very salubrious air, and had many wells or fountains which supplied them with excellent water. He also pretends, that no scorpions would then live amongst them. Besides this, there is another Azaza, not far from Rakka, the
- f Areka, Arekka, or Nicephorion, of the ancients, in Mesopotamia. That city is seated on the Euphrates, and supposed by Goli to be the same place with Ara, where the famous Abetani, whom we shall probably have occasion hereafter to mention, made his astronomical observations. Abu'lfeda assigns the Azaza in the district of Aleppo, or the Aazáz of Al Walkedi, long. 61° 55', lat. 36° 0'.

WHILST Malec was on his march for Aleppo, he was joined by a Moslem detachment of Haïm Ebn 1000 horse, under the command of Al Fadl Ebn Al Abbâs, whom Abu Obeidah had sent to Jabalab Ebn plunder all the villages about Manbij. This he had effectually done, and was with the spoil Al Aynam on his route to the Moslem camp. There were in Al Fadl's detachment about two hundred d. f. is a Moslem detachment.

<sup>a</sup> AL WAKEDI. ubi sup. ISM. ABU'LFED. de vit. Moham. c. xxx. v. 64, & alib. AL JANNAB. p. 102, & alib. AL TABARI. apud AL MAKIN, ut & ipse AL MAKIN, ibid. JOAN. GAGN. not. ad ISM. Abu'lfed. de vit. Moham. ubi sup. & la vie de Mahom. tom. i. p. 351, 352, & alib. BEN SAUD, apud ISM. Abu'lfed. in geogr. ut & ipse ABU'LFED. ibid. BOHADIN BEN SJEDDAD, in vit. Salad. p. 51. AL E. SCHULT. ubi sup. PROL. geogr. lib. v. c. 15. GOLII not. ad Asiagan. p. 252, 253, 254, 255.

renegado's, who had formerly served under Youkinna in the castle of Aleppo, and with him likewise had renounced the Christian faith. These Youkinna desired Al Fadl to permit to march under his orders to Antioch, that he might have an opportunity of doing some service to the Khalif, by their assistance, there. This being granted, he, with four friends that he could intirely confide in, struck out into a by-way that led to Antioch, the other renegado's being commanded to keep the high road to that place. Youkinna and his friends soon met with a party of imperial horse, that seized them, and conducted them to Antioch. Youkinna being brought before his old master Heraclius, who then resided at Antioch, informed him, that, "he was still a Christian, tho', in order to be the more capable of serving his imperial majesty, he had pretended to be a Moslem; and that he had taken the opportunity of flying to him from Aazâz, solely with a view of demonstrating his fidelity to him." This open and explicit declaration made such an impression upon the emperor, that he did not only constitute him the commander of the 200 men, who, as he pretended, had made their escape with him, and who arrived soon after him at Antioch, but also sent him with a body of 2200 men, to conduct his youngest daughter, then in a place at a considerable distance from home, to court. Youkinna, with the troops under his command, who served the princess for an escorte, being on his return to Antioch, received advice from some of his advanced guards, that he would soon come up with a party of Arabs asleep, with their horses feeding by them, all of whom he might easily put to the sword. But Youkinna taking these to be Moslems, whom he had a secret inclination to serve to the utmost of his power, commanded them to be taken prisoners, in order to be exchanged for some Christians that Abu Obeidah had still in his hands. However, they happened to be not Moslems, but Christian Arabs, of the tribe of Ghassân, under the conduct of Haïm Ebn Jabalah Ebn Al Ayham, who had surprized a Moslem detachment, commanded by Derâr, that had been foraging in the northern parts of Syria. Derâr himself was taken prisoner, with 200 men, and many of the Moslems likewise were killed in the action. Youkinna paid his respects to Haïm in a very complaisant, tho' at the same time hypocritical, manner, and congratulated him upon his good success. We are told by Al Wakedi, that when the prisoners were brought into the emperor's presence, they refused to approach him with those marks of homage and submission that his subjects did, which they termed adoration; and that Derâr being asked the reason of this, replied, that their prophet had forbidden them to pay adoration to any creature. The emperor then proposed several questions to Kais Ebn Amer, an old man, one of them concerning Mohammed. Amongst others, he asked him, "By what signs or tokens their prophet perceived himself inspired, when he first set up for a reformer?" To which, Kais, almost in Mohammed's own words, made answer, "Sometimes he heard a sound resembling that of a bell, but stronger and sharper; sometimes an angel in a human shape appeared to him, and discoursed with him upon various subjects, and once, according to Ayesha, the spirit of prophecy descended upon him on a very cold day, and, after its departure, he was in a violent sweat. The first message," continued he, "that he received, was in a dream; others were imparted to him in visions, which resembled the morning brightness. At such times he confined himself in some solitary place, till the Truth appeared. Once an angel approaching him, said READ; to which he replied he could not read, as being perfectly illiterate: upon which the command was repeated, and attended with a promise, that God, who had inspired man with the art of writing, would graciously remedy this defect in him. At another time, being on mount Harâ, and hearing himself called, he looked upwards, and saw the angel Gabriel on a throne, between heaven and earth; at which sight being greatly terrified, he returned to his wife Khadijah, and said to her, Zammilouni, zammilouni; Wrap me up, wrap me up: after, which, the angel descended, and revealed to the prophet the words that form part of the seventy-third and seventy fourth chapter of the Korân." Then the emperor demanded of Kais, "Whether he had ever been an eye-witness of any of Mohammed's miracles?" To which Kais replied, that "he was once with Mohammed, when he pressed an idolatrous Arab to acknowledge that there was only one God, and that he was his prophet. This the Arab refused to do, unless Mohammed could produce some witnesses to attest the reality of his mission: upon which, the prophet calling a tree to him, that stood at some distance, it instantly obeyed him, came erect to him, plowing up the ground with its roots, and said three times aloud, Thou art the apostle of God. After which, it returned to its former place." Then Kais in answer to several other questions, assured the emperor that "every virtuous action according to the principles of the Moslems, would be intitled to a tenfold reward; but every evil one would be punished precisely according to the degree of its demerit; that their prophet was the witness in this world, and would be that in the world to come; that he really performed a night-journey to heaven, actually conversed there with God himself, and received several institutions immediately from him; and that they were all of them obliged to fast the month of Ramadân, in which, on the night

- a "night Al Kadr, the Korán was sent down from heaven." All which he endeavoured to support by passages taken out of the Korán. This impious deduction of falsehoods so incensed a venerable bishop, who was present at the conference, that he could not forbear uttering some things that seemed to reflect upon Mohammed; which so exasperated Derár Ebn Al Azwar, one of the prisoners, that he gave him the most opprobrious language, affirming, that Mohammed was a prophet divinely inspired, but that the knowledge of such an excellent truth was intercepted from him by the veil of infidelity. This language, says Al Wakedi, so provoked some of the Christians who heard it, that they drew their swords, to chastise his insolence, and made fourteen pushes at him; but he was delivered from them in a most wonderful and surprizing manner. However, he would have been immediately executed,
- b by the emperor's command, had not Youkinna procured a respite for him. These circumstances we could not omit inserting here, as they are a clear and incontestable proof of the enthusiastic genius and disposition of the Arabs in the days of Omar. The Moslem general treated with uncommon marks of distinction both Malec, who had acquired such reputation at Aazáz, and Al Fadl, who had so effectually pillaged the villages in the neighbourhood of Manbij, after their return to Aleppo. It may not be improper to observe, that Manbij was a city of the province of Kinnisrín, situated in a plain, about two days journey from Aleppo, and one from the Euphrates. It seems to have derived its name from a Magian temple called Manba, erected on a spot at a small distance from it, by one of the Persian kings, surnamed Khostrú, who subjugated Syria. It has been proved by Golius to answer to the Hierapolis of Ælian, Appian, Pliny, and Strabo. It was famous for the worship of the goddess Atargatis, Derceto, Athara, Astbara, or Astarte; by all which names that deity went. There stood a little fortified town on the Euphrates, the fields adjacent to which were irrigated and fertilized by the water of that river, called the Bridge of Manbij; which is supposed by Golius to have been the Zeugma of the antients. The temple of the Dea Syria, Dea Hierapolitana, who was the Syrian or Phœnician Astarte, was immensely rich when it was plundered by Crassus, as we learn from Appian. Some think, that the Magian temple above-mentioned was the temple of the Syrian goddess taken notice of by the antients; and that it was converted into a FIRE-TEMPLE by one of the latter Persian kings, surnamed Khostrú. Be that as it will, our learned readers will find a very large and curious description of Manbij drawn up by Golius, to whom, for their farther satisfaction in this particular, we shall beg leave to refer them<sup>c</sup>.

- AFTER Abu Obeidab had been rejoined by all his detachments, which he had sent out on different occasions, he began his march to Antioch, which he proposed to reduce to the obedience of the Khalíf. He made himself master of several fortified places, that surrendered to him on his march, and then advanced to the bridge called the Iron bridge, at a very small distance from Antioch. In the mean time, the emperor appointed the treacherous Youkinna governor of that city, constituting him at the same time commander of all his forces on that side, and delivered to him a crucifix that was never exposed to public view, but upon very extraordinary occasions. The emperor then, being informed of the approach
- e of the Moslem army, discovered an inclination to put all the prisoners taken by Haim Ebn Jabalab Ebn Al Ayham to death; but was diverted from that design by Youkinna, who represented to him, that it would be better to exchange them for an equal number of Christian captives, that either had or might fall into the hands of the Arabs. Amer Ebn Refâa, one of them, embraced the Christian religion, and was baptized in the great church of Antioch. His conversion, says Al Wakedi, in this point possibly not quite an impartial writer, was effected more by the dress and beauty of the Greek ladies, of whom he was a vast admirer, than any conviction of conscience. Be that, however, as it will, this event gave his father Refâa infinite uneasiness and concern; who, upon hearing the first news of it, broke out into a very passionate exclamation, too large to be described here. After his
- f baptism, he was received with great kindness both by the bishops and the emperor. The latter of whom made him a present of a young woman and a horse; and then ordered him to be incorporated in the body of Arab troops commanded by Jabalab Ebn Al Ayham. The patriarch asked the other prisoners, what hindered them from following his example? To which they answered, "The truth of our religion." The patriarch then represented to them the danger to which they exposed themselves, by displeasing JESUS CHRIST. To which they replied, that "it would one day be seen which party was rejected, and which "in the favour of God." The emperor desired to know what could induce the Khalíf to appear in such mean and sordid attire, so different from that of other princes, when he had taken so much wealth from the Christians? Refâa told him, "The consideration of the "other world, and the fear of God." The emperor asked them farther, what sort of a palace the Khalîf had? They answered, "One of mud." "Who," said he, "are his "attendants?" "Beggars," replied they, "and poor people." "What tapestry does

<sup>c</sup> AL WAKED. ubi sup. AL KOR. MOHAM. f. xcvi, lxxiii, lxxiv, vi, xl, xlviii, xxxiii, &c. SALE's notes on the Kor. f. xcvi, lxxiii, lxxiv. ISM. ABU'LFED. in geogr. YACUT, ÆLIAN. hist. animal. lib. xii. c. 11. APPIAN. in Parthic. p. 223. PLIN. lib. v. cap. 23, 24. STRAB. lib. xvi. STEPH. BYZANT. THEOPHAN. chronograph. Vide etiam GOLII not. ad Alfragan. p. 260, 261, 262. & CHRIST. CELLAR. geograph. antiq. lib. iii. c. 12. p. 428, Lipsiæ, 1706.

 "he sit upon?" "Justice and equity." "What is his throne?" "Abstinence and cer"tain knowledge." What is his treasure?" Trust in God." Who are his guards?" "The "stoutest of the UNITARIANS." To which they added, "Knowest thou not, O king!
 "that some have said to him, O Omar! thou possessest the treasures of the Cæsars; kings "and great men are also subdued unto thee; why, therefore, puttest thou not on rich gar"ments?" To whom he made answer, "Ye seek the outward world, but I the favour of "him who is Lord both of that and the other." A sort of enthusiastic and fanatical cant b this, extremely similar to that which prevailed in our own nation about a century ago, and even not at present grown into absolute disuse amongst us; which, whatever disposition it may be intended to exhibit, in reality points out nothing, for the most part, to the sober, rational, and we may add, the virtuous part of mankind, but SATANICAL HYPOCRISY, to adopt the very terms made use of by Theophanes and Cedrenus on the present occasion <sup>f</sup>.

and takes the two towers
 there.

ABU OBEIDAH being arrived at the Iron Bridge, in the neighbourhood of Antioch, with all his forces, made the proper dispositions for attacking that important post. The two towers erected there were places of considerable strength, and furnished with numerous garisons, that were commanded by 300 officers. But they surrendered to the Moslem gene- c ral, without making any defence. A certain great man coming one day from court to visit these towers, and see what condition they were in, as he generally did once a day at this dangerous conjuncture, observed a total neglect of duty; the soldiers being engaged in drinking and riotous living, and having deserted all their posts. Incensed at such an intolerable relaxation of discipline as this, he ordered them fifty lashes apiece; which inspired them with vindictive sentiments. As soon, therefore, as Abu Obeidah with his army appeared, they proposed to him a capitulation, which he immediately signed; and they, in consequence of this, delivered the towers into his hands. This is a full and incontestable proof of the great degeneracy of the Greeks, and of the irrecoverable loss of discipline amongst their troops, at this fatal period; which will of itself, even without the additional confiderations that have already been offered, enable us to account for the rapid progress, made d at this time by the Moslems, in the conquest of Syria <sup>2</sup>.

An attempt to assassinate the Khalîf mis-carries.

WHEN the emperor received advice of the surrender of the Iron Bridge, and that it had submitted to the Arabs in so ignominious a manner, he could not forbear giving Antioch itself up for lost, nor bemoaning the unhappy fate of Syria. This being observed by Jaba- lah Ebn Al Ayham, king of Ghassân, he told him, that however embroiled his affairs might then appear, they would be perfectly re-established by an assassination of the Khalîf. He, therefore, undertook to perform this piece of service for the emperor; and dispatched one Watbek Ebn Mosâfer, an Arab of his tribe, and a resolute young man, to Medina, for that purpose. Watbek, some time after his arrival there, observing Omar to fall asleep under a tree on which he had placed himself, so as not to be discovered by any person whatsoever, c drew his dagger, and was upon the point of stabbing him, when, lifting up his eyes, he saw a lion walking round about him, and licking his feet. Nor did the lion cease to guard the Khalîf till he awoke; but then instantly went away. This struck Watbek with a most profound reverence for Omar, whom he now looked upon as the peculiar care of heaven.
 He, therefore, came down from the tree, on which the lion had forced him to remain, kissed the Khalîf's hand, confessed his crime, and embraced the Mohammedan religion; being so strongly affected with the wonderful deliverance he had been an eye-witness of. In the mean time, the Moslem and the Christian armies before Antioch were drawn up in order of battle.
Nestorius, one of Heraclius's commanders, challenged any man in the Moslem army to fight him in single combat, before the beginning of the action. This challenge was accepted by f Dames, who had distinguished himself on a former occasion, and a combat was accordingly fought. But Dames's horse stumbling in the engagement, he was seized before he could recover himself, and carried bound to Nestorius's tent. This affair being over, Nestorius engaged, in a second combat, one Dekâc, who behaved with great bravery and resolution.
 The multitude of soldiers on both sides that assembled to see the combatants, was so great and tumultuous, that they overturned Nestorius's tent; and, in the hurry and confusion which this occasioned, Dames, who was there confined, found means to make his escape.
 Nothing decisive happened between Nestorius and Dekâc, who were so equally matched that they found themselves obliged to part by consent. Whilst these things happened, Youkima remained within the city, and turned all the power he enjoyed against his natural sovereign, g

<sup>f</sup> AL WAKED. ubi sup. THEOPHAN. chronograph. p. 281. GEORG. CEDREN. historiar. compend. p. 426, 427.
<sup>2</sup> AL WAKED. ubi sup. OCKLEY'S hist. of the Sarac. vol. i. p. 19. SALE'S prelim. disc. sect. iii. p. 36, &c.

- a who had intrusted him with it. He not only released all the prisoners taken by Haïm Ebn Jabalab above-mentioned, and restored them their arms, but likewise assured them, that many persons of quality engaged in the emperor's service were disposed to a revolt. This coming to that prince's ears, he began absolutely to despond; and being at the same time greatly terrified by his crown's falling from his head, and a bad dream, in which a person seemed to thrust him out of his throne, both of which he interpreted as ill omens, he left his troops in and about Antioch to themselves, and embarked for Constantinople with some of his domestics, that had attended him privately to the sea-shore. In fine, tho' Heraclius was a prince of admirable courage and conduct, had done what possibly could be done to restore the discipline of the army, and had had great success against the Persians; yet the very
- b vitals of the empire seemed then to have been mortally wounded; so that the Arabs, by reason of the extreme degeneracy of the Greeks, who were at this time become even the very scum of mankind, found it no difficult matter to carry the vast designs they had formed into execution<sup>h</sup>.

- AFTER the two combats above-mentioned, which had no great effect either upon the Abu Obeidah Christian or the Moslem affairs, the two armies came to a general action. The Christians at first behaved with a good degree of bravery and resolution; but through the treachery of Xoukinna and several other persons of note, as well as the activity of Derâr and his companions, who were intermixed with Xoukinna's men, they were at last overthrown with very great slaughter. This defeat, which rendered the Greeks incapable of making any farther
- c resistance, occasioned the loss of Antioch. The people of the town perceiving the battle lost, surrendered immediately to Abu Obeidah, and paid him down the sum demanded of them, which amounted to 300,000 dinârs. After which, the Moslem general triumphantly entered the town. This, according to Al Wakedi, happened on Tuesday, August 21st, in the year of our Lord 638, and in the 17th year of the Hejra. Antioch, or Antiochia, called by the Arabs Antakiyah, or Anthakia, was seated upon the Orontes, and stiled the head, or metropolis, of Syria by Strabo. It was a city of very large extent, stood in a fertile pleasant province, abounding with wells or fountains, and about a day's journey from the Mediterranean. The walls were built of stone, being extremely strong and thick; and, besides them, the place was fortified with a very considerable number of towers, which rendered it capable
- d of sustaining a long siege. It was founded by Seleucus Nicator, who, from his father Antiochus, denominated it Antioch, or Antiochia. The same prince also built another city, that, from himself, he called Seleucia; a third, to which, from his wife Apama, he gave the name of Apamea; and a fourth, that, from his mother, he named Laodicea. Antioch consisted of four cities, and for that reason was stiled Tetrapolis by Strabo. It may now be considered as a large village, if not a collection of villages; many fields, pastures, and gardens, as well as houses, being contained within the remains of the antient walls, which are still to be seen. The houses are inhabited chiefly by Christians and Jews; not many of the Turks being settled there. The patriarchal see, which formerly rendered this city so famous, was long since translated to Damascus; so that the person who now supplies the place of the patriarch can scarce be looked upon as equal to an acolyte. Some traces of Christian antiquity
- e are still visible in the northern part of the place, which have been touched upon by several authors. The lake of Antioch, about three miles distant from the remains of the town, is about twenty miles long, and seven broad. The tract to which this belongs is called Alamk. Into this lake three rivers disembogue themselves; the Ifrin, which moves in an eastern direction; the Afwad, or black river, which comes from the west; and the Yagra, that derives its name from a Christian village thro' which it passes. Within the circumference of the walls there are five mountains, and the place was fortified in Abu'lfeda's days by a citadel. The walls were likewise, in the Moslem times, both strengthened and adorned with 360 towers. The city had then also five gates. Ebn Hawkel assigned it the next
- f place to Damascus, in point of dignity and pleasantness of situation. Al Azizi relates, that the walls were twelve miles in compass. The tomb of the Moslem martyr Habib Alnajjar, held in the highest veneration by the Mohammedans, was to be seen here in the time of Saladin. Abu'lfeda places Antioch in long. 60° 00', and lat. 35° 00'. In fine, the inhabitants of this city, when it was reduced by Abu Obeidah, enjoyed such a profusion of delights, that he would not permit his troops to stay there above three days. He imagined that a continuance in so charming a place would enervate his men, and render them unfit for action, as well as absolutely incapable of sustaining the fatigues of war<sup>i</sup>.

<sup>h</sup> AL WAKED. ubi sup. OCKLEY, ubi sup. p. 19, 20. THEOPHAN. in vit. Herac. SALE, ubi sup. <sup>i</sup> AL WAKED. ubi sup. STRAB. lib. xvi. p. 516. PLIN. lib. v. cap. 21. PROL. lib. v. cap. 15. THEOD. hist. eccles. lib. v. c. 11. CIC. pro Arch. cap. iii. PROCOPI. lib. ii. c. 10. & lib. v. c. 5. AMMIAN. MARCELLIN. ISM. ABU'LFEDA, in geogr. EBN HAWKEL & AL AZIZI, apud Ism. Abu'lfeda. ubi sup. BOHAD. vit. & res gest. Salad. p. 86. GOLLII notæ ad Alfragan. p. 278—282. ALB. SCHULT. ind. geograph. in vit. Salad. &c.

Abu Obeidah
sends the Kha-lif advice of this by an express.

ABU OBEIDAH having thus made himself master of Antioch, dispatched an express to the Khalif with an account of the success that still attended his arms. He informed him, that Heraclius had taken his flight to Constantinople, and that, by abandoning his subjects in Syria, he had thrown Antioch into the hands of the Moslems. To which he added, that the Moslems had discovered a strong inclination to marry the Greek women; which, as a thing not at all conformable to the spirit of the Korân, he had forbidden them to do. Zeid Ebn Waheb, Omar Ebn Awf's slave, who was employed as an express on this occasion, did not only obtain his master's consent to go to Medina, but was likewise manumitted by him, for the alacrity he discovered when Abu Obeidah first made choice of him for that service. Omar, in answer to his lieutenant in Syria, expressed great satisfaction at the reduction of Antioch, permitted his subjects who had no families in Arabia to marry the Greek women, and allowed them the liberty of purchasing as many female slaves as they pleased. In the conclusion of his letter, he commanded Abu Obeidah to pursue the enemy into the mountainous part of the country, and to take the most effectual measures to secure the conquests he had made. We are told by Al Makin, that Abu Obeidah was so much pressed this year, that he was obliged to demand assistance of Saad Ebn Abu Wakkâs, who commanded the Moslem forces in Persia, who sent him a reinforcement of 40,000 men. He also relates, that Omar himself came this year to Damascus; and that this was the fourth expedition he made in person. But we find neither of the two last particulars mentioned by any other Arab historian<sup>k</sup>.

Khâled takes several towns not far from the Euphrates.

Soon after the surrender of Antioch, Khâled Ebn Al Walid, one of the most active of the Moslem generals, advanced with a body of troops as far as the Euphrates, took Manbij, Berâa, Bales, or Balis, and several other towns. He also exacted of the inhabitants 100,000 dinârs, for their present security, and obliged them to submit to an annual tribute, which he imposed upon them, for the time to come. This happened in the month of Al Mobar-ram, and the 18th year of the Hejra; which answers to January, in the year of our Lord 638. To what has been already observed of Manbij, we must beg leave to add, that it was sometimes called by the antients Bambyce, as well as Hierapolis, as we learn from Pliny; and that Manba, or Menba, from whence Manbij is apparently derived, seems to be a corruption of the former name. The word Manba, or Menba, was first used by the Persians, after they had made themselves masters of Bambyce, or Hierapolis; so that the aforesaid corruption, if it be really one, must be imputed to them. This place was famous not only for the worship of Astarte, or Derceto, as she is called by Ctesias, but likewise on account of the sacred fishes, at the head of which that goddess was supposed to have been; a most curious description of which we meet with in Ælian. According to Ebn Hawkel, it is situated in a plain, whose fields are frequently refreshed with rain, and produce nothing noxious or bitter. All the adjacent territory was formerly covered with a face of plenty, contained many aqueducts, and abounded with mulberry-trees, which supported a vast number of silk-worms, from whence proceeded very considerable quantities of down, or silk-yarn, that was spun by those animals. Hence probably came the Persic name Pambe, or Pembe, pronounced by the Arabs Bambe, which denoted that kind of down, or yarn. From the Persic Pambe, or Pembe, in all likelihood, the Greek and Latin word Bombyx, signifying the same thing, and consequently Bambyce, the ancient name of Hierapolis, taken notice of by Pliny, is to be deduced. Pambe, Pembe, or Bambe, some of the orientals might naturally convert into Mambe, as Baalbec into Malbec, Becca into Mecca, &c. from whence might come the Arabic, Menbij, or Manbij, and the Syriac Mabog. For the Syrians frequently expunged Nun, as from a great number of instances might easily be evinced. These observations will enable us to emend a passage in Pliny, wherein, according to the present reading, that author informs us, that the Syrians called Hierapolis, or Bambyce, Magog. For, from what has been advanced, we may infer, that Magog there was originally Mabog. Manbij, according to an oriental geographer, was about ten parasangs distant from Aleppo, and three from the Euphrates. The longitude assigned Manbij by Abu'l-feda is 62° 50', and the latitude 36° 35'<sup>l</sup>.

BESIDES Manbij, Berâa, or rather Bira, and Balis, the Arabs, about this time, if not the preceding year, possessed themselves of Raabân, Dulouc, Korus, the Cyrus, or Cyrrhus, of the antients, Tezîn, and several other fortified towns in the neighbourhood of the Euphrates; nothing now being able to stand before them. Balis is a small fortress of Kinnisrîn, on the western bank of the Euphrates. It faces Arakka, or Arrakka, on the opposite bank, and stands upon the confines of the deserts of Shâm and Irâk. It is also, according to Abu'l-feda, about thirteen parasangs off Arrakka, and fifteen off Aleppo. Raabân, or Rahaba, is likewise seated on the western bank of the Euphrates, at no very great distance from Tadmor, which stands in a south-western direction from it. Rahaba has a castle of some strength, and was a overturned by an earthquake; but rebuilt by Saifo'ddawla. Bira was a little fortified town, with a citadel of considerable strength, on the eastern bank of the Euphrates, above the city of Manbij, tho' in the district belonging to that place. The longitude assigned it by Abu'lfeda is  $62^{\circ} 30'$ , and the latitude  $36^{\circ} 50'$ . As for Duluc, Korus, Tezin, and other small fortresses, taken about this time by the Moslems, and situated in this part of Syria, we must refer our curious readers, for a description of them, to Goli, and the eastern geographers, who, in this point, will give them full and ample satisfaction <sup>m</sup>.

<sup>k</sup> AL WAKED. ubi sup. AL MAKIN, hist. Saracen. lib. i. c. 3. p. 23.

<sup>l</sup> AL WAKED. ubi sup. PLIN. lib. v. c. 23. STRAB. lib. xvi. p. 517. ÆLIAN. hist. animal. lib. xii. cap. 2. CTESIAS, apud Strabon. ubi sup. LUCIAN. de Dea Syr. ISM. ABU'LFED. in geogr. EBN HAWKEL, apud Abu'lfed. ibid. YACUT, GOLI not. ad Alfragan. p. 98, 99, 260, 261, 262, 279. ALB. SCHULT. ind. geograph. in vit. Salad. pass.

UPON Zeid's arrival from Medina at the Moslem camp, Abu Obeidah perused with great attention the letter he brought to him from the Khalif; and finding an order therein to invade the mountainous part of Syria, he demanded of the general officers, which of them would command the body of troops destined for that invasion. For some time they were all silent, tho' from what motive their silence proceeded no one could pretend to say. But, at last, Meisarab Ebn Mesrouk offered his service, and received from the general a black standard, with the following inscription upon it in white letters: THERE IS BUT ONE GOD; MOHAMMED IS THE APOSTLE OF GOD. The body assigned him for this expedition consisted of 300 Arabs, besides 1000 black slaves commanded by Dames. Meisarab, at the head of his troops, with some difficulty, ascended the mountains, and, with much more, advanced to that part of the tract where the emperor's forces were posted. The cold was so intense on the summits of these mountains, that the Arabs, who had always been inured to a hot climate, could scarce sustain the severity of it. For some time, they could not meet with a single person to give them intelligence of the enemy's motions; but at last they took a Greek prisoner, who informed them, that the imperial army, which consisted of 30,000 men, lay incamped upon a spot not above three leagues from them. The prisoner refusing to profess Islamism, the Moslems cut off his head, and then moved towards the imperial camp. The Greeks, having received advice of this invasion of the Moslems, advanced to meet them, and quickly appeared in fight. Then the action soon began, and Meisarab was hemmed in on all sides, tho' for some time he defended himself with extraordinary bravery. However, being overpowered at last, he was obliged to dispatch a courier to Abu Obeidah, to let him know the danger he was in, and to desire a speedy reinforcement. Upon the arrival of the courier at the Moslem camp, Abu Obeidah instantly detached Khaled Ebn Al Walid with a body of 3000 horse, to support Meisarab; and, after him, Ayyad Ebn Ganem, with 2000 more, for the same purpose. In the mean time, Abd'allah Ebn Hodafa, an Arab of distinction, and one of Omar's particular favourites, was taken prisoner by the enemy, and sent directly to Constantinople. But notwithstanding the advantage gained by the Greeks, they thought fit to retire at the approach of the Moslem horse, under the conduct of Khaled, who was extremely dreaded by the Christians, and abandoned in the night all their tents, together with all the rich furniture and most valuable effects in them, to the Arabs. However, as Meisarab and his men had little knowledge of the country they were in, he did not judge it proper to pursue them, but returned with his detachment to Abu Obeidah, and gave him an account of what had happened. This the Moslem general took care to notify to Omar, who was greatly concerned at the captivity of Abd'allah Ebn Hodafa; and, in order to procure his liberty, wrote to the Greek emperor the following letter: "In the name of the most merciful God. Praise be to God, the LORD of all creatures; who hath taken no wife, nor hath he begotten any issue. And the blessing of God be upon Mohammed, his prophet and apostle, divinely assisted. From the servant of God, Omar Ebn Al Khattab, to Heraclius, king of Greece. As soon as this letter shall reach thee, send me the prisoner that is with thee, whose name is Abd'allah Ebn Hodafa. This if thou shalt think proper to do, I shall hope that God will direct and lead thee into the right way. But if thou refusest, I shall send thee men, whom trade and merchandize shall not divert from the remembrance of God. Health and happiness be upon every one that follows the right way." Heraclius having received this letter, not only dismissed Abd'allah Ebn Hodafa, but likewise made both him and the courier dispatched to Constantinople by Omar several very valuable presents, and allowed them a sufficient guard to conduct them safe through that part of his territories they were to traverse. He also sent a jewel of very great value as a present to the Khalif, who offered it to the jewellers at Medina; but they were ignorant of the worth of it. The Moslems begged him to keep it for his own use; but that he said he could not answer to the public. Being, therefore, sold, the money paid for it was put into the treasury; of which the Khalifs, in these early times of Islamism, looked upon themselves only as the stewards and managers. They seldom, notwithstanding it was all at their disposal, applied any part of it to their own private use, much less to gratify a luxurious and extravagant taste; but expended it in such a manner as rendered it the most serviceable to the public. We are told by Al

<sup>m</sup> ISM. ABU'LFED. ubi sup. GOLII notæ ad Alfragan. p. 249, 259, 279, &c. ALBERT. SCHULT. ubi sup. See also SALE's map of Arabia, prefixed to his preliminary discourse.

Wakedi, that several attempts were made at the imperial court to prevail upon Abd'allah Ebn Hodâfa to drink wine, eat hogs-flesh, and, in fine, to become a Christian; but without effect. He was not only tempted by advantageous offers, but likewise menaced, and confined in a room three days together without any sustenance, in order either to induce him by pleasing considerations, or force him by motives of terror, to pay adoration to a crucifix, as well as to eat and drink what was prohibited by the Korân; but all the means made use of to draw him out of the paths of Islamism proved ineffectual. We are told by Al Makin, that Heraclius besieged Hems with a numerous army in the seventeenth year of the Hejra, and was forced by Abu Obeidab, after he had received a reinforcement from the Khalif, to raise the siege. But from what has been already related here, this seems highly improbable; nor has it been taken notice of by any other, either Arab or Greek historian <sup>a</sup>.

<sup>b</sup> Amru Ebn Al As marches into Palestine; It has been already observed, that, after the reduction of Jerusalem, Omar sent an army, under the command of Amru Ebn Al As, to invade Egypt. That general did not march directly into Egypt, but remained some time in Palestine, in order to take some places that still defended themselves there. As he was advancing to Cæsarea, he found the weather extremely cold. It happened during this march, that Sobeib Ebn Hamzah, by eating some grapes, was so chilled that he could scarce keep pace with the army; which being perceived by an old man, that was a Christian, he persuaded him and his companions, who had suffered likewise by eating grapes, to drink some wine that he set before them, which he assured them would infallibly cure the disorder they laboured under. In consequence of this advice, they drank so freely of that liquor, that Amru plainly discovered them to be disguised, and even inebriated, upon their arrival in the camp. This so provoked him, that he informed Abu Obeidab of the crime they had been guilty of, who immediately ordered them to receive the number of stripes usual on such occasions upon the soles of their feet; which punishment was accordingly inflicted upon them. This so irritated Sobeib, that he would have killed the poor man that supplied him with wine, as a remedy for his disorder, had he not before been taken under the protection of the Moslems. So strict were the Arabs at this time in their observance of that negative precept of the Korân, relating to inebriating liquors; though some of the commentators on that book have since approved of the moderate use of them. The more received opinion, however, is, that the Moslems are not only commanded to abstain from all intoxicating liquors, but likewise never to maintain themselves with the money arising from the sale of them; of which we have given our readers a more particular account in a former part of this work <sup>c</sup>.

<sup>d</sup> And has a conference with the emperor's son Constantine. UPON Amru's arrival in Palestine, he was informed, that Constantine, the emperor's son, lay incamped with a body of troops not far from Cæsarea, and was very attentive to his motions. That prince frequently sent some of the Christian Arabs, whom he employed as spies, into the Moslem camp; where one of them, swearing by CHRIST, was discovered, and instantly cut to pieces. This rash action gave great offence to Amru, who ordered his men for the future to bring all the spies they should detect to him, in order to their examination, before they proceeded to such extremities; especially as it was probable that such spies, in cases of conviction, would rather embrace Islamism than suffer death. About this time, Constantine dispatched a priest to Amru, to beg, that he would send an Emîr, or principal officer, to the Christian camp, that he might have a conference with him. This coming to the ears of Belâl, a black, or Ethiopian, who had formerly been the Muedhdin, or crier, that is, the person who calls the people together to prayers, of the prophet, and valued himself not a little on that account, he desired to be employed on this occasion; which, tho' not without great difficulty, was at last granted by Amru. But Belâl having more the appearance of a slave than a principal officer, he was denied admission; which determined Amru himself to go in person. Upon his being introduced to Constantine, he refused to make use of a seat that was offered him, and took his place cross-legged on the ground, after the Arab manner, with his sword upon his thigh, and his lance laid across before him. Constantine then told him, that, "as the Greeks and Arabs were relations they ought not to make war upon one another." To which Amru answered, that their being of a different persuasion would justify that, however nearly related they might be; but that, for his part, he could discover no consanguinity between the Koreish and the Greeks. To this Constantine replied, "Adam, Noah, Abraham, Isaac, and Esau, were the progenitors both of the Greeks and the Arabs, who must therefore be related, and consequently they ought not to quarrel about the division of territories, which was made for them by their forefathers." "True," said Amru, "but that division at present does not subsist. This land was not originally yours, but belonged to the Amalekites, who had it before you." <sup>e</sup>

<sup>a</sup> AL WAKED. ubi sup. AL MAKIN, ubi sup. p. 23. <sup>c</sup> AL WAKED. ubi sup. AL KOR. MOHAM. f. ii. & f. v. JALLALO'DDIN. AL ZAMAKHSHAR. D'HERBEL. biblioth. Orient. p. 6, 6. HADR. RELAND. de relig. Mohammed. lib. i. c. viii. p. 78, 79. SALE'S notes on the Kor. c. ii p. 25, c. v. p. 94. & c. xvi. p. 219. See also his preliminary discourse, sect. v. p. 122, 123, 134.

<sup>f</sup> "Noah

- a “ Noah divided the world amongst his three sons, Shem, Ham, and Japhet; to the first of whom he gave Syria, and what lies round it, from Yaman and Hadramaut to Ammán. Now all the Arabs are the descendents of Shem, Kabtán, Tefm, Jadis, and Amalek, who was the father of the Amalekites. To his son Ham Noah gave the west and sea-shore, and Japhet he left in possession of the tract between the east and the west. We, therefore,” continued he, “ only desire to have this ancient division restored; to take possession of your fertile territories, rich pastures, pleasant rivers, and stately buildings, and relinquish to you our rocky and barren habitations.” “ The present division,” returned Constantine, “ having been already made, it would be injustice in you not to be content with what has fallen to your share.” To which Amru made answer, “ We are so much better pleased with your manner of living in Syria than our own, that we cannot think of leaving so delightful a country till we have made ourselves masters of it. However,” continued he, “ you may still remain secure in the enjoyment of your large possessions, provided you will either change your religion, or pay the tribute exacted by us of unbelievers.” But neither of those conditions pleasing Constantine, Amru told him, that “ he had pointed out to him the means by which he might have saved both himself and his people; but that he was rebellious, like his father Esau, who refused to obey his mother. You pretend to be related to us,” added he; “ but we shall disclaim all manner of consanguinity with you, as long as you persist in your infidelity. Besides, you are descended from Esau, we from Ishmael. God likewise chose Mohammed to be his last great prophet, and had him in view from the creation of Adam to the time that he came out of his father’s loins. This same great prophet Mohammed God made the noblest of the sons of Ishmael, who was the first that spoke Arabic. He also rendered the tribe of Kenánab the most illustrious of the Arabs; the family of Koreish the best of any belonging to that tribe; the offspring of Háshem the most worthy of the Koreish; and Abd’almotalleb, the prophet’s grand-father, the most excellent of the sons of Háshem. To Mohammed likewise he sent the angel Gabriel with inspiration.” Hence it appears, as has been observed by Mr. Ockley, that the Arabs, at this juncture, whatever may be insinuated to the contrary by some Christian writers, were so far from being ashamed of Ishmael, and his mother Hagar, who was Abraham’s slave, that they gloried in being descended from them. Which notion is not only supported by Al Wakedi’s authority here, but likewise confirmed by the concurrent testimony of other Arabian authors <sup>p</sup>.

- THE conference between Constantine and Amru producing no good effect, all hopes of an accommodation vanished into smoke; so that the generals on both sides prepared to enter upon action. As there was now no room for pacific measures, the quarrel between the Christians and the Moslems, the latter of which were undoubtedly the aggressors, was left intirely to the decision of the sword. In the mean time an officer came out of the Christian camp, in very rich apparel, who challenged to fight the stoutest man in the Moslem army. This challenge was accepted by a young Arab officer of Yaman, who being animated by a notion derived from the prophet himself, that the spirits of the martyrs should rest in the crops of green birds, which eat of the fruits and drink of the rivers of paradise, discovered an uncommon eagerness to engage his antagonist. But the Christian officer not only killed this youth, but two or three more of the Moslems, who had the courage to enter the lists against him. Nay, he would finally have dispatched Serjabil Ebn Hosanab, a person so weakened and emaciated by fasting, that he was not able to stand before him, tho’ he could not be diverted from encountering this champion, had not a horseman of the Greek army very opportunely interposed, and with one blow of his scymitar cut off the Christian’s head. This unexpected deliverance greatly surprizing Serjabil, he asked the supposed Greek who he was, and from whence he came? Who replied in the following terms: “ I am the unfortunate Toleiba Ebn Khowailed, who set up for a prophet; and, lying against God, pretended to inspiration.”
- f “ Brother,” answered Serjabil, “ knowest thou not, that God said to our prophet, MY MERCY IS EXTENDED TO EVERY CREATURE THAT DESIRES IT; and that the prophet himself has declared, THAT REPENTANCE TAKES AWAY WHAT WAS DONE BEFORE IT.” To which he added many other considerations, in order to comfort his dejected deliverer. The truth of the matter was; Toleiba was afraid of Kbáled Ebn Al Walid, who had defeated both him and Moseilama, and was the scourge of false prophets. But Serjabil introducing him to Amru, to whom he gave an account of what had happened, that general engaged to bring about between him and Kbáled a reconciliation, and even to procure him, notwithstanding his former defection, a favourable reception at the Khalif’s court. Writing, therefore, a recommendatory letter to Omar, he acquainted him with the signal proof
- g Toleiba had given of his unfeigned repentance, and the sincerity of his conversion. Toleiba

<sup>p</sup> AL WAKED. ubi sup. AL JAWHAR. in voc. Agara. OCKLEY’S hist. of the Sarac. vol. i. p. 331. AL BAIHEKI & AL JARRA. apud Ism. Abu’lfed. de vit. Moham. cap. ii. p. 7. Oxon. 1723, Poc. not. in spec. hist. Arab. p. 45, 46.

found the Khalif at Mecca, where he delivered him the letter, and told him who he was, a expressing at the same time a most hearty sorrow for the enormous crime he had been guilty of. Omar no sooner heard his name mentioned, than he made off as fast as he could, saying, “Alas for me! If I forgive thee, how shall I answer to God the murder of Ocâfab?” “Ocâfab,” answered Toleiba, “suffered martyrdom by my hand; which I am very sorry for, and hope that God will forgive me what I have done.” Omar then having perused the letter sent him by Amru, immediately pardoned him, took him with him to Medina, and employed him afterwards in his wars against the Persians. When Khâled defeated him, he was at the head of the tribe of Asad, which had adhered to him, together with great numbers of the tribes of Ghatfân and Tay. His shattered troops, after the overthrow they had received, were obliged to retire into Syria. Here he lived for some time privately with a Mohammedan, who entertained him in a very hospitable manner, till the false prophet discovered himself to him. But then being dismissed by his benefactor, he proposed to withdraw into some island, where he might the more easily keep himself concealed. This design the Christian army hindered him from carrying into execution, by marching at that very juncture into the part of Syria where he had been forced to seek for refuge; so that he found himself obliged to take on in the emperor’s service. Nor was he greatly averse to this, as he flattered himself it would supply him with an opportunity of ingratiating himself again with his countrymen the Arabs. After he had been pardoned by Omar, he took the oath of fidelity to him, embraced Mohammedism in his presence, and, as we are informed by Al Beidâwi and Al Makîn, being of the tribe of Asad, returned to his own country and people.<sup>a</sup>

Youkinna
takes Tripoli from the Christians by perfidy and surprize.

THOUGH the two armies, which lay incamped very near one another, did not come to a general action; yet frequent skirmishes and rencounters happened between their parties and detachments, wherein the Arabs always had the advantage; and in some of these the Greeks sustained a very considerable loss. This, together with the severity of the season, which was then extremely cold, so dejected the Greek soldiery, that they began to desert in great numbers. Constantine finding his forces to diminish daily, and the Arabs to grow stronger and stronger, he began to be in pain for Cæsarea; and therefore, in order to animate the inhabitants by his presence, he resolved to retire into that city. A proper opportunity, therefore, offering itself, he made his escape thither in a tempestuous night, and abandoned d his camp to the Moslems. Amru considered this as a victory obtained without any effusion of blood, and immediately dispatched a courier to Abu Obeidab, with advice of the precipitate retreat, or rather shameful flight, of the Greeks, and received express orders from him to march directly to Cæsarea, where he promised speedily to join him, in order to form the sieges of Tripoli, Acca, and Tyre. Soon after, Tripoli was taken by Youkinna, who made himself master of it by perfidy and surprize. He had scarce entered the town, when fifty ships from Cyprus and Crete, with a supply of arms and provisions for Constantine’s troops, entered the port. These he seized, together with a considerable number of officers, who were not apprized that Tripoli was possessed by the Arabs, on board them; all which he put into the hands of Khâled Ebn Al Walid, who came in a short time after this seizure e happened, with a Moslem detachment, to take possession of the town. Tripoli, called by the Arabs Tarabolis, Tarabolos, Trablous, Itrabolis, and Atrabolos, is a maritime city of Phœnicia, seated on the Mediterranean, in the district of Hems, and about two days journey to the west of that town. It stands under mount Libanus, or Lebanon, between the mountain called by the Italians the mountain Della Croce, and the promontory stiled formerly by the Greeks the Face of God; from the latter of which it is about a parasang distant. This city derived the name of Tripolis, by which it was known amongst the Greeks, either from the three parts, or cities, of which it was composed, or from the colonies detached from three cities that built it. The first of these seems to be assigned as the reason of the name by Diodorus Siculus, who informs us, that Tripoli consisted of three towns, or cities, which were f about a stadium distant from one another; and the latter by Strabo. The last author, in support of his opinion, observes, that this city was founded by the Sidonians, the Tyrians, and the Aradians; from which circumstance it may very naturally be supposed to have been denominated Tripolis. And these are the very people by whom it is said to have been inhabited by Diodorus Siculus; as well as by Scylax, Stephanus of Byzantium, Pliny, and Mela. It was anciently situated near a plain, and fortified with a wall and several towers. It had likewise a commodious haven, and was plentifully supplied with water by aqueducts and fountains. The present town, according to Abu’lfeda, stands about a mile from the spot occupied by the ancient city, which was demolished by the Moslems about the year of the Hejra 688, when it was taken by Al Malec Al Mansûr, the king, or Soltân, of Egypt. Several g

<sup>a</sup> AL WAKED. ubi sup. AL MAKÎN, ubi sup. p. 16. AL BEIDAWÎ, in AL KOR. Moham. f. v. See also SALE’s notes on the Kor. c. v. p. 90.

- a trees and sugar-canes have since been planted about the place, which at present extends itself on one side towards the declivity of a hill, having on the right hand a plain covered with mulberry trees, which sustain a vast number of silk worms, very considerable quantities of silk being produced here; and on the left an olive-yard, which supplies the neighbouring parts with abundance of oil. The town itself, which consists of above 2000 houses, is without walls or fortifications; but the area which lies between the port and the city is fortified with six or seven square towers, for the greater security of the place. There is a fine plain before the city, at a small distance from the sea. Tripoli is said to stand about 20 German miles from Damascus to the north, and a little farther from Famagusta to the south; and to have been lately the seat of a Turkish Sangiâk. The plain in the neighbourhood of the town, covered with olives, some authors make to be twelve leagues long; and further assure us, that the city is defended by a very strong castle, built upon a rock, at some distance from the town, supposed to have been first erected by the Franks. Some modern writers place Tripoli in long.  $62^{\circ} 30'$ , and lat.  $34^{\circ} 20'$ ; though the longitude assigned it by Abu'lfeida is only  $59^{\circ} 40'$ , and the latitude  $34^{\circ} 00'$ . It abounds with gardens, trees, shrubs, plants, &c. of various kinds. Yâkût, an Arab author, cited by Abu'lfeida, says it was founded by the Greeks; but this must be a mistake. Dr. Pococke, who seems to have given us a tolerable good description of the present state of Tripoli, tells us, that this city is now governed by a Pasha, and situated at the entrance of a narrow valley between the hills, and to the east of a low promontory, that extends itself about a mile into the sea, but is not above half a mile broad. He also relates, that the town is about two miles in circumference, and stands low, tho' there are some buildings belonging to it on the side of the hills. A river likewise, according to him, runs through it, which after great rains, overflows, and does much damage to the city. The valley through which this river passes, he says, is extremely delightful. The harbour, which is used at this time, is sheltered by some islands and rocks towards the west. The square towers abovementioned are about a quarter of a mile distant from each other on the north side of the cape, and at present serve to protect the place against corsairs and privateers; tho' at first probably they might have been joined by a wall erected for defence along the shore. On this side, where the wall might have crossed the promontory, is a little town, called the Marine, inhabited chiefly by Greeks.
- d The custom-house is there, and all goods are landed in small boats from the ships, which lie at a distance. Notwithstanding what has been advanced to the contrary by Al Wakedi, we are assured by Goliûs, who, however, does not cite any oriental historian in proof of what he asserts, that Tripoli, called by the Arabs Trablous Al Shâm, and by the Italians Tripoli di Soria, was taken by Amru Ebn Al As, with the Moslem forces under his command, after two months siege<sup>r</sup>.

- THE ships Youkinna made himself master of in the port of Tripoli, enabled him to undertake an expedition against Tyre, after the reduction of the former city. Having, therefore, put a body of land-forces on board, he set sail for Tyre; and, upon his arrival there, told the citizens, that he had brought with him a supply of arms and provisions for Constantine's army; and therefore desired that he might be admitted into the town. This being granted, he landed about 900 of his men, and met with a kind reception from the Tyrians; but, being soon discovered by one of his own soldiers, they were all seized, and immediately put under arrest. In the mean time, Yezid Ebn Abu Sofiân having not been able to take Cæsarea, as has been already observed, left that place to be besieged by Amru Ebn Al As, who had a larger body of troops under his command, and advanced with his detachment, which did not amount to above 2000 men, to Tyre. At his approach, the governor of the castle ordered Youkinna and his men to be carried prisoners thither, and made a vigorous sally upon the Arabs. In the heat of the action, which was very sharp, one Basil, a Greek officer belonging to the garison of the citadel, who had long had a secret inclination to favour the Moslems, having been intimately acquainted with Boheira, the monk, and with him when he had first an interview with Mohammed at Bosra, released Youkinna and his men; who finding means to inform the other land-forces on board the ships, as well as those commanded by Yezid Ebn Abu Sofiân, of what had happened, the place was carried by storm. For, as soon as Youkinna and his troops found themselves at liberty, they opened the gates, and introduced all their countrymen, whom they had before apprized of what had happened, into the place; so that all the Moslem troops now joining in a body, the people and garison found it impossible to make head against them. Some of them, therefore, fled one way, and some another; but the Arabs pursuing them very closely, great numbers of them were

Yezid Ebn
Abu Sofiân reduces Tyre.

<sup>r</sup> AL WAKEDI. ubi sup. DIOD. SIC. lib. xvi. c. 41. STRAB. lib. xvi. p. 519. SCYL. in peripl. p. 99. POMFON. MEL. lib. i. cap. 12. PLIN. lib. v. cap. 20. STEPH. BYZANT. in VOC. Ἱππὸν. ISM. ABU'LFED. in gen. hist. & geograph. YAKUT, apud Abu'lfeida. ubi sup. GOLII not. ad Alfragan. p. 282—285. BOHAD. ubi sup. p. 70. ALB. SCHULT. ubi sup. Pococke's description of the East, vol. ii. par. i. p. 100, 101, 102.

put to the sword. However, Yezid at last told them, that tho' by staying till the town was carried by assault, they had forfeited their lives, or at least their liberty, yet if they would become converts to Islamism, they should meet with the same treatment as did the Moslems. The greatest part of them, therefore, in order to secure their liberty, privileges, and possessions, embraced Mohammedism. Constantine, receiving advice of the surrender of Tripoli and Tyre, set sail with his family, and the greatest part of his wealth, for Constantinople, on board a ship he had prepared for that purpose; so that the war in Syria now seemed to be drawing towards a conclusion. The city of Tyre, at this time reduced by the Moslems, was called by the orientals Sur, or Tzur, from whence the Romans seem to have derived the name Sarra, which they sometimes applied to that place; as the word Sur, or Tzur, the original name, may, with equal propriety, be converted into Tyr, or Tyrus, and Sar, or Sarra. It was formerly the principal city of Phœnicia, mistress of the sea, and extremely well fortified both by nature and art. It was all, except about a fourth part of it, surrounded by the sea; which rendered it almost inaccessible, especially as the spot joining it to the continent had an exceeding strong citadel erected upon it. Tyre sustained a five months siege, in the year of the Hejra 518, or of CHRIST 1124; when the Franks, or Christians, starved it to a surrender. From them the Moslems took it the year of the Hejra 690, or of our LORD 1291. After which, it fell to decay, and became at last buried in its own ruins; so that it has, for several ages, been little better than a mere solitude, in exact completion of some of Ezekiel's prophecies concerning it. Tyre was anciently seated in an island, which remained after the days of Alexander the Great connected with the neighbouring continent. It was a town of great antiquity, but not so ancient as Sidon; the people of that city having been the founders of it. We find it no-where mentioned in Scripture before the reign of David; and that it has never been taken the least notice of by Homer, tho' that this celebrated poet mentions both Sidon and the Sidonians, is observed by Strabo. The old city, however, called, after the erection of that which succeeded it, Palætyrus, was built on the continent. The Tyrians, as well as the Sidonians and other Phœnicians, in the remoter periods of antiquity, planted colonies in many parts of the then known world, as we learn from a great number of authors, both antient and modern, and particularly from the learned Bochart. It had a very commodious harbour mentioned and described by Sharif Al Edrisi, an Arabian writer cited by the famous Abu'lfeda. Palætyrus stood within thirty stadia of the new city, and was to the south of it. Yâkût determines its latitude to be  $33^{\circ} 40'$ ; but Abu'lfeda places it in lat.  $32^{\circ} 40'$ , and long.  $58^{\circ} 35'$ . Some remains of the old haven, which with its wall was formerly surrounded by the walls of the town, as well as those of a most remarkable antient aqueduct, and of certain temples, and other superb edifices, were not long since to be seen. This we learn from Goliüs, who had himself been a great traveller in the east, and had undoubtedly visited this place. But for a full and most accurate account of the ruins and remains of the city and aqueduct, or rather aqueducts, of Tyre, we must refer our readers to the description given us of them by the learned Dr. Pococke, who was himself very lately upon the spot; which is much more curious and particular than any thing relating to the present state of Tyre, or, as it is still called by the orientals, Sur, that has hitherto, besides it, been communicated to the world<sup>a</sup>.

Amru Ebn
Al As takes Cæsarea.

At the time that Yezid Ebn Abu Sofiân, by means of Basil's and Youkinna's treachery, made himself master of Tyre, Amru Ebn Al As, with the Arab forces under his command, was carrying on the siege of Cæsarea; which, till the surrender of Tyre, and the departure of Constantine, continued to make a vigorous defence. But the citizens having received advice of those two fatal events, thought it high time now to shift for themselves, and to procure the best terms they could, both for themselves and their families, of the Moslem general. They, therefore, surrendered the city to Amru, and paid him down 200,000 dirhems; in consideration of which, and an annual tribute imposed upon them, they were secured in the free exercise of their religion, as well as the possession of their properties and effects, and taken under the Khalif's protection. As Constantine, with his family, and the best part of his wealth, abandoned Cæsarea, upon the first news of the loss of Tripoli and Tyre, the inhabitants considered themselves as deserted by him, and therefore delivered into Amru's hands all the effects of that prince which he could not carry off with him. Thus

<sup>a</sup> AL WAKED ubi sup. ISM. ABU'LFED. de vit. Moham. cap. iv. p. 10, 11. AHMED EBN YUSEF, sect. i. p. 39. ABU'L HASAN AL BECRI, AL MASUDI, ABU NAZAR, AL BOKHAR. LUDOVIC. MARRACC. in prodrom. par. i. p. 42. GAGN. not ad h'm. Abu'lfed. ubi sup. p. 10, 11, 12. SALE's notes on the Kor. p. 224. JUSTIN. lib. xviii. cap. 3. CURT. lib. iv. c. 4. STRAB. ubi sup. p. 520. PLIN. lib. v. cap. 19. MEL. lib. i. cap. 12. VIRG. georg. lib. ii. v. 506. SIL. ITAL. lib. xv. v. 205. JUV. sat. x. v. 38. GELL. lib. xiv. cap. 6. SERV. in Virg. ubi sup. JOSEPH. lib. ix. EZEK. xxvi. 14, 21. xxviii. 19. DIOD. SIC. lib. xvii. c. 40, & alib. BOCHART. in Phal. & Chan. pass. YAKUT. SHARIF AL EDRIÏ, apud Abu'lfed. in geogr. GOLII. not. ad Alfragan. p. 130, 131. ALB. SCHULT. ubi sup. BOHAD. ubi sup. p. 72, 75, 76, 224, &c. POC. ubi sup. chap. xx. p. 80—84.

- a was Cæsarea taken by the Arabs, towards the close of the seventeenth, or the beginning of the eighteenth, year of the Hejra, and the fifth of the Khalifat of Omar; which answered to the year of our LORD 633, or 639. and the twenty-ninth of Heraclius's reign. Cæsarea was called at first the Tower of Strato; but Herod, after he had repaired, beautified, and enlarged it, gave it the name, in honour of Augustus, of Cæsarea. It is about twelve parasangs S. W. of Acca; and was taken from the Franks, or Christians, by the Moslems, in the year of the Hejra 663. Al Azizi makes it to be thirty-two miles distant from Ramla, and is herein followed by Abu'lfeda. Tâkût affirms it to have been antiently a very considerable place, but tells us it lay waste in his days. Strato, from whom Cæsarea received its first name, was a Greek, and the founder of it. We are told by Dr. Pococke, who gives us an accurate account of the present state of it, that Cæsarea is sixty-two miles distant from Jerusalem, thirty from Joppa, and thirty-six from Acre, or Acca. This city was named Cæsarea of Palestine, to distinguish it from Cæsarea Philippi, or Paneas, which stood near the source of the river Jordan. It was made a Roman colony by Vespasian, and denominated the first Flavian colony from him and his family. The antient city extended further to the north than the present walls, as appears from a wall on the shore running about half a mile to the north, near some aqueducts. We find a particular description of the extraordinary port made here by Herod, in Josephus, the Jewish historian. There was another Cæsarea, besides those above-mentioned, which was a city of Cilicia, and not far from Anazarbus. Al Biruni places Cæsarea of Palestine in long.  $55^{\circ} 20'$ , lat.  $32^{\circ} 50'$ . Al Faras in long.  $57^{\circ} 30'$ , lat.  $32^{\circ} 30'$ . Ptolomy in long.  $57^{\circ} 30'$ , lat.  $33^{\circ} 15'$ ; and Kiyâs in long.  $56^{\circ} 15'$ , lat.  $32^{\circ} 40'$ .

THE surrender of Cæsarea, which immediately followed the reduction of Tripoli and Tyre, struck the remaining imperial garisons of Syria with such terror, that Ramla, Acca, Joppa, Joppe, Jafa, or Jaffa, Ascalon, Gaza, Sichem, Nabulos, or Naplosa, and Tiberias, Taberria, or Tabariyah, opened their gates to the Arabs, upon the first summons; and soon after, Beirût, Bayreut, or Berytus, Saida, Seida, or Sidon, Jabalab, and Ladikia, Latikia, or Laodicea, followed their example. As the knowledge of the situation of these towns, most of which were places of great note and antiquity, will give us a better idea of the theatre of this war, and render more intelligible that part of the Arab history we are now upon; the following short description of them, however it may for a moment interrupt the thread of our historical narration, cannot prove unacceptable to our learned and curious readers<sup>u</sup>.

- RAMLA, or Rama, the first of the aforesaid fortresses, is situated in a fertile plain, about Ramla, a day's journey distant from Jerusalem, and half a day's from Joppa. This place, according to the Arab annals, was not of very high antiquity; it having been built by Solimân, the son of Abd'allah, the fourteenth Khalif, of the house of Ommiyah. Lydda, about three parasangs to the east of Ramla, a more ancient city, was demolished by the said Solimân, the son of Abd'almalec Ebn Merwân, after he had founded Ramla. But whatever may have been advanced to the contrary by some of the Moslem writers, who have been followed herein by Schultens and Golius, Rama, or Ramla, must have been not only a considerable town, but even a fortress, before the time of the Khalif Solimân, of the family of Ommiyah; since it was one of those fortified places of Syria, or Palestine, that surrendered to the forces of Omar near eighty years before the Khalif Abd'almalec entered upon his reign. Nor is there any room to doubt, but the Ramla mentioned here by Al Wakedi is the antient Rama belonging to the tribe of Ephraim, called by the Arabs at this day Rameli, seated in a rich plain, and supposed to be the Arimathea of Joseph, according to the learned Dr. Pococke. There were formerly two Christian churches in this place, which were afterwards converted into mosques. In one of these it is said, that some of the bodies of the martyrs of Sebastè in Armenia were deposited. There are great ruins of houses in this town; so that it seems to have been formerly a much more considerable place than it is at present. And, indeed, this is sufficiently implied by what we find related of it by Abu'lfeda. That author, amongst other things, which he takes from Al Azizi, relates, that Abd'almalec himself had a palace in Ramla; which is a sufficient proof that his son Solimân did not found this city; tho' that had been just before absurdly asserted, at least if we admit of no corruption of the text there, by the same author. Al Faras assigns Ramla long.  $56^{\circ} 50'$ , lat.  $32^{\circ} 10'$ . Kiyâs, long.  $56^{\circ} 20'$ . Al Biruni, long.  $56^{\circ} 20'$ , lat.  $32^{\circ} 40'$ .

ACCA

<sup>u</sup> AL WAKED. ubi sup. STRAB. lib. xvi. p. 522. PTOL. in Palest. lib. i. cap. 16. TACIT. histor. lib. ii. c. 79. PIIN. lib. v. c. 13. EUTYCH. ubi sup. p. 296, 297. THEOPHAN. chronograph. p. 282. GEORG. CEDREN. historiar. compend. p. 426, 427. JOSEPH. antiq. lib. xv. AL AZIZ. apud Abu'lfed. in geograph. ut & ipse ABU'LFED. ibid. YAKUT, apud Abu'lfed. ibid. GOLII not. ad Alfragan. p. 136. POCOKE's descript. of the East, vol. ii. par. i. p. 58, 59, 60. AL BIRUNI, AL FARAS, & KIYAS, apud Abu'lfed ubi sup.

<sup>w</sup> AL WAKED. THEOPHAN. & CEDREN. ubi sup.

YAKUT, apud Abu'lfed. ubi sup. ut & ipse ABU'LFED.

Acca.

ACCA, or, as 'tis now called, especially by the Franks, Acre, stands in a very large and a fertile plain, bounded on the north, at about twelve miles distant, by the mountains anciently called Antilibanus, or Antilebanon, and to the east by the fine and fruitful hills of Galilee, about ten miles from this city. The antient name of this place was Ace, or Accho. It was one of the towns out of which Affer did not drive the antient inhabitants, and seems always to have retained this name among the natives of the country; the Arabs still calling it Acca, or Akka. The Greeks gave it the name of Ptolemais, from one of the Ptolemies, kings of Egypt. And when it was in the possession of the knights of St. John of Jerusalem, it was called St. John D'Acre. The present town seems to be on the spot occupied by the old city, being at the S. W. corner, and is washed by the sea on the S. and W. sides. It has a small bay to the E. which seems to have been the antient port, and a very considerable one b in the days of Sbarif Al Edrisi, when it insinuated itself into the middle of the city, and had two towers erected upon it. There are great remains of the old port, within which small ships come to anchor in the summer, and take in their loading. The present town is near a mile in circumference, and has no walls. Abu'lfeda makes it to be twenty-four miles from Tiberias, and half that number from Tyre. Said assigns its long.  $53^{\circ} 8'$ , lat.  $32^{\circ} 20'$ . Al Biruni long.  $53^{\circ} 20'$ . Al Faras long.  $53^{\circ} 15'$ , lat.  $32^{\circ} 30'$ . Ptolemy long.  $56^{\circ} 25'$ , lat.  $33^{\circ} 20'$ ; and Kiyas, long.  $54^{\circ} 30'$ , lat.  $33^{\circ} 00'$  x.

Joppa.

JOPPA, at present denominated by the natives Jaffa, or Jafa, and in the Holy Scriptures of the Old Testament, Japbo, or Jaso, stands six miles to the W. of Ramla, in the champaign country of Sidon, which extended from this place northward as far as Cæsarea. c It is situated on the side of a low hill over the sea. There seems to have been an antient port, which formerly might have contained large vessels; but now large boats only can go into it. The ships ride in the open road, and are often obliged to go to sea in stormy weather. The people of Joppa have a great trade in soap, and also export large quantities of cotton in small boats to Acre, to be shipped off for other parts. They have a constant supply of good water, by digging wells close to the sea-shore. The town belongs to the Kisler Aga, or head of the Grand Seigneur's black eunuchs, who sends a governor to this place, that resides in a small castle at the S. end of the town, and has a soldiery under him. Richard I. king of England, with a small body of troops, forced Saladin to raise the siege of the citadel of Joppa, after he had made himself master of the town, and even obliged d that conqueror to cede them both to him by treaty; which heroic actions, to our very great surprize, have not been taken notice of by any of the Christian writers. The longitude of Joppa, or Jaffa, has been determined by Al Faras to be  $56^{\circ} 40'$ , by Al Biruni  $56^{\circ} 20'$ , and by Kiyas  $56^{\circ} 00'$ . Its latitude is settled by the first of these at  $32^{\circ} 20'$ , by the second at  $33^{\circ} 8'$ , and by the last at  $32^{\circ} 40'$ . Joppa was not a town of any great note in Abu'lfeda's days; but it made a very good figure in the time of Saladin, and is mentioned as a fortress of considerable strength by Bobadin, in his life of that prince y.

Ascalon.

ASCALON was a maritime town of Palestine, about eighteen miles from Ramla, and in antient times one of the strongest places of Syria. It was a town of great antiquity, three parasangs from Gaza, and enjoyed for a certain period a very extensive commerce. It e was taken by the Franks in the year of the Hejra 548; but retaken by Saladin thirty-five years after, who dismantled it in the year of the Hejra 587. We are told by Abu'lfeda, that, in his days, it was little better than a heap of ruins. Al Faras makes its longitude to have been  $56^{\circ} 30'$ , and lat.  $32^{\circ} 55'$ ; but, according to Kiyas, the former was  $56^{\circ} 10'$ , and the latter  $32^{\circ} 10'$  z.

Gaza.

GAZA was one of the last towns of Palestine, on the side of Egypt, and about three parasangs S. of Ascalon. The Arabs, in their pronounciation of this word, double the middle letter, calling it Gazza; as did likewise the Hebrews themselves, according to Goliis. But this must not be understood of the earlier Hebrews, notwithstanding the great authority of Goliis, as very clearly appears from the Septuagint. The word Gaza, signifies strong, or f powerful, and might possibly allude to the strength of the fortress, as it was one of the stron-

ABU'LFED. ibid. AL AZIZ. ibid. BOHAD. ubi sup. AL MAKIN, hist. Saracen. lib. i. c. 14. p. 73—75. AL WAKED. ubi sup. POCOCK. ubi sup. p. 3, 4. JOSEPH. antiq. Jud. lib. viii. c. 6. CHRIST. CELLAR. geogr. antiq. lib. iii. c. 13. GOLII not. ad Alfragan. p. 140, 141. ALB. SCHULT. ubi sup. AL FARAS, AL BIRUNI, & KIYAS, apud Abu'lfed. ubi sup. * STRAB. lib. xvi. p. 521. JUD. i. 31. PLIN. lib. v. c. 19. DIOD. SIC. lib. xix. cap. 93. SHARIF AL EDRISI, & AL AZIZ. apud Abu'lfed. in descript. Syr. ut et ipse ABU'LFED. ibid. GOLII not. ad Alfragan. p. 131—133. POC. ubi sup. p. 51—54. SAID, AL BIRUNI, & AL FARAS, apud Abu'lfed. ubi sup. PTOL. in Syr. ALB. SCHULT. ubi sup. y 2 CHRON. ii. 16. EZR. iii. 7. JOH. i. 3. POC. ubi sup. p. 2, 3. ISM. ABU'LFED. ubi sup. BOHAD. in vit. & reb. gest. Salad. pass. AL FARAS, AL BIRUNI, KIYAS, apud Abu'lfed. ubi sup. STRAB. lib. xvi. p. 52, JOSEPH. de bell. Jud. lib. iii. c. 29. POMPON. MEL. lib. i. c. 11. PLIN. lib. v. c. 13. Vide etiam CON. apud Photium, cod. clxxxvi. SALMAS. in Solin. cap. xxxiv. et ALB. SCHULT. ubi sup. z STRAB. ubi sup. PTOL. PLIN. lib. v. c. 13. JOSEPH. de bell. Jud. lib. iii. c. 1. PAUSAN. in Artic. c. 14. ABU'LFED. ubi sup. BOHAD. ubi sup. pass. AL FARAS & KIYAS, apud Abu'lfed. ubi sup. GOLII not. ad Alfragan. p. 141. ALB. SCHULT. ubi sup.

- a tiers of the Philistines on the side of Egypt. Be that as it will, we can by no means allow, that it derived the name of Gaza from the treasure of Cambyses deposited there; the word Gaza, in antient Perfic, signifying a treasure, as is affirmed by Mela, and, after him, insinuated by Goli; since it was called Gaza in the time of Samson, who lived many ages before Cambyses was born. It was taken by Alexander the Great, who was obliged to sap its walls, before he could make himself master of it; which is a plain proof of the strength of the place, and, therefore, not a little countenances what has been here advanced concerning the origin of the name. After this, it lay waste till Constantine the Great rebuilt it. Omar Ebn Al Kbattáb, the present Kbalif, was taken prisoner in a war between the people of Gaza and the Arabs of Hejá, that happened before the commencement of Mohammedijm.
- b The famous Mohammed Ebn Edris Al Sháfí, author of one of the most noted orthodox sects of the Mohammedans, was born here, if not, as some say, at Ascalon, in the year of the Hejra 150. Gaza was taken from the Franks by the Egyptian Moslems, in the year of the Hejra 552, and afterwards dismantled by Saladin. Some time after which, the Franks restored the fortifications; but were finally obliged to demolish them by treaty. We must not forget to observe, that both Ascalon and Gaza belonged, in the earliest ages, to the Philistines. Al Faras assigns to Gaza long.  $56^{\circ} 10'$ , lat.  $32^{\circ} 00'$ ; but Ebn Said, long.  $57^{\circ} 00'$ , lat.  $32^{\circ} 00'$ . Reland has committed a small error in the numbers he has transcribed from Abu'lfeda, who prefers those of Al Faras, relating to the longitude and latitude of Gaza, to the other. This place, as appears from the relations of the most authentic modern
- c travellers, is at present quite obscure<sup>2</sup>.

SAIDA, Seida, or Tzaida, called by the Hebrews Sidon, or rather Tzidon, and by the Saida. Greek and Roman writers Sidon, was a most celebrated city and sea-port of Phœnicia, about three days journey S. of Tripoli. It was the boundary of Judæa, or rather Palestine, on that side, and one of the most antient cities in the world, being supposed to have derived its name from Sidon, or Tzidon, the eldest son of Canaan. Before it was taken by the Persians, it was looked upon to be the largest city of Phœnicia, according to Mela. The Itinerary of Antoninus makes it to be twenty-four miles distant from Tyre; which pretty nearly corresponds, or rather is the same, with the 200 stadia, or furlongs, assigned for the distance between those two cities by Strabo. And this is likewise apparent from the present distance d between the remains of those two cities. For, Tyre is about six hours journey from Serphant, or Sarphenda, the antient Sarepta, which is two hours from Sidon, to the district of which city it formerly belonged. But, according to Dr. Pococke, the distance between Tyre and Sidon is not quite so large as it has been defined by the antients. The plain of Sidon is not above two miles wide; whereas that of Tyre is four or five miles broad. To the E. of the former there are some fine fruitful hills. Sidon was in the territory belonging to the tribe of Asher, or Asher, but the Israelites could not drive out the antient inhabitants of it. It always underwent much the same fate as Tyre, is said to have produced the inventors of arithmetic and astronomy, and was in remote times a place of very great trade. It was likewise famous for a manufacture of glass, as we learn from Pliny. Dr. Pococke tells us, that

e it is computed to be 66 miles W. S. W. of Damascus, and a day's journey from the source of the river Jordan. It was situated on a rising ground, defended by the sea on the N. and W. The present city is mostly on the N. side of the hill; tho' the old one seems to have extended farther E. as may be judged from the foundations of a thick wall that extends from the sea to the E. On the S. it was probably bounded by a rivulet, and on the N. by another, both of which are now to be seen. Some think, that the antient city stretched to the E. as far as a high hill that is about three quarters of a mile from the present town. The space between that hill and the town is now all laid out in gardens, or orchards, which appear very beautiful at a distance. On the N. side of the town there are great ruins of a fine port, the walls of which were built with very large stones, twelve feet in length, which

f is the thickness of the wall, and some are eleven feet broad, and five deep. The harbour, which is now choaked up, seems to be the inner port mentioned by Strabo, for the winter; the outer one probably being to the N. in the open sea between Sidon and Tyre, where the shipping ride in safety during the summer-season. Sidon is at present the residence of a Pasha, and there are in it a great number of new-built houses. The trade here is carried on intirely by the French, the export being chiefly raw silk, cotton, and corn. The distance between Sidon and Damascus is computed in the following manner. From Sidon to Mashgara 24 miles, from Mashgara to Kamad six miles, from Kamad to Ain Sher 18 miles, and from Ain Sher, to Damascus 18 miles; the sum of which is 66 miles. Though it appears from

<sup>2</sup> JOSH. xv. 47. JUD. i. 18. POMPON. MEL. lib. i. c. 11. GEN. x. 19. STRAB. lib. xvi. ARRIAN. lib. ii. p. 150. POLYE. in excerptis Valesii, p. 86. JOSEPH. lib. 13. c. 21. STEPH. BYZANT. ISM. ABU'LFED. ubi sup. BOHAD. ubi sup. pass. GOLII not. ad Alfragan. p. 142. HADR. RELAND. Palæst. illustr. p. 510, 511. EBN KHALECAN, AL FARAS, & EBN SAID, apud Abu'lfed. ubi sup. ALBERT. SCHULT. ubi sup.

Moses, that Sidon, the eldest son of Canaan, was probably the founder of Sidon, as many of the most ancient cities derived their names from their founders; yet some thought it might have been denominated Sidon from the great plenty of fish found by the Phœnicians there. But as the former opinion seems more agreeable to the sentiments of the sacred historian, and is supported also by Josephus, we are inclined to adhere to it. One of the oriental writers makes Sidon to be six parasangs distant from Tyre; which, as a parasang consists of 30 stades, or furlongs, falls something short of the distance between those two cities, as defined by Strabo. The longitude of Sidon, or Tzaida, as ascertained by Al Faras, is  $58^{\circ} 15'$ , and its latitude  $33^{\circ} 8'$ ; but, according to the determination of Al Biruni, the former is  $59^{\circ} 20'$ , and the latter  $33^{\circ} 55'$ <sup>a</sup>.

Nabolos.

NABOLOS, or Naplosa, supposed by some to have been the ancient Sichem, or Sechem, so famous in holy writ; by others, to have been erected near the ruins of that place; was seated on the foot of mount Girizim, about thirteen parasangs from Jerusalem. The word Nabolos, or Naplosa, is a corruption of Neapolis; by which name, as well as that of Flavia Neapolis, it went in the time of Pliny. The cognomen Flavia points out nearly the time when, and the person in honour of whom, the city of Sichem received the name of Neapolis; that is, either in the reign of Vespasian, or his son Titus, and in honour of one of those princes, who were of the Flavian family. This city has been, for many ages, as it probably is still, the chief seat of the Samaritans, who admit only for canonical the Pentateuch, or five books of Moses, and were lately reduced to a very small number. Al Faras asserts the longitude of Nabolos, in his time, to have been settled at  $57^{\circ} 35'$ , and its latitude at  $32^{\circ} 10'$ ; but Kiyas fixes the former at  $56^{\circ} 25'$ , and the latter at  $32^{\circ} 8'$ <sup>b</sup>.

Tiberias.

THE TOWN of Tiberias, or Tabariyah, was situate on the sea, or lake, of that name, at the N. end of a narrow plain, which runs along by that sea, and extends farther south by the river Jordan, being about half a mile broad. The town at present has indifferent walls on three sides, on the fourth is open to the lake, and seems to be about three quarters of a mile in circumference. There are the remains of a very large castle here; and the Sheikh, by whom this town, or rather village, is governed, has built one on a hill to the N. of it. Some think, that the town of Kenereth stood on the spot that was afterwards occupied by Tiberias, so named in honour of Tiberius, and said by Josephus to have been founded by Herod; though others maintain that it was built by Tiberius himself. But Reland takes this to be a mistake. After the destruction of Jerusalem, the Jewish rabbins settled here, and remained in the place till after the beginning of the tenth century. The province in which Tiberias stands was called by Josephus Auranitis, as has been already observed. The lake, or sea, of Tiberias, which, according to Abu'lfeda, is about twelve miles long, and six broad, empties itself into the Jordan, and is about 75 miles N. of the Dead Sea. The water of this lake is good, and it abounds with fish. There are hot baths a quarter of a mile S. of the walls of old Tiberias, which extended about half a mile farther to the S. than the present inclosure, that have been taken notice of by Pliny, Josephus, Al Azizi, Abu'lfeda, and others of the oriental writers. We must not omit observing, that Dr. Pococke asserts the Jewish rabbins to have lived at Tiberias till the eleventh century; and yet in the same breath affirms the Jews to have left that place before the year of our LORD 945. So that, in this point, he seems not perfectly consistent with himself. The citadel of this place surrendered to Saladin, after the fatal battle that put a period to the kingdom of Jerusalem. After which, it was recovered by the Franks; but finally taken from them by Ayub, in the year of the Hejra 642. Tiberias, Taberria, Taberya, or Tabariah, according to Al Faras, is in long.  $58^{\circ} 15'$ , and lat.  $30^{\circ} 31'$ ; but according to Ebn Said, in long.  $56^{\circ} 35'$ , and lat.  $32^{\circ} 10'$ <sup>c</sup>.

Beirût.

THE city of Beirût, Bayreut, or Bayrût the ancient Berytus, was about a day's journey N of Tzaida, or Sidon. It was made a colony by Augustus, who denominated it from his daughter Colonia Felix Julia. It is at present situated over the sea, on a gentle rising ground, on the N. side of a board promontory. The gardens appear very beautiful on the hanging ground<sup>f</sup>

<sup>a</sup> JOSEPH. antiq. lib. i. c. 7. JUSTIN. lib. xviii. c. 3. DIOD. SIC. lib. xvi. cap. 41. POMPON. MEL. lib. i. cap. 12. STRAB. lib. xvi. p. 756, 757, 758. PLIN. nat. hist. lib. v. c. 19. GEN. x. 15. xii. 13. JOSH. xi. 8. xix. 28. JUD. i. 31. POLYB. lib. v. c. 69. VIRG. ÆN. i. v. 619. ÆN. iv. v. 75, 683, &c. DIONYS. Perieg. v. 913. HIERON. in onomast. AL AZIZ, apud Abu'lfed. ubi sup. ut & ipse ABU'LFED. ibid. BOHAD. ubi sup. GOLII not. Alfragan. p. 287, 288, 289. AL FARAS, & AL BIRUNI, apud Abu'lfed. ubi sup. Poc. ubi sup. p. 85, 86, 87. ALB. SCHULT. ubi sup. <sup>b</sup> GEN. xii. 6. xxxvii. 12. JOSH. xxiv. 1. 33. JUD. viii. 31. ix. 1, 7, 45. 1 KING. xii. 25. JOH. iv. 5. JOSEPH. antiq. lib. iv. c. 8. PROCOPIUS. de ed. lib. v. c. 7. PLIN. lib. v. c. 13. AL AZIZ, apud Abu'lfed. ubi sup. ut et ipse ABU'LFED. ibid. BOHAD. ubi sup. CHRIST. CELLAR. in hist. Samaritan. collectan. cap. i. sect. 15, 16, &c. AL FARAS & KIYAS, apud Abu'lfed. ubi sup. ALB. SCHULT. ubi sup. <sup>c</sup> JOSEPH. ubi sup. lib. xviii. c. 3, & alib. JOH. vi. 23, xxi. 1. PLIN. lib. v. c. 15. STEPH. BYZANT de urbib. Hieronym. in Ezech. cap. xlviii. 21. TALMUD, cod. Megill. fol. v. col. 2. PTOL. geogr. lib. v. c. 16. AL AZIZ, apud Abu'lfed. ubi sup. & ipse ABU'LFED. ibid. GOLII not. ad Alfragan. p. 133, 134. EZEK. xlvii. BOHAD. ubi sup. ALB. SCHULT. ubi sup. Poc. ubi sup. p. 68—71. AL FARAS & EBN SAID, apud Abu'lfed. ubi sup.

- a over it. The old port is a little bay, and was formerly well secured by strong piers, which were destroyed by Feckerdine, prince of the Druses, who had possession of this city. To the E. of the port is a castle built on two rocks in the sea, with a bridge to it. E. of this, over the sea-cliffs, is another castle; and to the E. of that are remains of a very large one, defended with a fossé, where Dr. Pococke saw some broken pillars. About a furlong to the E. of this place, he came to the old city walls on that side. The town, according to him, may be about two miles in circumference. At a small distance to the W. is a little bay, which opens to the N. where he saw some signs of ruins, but could not judge what they were. Beirût is under the influence of the Maronites and Druses, as many other places are under the Arabs, and the inhabitants of Lebanon, or Antilebanon, dare not go to any other town. It was taken from the Moslems by Baldwin, king of Jerusalem, after a vigorous siege, in the year of our LORD 1111; but retaken by Saladin in 1187. Ebn Said calls it the port of Damascus. According to Al Azizi, it was 18 miles from Giobeila, or Sjceila, 24 of Argimousum, and 36 of Baalbec. We are told by the very learned and curious Dr. Shaw, that upon the Castravan mountains, above Bayrût, there is a curious bed of whitish stone, of the slate kind, which unfolds in every fleak of it, a great number and variety of petrified fishes. These, for the most part, according to that ingenious naturalist, lie exceeding flat and compressed, like fossil fern plants, yet are, at the same time, so well preserved, that the smallest strokes and lineaments of their fins, scales, and other specifical distinctions, are easily discovered. For a very considerable period, Beirût was a most eminent seat of literature. It is placed by Abu'lfeda in long.  $59^{\circ} 30'$ , and lat.  $34^{\circ} 00'$ <sup>d</sup>.

- JABALAH, Jibla, Jablab, Jibala, or Jabala, for it went by all those names, was formerly Jabalab, a pretty celebrated maritime town of Syria. Al Azizi tells us, that in his days, it was but a small town, but that it had a territory annexed to it of a very considerable extent. It was, according to the same author, about twelve miles from Laodicea; and is mentioned, as in the vicinity of that city, by the Itinerary of Antoninus. It was taken, after a short siege, by Salâdin. Bobadin, says, that it had two strong towers, which resembled citadels; and Ismael Abu'lfeda gives us a tolerable good description of it. Dr. Pococke calls it Jebilee, which probably is the name it goes by amongst the natives and the neighbouring Arabs. It is governed by an Aga, who resides in the place, and undoubtedly answers to the Gabale, or Gabala, of Pliny, Ptolemy, and Strabo. This was anciently a small city, and is at present a poor miserable town, thinly inhabited. There are still some traces of the ancient walls. It was once a considerable sea-port, but has not now above four or five boats, and is intirely destitute of trade. The chief remains of antiquity here are several sepulchral grotts cut in the cliffs on the sea-shore. The town is supplied with water by a channel on the ground, which winds round to the N. and seems to come from the river of Jebilee, half a league S. of the town. The mosque here is famous among the Turks for being the place where the body of Sultan Ibrahim is deposited. Dr. Pococke is undoubtedly mistaken in his conjecture relating to that Sultan, when he supposes him to have been Ibrahim Ben Valid, Ibrahim Ebn Al Walid he should have said, the sixteenth Khalif of the house of Ommiyah. Nor is there the least foundation in history for such a conjecture. On the contrary, had he consulted Abu'lfeda, he would have found, that this Ibrahim was the son of one Adham, who bore no manner of relation to that Khalif. As greatly is this learned author mistaken, when he asserts Ibrahim Ebn Al Walid to have been the sixteenth Khalif of the family of Ommiyah; since both M. D'Herbelot, the very author he cites in support of his assertion, and Al Makin, expressly declare, that he was the thirteenth Khalif of that family. The longitude assigned this place by Abu'lfeda is  $60^{\circ} 20'$ , and the latitude  $35^{\circ} 55'$ <sup>e</sup>.

- LAODICEA, Ladikia, or Latikia, called also Laodicea ad mare by the ancients, in order to Laodicea. distinguish it from other cities of the same name, was built by Seleucus I. king of Syria, who founded also Antioch, Selucia, and Apamea, as has been already remarked. It is situated on the sea, and the plain in which it stands is exceedingly fruitful, as it also was in the earliest times. The country about it was famous for wine, with which it supplied the inhabitants of Alexandria in Egypt; the hills to the E. having been well cultivated with vineyards. To the S. of the present town there are some low hills, on the top of which the ancient city-walls were probably erected. It had a very commodious haven. Towards the S. E. corner of the town there is a remarkable triumphal arch, which is still almost intire. It is conjectured that this arch was raised in honour of Lucius Verus, or Septimius Severus. The present town is about a mile and a half in circumference, and has many gardens inclosed within the walls. It is but very lately that an English consul has been established here; this port being formerly dependent

<sup>d</sup> STRAB. lib. xvi. p. 520. PLIN. lib. v. c. 20. EBN SAID & AL AZIZ. apud Abu'lfed. ubi sup. ut & ipse ABU'LFED. ibid. GOLII not. ad Alfragan. p. 289. BOHAD. ubi sup. ALBERT. SCHULT. ubi sup. Poc. ubi sup. p. 90, 91. SHAW's physical observat. &c. in Syria, Phœnice, &c. p. 372. <sup>e</sup> AL AZIZ. apud Ism. Abu'lfed. ubi sup. ut & ipse ABU'LFED. ibid. BOHAD. ubi sup. ANTONIN. itinerar. Poc. ubi sup. p. 198, 199. PLIN. PTOL. STRAB. ubi sup. D'HERBEL. bibl. Orient. p. 480. AL MAKIN, hist. Sarac. lib. i. cap. xx. p. 87, 88.

dependent on Aleppo. It abounded with cisterns, and had a monastery, that was looked upon as an elegant structure, in the days of Abu'lfeda. Al Azizi says it was a splendid city, when he wrote, and situated in the prefecture of Hems. He also relates, that it was 12 miles distant from Jabalab, and 48 from Antisch. To which he adds, that, both with respect to the number of its inhabitants, and the strength of its fortifications, it was one of the most considerable maritime cities of Syria. Its citadel has been taken notice of both by Abu'lfeda and Yacut, and seems to be, according to Goli, the Platanus of Antoninus. We meet with a short and slight description of it in Bohadin's life of Saladin. Abu'lfeda asserts its longitude to be  $60^{\circ} 40'$ , and its latitude  $35^{\circ} 15'$ .

The Arabs
complete the conquest of Syria.

AFTER the Arabs had possessed themselves of these towns, which are the only places of strength the emperor had left in Syria, all the other fortified posts of lesser note of course submitted to them. So that the Khalif was now master of the whole country of Syria; his forces having driven the Greeks out of every part of the tract extending from the Mediterranean to the Euphrates; which comprehended all the provinces of that wealthy and populous region denominated Syria by the ancients. Nay, we are told by Theophanes and Cedrenus, that, two years before the reduction of the fortresses last-mentioned, that is, in the 27th year of the emperor Heraclius, Yezid Ebn Abu Sefiân advanced with a body of Arab troops to the frontiers of Mesopotamia, and had actually made an irruption into the province of Osroëne, had not John Cateas, the imperial procurator of that province, prevailed upon him not to pass the Euphrates, by submitting to pay a very large annual tribute, amounting to 100,000 pieces of gold, or dinârs, that was imposed upon him. The same author adds, that, in consequence of this treaty, the imperial procurator paid the money when it became due, by way of tribute, exacted of him, and then returned to Edeffa, a city near mount Taurus, on the Mesopotamian bank of the Euphrates, where at that time he resided. However, Theophanes likewise observes, that as soon as the emperor was informed of the ignominious treaty concluded with Yezid, (for this, it seems, was kept a secret as long as it could possibly be concealed from him) he sent Cateas into exile, and disannulled all his clandestine negotiations. That writer calls Yezid Jasrus, and Cedrenus denominates him Jadus; tho' neither of them take the least notice of Amru Ebn Al As. Cedrenus gives the prefect above-mentioned, who was banished by Heraclius, the name, or rather surname, of Catzas. We are told by Theophanes, that Cateas came to Chalcedon, ΕΙΣ ΧΑΛΚΗΔΟΝΑ, in order to have an interview with Yezid there, and settle with him the articles of the aforesaid treaty. But the text of Theophanes must undoubtedly have been corrupted here, and that even before the time of Cedrenus, who has copied the depravation; since Chalcedon was a city of Bithynia, seated on the Bosphorus, at an immense distance from Mesopotamia, and a place that Yezid never saw. In the room of ΕΙΣ ΧΑΛΚΗΔΟΝΑ, therefore, we must substitute either ΕΙΣ ΧΑΛΚΙΔΑ, or ΕΙΣ ΧΑΛΤΒΟΝΑ; Chalcis being the capital of Chalcidene, a province of Syria, at no great distance from the Euphrates, that separated Syria from Mesopotamia, and Chalybon, the principal city of Chalybonitis, another province of Syria, terminated by that river. But the first of these two readings, in our opinion, is preferable to the latter; since Chalcis was a city of much greater note than Chalybon, and mentioned by some of the Arab historians, who have wrote the life of Omar; whereas Chalybon has been passed over in silence by every one of them. The Moslems completed the conquest of Syria, in six years; that term elapsing between the first expedition against Syria, which was undertaken in Abu Becr's reign, and the final expulsion of the Greeks out of that region by Omar, in the 18th year of the Hejra.

A great mortality in Syria and Arabia.

THERE happened this very year such violent storms of hail in the peninsula of the Arabs, that a considerable extent of territory was laid waste by them, and a great number of animals of various kinds destroyed. An epidemical distemper likewise raged at Medina, which spread itself over all the adjacent territory, and swept away abundance of people. Omar himself and Abbâs were visited by the common calamity; but, by the application of proper remedies, they recovered. Nor did Syria escape the fatal effects of such a terrible malady, the plague this very year making dreadful ravages in that county. The Moslems there lost 25,000 men, who were carried off by the pestilence; and amongst them Abu Obeidab himself, who was about 58 years old, Serjabil Ebn Hasanab, who had been Mohammed's secretary, Maad Ebn Hamil, Al Fadl Ebn Al Abbâs, an Arab commander, who had been sent by Abu Obeidab to plunder Manbij, Yezid Ebn Abu Sefiân, and other persons of distinction. In fine, the mortality occasioned by the plague, both in Arabia and Syria, was so frightful, that

<sup>f</sup> STRAB. lib. xvi. p. 751, 752. CIC. epist. lib. xii. ep. 14. VAILL. Seleucidar. imper. p. 262. DIONYS perieg. v. 915. AMMIAN. MARCELLIN. lib. xiv. c. 8. edit. Vales. AL AZIZ. apud Abu'lfed. ubi sup. ut & ipse ABU'LFED. ibid. GOLII not. ad Alfragan. p. 298, 299. Poc. ubi sup. p. 196, 197, 198. YACUT, ANTONIN. itinerar. SHARIF AL EDRISI, BOHAD. ubi sup. p. 81. ALB. SCHULT. ubi sup. & AL WAKED. ubi sup. THEOPHAN. chronograph. p. 282. GEORG. CEDREN. historiar. compend. p. 429. PLIN. STRAB. TACIT. JOSEPH. PTOL. STEPH. BYZANT. &c. ABU'LFED. in hist. gen. EUTYCH. AL MAKIN, ABU'L FAR. &c.

- a the Arabs stiled the 18th year of the Hejra, notwithstanding the beginning of it had proved so favourable to them, the year of destruction. As for Khâled Ebn Al Walîd, he survived Abu Obeidah only three years. Some of the Arab writers say, that Hems was the place both of his death and interment, others Medina; so that in this point the Moslem historians are not agreed <sup>h</sup>.

- AMRU EBN AL AS having executed the Khalîf's orders in Syria, and settled every thing there to the satisfaction of the Arabian pontiff, began his march for Egypt, at the head of the forces assigned him for the invasion of that country. In the mean time, Amru having had some ill offices done him at court by Othmân Ebn Affân, as was supposed, the Khalîf dispatched a courier to him with a letter couched in the following terms: "If this letter reaches you before you enter Egypt, return; if not, continue your march, and the blessing of God attend you. The supplies you may at any time stand in need of shall be sent you with all possible expedition." The courier overtook Amru before his troops were out of Syria, tho' they were all then in motion for Egypt, and delivered him the Khalîf's letter. But he either suspecting, or having received some secret intelligence of what had happened, ordered him to follow the army till he should be at leisure to read it; and then, by forced marches, he advanced from Rafakh, where the courier found him, to a village not far from Arish, a place within the territories of Egypt, where he ordered his army to halt. Here he opened the letter before the messenger, and all the officers assembled in his tent, with the same gravity and formality as if he had been altogether ignorant of the contents. Having read it in the presence of them all, he asked whether they were in Syria or in Egypt? To which they replied, in Egypt. "Then," said he, "we are to pursue our march, and make ourselves masters of that country." Rafakh, or Rafakh, is said to be the first town, or village, of Egypt, on the side of Syria, by Abu'lfeda, who calls the tract betwixt it and Farma Al Jafâr. From whence it appears probable, that Amru was within the territories of Egypt, when he received this letter from the Khalîf; though Mr. Ockley seems to have been of a different opinion. We are told by Eutychius, that Othmân Ebn Affân prejudiced Omar against Amru Ebn Al As, of whom he had always entertained a very good opinion, by representing him as an officer that was too rash and precipitate, as well as too imperious, and consequently as one who would in all probability expose his troops to very great dangers, to the Khalîf. Be that as it will, Amru suspected, if he did not know, that the contents of Omar's letter were not favourable to him. Some say, that the Khalîf himself had informed him, when he was engaged in the siege of Cæsarea, privately, what measures he was to pursue. But the Arab writers themselves, as sufficiently appears from Eutychius, were not perfectly agreed as to the circumstances of this affair <sup>i</sup>.

- It being determined to penetrate farther into Egypt, Amru resumed his march, and advanced to Farma, or as it is called by some authors, Farama and Faramia, a town of Egypt, on the Mediterranean, known amongst the Copts, or Coptis, by the name of Beramîn, where he immediately ordered his tents to be pitched. With what sort of garison that place was then provided, we are no-where told; but the troops of which it was composed made a pretty vigorous defence, since Amru found himself obliged to carry on in form the siege of it a month before he could force it to surrender. Farma was seated on the isthmus that separates the Arabian gulf from the Mediterranean, or rather connects Egypt with Syria and Arabia, not far from Tina, or Pelusium, on the first mouth of the Nile. After Amru had made himself master of this place, he narrowly viewed its situation; and, according to Ebn Said, formed a design to cut a channel through the isthmus on which it stood, and thereby open a communication between the Arabian gulf and the Mediterranean. But this project by no means met with the approbation of the Khalîf, as he imagined that the execution of it would facilitate the entrance of the Christians into Arabia. The name Farma, or Faramia, seems to be Egyptian, and may possibly have been originally deduced from the Egyptian word Pharmuthis, or Pharmutosis; either of which, by contraction, might have become Farma, or Faramia. We are told by Abu'lfeda, that the isthmus between the seas Al Rûm and Al Kolzom, as he termed the Mediterranean and Arabian gulf, was about 70 miles over; and that the canal projected by Amru was to have been made in a part of that isthmus called in his time, by the Arabs, Dhanab Al Tamsâb. That author gives the town we are now speaking of the name of Al Farama. Ebn Hawkel relates, that the sepulchre of Galen, or, as he calls him, Jalinus, was to be seen here in his time, who died at Farma on his return home. It was taken in the 18th year of the Hejra by Amru Ebn Al As, and likewise by Baldwin, king of Jerusalem, in the year of our LORD 1117. Afterwards it went to ruin, and has for a considerable period been so completely buried in the sands on which it stood, that at present scarce any remains of it are to be seen. It has been remarked by Golius, that a species of palm-trees flourish here, which in size, fecundity, and the excellency of their fruit, are superior to those to be met with in any other part of the world <sup>k</sup>.

<sup>h</sup> AL MAKIN, hist. Saracen. lib. i. c. iii. p. 24. AL WAKED ubi sup. Auth. of the hist. of Jerusalem, MS. Arab. POCOCC. in Bibl. Bodl. Oxon. num. 362. <sup>i</sup> EUTYCH. annal. tom. ii. p. 296—303. AL MAKIN, ubi sup. p. 29. ISM. ABU'LFED. in descript. Ægypt. OCKLEY's hist. of the Sarac. vol. i. p. 345.

He marches to Mefr;

AMRU having made himself master of Farma, or, as it is called by Abu'lfeda, A' Farama, marched directly to Mefr, Mifr, or Mifra, the Memphis of the old geographers, and the residence of the antient Egyptian kings. Mefr, or Mifr, was the first and original name of Egypt, being the same as the Mizraim, or Misraim, of Scripture, and is applied to the whole region, as well as the ancient capital of it, by the rabian writers. The city of Mefr was situated on the western, or Lybian, bank of the Nile, and occupied the spot on which the village of Geeza at present stands. This we learn from Dr. Shaw, whose geographical observations relating to Egypt and Arabia Petraea are more curious, and superior in point of truth, at least probability, learning, accuracy, and judgment, to those of any other modern traveller. This we think ourselves obliged to own, though, in our ANTIEN UNIVERSAL HISTORY, we have sometimes taken the liberty to differ from him. 'Tis true, he has not, by any lukewarmness or indifference to revealed religion, endeavoured to accommodate his observations to the vitious and depraved taste of our modern unbelievers; but then he has not, by any tedious and jejune descriptions of things meriting not the least regard, by citing authors in support of facts they never mention, and by many inaccuracies, as well as some gross blunders and misrepresentations, rendered them unworthy of the perusal of the learned. In fine, his book will stand its ground, after all the efforts of envy and malice against it have been spent; when some of those, either written in imitation of it, or with a design to depreciate it, will be buried in oblivion, or at least meet with that contempt which they so justly deserve <sup>l</sup>.

and besieges it.

MESR being the most considerable and strongest fortress of Egypt, except Alexandria, in the time of Omar, the Greeks had taken care to fortify it, as expecting a visit from the Arabs, in the best manner they were able. They had surrounded the castle, of itself a place of considerable strength, with a foss, or ditch, into which they had thrown great quantities of nails, iron spikes, &c. in order to render the place inaccessible to the Arabs. However, Amru, tho' with great difficulty, first invested the town, and then besieged it in form. The siege he continued seven months, without being able to make an impression upon the citadel; from which, indeed, the greatest resistance was apprehended by the Moslems. Nor was he much surprized at this, since his troops at first did not amount to above 4000 men, and many of these he had lost since the commencement of the siege. This he apprized the Khalif of by the courier, dispatched to him for that purpose; who, immediately after the intelligence came to hand, sent him a reinforcement of 4000 men. But neither would this additional force, that marched instantly under the command of Zobeir Ebn Al Awam into Egypt, have been sufficient to enable him to carry his point, had not Mokawkas, a Copt, the governor of Mefr, by treachery, delivered up both the city and the castle into his hands <sup>m</sup>.

Miffr delivered into the hands of the Arabs.

MOKAWKAS, who had for some time been the emperor's lieutenant, or prefect, of Mefr, was of the Jacobite sect, and a mortal enemy to the Greeks. When Khosru, the king, or Shah, of Persia, besieged Constantinople, he considered the emperor as upon the brink of destruction; and, therefore, thought he had then a fair opportunity of setting up for himself in Mefr, or Egypt. Instead, therefore, of affording his master any assistance at that perilous conjuncture, as in duty he was obliged to do, he hoarded up the publick revenues of Mefr for his own use. Conscious of his own guilt, and apprehensive of the punishment he deserved, he ever after did his utmost to prejudice and embarrass the emperor's affairs. His intention now, of consequence, was not to defend the citadel, but to surrender it to the Arabs, upon as good terms as he could procure for himself, and, above all, to secure to himself the possession of the immense treasure he had so villainously acquired; not being at all solicitous for the welfare of the Greeks, to whom he bore the most implacable hatred that could be conceived. In order, therefore, to facilitate the execution of the scheme he had formed, he prevailed upon the greatest part of the Greeks to abandon the castle, and retire into a little island of the Nile, between the citadel and the opposite bank, where he told them they would not be exposed to any attacks of the besiegers, who had lately received a strong reinforcement, and must of course soon possess themselves both of the town and citadel of Mefr. The Copts withdrew with Mokawkas, when he deserted his post, and accompanied the body of the Greeks to the island whither he had decoyed them; so that a very small number of men were left to defend the castle. He had no sooner taken this step, than a the Nile began to overflow. Then he sent messengers to Amru, to know the reason of his invasion of Mesr, and what he proposed to himself by such an unexpected irruption into that country. In answer to which, Amru informed him, by an Ethiopian, named Abadab Ebn Al Samet, whom he immediately dispatched to Mokawkas, that the Khalif's orders to him were, to oblige the people of Mesr either to embrace Mohammedism, or to pay an annual tribute, or, lastly, to leave the dispute between them and his subjects to the decision of the sword. Mokawkas and the Copts, without any farther delay, submitted to become tributaries to the Khalif, and concluded a treaty of peace with Amru; but the Greeks taking the terms of it to be too dishonourable, refused to accede to that treaty. But they were too weak in the castle to hold out long; so that, upon intelligence given the enemy of the weakness of the garison by Mokawkas, Zobeir Ebn Al Awam stormed it, after a faint resistance, and either killed or took prisoners all the Greeks they found therein. The body of Greek troops that had taken post on the aforesaid island, who were joined by some that had made their escape out of the citadel, finding themselves deceived by Mokawkas, reached the opposite bank of the Nile, and marched to Keram Al Shoraik, between Kairo, or Al Kabirah, and Alexandria, where they endeavoured to put themselves into a posture of defence, and resolved to wait for the Arabs. The articles of the treaty concluded between Amru and Mokawkas, which included the whole nation of the Copts, were to the following effect.

<sup>k</sup> EUTYCH. AL MAKIN, & ABU'LFED. ubi sup. EBN SAID, apud Abu'lfed. ubi sup. EBN HAWKEL, ibid. GOLII not. ad Alfragan. p. 145--147. <sup>l</sup> EUTYCH. & AL MAKIN, ubi sup. SHARIF AL EDRISI, in clim. iii. c. 3. ABU'LFED. in descript. Egypt. OZJOT, in Al Kahir. & Egypt. chron. GOLII not. ad Alfragan. p. 151--157. SHAW'S geographic. observat. in Egypt, Arabia Petraea, &c. p. 341. <sup>m</sup> EUTYCH. AL MAKIN, ABU'LFED. SHARIF AL EDRISI, OZJOT & GOL. ubi sup.

c I. THE Coptic boys, not arrived at the years of puberty, the men worn out with old age, and all the women, shall be exempted from the payment of the annual tribute to be imposed upon all the other individuals of the Coptic nation.

II. ALL the Copts, except those above-mentined, that live both above and below Al Mesr, shall pay yearly two dinârs each, without any difference or distinction; no regard being had to the circumstances of the persons of whom the money is to be exacted.

III. THE Copts shall entertain all the Moslems that shall occasionally pass through the country, for three days together, if required, at their own expence.

d IV. THE Copts shall supply, for ready money, with provisions, the Moslem camp; repair two bridges, that have been broken down; build others, that are necessary for the more expeditious march of the army; and render more practicable the roads between the city of Al Mesr and Al Escandaraïah, or Alexandria, which the Moslem general has an intention soon to besiege.

V. THE Moslems shall be at liberty to continue the war against the Greeks, who deserve the most rigorous treatment, till they have either reduced them to a state of slavery, or pursued them to utter destruction.

VI. MOKAWKAS himself shall always be considered as a Copt by the Moslems; and, after his death, his body shall be interred, by the Khalif's permission, in the Coptic church of St. John in Alexandria.

e VII. In consideration of the foregoing concessions, the Khalif shall also secure to Mokawkas, and the Copts, the free exercise of their religion, as well as the possession of their properties and effects, and take all of them under his immediate protection<sup>n</sup>.

THESE articles being signed by Amru and Mokawkas, who had acted such a perfidious part, the Copts remained in quiet possession of all their properties and effects. The traitor Mokawkas, therefore, enjoyed the fruits of his iniquitous conduct, as his immense treasures so villainously amassed, were not touched by the Moslems, and escaped being brought to that condign punishment he so richly deserved. The reduction of Al Mesr, in the manner here related, happened in the 18th, according to some, or, as others will have it, in the 19th year of the Hejra °.

f AL ZOBEIR EBN AL AWAM, in order to facilitate the attack he made upon the citadel, Al Zobeir stormed, by the assistance of his military engines, the weakest part of it, on the side called Ebn Al Awam Sîkol Hamam, that is, the market-place of the bagnio; and, by the help of a scaling-ladder, takes the citadel by storm. mounted the walls, before the besieged had any notice of his design. We are told by Al Makîn, that the Copts, of whom the tribute was collected, were at least 6,000,000 souls, and consequently, that the sum now advanced, as well as that paid afterwards to the Khalif yearly, by the Coptic nation, amounted to 12,000,000 dinars. We must not forget to inform our readers, that the city of Al Mesr, notwithstanding the treaty concluded with Mokawkas and the Copts, was afterwards destroyed by Amru Ebn Al As, and the city of Al Fostat built on the opposite bank of the Nile, by the command of the Khalif Omar. Very considerable remains of the ruins of Al Mesr were to be seen in the days of Abu'lfeda; but these remains are now so intirely buried in the soil, that no traces of them are to be discovered. This g we learn from the most ingenious and accurate Dr. Shaw, who, in his description of Egypt, does not only agree with the antients, but likewise with the Arabian geographers; which, notwithstanding what has been insinuated to the contrary by some who envied his superior merit, is a strong presumption of the truth of what he has there advanced. The Copts, after the retreat of the Greeks to Keram Al Shoraik, did not only give the Arabs a particular account of their situation, but likewise animated Amru to pursue them, without giving them time to breathe, and (so inveterate was their enmity to their fellow Christians!) even, if possible, to complete their utter excision <sup>p</sup>.

<sup>n</sup> EUTYCHIUS & AL MAKIN, ubi sup. ISM. ABU'LFED. ubi sup. & in hist. general. GREG. ABU'L FAR. in hist. dynast. p. 178.

° AL MAKIN, ubi sup. p. 23, 30.

The Arabs
drive the Greeks into Alexandria.

In compliance with the reiterated solicitations of Mokawkas and the Copts, Amru, after he had settled matters to his satisfaction at Mesr, advanced at the head of his troops to Keram Al Shoraik, where the Greeks had taken post, after their departure from the island in the Nile. Both armies being animated by resentment, an action immediately began. The Greeks, for some time, behaved with great bravery, but were at last forced to give way. The Arabs, flushed with their late success, bore down all before them, dislodged the enemy from Keram Al Shoraik, and possessed themselves of that post. Several other actions happened before the Greeks arrived at Alexandria; to which place they were pursued by the Arabs. According to Eutychius, the battle of Keram Al Shoraik lasted three days; after which, the Greeks retired to S. Salstam, and maintained themselves in that post nineteen days; but were at last forced to abandon it to the Arabs. They made another stand against Amru, if we will believe the same author, at Karyun; but, after a sharp dispute, they were likewise driven from thence, and obliged to shut themselves up within the walls of Alexandria. We find it intimated by Al Makin, or Elmacinus, that the Khalif himself headed his troops in this expedition; but this from any other Arab writer does by no means appear <sup>q</sup>.

Amru besieges
Alexandria;

THE Greeks had not long entered Alexandria, before Amru, at the head of the Moslem forces, presented himself before the town. He first summoned the garison to surrender the place to the Khalif, offering the Christians the usual alternative, either to profess Mohammedism, or to pay tribute. But neither of those proposals pleasing them, he caused the city to be immediately invested; and, as soon as every thing could be got ready for that purpose, laid close siege to it. The garison, however, made a brave defence, frequently sallying out upon the besiegers, and killing them abundance of men. Amru observing his troops to be greatly annoyed by the besieged from the castle, resolved, if possible, to make himself master of that place. He, therefore, attacked it with so much courage, that he carried it sword in hand; but, after a very warm dispute, the Arabs were fairly beat out of it again by the Greeks, who, on this occasion, behaved with extraordinary bravery. The Arabs lost a great number of men in this vigorous action, and, amongst the rest, several persons of distinction; which rendered not a little more sensible the loss they had sustained. Amru Ebn Al As, the general, Moslemab Ebn Al Mokballed, and Werdan, Amru's slave, were taken prisoners, and carried into the town. Being brought before the governor, he asked them why they committed such ravages and depredations in the Christian territories? To which Amru resolutely answered, "We are come hither to oblige you either to profess Islamism, or pay an annual tribute to the Khalif; to one of which conditions you must submit, or all be put to the sword." A Greek that stood by, hearing this, said to the governor, "This man is certainly the enemy's general; therefore take off his head." Werdan understanding Greek, and seeing the danger his master was in, took him by the collar, and gave him a box on the ear; saying, "Hold thy tongue, and suffer thy betters to speak. Sure! this is unparalleled impudence! Shall one of the lowest wretches in the army give himself such airs!" Upon this, Moslema Ebn Al Mokballed addressed himself to the governor in the following terms: "Our general has been for some time disposed to raise the siege of Alexandria. Omar Ebn Al Khattab, the emperor of the faithful, has also wrote to him on that subject. In that letter he has signified his intention of sending to you an honourable embassy, consisting of ten persons of the first distinction, in order to confer with you about what is proper to be done on this occasion, and to settle such preliminaries as may serve for the basis of a future treaty, and prove agreeable to both parties. If, therefore, you will be so good as to dismiss us, we will acquaint our general with the courteous treatment we have received, and employ the utmost of our endeavours to facilitate an accommodation. Nor do we doubt but ten persons of the highest rank will soon be sent to you, to negotiate that affair; after which, the siege will be immediately raised." The credulous governor being imposed upon by this idle fiction, and convinced, from Werdan's behaviour to him, that Amru was as mean as his slave had represented him, released them without hesitation. To which he was likewise farther excited by the desire of dispatching ten Arabs of distinction; which he believed the dismissal of the three or four supposed vulgar prisoners then in his power, the detention of whom he a imagined would be of no service to the emperor, might enable him to do. Upon their arrival in the Moslem camp, they were received with the loudest acclamations, and all possible demonstrations of joy; which gave the Greeks sufficiently to understand, that they had lost an opportunity of embarrassing the Moslem affairs, which could not easily be retrieved. This story is supported by the joint authority of Al Wakedi, Al Makin, and Eutychius, tho' told by those authors with some variation of circumstances, however improbable in several particulars it may at first sight appear<sup>r</sup>.

<sup>p</sup> EUTYCH. & AL MAKIN, ubi sup. ABU'LFED. in descript. Ægypt. GOLII not. ad Alfragan. p. 152. SHAW, ubi sup. SHARIF AL EDRISI, ALB. SCHULT. ubi sup. <sup>q</sup> EUTYCH. ubi sup. p. 310—313. AL MAKIN, ubi sup. p. 24. ABU'LFED. in hist. gen. EBN ABD'ALHAKIM, in Ægypt. expugnat. histor.

THE Moslems, greatly animated by the safe return of their general, resolved to make another assault upon the citadel; and either to carry it, or perish all in the attempt. The<sup>form.</sup> attack was so vigorous, that the Greeks could not maintain their posts, but were obliged to b give way to the fury of the Moslems. The castle, therefore, was taken by storm, and all the garison either killed, taken prisoners, or absolutely dispersed. Some of those that made their escape, fled further up into the country; and others, by the assistance of certain vessels that were ready to receive them, went off by sea. Thus was Alexandria taken by the Arabs. under the command of Amru Ebn Al As, on Friday, in the beginning of the month of Al Moharram, and the 20th year of the Hejra, after they had besieged it fourteen months, and lost before it 23,000 men. With regard to all the circumstances attending this event, the Arab writers are not perfectly agreed. Al Makin, or Elmacinus, and Eutychius, clearly intimate, that Alexandria was carried by storm; whereas it was surrendered upon terms, or taken by capitulation, if we will give any credit to Abu'l Faraj<sup>s</sup>.

c In order to secure the repose of the Copts, as well as that of the Moslems, Amru thought it proper to pursue the Greeks, who had escaped from the citadel, and fled farther up into the country; rightly concluding, that the public tranquillity might be disturbed, and the possession of his conquests in Egypt rendered precarious, as long as any considerable body of them should remain in arms. He, therefore, marched out of Alexandria, at the head of his forces, in quest of those fugitives, leaving but a very slender garison in the place, as not being apprehensive of any immediate danger on that side. The Greeks, who had before fled on board their ships, being apprized of this, returned on a sudden, surprized the town, and put all the Arabs they found therein to the sword. Amru receiving advice of what had happened, moved back to Alexandria, attacked the enemy, whom he found in possession of the d castle, as well as of the town, with such bravery, that, after an obstinate dispute, he dislodged them once more from thence, and forced them to fly for shelter a second time on board their ships. Many of the Greeks were cut to pieces in this action, and the rest so intimidated, that the Arabs had nothing farther to fear from them. Things being in this situation, Amru informed the Khalif, by an express, of the progress of his arms in Egypt; at the same time acquainting him, that his troops were desirous of plundering Alexandria, which they had taken by assault. Omer, in his answer to Amru, expressed a grateful sense of his services, and of the bravery of his troops; but at the same time blamed him for even mentioning the bare inclination of the soldiery to plunder so rich a city, which at that time was one of the most celebrated empories of the East. He commanded him absolutely to restrain the rapacious impetuosity

e of his men, to suffer no violence of any kind to be committed, to preserve every thing valuable that might contribute towards the enabling him to defray the expence of the war, and, finally, to deposite the money brought into his coffers, by the tribute imposed upon the Copts, in some safe place within the precincts of Alexandria, that the necessities of the Moslems might be therewith fully supplied. Besides the tribute of two dinârs a head, already mentioned, there was a tax laid upon lands, vineyards, and farms, proportionable to their annual value; which, exclusive of many other articles, produced of itself a prodigious revenue for the Khalif. In order to enable our readers to form a more adequate idea of the immense wealth Omer acquired by the conquest of Egypt, of which that was only one particular city, we shall beg leave to insert a passage of Amru's letter to the Khalif, handed

f down to us by Eutychius, which is couched in the following terms: "I shall not pretend " to give a particular description of the city I have taken, nor send you an account of all " the curious and valuable things contained in it. At present it will be sufficient to observe,
" that I have found in it 4000 palaces, 4000 baths, 40,000 Jews that pay tribute, 400
" royal circi, or places set apart for public diversions, and 12,000 gardeners, who supply
" the city with all kinds of herbs in great plenty." To which we shall beg leave to add, from Abu'l feda, Ebn Abd'al Hakim, and others, that Alexandria, when taken by Amru, consisted of three cities, viz. Menna, or the port which included the Pharos, and all the neighbouring parts; Alexandria, properly so called, where Scandarea, or the modern Alexandria, at present stands; and Nekita, probably the Necropolis of Josephus and Strabo. The Pharos was an island extending from E. to W. near to the eastern promontory called Lockias, in a

<sup>r</sup> EUTYCH. & AL MAKIN, ubi sup. AL WAKED. ubi sup. ABU'LFED. & EBN ABD'ALHAKIM, ubi sup.

<sup>s</sup> EUTYCH. & AL MAKIN, ubi sup. GOLII not. ad Alfragan. p. 160. ABU'LFED. EBN ABD'ALHAKIM & GREG. ABU'LFAR. ubi sup.

bay, about three leagues wide, and, according to the learned Dr. Pococke, made the ports of Alexandria. That, at present called the Old Port, is undoubtedly the Eunostus of Strabo, and lay to the W. of the Pharos. The vessels only from Turkey are at present admitted into this port. Here was also the Cibotus, which is said to have had a communication with the lake Marcotis, that lay behind it to the S. The port, now known by the name of the New Port, was the Great Port of Strabo, and lay to the eastward of the Pharos. To this port the vessels of Europe at present resort. The island of Pharos was joined to the continent by a causeway, and two bridges, 900 paces long, towards the W. end of it, which must have been about the quay of the Old Port. The famous light-house, or Pharos, as it was likewise called, was erected on a rock at the E. end of this island, that was on every side encompassed with water, and so in a manner a small separate island; which seems to be the spot on which the castle is built, at the entrance of the New Port. As for the city of Alexandria, it is said to have been washed on two sides by the water; to the N. by the sea, and to the S. by the lake Marcotis; and that the other two sides were each a kind of isthmus, or neck of land, between the water, about seven stadia in length; on which account, each of these sides, especially that to the W. was called Heptastadium, from which the causeway to the island of Pharos is said to have gone. The old walls of the city seem to have been erected on the height, which extends from cape Lochias towards the E. the remains of a grand gate-way being visible in the road to Rosetto, at this high ground, and the foundations of the walls may from thence be traced to the canal. The outer walls round the old city are very beautifully built of hewn stone, and seem to be ancient; all the arches being true, and the workmanship very good. They are defended by semicircular towers, 20 feet in diameter, and about 130 feet apart: at each of them are stairs to ascend up to the battlements, there being a walk round on the top of the walls built on arches. The Necropolis part of the city was terminated on one side by a grand street, that extended from the gate which went under that name to the gate of Canopus, which is said to have been an hundred feet wide, and had, doubtless, in it many magnificent buildings, as sufficiently appears from the granite pillars still remaining in two or three parts. These stood in two rows, and several of them are standing at this very day. Among them was the Gymnasium, or public schools, to which there were porticos, above a stadium in extent. It is intimated by some of the oriental writers cited here, that the two principal streets of Alexandria crossed one another at right angles; and that they were built in so regular a manner, that no stranger could lose his way in this city, though it was of so very large an extent. The learned Dr. Pococke, to whom we are obliged for several particulars inserted here (though, in the main, he seems to be rather too prolix in his description of this city, and to intermix too much of history with his geographical, or rather topographical, observations; which hinders his readers from forming a clear and distinct idea of the place he undertakes to describe) supposes the gate of Necropolis to be that to the S. W. which is now built up. To the three parts of Alexandria, mentioned by the oriental geographers, we may add a fourth, which has been taken notice of by Strabo; and that is the palace, with the suburbs belonging to it, within which was the Museum, or Academy, and the burial-place of the kings. The ingenious Dr. Shaw has judiciously observed, that, considering the terrible devastations committed in other places by the Arabs, it is pretty extraordinary, that the greatest part of the antient walls of this city, together with their proper turrets, should have remained so compact and intire quite down to this time. This, he thinks, is chiefly confirmed by the present condition of the antient cisterns, which were built under the houses, supported by two or three stories of arches on columns, in order to receive the Nile water by the canal of Canopus, as they continue to do at this day. And the learned Dr. Pococke likewise looks upon these cisterns as the most extraordinary remains of antiquity that at Alexandria are now to be seen. But notwithstanding what has been advanced by both these learned gentlemen, with regard to the antiquity of the walls, we cannot help suspecting, that they must have been erected since the time of Omar. For, we are assured by Ebn Abd'al Hakim, an Arab author of good repute, that Amru Ebn Al As, being provoked by the Greeks, swore, that he would make Alexandria like the house of a common harlot, that was open on every side; and that, in consequence of this menace, he demolished the walls, and absolutely dismantled the city. It is at present governed by an Agā, who constantly resides in the place. The Arabs call Alexandria Al Escandaraïab, and the Turks, as well as the natives, Scandarea. Abu'lfeda relates, that the Pharos, or light-house, of Alexandria was 180 cubits high, and destroyed by the Christians in the Khalifat of Al Walid Ebn Abd'almalec. He has also preserved a beautiful description of the canal here, extracted from the Arab poet Thâfar Al Hadâd. The longitude assigned Al Escandaraïab, or Alexandria, by this celebrated geographer, is  $51^{\circ} 51'$ , and the latitude  $30^{\circ} 58'$ .

THE

<sup>1</sup> EUTYCH. & AL MAKIN, ubi sup. GOLII not. ad Alfragan. p. 159, 160, 161. ABU'LFED. & EBN ABD'AL-HAKIM, ubi sup. PTOL. lib. iv. c. 5. PLIN. lib. v. c. 10, 31. JOSEPH. contr. Apion. lib. ii. p. 1063. DIOP. Sic.

- a THE Arabs having been hitherto sufficiently employed in the conquests they had made, had not yet applied to any branch of literature, but poetry in their own language; and even that, for several years, had been in some degree neglected by them. They were at this time altogether ignorant of the sciences, and of every language but their own. However, Amru being a man of parts, and blessed with a good capacity, had no dislike to the conversation of learned men. On the contrary, he now and then, when the more important business of his province would permit, took great delight in hearing philosophical points discussed; and discovered a higher regard for those rational entertainments that please learned men, than the generality of the Arabs at that time did. It happened, that one John, surnamed The Grammarian, a man eminent for his extensive erudition, lived in Alexandria, when it was taken by the Arabs. This man finding an opportunity of insinuating himself into the good graces of Amru, was resolved to cultivate an acquaintance with him. This he did with such success, that he wonderfully conciliated the affections of that general, who was highly entertained with his philosophical discourses, and, for that reason, treated him with singular marks of respect. John finding himself a favourite, one day took the liberty to desire Amru to bestow upon him the famous Alexandrian library, in the following terms: "You have visited all the repositories of Alexandria, and sealed up every thing curious and valuable in them. With regard to those things there that will be of real service or advantage to you, I have no intention to ask for any of them; but since there are other things likewise there, which cannot in any respect be useful to you, these, I hope, I may be allowed to consider as of importance to myself." "What are the things," said Amru, "that you seem so desirous of?" "The philosophical books," replied John, "deposited in the royal library." "Those," returned Amru, "it is not in my power at present to give you. However, I will write to the Khalif about them; and if Omar Ebn Al Khattâb, the emperor of the faithful, will permit me to dispose of them, they shall be at your service." This he accordingly did, and received for answer from the Khalif, "That if the books he mentioned agreed in all points with the book of God, this last would still be perfect without them, and consequently they would be superfluous; but if they contained any thing repugnant to the doctrines and tenets of that book, they ought to be looked upon as pernicious, and of course should be destroyed." As soon as the Khalif's letter came to hand, Amru, in obedience to his master's command, dispersed the books all over the city amongst those that kept warm baths, amounting to 4000, as has been already observed, to heat the baths with. And notwithstanding the great havock that must have been made of them by this means, their number was so immense, that they were not intirely consumed in less than six months time. This was the fatal end of that noble and stupendous Alexandrian library in the Serapæum, and suburb Rhacotis, called the daughter of that founded by Ptolemy Philadelphus, in the part of the city denominated Bruchium; the loss of which can never be sufficiently regretted by the learned world. The latter of these was reduced to ashes, and the books it contained, amounting to 400,000 volumes, intirely consumed, in Julius Cæsar's time; and the former, whose number of MSS. when the other perished, was at least five hundred thousand, and afterwards increased to a much larger number, was destroyed in the manner here related by Amru Ebn Al As, in pursuance of the order for that purpose he received from Omar. Several of the antients, after the destruction of the library of Ptolemy Philadelphus, mention that in the Serapæum, and particularly Orosius, who wrote his history about the year of CHRIST 417. This, therefore, happened about 225 years before Johannes Grammaticus, the famous Aristotelian philosopher, a Jacobite by sect, and afterwards excommunicated by the Egyptian bishops, assembled at Mesr, for refusing to renounce his erroneous opinions, would have begged it of the Moslem general. Had this invaluable collection of books been still extant, several curious philosophical discoveries, that have since been lost, might possibly to the present time have been preserved, and farther improvements in various branches of science been made. A fuller and more extensive knowledge of antiquity in particular, by the assistance of some of those valuable manuscripts, at this time destroyed by fanatical madness, would undoubtedly have been obtained; as well as a clearer and more perfect discovery of the origin of letters, the basis and foundation of our historical researches, which has of late so much exercised the pens of the learned.

THE citadel of Alexandria having been twice taken by storm, the Greeks inhabitants of that city, after the second reduction of the castle, were not considered as upon the same foot with the Copts; the governor, or prefect, appointed them by the Khalif, being left at liberty to impose what tribute he thought fit upon them. This we learn from Eutychius, a who likewise informs us, that Amru detached Okba Ebn Nafe', with a body of troops, to penetrate into the western part of Africa; and that this general made himself master of all the country lying between Barka and Zaweilah. The people of that tract punctually sent the tribute exacted of them, of their own accord, to Amru, at the time agreed upon. Tripoli in Africa, according to Al Makin, was about this time likewise taken by the Moslems. That city, called by the author last-mentioned Tripoli of the Arabs, is seated on the Mediterranean and denominated by the Italians Tripoli di Barbaria, as it is by the present Arabs Traubious Ifrikia. Eutychius relates, that this city, to which he gives the appellation of the Western Tripoli, was reduced by Amru Ebn Al As himself, two years after the taking of Alexandria, or the 22d year of the Hejra, and the 10th of the Khalifat of Omar. The same author b likewise affirms, that Amru built a temple, or mosque, at Al Fostat. Notwithstanding, therefore, what may have been insinuated to the contrary by Cellarius, from the passages of Al Makin and Eutychius now before us, we may infer, that the city at present forming the piratical republic of Tripoli, or at least another not far from it, went by that name amongst the Greeks, before the time of Mohammed <sup>w</sup>.

The Moslems penetrate farther into Africa.

SIC. pass. STRAB. lib. xvii. CURT. PLUTARCH. ARRIAN. ÆL. pass. AL HADAD, apud Abu'lfed. in descrip. Ægypt. POCOCKE's observ. on Egypt, p. 1—11. SHAW's geograph. observat. in Egypt. Arab. Petr. &c. p. 338, 339. ALBERT. SCHULT. ubi sup. <sup>u</sup> Poc. in orat. præfix. & in calce notar. ad carmen Tograi, p. 10, 233, &c. JALLALO'UDIN AL SOYUTI, apud Pocockium, in not. ad spec. hist. Arab. p. 159. GREG. ABU'L FAR. in hist. dynast. p. 180, 181. PLUT. in Jul. Cæs. AMMIAN. MARCEL. lib. xxii. c. 16. DIO, lib. xlii. p. 202. LIV. apud Senec. de tranquil. OROS. lib. vi. c. 15. TERTULLIAN. CHRYSOST. EPIPHAN. &c. See also PRID. connect. b. i. p. ii. p. 12, 13, 14. Lond. 1718.

A grievous famine in Arabia.

Soon after the Moslems had made themselves masters of Alexandria, a grievous famine raged in Arabia, and particularly at Medina, then the residence of the Khalif. This induced, or rather obliged, Omar to write to Amru, to send him a supply of corn, with which Egypt at that time abounded. Amru, in compliance with that order, sent a large train of camels laden with corn, in a continued line from Egypt to Medina, the first of which were entering c Medina when the last were within the limits of Egypt. But this method of transporting corn proving too tedious and expensive, the Khalif ordered Amru to open a communication between the Nile and the sea Al Kolzom, by cutting a canal through the interjacent tract. This, if we will believe Eutychius and Al Makin, that general effected; and gave to this canal the name of The river of the emperor of the faithful. But here we must beg leave to dissent from these writers; since it does not sufficiently appear from history, that there was ever any passage for vessels dug between the towns of Al Fostat, on the eastern bank of the Nile, and Al Kolzom, on the sea of that name, as they have been pleased to assert. The river, or rivulet, denominated by them The river of the emperor of the faithful, was undoubtedly no other than the Annis Trajanus of Ptolemy, or the Khalis, which annually supplies the d city of Kairo, or Al Kabirah, with water, running from one end of it to the other, as well as the neighbouring country for several miles. It is, therefore, far more probable, that, on the present occasion, the Khalif ordered Amru to make the Khalis more navigable, by clearing it of the gravel or sand with which it was then choaked up; and that, for this reason, it received the name of The river of the emperor of the faithful. And that this was really the case, we are certainly informed by Abulbakim, in his history of the conquest of Egypt; whose opinion in this point is supported by the concurrent testimony of Al Makrizi and Abulfeda. The former of which authors make the Khalis to have been first formed by some of the antient Egyptian kings, in the days of Abraham, and afterwards cleansed and enlarged by Hadrian; and the latter asserts, that Al Fostat had its situation close to the Nile, e and that the vessels navigated on that river received their lading there, and set sail from thence when they departed to any other port. Al Kabirah stood a little to the E. of Al Fostat; and therefore the latter was not the same city with that capital, as we find intimated by Dr. Pococke. The word Al Fostat, or, as Goli calls it, Fustata, denotes a tent, tabernacle, street, or city, in Arabic; the town so named having been erected by Amru Ebn Al As upon the spot where he pitched his tent, before he undertook his Alexandrian expedition. After the foundation of Al Kabirah by one of the Fatimit Khalifs, which happened in the year of the Hejra 359, the city of Al Fostat, according to Ebn Said, was soon abandoned, and in a manner forgotten; tho' at first the Egyptians were highly pleased with its agreeable situation. Some of the oriental geographers make the antient city of Menf, Minf, or f Minph, that is, Memphis, to have been a short day's journey distant from Mesr, Misr, or Misra; whilst others of them assert all these names to have been applied to the very same city. We must not forget to observe, that, according to Al Makin, Amru built Al Fostat, and that by the command of Omar Ebn Al Khattab himself, if we will believe Abulfeda, after the reduction of Alexandria <sup>x</sup>.

The Greek and Arab

It is intimated by one of the Greek writers, that the Arabs made an irruption into Egypt a little before that country was subjugated by Amru Ebn Al As; and that they were pre-

<sup>w</sup> EUTYCH. & AL MAKIN, ubi sup. GOLII not. ad Alfragan. p. 283. CHRIST. CELLAR. geograph. antiq. lib. iv. cap. iii. p. 125, 126. Lipsiæ, 1706. <sup>x</sup> EUTYCH. ubi sup. p. 320, 321. AL MAKIN, ubi sup. p. 24, 25, 30. ABULHAKIM, in hist. expugnat. Ægypt. AL MAKRIZ. in commentar. Ægypt. ISM. ABULFEDA. in descript. Ægypt. SHAW, ubi sup. p. 340. PTOL. in Ægypt. POCKE, ubi sup. p. 26, 27. EBN SAID, apud Abu'lfed. ubi sup. GOLII notæ ad Alfragan. p. 151—175. SHARIF AL EDRISI sine GEOGR. NUB. clim. iii. c. 3. LEXICOGRAPH. ARAB. apud Schult. ubi sup. ut & ipse SCHULT. ibid.

a vailed upon to retire from thence by Cyrus, an Egyptian bishop, who gave them a good round sum of money to induce them to comply with his request. To which it is farther added, that the emperor being informed of this, sent for Cyrus to Constantinople, to give an account of his conduct; and dispatched, in great haste, one Manuel, an Armenian, to Egypt, to command his forces there, who was overthrown by the Arabs. The imperial troops were almost all cut to pieces in this action, and Manuel himself, with great difficulty, made his escape to Alexandria. This threw the emperor into such a consternation, that he immediately dismissed Cyrus without inflicting any punishment upon him, and ordered him, if possible, to conclude a treaty, or truce, with the Moslems, upon the same terms as formerly; but this he found it impossible to effect, they being grown more haughty and intractable by their late success. Dionysius Telmarenfis, the Jacobite patriarch, also pretends, that the Arabs conquered part of Armenia and Mesopotamia, before they reduced Cæsarea in Palestine, and made themselves absolute masters of Syria. But as all the particulars here mentioned seem to run counter to what we have already extracted from the Arab historians, who ought to have been the best acquainted with the heroic actions of their own countrymen, perhaps they may not altogether merit the attention of our learned and curious readers <sup>v</sup>.

In the 20th, or the 21st, year of the Hejra, Aiyad Ebn Gânem, by the Khalif's order, with a powerful army, invaded Mesopotamia. Having assembled all his forces, he advanced to the Euphrates, passed that river, and made the necessary dispositions for undertaking the siege of Edeffa. But the governor, garison, and inhabitants, of that place, being apprehensive that they could not defend it against the Arabs, the imperial commandant offered to surrender the town to Aiyad, provided he would secure to them all the possession of their properties and effects, and grant them the free exercise of their religion. To which he thought fit to add, that, if this offer was accepted, they would willingly submit to such a tribute as the Khalif should impose upon them. These proposals being agreeable to Aiyad, he signed the capitulation; upon which his troops were immediately admitted into the town. Edeffa, called by the Arabs and natives at this day Roba, is about a day's journey distant from Charræ, Carræ, or Harrân, a city famous amongst the antients, and situated on the eastern bank of the Euphrates. It was called by Pliny, from a fountain in or near it, Callirhoe, from whence the Arabs have deduced their Al Roba and Roba. It was formerly governed by its own princes, who had the name, or rather surname, of Abgar, as appears not only from some good authors, but likewise from many Greek imperial coins that still are extant. These princes either really were, or supposed to have been, of Arab extraction; as we learn from Tacitus. Abu'lfeda relates, that it had been a very large city, adorned with a noble Christian church, and rendered remarkable by 300 monasteries that were in it; tho' in his time, as he says, it lay almost buried in its own ruins. The author of the book Al Azizi observes, that many traces and remains of antiquity, in his days, were visible in it. The longitude assigned it by the former author is 62° 50', and the latitude 37° 00' <sup>2</sup>.

FROM Edeffa Aiyad marched to Constantia, or Constantina, at the head of the Moslem forces. This city was likewise seated on the eastern bank of the Euphrates, but in a southern direction from Edeffa, and is taken by Cellarius for the Nicephorium of the ancients. The inhabitants of this place, as well as the garison, refusing to surrender it by capitulation, Aiyad found himself obliged to lay siege to it. This he for some time carried on, and at last took the town by assault; putting 300 Greeks he found there in arms to the sword. From thence he moved to the strong fortress called Daras, which he likewise carried by storm, and massacred all the people he met with in the place. This struck the other fortified towns of Mesopotamia with such terror, that most of them submitted without making any resistance. Harrân, in particular, surrendered to Amru Ebn Said upon the same terms as those that had been granted to Edeffa. This city is the principal seat of the Sabians, whose chief temple was erected upon a pretty high hill, insomuch that the words Harranite and Sabian have been considered as synonymous by some of the oriental writers. It has produced many learned men, and particularly several that have made a very considerable progress in mathematics and philosophy. Of these we have a fuller account given us by Ebn Nedim and Ebn Kafta, who take notice of a good number of them, and, amongst the rest, of Thabet Ebn Korrab, and Mohammed Ebn Jabbar Ebn Senân Al Battâni, generally called by the Europeans Albatani, from Battân, or Bitân, a tract in the district of Harrân, who made a very considerable figure. The religion of the Sabians is one of those, the practice of which, on paying tribute, is tolerated by the Mohammedans; and the professors of it are often included a in the expression of the Korân, those to whom the Scriptures have been given, or literally, people of the book. They go on pilgrimage to a place near this city, and have also a great respect for the temple of Mecca and the pyramids of Egypt; fancying these last to have been the sepulchres of Seth, and of Enoch and S bi, his two sons, whom they look on as the first propagators of their religion. At these structures they sacrifice a cock and a black calf, and offer up incense. Besides the book of Psalms, the only true Scripture they read, they have other books, which they esteem equally sacred, particularly one in the Chaldee tongue, which they call the book of Seth, that is full of moral discourses. They derive their name of Sabians from the above-mentioned Sabi, tho' others deduce it from שִׁבָּא Saba, or the best of b heaven, which they worship. Travellers commonly call them Christians of St. John the Baptist, whose disciples also they pretend to be, using a kind of baptism, which is the greatest mark they bear of Christianity. Harrân is the principal city of that part of Mesopotamia called Diyâr Modar by the Arabs, a day's journey, or six parasangs, to the S. E. of Edeffa, according to the oriental geographers; tho' the interjacent tract terminated by those two cities is said to amount to two days journey by Golius. We are told by an eastern writer, that Harrân was the first city built after the deluge, and that it is about two days journey distant from Racca. It was the place where Terab, the father of Abram, died, according to Scripture; and is famous in profane history for the memorable defeat of Cressus. Its longitude, according to Abu'lfeda, is  $68^{\circ} 00'$ , and latitude  $37^{\circ} 50'$ . After the surrender of Harrân, Aiyad easily made himself master of Racca, or Rakka, Nisibis, or Nisibîn, Mawfel, or Mawfil, Beled, Beleda, or Belath, Rasain, or Rasein, Amîd, or Amîda, and many other towns of considerable strength; all which, without the least opposition, at his first appearance before them, surrendered to him. Al Makîn relates, that Amru Ebn Said took Ainwerda, about this time; which may possibly be true: but that he was the Moslem general who reduced Harrân and Roba, as that author likewise asserts, we cannot prevail upon ourselves to admit; as such a notion runs counter to all the other writers who have given any account of this irruption of the Arabs into Mesopotamia, and is absolutely exploded by Golius. Habib Ebn Meslema also, according to Abu'l Faraj, possessed himself of Karkisia, or Kirkisia, a city of Diyâr Modar, seated upon the river Chabora, or Aboras, together with the district belonging to it, by capitulation. We must beg leave to remind our readers d here, that, by the inundation of Al Arem, so famous in the Arabian history, eight of the Arab tribes were forced to abandon their habitations; at which time some of those tribes, or colonies, were probably led into Mesopotamia by three chiefs, Becr, Modar, and Rabîa, from whom the three provinces of that country are still called by the Arabs Diyâr Becr, Diyâr Moda, and Diyâr Rabîa. The tract comprehending these three provinces, and limited on every side but the N. where it is bounded by mount Taurus, by the Tigris and the Euphrates, and consequently forming a sort of peninsula, is, for that reason, not improperly denominated by some of the eastern writers Jezîra, or Al Jezîra, that is, the island, or peninsula; that word being applied by the Orientals to peninsulas as well as islands, as we have already e observed in our history of the ancient Arabs. Dionysius Telmarenfis informs us, that Asus, the Aiyas, or Aiyad, of Eutychius, Al Makîn, and Abu'l Faraj, the Moslem commander in chief, came to a general action with the imperial forces in Mesopotamia, and gave them an intire defeat; which, as he seems to intimate, happened before his troops possessed themselves of Edeffa, and therefore might probably occasion the surrender of that place. Theophanes, according to a very learned modern writer, calls this general Jasfus, and Cedrenus Jadus; which seems to imply, that he was Yezid Ebn Abu Sofiân, who is named Jasfus by the former, and Jadus by the latter, of those authors. But such a notion must be a mistake, as Yezid Ebn Abu Sofiân died of the plague in Syria, before the commencement of this expedition. In fine, by the reduction of Amîd, or Amîda, which stood near the foot of mount Taurus, at a small distance from the western bank of the Tigris, Aiyad seems to have completed, in less f than a year, the conquest of Mesopotamia <sup>a</sup>.

<sup>v</sup> THEOPHAN. chronograph. p. 280, 281. DIONYSIUS TELMARENS. apud Joseph. Simon. Asseman. in biblioth. Orient. tom. ii. p. 103. Romæ, 1721. <sup>2</sup> THEOPHAN. chronograph. p. 282, 283. GEORG. CEDREN. historiar. compend. p. 429. GREG. ABU'L FAR. hist. dynast. p. 178. DIONYS. TELMARENS. apud Joseph. Simon. Asseman. in biblioth. Orient. tom. ii. p. 103. Romæ, 1721. AL MAKIN, ubi sup. p. 30. EUTYCH. ubi sup. p. 294, 295. PLIN lib. v. c. 24. TACIT. annal. lib. xii. c. 12. & JAC. GRONOV. not. in loc. ISM. ABU'LFED. in tab. Mesopotam. Aut. lib. AL AZIZ. apud Abu'lfed. ibid. GOLII notæ ad Alfragan. p. 244, 249. ALB. SCHULT. ubi sup.

The Moslems extend their conquests.

NOR did the Moslems, about this time, meet with less success in other parts. Al Mogheirab Ebn Shaaba, one of the Khalîf's commanders, with a body of troops, made himself master of Shiz, a place famous for the birth of Zerdusht, situated between Zerjân, Shabrozûr, Dainawâr, and Marâgab, and over-ran the whole province of Aderbijân. He also took,

<sup>a</sup> STEPH. BYZANT. SUID. CHRIST. CELLAR. geogr. antiq. lib. iii. c. xv. p. 713, 714. LIPSIÆ, 1706. THEOPHAN. & CEDREN, ubi sup. AL MAKÎN, ubi sup. p. 25. GREG. ABU'L FAR. ubi sup. D'HERBEL. biblioth. Orient. p. 726, & alib. HYDE, de rel. vet. Pers. p. 128, & alib. GREAVES'S pyramidograph. p. 6, 7. POC. not. in spec. hist. Arab. p. 138, & alib. GREG. ABU'L FAR. hist. dynast. p. 281, 282, 291, 292, &c. GOLII not. ad Alfragan. p. 232, 233, 249—252. Aut. lib. AL AZIZ. & EBN HAWKEL, apud Abu'lfed. in Mesopotam. ut & ipse ABU'LFED. ibid. GEN. xi. 32. PLIN. lib. v. c. 24. FLOR. lib. iii. c. 11. LUCAN. lib. i. v. 104. EUTROP. lib. vi. c. 15. STRAB. lib. xvi. PLUT. in Crass. AMMIAN. MARCELLIN. lib. xxiii. EUTYCH. ubi sup. p. 294, 295. AL KOR. MOHAM. f. xxxiv. AL BEIDAWI, DIONYS. TELMARENS. & JOS. SIMON. ASSEMAN. ubi sup. OCKLEY'S hist. of the Sarac. vol. i. p. 362.

- a took, after a short siege, the city of Adabin in Armenia, and possessed himself of all that part of this country bordering on mount Taurus, and consequently in the neighbourhood of Mesopotamia. Nay, he obliged, in a manner, the whole region to recognize the authority of the Khalif, and penetrated into Cappadocia. The large town of Siwás, the Sebastia of Pliny, at that time perhaps belonging to Armenia, he took by composition, and subjugated all the inhabitants of the neighbouring tract. We are told by Eutychius, that Al Mogbeirah Ebn Shaaba, who at this time conquered the province of Aderbijân, was the first who gave Omar the title of the emperor of the faithful; which at first disgusted the Khalif, tho' he was afterwards reconciled to it. But this runs counter to what we find advanced by Abu'l Faraj in that particular, as has been already observed. That general, according to the first of these authors, when this event happened, was governor of Basra; the whole district of which place, together with Obolla, and other towns, had been reduced by Uibal Ebn Arkan, with a body of the Moslem forces. Uibal afterwards advanced to Al Madâyen, overthrew the governor of that place, who commanded a large body of Persian troops there, with great slaughter, and cut off his head. After which, he obtained leave of the Khalif to perform the pilgrimage to Mecca; but, before his departure from the army, he made himself master of Al Madâyen, and left a garison there. Al Mogbeirah Ebn Shaaba succeeded him in the post of governor of Basra, as well as that of general of the Moslem forces in Persia. But he not remaining long in that honourable situation, Abu Musa Al Ajhari was appointed his successor, and also prefect of the territory of Misan, with orders from the Khalif to build several towns, or villages, in the neighbourhood of Basra, and settle some Arabian colonies there. This he did, and finished the buildings of the city of Basra, in which he thought proper to erect a Moslem temple, or mosque, of a moderate size. The city of Sbiz, according to Golius, seems, by way of eminence, to be called the Pyreum, or fire-temple, by Abu'l-feda, as having given birth to Zerdusht, the great prophet and pontiff of the Magians or fire-worshippers, if not the author and founder of their religion, and is one of the principal places in the province of Aderbijân. That province, which includes part of the ancient Media and part of Armenia, was, as it were, anciently the center of the Magians, having been almost intirely inhabited by them, and received its name from the object of their worship; the word Azar, Adur, Adar, or Ader, in old Persic, signifying fire, or rather the angel presiding over that element. Nay, the word Zar-adoft, Zar-ades, Zar adusht, or Zerdusht, the name of the great Magian pontiff himself, according to some, denotes, in the ancient Persic language, the friend of fire. It may not be amiss to remark farther there, that the followers of Zerdusht not long since continued to be pretty numerous in the aforesaid province; so that it may not improbably be the principal seat of the Magians, or Persees, at this very day <sup>b</sup>.

- THE Moslem arms likewise made a very considerable progress in Khûzestân, the antient Susiana, a little before the 21st year of the Hejra, as seems sufficiently to appear from Ebn Shohnah, as well as from Khondemir, the Persian historian. The general that commanded the Khalif's forces on the side of Persia, in this expedition, who, from several circumstances in the Arabian history, appears to have been Saad Ebn Abi Wakkâs, some of whose great exploits in that country have already been taken notice of, possessed himself of Abwâz, the principal town of that province, with little opposition; which put the best part of it, if not the whole, intirely into his hands. The city of Abwâz is the capital of Khûzestân, as well as of a particular district, called from it by the Persians the province of Abwâz. Sometimes that name is also applied to the whole tract going amongst the Orientals under the name of Khûzestân, as may be inferred from some good authors. That city, of which at present little remains, stood near the confluence of two small rivers, and not far from the Persian gulf, or bay of Basra <sup>c</sup>.

- THIS last town, however, seems to have fallen again to the Persians, after it had been reduced by Saad Ebn Abi Wakkâs, according to Al Makîn; tho', if we will believe that author, it did not remain long in their hands. For, Abu Musa Al Ajhari, as he asserts, made himself master of Abwâz and Siwâs in the 21st year of the Hejra. With regard to the latter of which places, we cannot prevail upon ourselves to admit, that it was Siwâs, or Sebastia, in Pontus, or rather at this time, as it should seem, in Armenia, above-mentioned, as some appear to have done. For, Al Makîn, by mentioning these two cities as taken near the same time, and that by the same general, seems clearly to intimate, that they could not be very far distant from one another; whereas Siwâs in Armenia stood at an immense distance from Abwâz in Khûzeftân. We would, therefore, emend the text of Al Makîn, by substituting Sirâf in the room of Sirwâs; which we hope will meet with the approbation of our learned and curious readers. For, Sirâf was at this time a flourishing maritime city, seated on the Persian gulf, or bay of Basra, in the province of Fars, or Persia properly so called, which was contiguous to Khûzeftân, and particularly that district of it called in the strictest sense the province of Abwâz. The Arabic elements of the word Sirâf are likewise extremely similar to those forming the name Sirwâs; so that the depravation here supposed might have been very easily made. Hormezan, or Harmazan, the Persian governor of Khûzeftân, surrendered the town and territory of Abwâz to the Moslem troops in the 17th year of the Hejra, or at least the following year. Abu Musa Al Ashari seems likewise to have almost completed the conquest of Khûzeftân, by the second reduction of Abwâz; and to have possessed himself of a considerable part of Fars, or Farfistân, by obliging the city of Sirâf to submit to the Khalîf. We say, Abu Musa Al Ashari seems to have almost completed the conquest of Khûzeftân, by the second reduction of Abwâz; for that he did not absolutely subjugate that province, appears from hence, that he was not able to force the strong city of Tustar, the Susa, or Shushan, of the antients, to surrender to him. M. D'Herbelot is guilty of a mistake, when he affirms the district of Abwâz to have been a part of Chaldea, or Irâk; since it was one of the principal cities, if not the metropolis, of Khûzeftân; the tract nearly answering to the Susiana of the antients, as has been already observed <sup>d</sup>.

<sup>b</sup> EUTYCH. AL MAKÎN, & GREG. ABU'L FAR. ubi sup. GOLII not. ad Alfragan. p. 35, 226, 227, 266, 267, & alib. DIONYS. TELMARENS. ubi sup. PLIN. PTOL. & SHARIF AL EDRIS. apud Gol. ubi sup. p. 266. ut & ipse GOL. ibid. AL WAKÊN. ubi sup. ISM. ABU'LFED. in geogr. OCKLEY, ubi sup. <sup>c</sup> EBN SHOHNÂH, KHONDEMIR, EUTYCH. AL MAKÎN, & GREG. ABU'L FAR. ubi sup. D'HERBEL. bibl. Orient. p. 687, 688. GOLII not. ad Alfragan. p. 118. See also Mr. SALE's map of Arabia, prefixed to his preliminary discourse, and his translation of the Korân.

The Arabs
conquer part of Khorasân.

ABOUT the same time, that is, in the 21st year of the Hejra, the Arabs, under the command of Al Nooman Ebn Al Makrân, subdued likewise Khorasân, according to Al Makîn; tho' that large and extensive province was reduced to the obedience of the Khalîf in the 21st and 22d years of the Moslem æra, if we will believe Khondemir, the Persian historian. Khorasân is bounded on the south by a vast desert, that separates it from the province of Fars, Farfistân, or Persia properly so called; on the north by Turkeftân, Mawarâ'nabr, the Amu, and sandy deserts on the side of the kingdom of Khowarazm; on the east by Sijistân, and the territories of the Mogul; and on the west by another solitude contiguous to Jurjân, Georgia, or Georgiana, and Al Jebâl, or the Persian Irâk. From which description of its limits, handed down to us by the Persian geographer, it appears to be a region of prodigious extent. M. D'Herbelot makes this vast tract to correspond with the Bactria, or Bactriana, of the antients; as it is terminated by the river Amu, supposed by him to answer to the Oxus, and the aforesaid deserts, on the side of Khowarazm. Nor can it be deemed improbable, that part at least of this province, in some respect, corresponded with the antient Bactria; since that country was separated from Sogdiana, part of which was occupied by the Chorasmii, by the Oxus. For, that the Chorasmii, or Khorazmians, of Ptolemy, Arrian, Curtius, and Athenæus, were the progenitors of the people of the kingdom of Khowarazm, from the great affinity of their names, as well as their situation, seems clearly enough to appear. Notwithstanding what has been so positively advanced, in relation to the conquest of Khorasân by Omar's troops, it must be allowed, that the Moslems could not effect the reduction of this province before the Khalîfat of Othmân. They therefore, at this time, probably made themselves masters of only those parts of it terminated by the deserts bordering upon Farfistân and the Persian Irâk. As there is so little difference between the words Khorasân and Khowarazm, or Khowarazm, and the regions going under those names were separated by the Oxus; from thence we may conclude it not improbable, that one of the nations inhabiting those tracts was descended from the other. Be this, however, as it will, we are by no means inclined to believe, that the etymon of the word Khorasân, produced by M. D'Herbelot will prove satisfactory to our more sagacious and intelligent readers <sup>e</sup>.

The Nohawandian war.

BEFORE we conclude our account of the military exploits of the Arabs in the Khalîfat of Omar, we must beg leave to give our readers a concise relation of the Nohawandic, or Nohawandian, war, which happened, according to Al Makîn, in the 21st year of the Hejra. The Persians receiving advice of an irruption made by the Arabs, under the conduct of Al Nooman Ebn Al Makrân, into their territories, assembled all their forces at Nohawand, a town of no great note in Fars, if we will give credit to Abu'l-feda; tho', according to Yakût, it was one of the principal cities of that country, in order to drive them from thence into their own dominions. Al Nooman being apprized of the enemy's motions, marched directly against them, came up with them at Nohawand, and immediately engaged them.

<sup>d</sup> AL MAKIN, ubi sup. p. 25. GOLII not. ad Alfragan. p. 266, 267. GREG. ABU'L FAR. in hist. dynast. p. 179. D'HERBEL. biblioth. Orient. p. 688, & alib. GOLII not. ad Alfragan. p. 216. SALE's map of Arabia, ubi sup. <sup>e</sup> AL MAKIN, ubi sup. p. 25, 30. D'HERBEL. biblioth. Orient. p. 687, 688. 995. KHONDEMIR, ISM. ABU'L-FED. ULUGH BEIGH, NASSIR ETTUS. GOLII not. ad Alfragan. pass. PTOL. in geogr. ARRIAN. lib. iv. c. 15. CURT. lib. vii. c. 4. lib. viii. c. 1. STRAB. lib. xi. ATHEN. deipnosoph. lib. ii. sub fin. DIONYS. perieg. v. 746. CHRIST. CELLAR. geogr. antiq. lib. iii. c. xxi. p. 833, 839. An account of the present state of Northern Asia, &c. p. 419. Lond. 1729.

- a This action, which was extremely sharp, ended in the defeat of the Persians, who could never afterwards make head against the Arabs. The latter, however, sustained a very considerable loss by the death of their general, Al Nooman Ebn Al Makrán, who was killed in the action. Al Makín seems to intimate, that this battle continued several days; by which, as we apprehend, he must mean, that, during the movements of the two armies in the neighbourhood of Nobawand, several skirmishes happened, which at last brought on a general action, that put a period to this war. The same author likewise relates, that many of the Persians were slain in the battle of Nobawand; but of these he has not transmitted down to us the precise number. After the Persians had received this overthrow, Nobawand surrendered to the victors, and had a tribute imposed upon it. The first sum the people
- b of that town paid the Arabs was distributed amongst the citizens of Basra, who had supplied Al Nooman with a great number of recruits. That general had been intimately acquainted with Mohammed, and was therefore stiled by the Moslems one of the COMPANIONS. Nobawand was situated upon a hill, fourteen parasangs S. of Hamedan, and abounded with rivers and gardens, that furnished the inhabitants both with plenty of water and excellent fruits; of the latter of which very considerable quantities were carried into Assyria. Hodaifa Ebn Yaman, who, after the death of Nooman Ebn Al Makrán, took upon him the command of the Moslem forces, following his blow, reduced the whole kingdom of Persia under the dominion of the Khalif, except the two dependent provinces of Kermán and Sijistán, which held out for some time, though they were obliged at last to submit. In fine, Yazdegerd
- c being almost intirely stript of his dominions by the last defeat, fled to Merú, a city of Khorasán, situated in a remote part of that country, upon the Oxus. We are told by a Christian writer, that the Arabs carried off with them all the rich furniture of Yazdegerd's palace, and took his daughters prisoners in this expedition; as also, that, after the Khalif had completed his conquests in Persia, he caused to be drawn out a list or roll, containing an exact account of the number of all the men, cattle, and other useful animals, in his extensive dominions. It has been already observed, that the Arabs, under the command of Abd'allah Ebn Nadil, immediately before the commencement of the Nobawandian war, had made themselves masters of Ispahán, or Asfehán, the Aspa of Ptolemy, and at present the metropolis of the kingdom of Persia; to which we must beg leave to add, that, about the same
- d time, they likewise reduced the city of Istacbra, that stood on the spot which had formerly been occupied by the antient Persepolis. This place made a considerable figure in the days of Omar, and has, since that time, been pretty populous for a certain period; but at present it has scarce the appearance of a poor obscure village. Istacbra is said to have derived its name from that of the son of Kajomaras, or rather Kayomaras; which, if true, must evince it to have been a town of very high antiquity; tho' it was afterwards called Persepolis by the Greeks. The remains of the antient capital of Persia, visible here in the days of Abu'lfeda, appeared so stupendous and wonderful, that the stately structures to which they belonged were supposed by the vulgar to have been the work of demons. A little before the battle of Nobawand, Jarir Al Bajali, with the Arab forces under his conduct,
- e took Hamadan, or Hamedan, a very large city of Fars, according to Ebn Hawkel, and at no great distance from Nobawand, or Nihawand, as 'tis called by Yakút. This must have happened soon after the reduction of that part of the province of Khorasán, which was conquered by the Arabs in the days of Omar. Al Makín affirms, that Khâled Ebn Al Walid died at Hems the year in which the battle of Nobawand was fought; with whom, as to the time of that event, another Arab author of good repute, as has been already observed, perfectly agrees <sup>f</sup>.

- ABOUT two years after the conclusion of the Nobawandian war, in which the Arabs probably still farther extended their conquests, tho' no account of their military operations during that period has reached us, that is, in the 23d year of the Hejra, according to Abu
- f Jaasar Al Tabari, the Khalif Omar Ebn Al Khattâb was assassinated by a Persian slave; of which horrid fact the Arab writers have handed down to us the following particulars: Abu Lulua, a Persian, of the Magian sect, whose Persian name was Firúz, one of Al Mogheira Ebn Al Shaaba's slaves, was obliged by his master to pay daily two dirhems, in conformity to the Mohammedan custom, for the free exercise of his religion. Firúz resenting this treatment, complained of it to the Khalif, and desired that some part, at least, of the tribute exacted of him might be remitted. But this being refused by Omar, the Persian threaten'd his destruction; which he soon after effected, by stabbing him thrice in the belly with a dagger, whilst he was in the mosque at Medina performing his morning devotions. The

<sup>f</sup> AL MAKIN, ubi sup. p. 25. GREG. ABU'L FAR. ubi sup. ISM. ABU'LFED. in hist. gen. GOLII not. ad Alfragan. p. 221, 222. EUTYCH. ubi sup. p. 296, 297. LEBTARIKH, KHONDEMIR, D'HEREEL. biblioth. Orient. p. 485. GEORG CEDREN. historiar. compend. p. 429, 430. PTOL. in Parth. GOLII not. ad Alfragan. p. 113, 114, 214, 215, 216, &c. ABU'LFED. in geogr. AUTHOR of the hist. of Jerusalem, MS. Arab. Pocock. in Bibl. Bodl. Oxon. num. 362.

Arabs then present perceiving that the villain had embrued his hands in the blood of their sovereign, immediately rushed upon him; but he made so desperate a defence, that he wounded thirteen of them, and seven of them mortally. But, at last, one of the Khalif's attendants threw his vest over him, and seized him; upon which, he stabbed himself, and soon after expired. According to Theophanes, this Fir'iz was an apostate, or renegade, and consequently had before embraced the Mohammedan religion; but this is by no means probable, because, on his becoming a convert to Islamism, he must have been manumitted by his master, and, on his relapsing into Magism, he would indubitably have been put to death by the Khalif's order; neither of which particulars are consistent with what we find related of him by the Arab historians, and even by our Greek chronographer himself. As for Omar, he languished three days, and then died, in the month of Dhu'l-hajja, and the 23d year of the Hejra, which began in the year of our LORD 643. With regard to the duration of his Khalifat, authors are not agreed. The Arab historians, whom we are inclined to follow, say that he reigned between ten and eleven years. Theophanes affirms, that he was murdered in the 12th year of his Khalifat, and Dionysius Telmarenensis extends the length of his reign to twelve complete years. Only one of the wounds given him by Fir'iz was mortal, and that he received under his navel. At his death he was sixty-three years old; which, as we are told by an Arab author, was the age of Mohammed himself, Abu Becr, and Ayesha, one of the prophet's wives, when they died. When Omar fell in the mosque, during the remainder of the service, Abd'alrahman Ebn Awf, one of Mohammed's first converts, supplied his place; and the three days preceding his death, Sabib Ebn Tarfib, at his command, officiated for him. His body was interred in Ayesha's apartment, near that of the prophet Mohammed. We are informed by Eutychius, that, during his Khalifat, he performed the pilgrimage to Mecca nine times <sup>e</sup>.

His character. THE Khalif Omar, as to his person, was very tall, bald, and of a swarthy complexion. One author says, that he was left-handed; and another that he used his left hand as well as his right. His head and his beard he tinged with Al Henna, which gave them a beautiful red colour in the same manner as did Mohammed, and his predecessor Abu Becr. With regard to his disposition, the Moslem writers pass the highest encomiums upon him; tho' in this, perhaps, they may not have altogether divested themselves of partiality. His singular justice, abstinence, and piety, say they, procured him more reverence from his subjects than his successors could command by their grandeur. His cane, or walking-stick, according to Al Wakedi, struck more terror into those that were present, than another man's sword. His food was chiefly barley-bread, and his sauce salt. Sometimes, however, by way of abstinence and mortification, he would eat the former without the latter. His drink was only water. He was a constant observer of religious duties, and extremely regular in the performance of his devotions. His administration of justice was very impartial, his ears being always open to the complaints of the meanest; nor could the greatness of an offender ever screen him from condign punishment. He punctually adhered to the true and genuine sense of the Korân, and the traditions of Mohammed, in all his decisions; which rendered him extremely agreeable to his people. He was so far from being of a jealous or suspicious temper, that he did not always take the measures and precautions necessary for his own preservation. This sufficiently appears from the following relation, handed down to us by Abu'l Faraj, of some of the principal circumstances attending his death, as well as of the cause and occasion of that fatal event <sup>h</sup>.

The cause of Omar's death. THE reason of Omar's assassination was this: Abu Lulua complaining to him of the rigorous treatment he met with from his master, who exacted of him every day two dirhems, by way of tribute, the Khalif said to him, "The money demanded by your master is no such great matter; since, as I am informed, you can construct a wind-mill, if you please." To this Abu Lulua replied, "I'll take care to construct a wind-mill for you, that shall not cease grinding till the day of the resurrection." Upon which, Omar cried out, "The slave threatens me; if I was disposed to put any person to death, upon bare suspicion, I should immediately take off the varlet's head." Afterwards, when he had been stabbed, whilst at prayers in the mosque, Omar sent for a physician, and commanded him to examine the wounds he had received. This being done, the doctor desired the Khalif to drink a draught of wine; which he did; but when the liquor came from him, it appeared in such a form, that no one could tell whether it was wine or blood. The Khalif then sent for another physician, who, after inspecting his wounds, requested him to take off a draught of milk. This that prince likewise complied with; and when the liquor ran out of one a of them, it was of the same colour and consistence as at first, or rather, according to some of the manuscript copies of Abu'l Faraj, stinking milk; which being observed by the doctor, he said to the Khalif, "O emperor of the faithful, make your will without delay; your departure is at hand." From which relation we may infer not only that the Khalif Omar was void of the least propensity to jealousy or suspicion, but likewise that, in his days, some persons at least not altogether unacquainted with physic were to be met with in Arabia <sup>1</sup>.

<sup>e</sup> EUTYCH. patriarch. Alexandrin. annal. tom. ii. p. 320—323. AL MAKIN, ubi sup. p. 25, 26. GREG. ABU'L FAR. ubi sup. p. 79. THEOPHAN. chronograph. p. 284. DION. TELMARENS. ubi sup. AUTH. of the history of Jerusalem, MS. Arab. Pocock. in Bibl. Bodl. Oxon. num. 362. <sup>h</sup> AL MAKIN, ubi sup. p. 26. EUTYCH. ubi sup. p. 322, 323. AL WAKED. ubi sup. GREG. ABU'L FAR. hist. dynast. p. 179, 180. D'HERBEL. bibl. Orient. p. 179, 180.

ONE of the names, or rather surnames, of Omar Ebn Al Kbattâb Ebn Nafail was Abu Omar surnam- Hafs, according to Al Kodai. Omar was of the posterity of Ada Ebn Caab Ebn Lxxxi, and <sup>Al Faruk</sup> had the surname likewise of Al Faruk, that is, the Divider, or Distinguisher, which he b received from the prophet himself on the following occasion. A wicked Moslem having a dispute with a Jew, appealed from Mohammed's decision, which was against him, to Omar; whose love of justice and equity at that time, tho' he could be considered in no other light than that of a private person, was most conspicuous amongst the Arabs. Omar, greatly incensed at the Moslem's obstinate presumption, in daring to prefer his judgment to that of the prophet himself, at one blow with his scymitar cut him in two; saying aloud, "This is the reward of him who refuseth to submit to the judgment of God and his apostle." Mohammed being informed of the fact, immediately gave Omar the surname, or title, of Al Faruk; which alluded both to his division of that knave's body, and to his distinction between truth and falsehood. The Moslem at first insisted upon referring the matter to Caab Ebn Al
c Ashraf, one of the principal Arabs of the Jewish religion; but at last agreed to leave it to the determination of Mohammed: for which reason the prophet gives Caab Ebn Al Ashraf the name of Tâghût, that is, the devil, or seducer, in the Korân. We are told by Ebn Shebâb, that Omar was first called Al Faruk by the Jews, and not by Mohammed; but Jallalo'ddin and Al Beidarwi, two of the most authentic commentators on the Korân, are of a different opinion <sup>k</sup>.

THIS Khalif's conquests were so considerable and extensive, that had no future additions <sup>Some other</sup> been made to the Moslem empire, it would have been one of the most powerful and for- <sup>particulars</sup> midable monarchies in the world. He expelled both the Christians and Jews out of the <sup>relating to</sup> peninsula of the Arabs. He subdued Syria, Egypt, a considerable part of Barka, the western <sup>Omar.</sup>
d Tripoli, with its territory, and almost the whole kingdom of Persia. Besides which, his troops possessed themselves of the whole province of Aderbijan, a large extent of territory in Khorasân, the greatest part of Armenia, and some other neighbouring tracts. He left behind him a numerous army, composed of the best soldiers in the world, such as the forces of no other potentate at that time durst look in the face. And, notwithstanding all this, he persisted to the last in his abstemious way of life; nor could any person ever infer an increase of his riches and power from any increase of his expences and retinue. The truth of the matter is, if we will believe the oriental historians, he was generous, liberal, and munificent, to a surprising degree; frequently supplying with large sums of money vast numbers of his subjects, and even strangers too, who stood in need of his support. He was extremely e punctual in the payment of his creditors, and often paid them more than their due. His equal and impartial distribution of justice is greatly celebrated by the eastern writers, and in some measure appears from several instances already produced in the course of this work; to which many more might be added, would the limits we have here prescribed ourselves permit. He surrounded the city of Cûfa with a wall, as has been already observed, and repaired, or rather rebuilt, both the temples at Jerusalem and Medina. The æra called the Hejra, or the supputation of time from the flight of Mohammed to Yatreb, was introduced first amongst the Arabs in his reign, and still prevails amongst the Moslems in every part of the world. He was the first who kept an exact list of all the persons who either served in the army or received any stipend from the public. A decree was first issued out in his f Khalifat, by which the Moslems were forbidden to sell any woman that had been delivered of a child for a slave; which afterwards passed into a law. As Abu Becr divided the money in his treasury every Friday night amongst his subjects, in proportion to the different degrees of merit of which they were possessed; so Omar made such a division of his money amongst the Moslems weekly on the same night, in proportion to their necessities only. For which he assigned this weighty reason, viz. "because the good things of the present life were given us by God for the relief of our necessities; whereas the proper reward of virtue, and real intrinsic merit, belonged to another world." We are told by some of the oriental writers, that the tomb of Sennacherib, king of Affyria, was discovered on mount Lebanon, in the Khalifat of Omar; and that Al Kbedr, or Elias, or at least one of his disciples, named Bar Elias, then appeared. Amongst the remarkable sayings of Omar, the following has been ranked by a Moslem author. The Arab empire will fail, when the prince at the head of it shall be destitute both of the piety of the Moslems and the liberality of the Gentiles. In fine, Omar, who, in his disposition, so resembled Abu Becr, that the Arabs called those Khalifs Omarân, or the two Omars, built the city of Basra, at the mouth of the Tigris, in order to make himself master of the Persian gulf, and consequently, by means of this, to facilitate the importation of all those rich and valuable commodities that were the produce of India into his own dominions <sup>1</sup>.

<sup>1</sup> GRIG. ABU'L FAR. ubi sup. KHONDEMIR. AHMED EBN MOHAMMED EBN ABDI RABBIHI, MS. Hentings: in Bibl. Bodl. Oxon. num. 554. Vide etiam GAGN. la vie de Mahom. tom. ii. c. 21. p. 405—413. A Amsterdam, 1732. Vide etiam D'HERBEL. biblioth. Orient. ubi sup. <sup>k</sup> AL KODAI, AL TABARI, EBN SHEHAB, apud Al Kodaium, JALLALO'DDIN, AL BEIDAWI, D'HERBEL. ubi sup. GAGN. not. ad Abu'lfed. de vit. Moham. c. x. p. 22. Al Kor. MOHAM. f. iv. See also SALE's translat. and notes on the Kor. p. 51, 69.

Omar refuses to name a successor.

As soon as it was known that one of the wounds Omar had received from Abu Lulua was mortal, and that the milk he had drank issued from thence without meeting in its passage with the least alteration, the Moslems about him pressed him to nominate a successor, without delay. To these he answered, that if Salem was alive, he should prefer him to any other person. Then they asked him what he thought of Ali Ebn Abu Tâleb, whose affinity and near relation to the prophet, as well as his own personal merit and bravery, seemed to render him worthy of so elevated a station. "He is not serious enough," replied the Khalif, "for the discharge of the duties of so important a post." This not succeeding, they proposed to him Othmân Ebn Affân, as a person every way qualified for so weighty a charge; but him he rejected, as one too much inclined to favour his own friends and relations. Then they recommended Zobeir Ebn Al Awâm, who had been of great service to Mohammed, soon after he entered upon his prophetic function; but his avarice, in Omar's opinion, rendered him unworthy of the Khalifat. Nor could he be prevailed upon to name Saad Ebn Al Wakkâs, whom he judged of too fierce and intractable a disposition for his successor. Telha Ebn Obeid'allah, one of Abu Becr's relations, he esteemed too proud and haughty for so sublime a dignity; since, in his opinion, the prophet's successor ought to be a person of the greatest affability and condescension. Nor could he be induced to nominate his son, when he was mentioned to him; saying, "It was enough for the family of Al Khatâb to have one to give an account of so arduous a province as the Khalifat." Omar, however, appointed six persons to deliberate about the election of a successor, for three days after his decease; excluding his son at the same time from the right of voting, tho' he commanded him to assist at their deliberations. These were Othmân Ebn Affân, Ali Ebn Abu Tâleb, Zobeir Ebn Al Awâm, Abd'alrahmân Ebn Awf, Tella Ebn Obeid'allah, and Saad Ebn Abu Wakkâs; all of which had been intimately acquainted with Mohammed, and were therefore stiled, by way of eminence, THE COMPANIONS. Abu Obeidah has been inserted in this list, instead of Abd'alrahmân Ebn Awf, by Abul Faraj; but as that historian herein runs counter both to Eutychius and Al Makin, and as more of the oriental authors than one assert Abu Obeidah to have died of the plague in Syria, in the 18th year of the Hejra, we have thought fit with the learned Mr. Ockley, to reject his authority in the point before us <sup>m</sup>.

Othmân elected Khalif.

THE six commissioners, or rather electors, met after Omar's death, in order to deliberate about the choice of a new Khalif. At their first meeting, Abd'alrahmân Ebn Awf declared, that he would lay aside all pretensions to the Khalifat, provided he might be indulged the liberty of electing out of his five companions an emperor of the faithful. To this they all agreed, except Ali Ebn Abu Tâleb, who thought himself injured, because he was not the immediate successor of Mohammed. He, therefore, imagined, that, as one of the prophet's nearest relations, and the husband of Fâtema, he ought to be called to the succession without any farther deliberations, and even without the formality of an election. However, he at last acquiesced in the proposal, after Abd'alrahmân had sworn to him, that he would not favour any of the candidates who should offer himself. Abd'alrahmân having now carried his point, consulted with the other commissioners, and the leading men amongst the people, in order to discover the person they had principally in view. Finding, therefore, that they were almost unanimously inclined to favour the elevation of Othmân Ebn Affân, he declared him Khalif; and his five companions, as well as the people in general, then assembled for that purpose, immediately recognized his authority. With regard to the precise day of Othmân's inauguration, authors are not perfectly agreed. Some say, that it happened on the last day of Dhulhajja, in the 23d year of the Hejra; others the year following, in the month of Al Moharram; and others again fix it upon the 20th day of Al Moharram, three days after the death of Omar. Be that as it will, the new Khalif at that time had the hearts and affections of all his subjects, tho' he afterwards unfortunately lost them. We are told

<sup>1</sup> AL WAKED. EUTYCH. AL MAKIN, ABU'L FAR. THEOPHAN. CEDREN. ABU'LFED. DIONYS. TELMARENS. & EBN SHOHNAH, ubi sup. KHONDEMIR, D'HERBEL biblioth. Orient. p. 687, 688, 689. <sup>m</sup> GREG. ABU'L FAR. hist. dynast. p. 182, 183. AL MAKIN, hist. Saracen. p. 25, 26. EUTYCH. patriarch. Alexandrin. annal. tom. ii. p. 322, 323. ISM. ABU'LFED. de vit. Moham. c. lxxii. p. 156, 157. OCKLEY'S hist. of the Sarac. vol. i. p. 344, 369, 370.

- a by Abu'l Faraj, that Abu Obeidah came to Ali, and demanded of him, "Whether, if he " was chosen, he would govern the Moslems according to the contents of the Korân, the " traditions of Mohammed, and the decisions of the two seniors?" meaning, we suppose, his two predecessors, Abu Becr and Omar. To which Ali made answer, that "he was very " willing to make the two former the basis and standard of his government, but could not " prevail upon himself to put the latter upon the same footing." The same terms being offered to Othmân, he readily embraced them, without the least limitation or restriction; and was, in consequence thereof, immediately elected Khalif. But here, whatever regard in the main we may pay to his authority, we must beg leave to dissent from this historian; since the death of Abu Obeidah preceded that of Omar, and consequently he could have no
 b share in the election of his successor, as has been already observed. Besides, Abd'alrahmân Ebn Awf was a much more considerable person than Abu Obeidah, notwithstanding all his conquests, as having been one of the first converts to Islamism, and even one of the principal of the first and most intimate companions of the prophet; so that had both he and Abu Obeidah been living at the time of Omar's decease, the former, in exclusion of the latter, would probably have been appointed one of the six commissioners, or electors, above-mentioned. However, that what has been attributed to Abu Obeidah by Abu'l Faraj, ought to be ascribed to Abd'alrahmân Ebn Awf, so that the story in the main may be true, very clearly appears from Al Makin. We must not forget to remark, that Othmân Ebn Affân is called Othmân the son of Phan, or Fan, by Theophanes; that Ebn Arrabeb, in his Chronicon, asserts c Othmân to have been inaugurated on the first day of Al Moharram; and that Abi'l Walid places that event on the third day of the same month, in the 24th year of the Hejra, which was nearly coincident with the year of our LORD 645<sup>a</sup>.

<sup>a</sup> AL MAKIN, ubi sup. c. iv. p. 31. GREG. ABU'L FAR. ubi sup. p. 182, 183. ABU JAAFAR, apud Al Makin, ubi sup. p. 25. EUTYCH. ubi sup. p. 320—323. EBN ARRAHEB, in chron. Oriental. ABU'L WALID, apud Dionys. Telmarenf. in chron. five annal. ut & ipse DIONYS. TELMARENS. ibid. Vide etiam JOSEPH. SIM. ASSEMAN. in bibl. Orient. tom. ii. p. 103. Romæ, 1721. ISM. ABU'LFED. ubi sup. OCKLEY, ubi sup. & THEOPH. chronograph. p. 284.

S E C T. III.

- d A S soon as Othmân was settled in the government, he sent a body of troops, under the The Arabs command of Al Mogheirah Ebn Shaaba, to complete the conquest of the territory of extend their Hamadan; which he effected without any great difficulty. He also attacked the castle of conquests.
Bira in Mesopotamia, seated upon the Euphrates, which had either never been reduced by Omar, or fallen again to the emperor, after the departure of the Moslem troops out of the province to which it belonged; and, with little loss, made himself master of it. With regard to Hamadan, or Hamadsan, as 'tis pronounced by the Arabs, it was, according to Abu'lfeda, one of the largest cities of Al Jebâl, enjoyed a very salubrious air, and abounded with gardens, fruitful plains, and fountains. There is a very high and famous mountain in its neighbourhood, named Al Wend. The kings, or Shâbs, of Persia retired formerly to this place, e for the sake of its delightful situation, and the fine breezes that greatly refreshed them, in the summer time; on which account it is denominated by Hamdalla the city of kings, or the royal city. Goliuf seems inclined to think, that it was the Ecbatana of the antients. Darâb, the son of Darâb, erected a citadel in it, which has for a considerable time been demolished.
Hamadan stands about two days journey from Derbezân, another very considerable city, little inferior in any respect to Hamadan, except that the inhabitants of the former follow the decisions of the Sonna, and consequently pay tribute to the king of Persia, for the free exercise of their religion; whereas those of the latter adhere to an observance of the doctrines and tenets of the Shiites, looking upon Ali as the first lawful Imâm, or rightful successor of Mohammed. We are told by an oriental writer, that Hamadan was formerly four parasangs f in length, and as many in breadth, and the largest city in Al Jebâl. He likewise says, that it was destroyed by Nebuchadnezzar, but rebuilt and refortified by Dara, the son of Dara, who brought all his riches thither; and that it has produced a great number of excellent men. The intense cold in the winter-season here has been taken notice of by several authors.
 One writer makes the longitude of this place to be 75° 20', and another 76° 00'; it has had likewise different latitudes assigned it by different authors. The situation given by Pliny to Ecbatana clearly evinces the spot occupied by Hamadan to have been at a considerable distance from that town. The fortress of Bira, reduced in the twenty-fourth year of the Hejra by Al Mogheirah Ebn Shaaba, is said to have been founded upon a rock; so that it was undoubtedly a place of exceeding great strength. It had a valley appertaining to it in g the time of Ebn Said, that went by the name of the valley of olives, and abounded with trees and fountains. It was then one of the most advanced garrisons of the Arabs against the Mod. Hist. Vol. I. S f f Tartars.

Tartars. It was at that time likewise the head of a prefecture, and the place where travellers<sup>a</sup> passed the Euphrates into Syria. Abu'lfeda determines its longitude to be  $62^{\circ} 30'$ , and its latitude  $36^{\circ} 50'$ . A modern Orientalist, of very considerable erudition, takes Bira on the Euphrates, there being some other places of the same name, to have been the Zeugma of the antients. A little before the reduction of Bira, Mab Al Basra, and the remainder of the tract belonging to Ispahân and Ray, or Raya, one of the most antient cities of Al Jebâl, were obliged also to submit to the Khalif, by a Moslem army, that obeyed the orders of Abu Musa Al Ashari. There was such a sharp contention between the Shiites and Sonnites in the city of Raya, that it broke out into a civil war, which ended in the extinction of the Shiites; after which, the Shâfeïtes and Hanîfites, the two sects of which the victors were composed, quarrelled amongst themselves, and almost totally ruined the city. What remained of it,<sup>b</sup> according to Hamdalla, was soon after destroyed by the Tartars. It is about a day's journey distant from Komes, and thirty parasangs from Cazbîn. Komes and Ra, if we will believe Abu'lfeda, terminate on the W. of the desert of Khorasân. Raya is famous for the birth of that celebrated philosopher and physician Abu Becr Mohammed Ebn Zakaria, from the place of his nativity furnamed Rhazis, Rhazes, or rather Al Razi, who died at Raya, in the year of the Hejra 311. He wrote many books; one of the principal of which seems to be that treating of particular diseases, intituled, Medicina Mansuriana, as though it had at first been dedicated, or inscribed, to Al Mansûr Ebn Ishak Ebn Ahmed, nephew to Ali Abu Mohammed Al Moktafi Billa, the 17th Khalif of the house of Abbâs, to whom it is directed, or addressed. The common title is Rhazes to Al Mansûr. According to Ebn Hawkel, Raya stands in the<sup>c</sup> region of Deylam, though others make it to belong to Khorasân. An oriental author says, that the country in which it was situated was formerly much frequented, or rather traversed, by merchants. The longitude of Raya, if we will believe Abu'lfeda, is  $76^{\circ} 20'$ , and its latitude  $35^{\circ} 35'$ . This year Moâwiyah Ebn Abu Sofiân, who was then the Moslem prefect of Syria, made an irruption into the imperial territories, took many towns, and ravaged the country through which he moved in a dreadful manner. Nor did he sustain any considerable loss, notwithstanding the signal advantages he gained in this expedition<sup>o</sup>.

The Arabs drive Yazdegerd out of his dominions.

In the first year of his reign, Othmân likewise sent another body of troops, under the command of Abd'allah Ebn Amer, to act on the side of Persia, with orders to repossess themselves of Istrachra, or Estakhr, which had found means to revert to its old master Yazdegerd. The<sup>d</sup> motive to this expedition seems to have been the seizure of Yazdegerd, who then resided in that place. Abd'allah first advanced to Darabajerd, from whence he detached Abd'allah Majase' Ebn Masûd, with a considerable party, in quest of Yazdegerd. That prince being hotly pursued, found himself obliged to traverse a solitude, or desert, in order to reach the province of Kermân. But not thinking himself safe there, he fled to Sijistân, and intirely abandoned Persia. What became of him after this precipitate flight, it would be both superfluous and impertinent to give a prolix account of here, as our readers will find a full and circumstantial relation of this in the history of the antient Persians, the last of whose kings was the unfortunate Yazdegerd<sup>p</sup>.

Alexandria taken by the Christians, and retaken by the Arabs.

THE next year, the Khalif dismissed Amru Ebn Al As from his government of Egypt,<sup>e</sup> and advanced his foster-brother, Abd'allah Ebn Sa'id, to that honourable and lucrative post. This conduct perfectly answered the idea Omar had entertained of him, when he judged him unworthy of the Khalifat, as being too much inclined to favour his friends and relations. His treatment of Amru on this occasion was an instance both of great injustice and ingratitude, and, we may add, of imprudence too; for that general had not a little contributed to the extension of the Moslem empire, not only by reducing many strong fortresses in Syria, but likewise by annexing Egypt to the Khalif's dominions. He had also wonderfully ingratiated himself with the Egyptians, as being not only of a very affable and obliging temper, but likewise perfectly well acquainted with the genius and disposition of that people, and having a thorough knowlege of the customs and constitution of the country over which<sup>f</sup> he had with so much reputation presided. His dismissal, therefore, was considered as a public loss, and even disposed the Egyptians to a revolt. Abd'allah Ebn Sa'id had scarce entered upon his government, when Constantine, the Greek emperor, received intelligence of the disaffection of the Egyptians to Othmân; which induced him to meditate the reduction of Alexandria. For this purpose, he sent one Manuel, an eunuch, his general, with a powerful

<sup>o</sup> AL MAKIN. ubi sup. p. 32. GREG. ABU'L FAR. ubi sup. p. 183. ISM. ABU'LFED. in geogr. tab. 19, & alib. EBN HAWKEL & HAMDALLA, apud Golium, in not. ad Alfragan. p. 220, 221. ut & ipse GOL. ibid. Lex. geograph. apud Schult. ubi sup. ut & ipse SCHULT. ibid. PLIN. lib. vi. c. 26. SHARIF AL EDRISI, five Geogr. Nubiens. apud Gol. ubi sup. p. 250. ut & ipse GOL. ibid. EBN SAID, apud Schult. ubi sup. ut & ipse SCHULT. ibid. MOHAMMED EBN KATHIR AL FARGANI, & GOL. in not. ad eund. p. 210—214. HAMDALLA PARTHUS, ibid. BOHAD. in vit. & reb. gest. Salad. p. 44, 60, & alib. pass. Vide etiam AL ISTAKHR. apud Schult. ubi sup. ut & ipse SCHULT. ibid. <sup>p</sup> GREG. ABU'L FAR. ubi sup. p. 183. LEBTARIKH, MIRKHOND, KHONDEMIR, Univ. Hist. vol. iv. c. xiii. p. 404. Lond. 1744.

- a army to retake that place; which, by the assistance of the Greeks in the city, who kept a secret correspondence with the imperial forces whilst at sea, and joined them as soon as they had made a descent, he effected without any great effusion of Christian blood. The loss of so important a fortress alarming the Khalif, who now plainly discovered the cause of it, he immediately restored Amru to his former dignity. This step was extremely agreeable to the Copts, who having had experience of the military skill and bravery of this renowned general, and apprehending that they should be called to an account by the Greeks for their former perfidious conduct, had petitioned Othmân to send him once more into Egypt, to re-establish his drooping affairs in that country. Upon Amru's arrival therefore, at Alexandria, the Copts, with the traitor Al Mokawkas at their head, did not only join him, but supplied
- b him likewise with all kinds of provisions, and excited him to attack the Greeks without delay. This he did, and, after a most obstinate dispute, which continued for several days, at last drove them into the town. However, for some time they defended themselves, and repelled all the efforts of the besiegers, with unparalleled bravery. This so exasperated Amru, that he swore, according to Ebn Abd'albakim, If God enabled him to conquer the Greeks, he would throw down the walls of the city, and make it as easy of access as a bawdy-house, which lies open to every body. Nor did he fail carrying this menace into execution. For, when he had made himself master of the town, which he did after a good defence, he quite dismantled it, intirely demolishing all the walls and fortifications. However, he spared the lives of most of the citizens; tho' some of them, as the place seems to have been
- c taken by storm, were put to the sword. In one part of the town, particularly, Amru found his men butchering the Alexandrians with unrelenting barbarity; but, by his seasonable interposition, he put a stop to their fury. In commemoration of this happy event, he ordered a mosque to be erected, on the spot where it happened; which he called, on that account, the mosque of mercy. The Greeks having thus a third time lost Alexandria, which never afterwards recovered its pristine grandeur, but dwindled away gradually to the state in which it still remains, Manuel, the imperial general, returned with shame to Constantinople. We must not forget to observe, that this Manuel, by the assistance of the Greeks, recovered Alexandria about five years after it had been taken by Amru Ebn Al As, and soon after lost it again in the manner related here. According to Theophanes, Amru's successor in Egypt
- d invaded the dominions of one Gregory, an African tyrant, defeated the troops he led against him, cut most of them in pieces, and obliged his subjects to submit to the payment of an annual tribute. Al Makin gives the governor who succeeded Amru in Egypt, the name of Abd'allah Ebn Sa'id, tho' he is called Abd'allah Ebn Mas'ud by Abu'l Faraj. Both of those authors, however, seem to agree, that this Abd'allah, during his continuance in the aforesaid post, possessed himself of the territories of a neighbouring African prince, not improbably the Gregory of Theophanes, and carried off with him all his treasures into Egypt, after he had put him to death. But neither of them has handed down to us either the name of this prince, and the country he governed, tho' Al Makin gives us to understand, that he was a king, or any of the remarkable particulars of this expedition<sup>a</sup>.
- e ABOUT the same time, that is, in the 27th year of the Hejra, according to the foregoing historians, Moâwiyah Ebn Abu Sofiân invaded the island of Cyprus. The imperial troops being then very weak there, and the people of that island in no condition to oppose the Moslems, the inhabitants agreed to pay the tribute Moâwiyah demanded of them, in order to be taken under the Khalif's protection. Which tribute, if we will believe Al Makin, they paid very punctually for the space of two years. Theophanes has handed down to us very few particulars relating to this expedition. He only intimates, that Moâwiyah reduced Constan- tia, or Salamis, and subdued the whole island; in which he is followed by Cedrenus. He also relates, that Moâwiyah, upon receiving advice, that Cacorizus was in motion with a powerful army to invade Cyprus, sailed with his fleet, and a body of land-forces on board,
- f to the island of Aradus, which he endeavoured to make himself master of; but without effect. Abu'l Faraj informs us, that Cyprus surrendered to Moâwiyah by capitulation. Some authors assure us, that the Moslem general engaged to secure the people of Cyprus in the perpetual possession of their properties and effects, as well as the free exercise of their religion, upon condition that the revenues of the island should be equally divided between the Khalif and the Greek emperor. In consequence of which treaty, Moâwiyah received of them annually 7200 pieces of gold, during the term above-mentioned; at the end of which the Moslems were ejected by the Christians. Al Makin places this expedition in the 27th year of the Hejra, or the year of our LORD 647. But it happened two years later, according to Dionysius Telmarenfis. Be that as it will, we are assured by one of the Greek writers, that the fleet on board of which Moâwiyah put the troops employed in this expedition consisted of 1700 sail<sup>r</sup>.

AFTER.

<sup>a</sup> AL MAKIN. ubi sup. p. 32. GREG. ABU'L FAR. ubi sup. p. 183. EUTYCH. annal. tom. ii. p. 338, 339, 340, 341. EBN ABD'ALMAKIM, GOLII not. ad Alfragan. p. 159.—161. THEOPHAN. chronograph. p. 285. <sup>r</sup> AL MAKIN

as likewise Aradus and Ancyra.

AFTER Moâwiyah had reduced Cyprus, he sailed to Aradus, landed a body of troops in a that island, and invested the city, or fortress erected upon it. This he afterwards besieged in form, and played upon it so furiously with his military engines, that, had not the garison made a very gallant defence, it must have fallen into his hands. But finding, at last, that he could make no impression upon the town, all his efforts having been vigorously repelled by the besieged, he abandoned the island, and made the best of his way to Damascus, where he put his troops into winter quarters. However, he attacked Aradus a second time, the following spring, with so formidable a power, that the imperial troops in garison there were not able to make a stand against him; so that he drove the natives out of the island, demolished the fortifications, and set fire to the city. This is the account of the reduction of Aradus given us by Theophanes and Cedrenus; but, according to Dionysius Telmarenensis, that b island was taken by the Arabs the preceding year. About the same time that Moâwiyah settled the terms of their submission with the people of Cyprus, Ancyra likewise surrendered to the Arabs upon composition, as we learn from Abu'l Faraj.

The Arabs
conquer Kho-
rasân.

IN order to extend farther still the conquests of the Arabs, Othmân sent this year another body of troops, under the command of Abd'allah Ebn Amer and Said Ebn Al As, to seize some of those parts of Khorasân that had not yet submitted to the Moslems. That the Khalîf might excite a spirit of emulation in those generals, he declared his resolution to make him the governor of Khorasân, who first entered that country. Being arrived there, they immediately began the military operations; and, in the course of the year, reduced a great number of towns. Amongst the rest, Nisabûr, or Naisabûr, the metropolis, Herâ, or Herât, c Busbank, or Busbakh, Tûs, or Tûsa, Abrim, Merû, Sirkhas, Sarkhas, or Saraksha, and many other places of note surrendered to them. Nor did Abd'allah Ebn Amer, who seems to have penetrated farther than Said Ebn Al As, leave that region before, to use Al Makin's expression, he had drank out of the river Balkh. By which that historian seems to give us to understand, that the Arabs, at this juncture, penetrated to Balkh, and probably made themselves masters of that noble city, which was considered as the metropolis of Khorasân by Abu'lfeda; the river of Balkh mentioned by Al Makin probably answering to the Dehâsh of Ebn Hawkel, which ran through the suburbs of Balkh. We shall at present forbear saying any thing farther of these towns, and beg leave to refer our curious readers to the learned Golius for a description of the principal of them; since we shall have occasion to expatiate d more largely upon them hereafter, as well as the country to which they belong, in another part of this work.

The Arabs
make an incursion into Isauria.

THE year after Moâwiyah had taken, or rather destroyed, the city of Aradus, another of the Arab commanders made an incursion into Isauria, where he committed dreadful depredations. Several towns and villages in that province he plundered, put a great number of people to the sword, and carried off with him 5000 prisoners into the Moslem territories. Theophanes relates, that the emperor sent this year a minister to Moâwiyah, to assure him of his sincere desire to conclude a peace with the Khalîf; but the overtures he made on this occasion that author has not handed down to us. Cedrenus intimates, that the fortress in Aradus sustained a sharp siege, before the garison could be obliged to surrender it to Moâ- e wiyah; whereas Theophanes only gives us to understand, that the imperial troops there delivered up the place, which was afterwards laid in ashes by the Moslems. Be that as it will, Othmân hitherto, in all his attempts, seems to have been as successful as his predecessor.

The death of Yazdegerd.

THE 31st year of the Hejra, according to Al Makin, was famous for the death of Yazde- f jerd. That unfortunate prince, who had for several years past not been in a condition to meet the Arabs in the field, prevailed upon Tarkân, the Turk, to assist him with a body of auxiliary troops. Soon after the junction of the Turkish and Persian forces, the former were dismissed, upon a frivolous pretext, by Yazdegerd; which exasperated Tarkân to such a degree, that, at the instigation of Mahwa, a person of note, and one of the Persian monarch's subjects, he returned in a short time, at the head of a powerful army, to chastise Yazdegerd for the affront. This brought on a general action between those two princes, wherein the latter was intirely defeated, and had the shattered remains of his army either cut to pieces by Mahwa, who had assembled a body of troops for that purpose, or totally dispersed. But for an account of the manner of Yazdegerd's death, and the circumstances attending that tragical event, we must beg leave to refer our curious readers to the antient history of the Persians, to which it more properly belongs.

MAKIN & GREG. ABU'L FAR. ubi sup. OCKLEY's hist of the Sarac. vol. i. p. 375, 376. THEOPHAN. ubi sup. p. 285. GEORG. CEDREN. historiar. compend. p. 431. DIONYS. TELMARENS. apud Joseph. Simon. Asseman. ubi sup. p. 103. EUTYCH. annal. tom. ii. p. 340, 341. THEOPHAN. ubi sup. p. 285, 286. GEORG. CEDREN. ubi sup. p. 431. DIONYS. TELMARENS. ubi sup. GREG. ABU'L FAR. ubi sup. p. 183. AL MAKIN, ubi sup. p. 32. GOLII not. ad Alfragan. p. 175, 176, 177, 179, 180, 181, 186, 187, 188, &c. EBN HAWKEL, apud Abu'lfed. in geogr. ut & ipse ABU'LFED. ibid. EUTYCH. ubi sup. p. 340, 341. THEOPHAN. ubi sup. p. 286. GEORG. CEDREN. ubi sup. p. 431. AL MAKIN, ubi sup. LEBTARIKH, MIRKHOND, KHONDEMIR, Univers. Hist. vol. iv. c. xiii. p. 405. Lond. 1747.

a Soon after the extinction of the ancient line of the Persian kings, denominated the Sásanians, who had been distinguished by the surname of Khosrú, by the death of Yazdegerd, the Khalíf ordered a body of his forces to advance towards the frontiers of Nubia, in order to penetrate into that remote kingdom, and annex it to his Egyptian dominions. Those troops were commanded by Abd'allah Ebn Sa'id, the Moslem prefect of Egypt, who seems to have been fixed a second time in that post by Othmán, if any credit be due in this point to Al Makin. That general, therefore, in pursuance of the Khalíf's orders, assembled the Moslem forces in the country of Thebais, or the Upper Egypt, called by the Arabs Al Sa'id Mesr, and from thence made several successful incursions into Nubia, where he met with little opposition. In fine, Abd'allah Ebn Sa'id, who had distinguished himself in a former African expedition, by his repeated courses, so harrassed the king of Nubia, who was a Christian, that he intreated the Moslem commander to grant him a peace almost upon any terms. In order, therefore, to obtain the peace he so earnestly desired, he was obliged by treaty to send the Arabs annually, by way of tribute, a vast number of Nubian, or Ethiopian, slaves into Egypt. Such a tribute at this time was more agreeable to the Khalíf than any other, as the Arabs then made no small account of those slaves *.

The Arabs penetrate into Nubia.

In this very year, that is, the 31st year of the Hejra, nearly answering to the 651st of the Christian æra, Abudar Al Acádi, a discontented Arab, began first to rail at the Khalíf, and to decry his administration. Of this Othmán at first took no farther notice, than to forbid him his presence; upon which, he retired into Syria, where he continued his aspersions with great rancour and virulence. This obliged Moáwiyah, then the prefect of Syria, to send the Khalíf advice of the seditious practices of that incendiary; who thereupon ordered him to return to Medina, and put him under arrest. How he bore his confinement, for it seems Othmán had no inclination to release him, we are not told by any Arab author; but from the sense given a passage of Al Makin by Mr. Ockley, it must be allowed probable that he died in prison either this or the following year. About the same time, or rather in this very year, according to Dionysius Telmarenis, Habib, one of the Moslem commanders, made an irruption into the imperial territories on the side of Mesopotamia; and, in conformity to the Arab custom, committed dreadful ravages there. Theophanes relates, that Habib made this irruption into Armenia, and defeated a body of imperial troops that offered to oppose him; pursuing them as far as mount Caucasus, with great slaughter, and laying waste all the country through which he moved. This seems likewise to be countenanced by Eutychius. Theophanes and Cedrenus also inform us, that Moáwiyah, just before this invasion, having seized the island of Rhodes, caused the famous Colossus there to be intirely destroyed, and sold the metal of which it consisted, 1360, or 1365, years after the erection of it, to a Jew of Edeffa, who loaded with it 900 camels. This (A) celebrated colossal statue of the Sun, which was cast in brass by Chares, of the city of Lindus, who had learned his art under the famous Lysippus, was 70 cubits high, and the stride thereof 50 fathom wide. This chorographer likewise observes, that the year preceding the death of Othmán, Abu'l Abar, who had been constituted admiral of the Arab fleet by Moáwiyah, gave the emperor Constans a signal defeat by sea, on the coast of Lycia; and that such a vast number of Christians were killed in this naval engagement, that all the neighbouring sea was died red with the blood of the slain. With which observation we shall beg leave to conclude our account of the military operations of the Arabs during the Khalifat of Othmán †.

Notwithstanding some seditious practices, the Arab arms are still attended with success.

NEITHER

* AL MAKIN, ubi sup. D'HERBEL. bibl. Orient. p. 695, 696. † AL MAKIN, ubi sup. p. 32. OCKLEY, ubi sup. p. 379, 380. DIONYS. TELMARENS. apud Joseph. Simon. Asteman. ubi sup. THEOPHAN: chronograph: p. 286, 287. GEORG. CEDREN. historiar. compend. p. 431, 432. PLIN. lib. xxxiv. c. 7. SCALIG. animadv. ad Euseb. p. 137. Amstelodami, 1658. EUTYCH. patriarch Alexandrin. annal. tom. ii. p. 340, 341.

(A) We are told by Pliny, that this famous statue was overthrown by an earthquake about 56 years after it had been erected; but that even in the condition it was in after that event had happened, it might justly be considered as a stupendous monument of antiquity. As, therefore, according to Eusebius, that earthquake happened in the 2d year of the 139th Olympiad, or, as has been evinced by Scaliger, in the year of Rome 530, in the consulate of C. Flaminius Nepos and P. Furius Philus, about 218 years before the birth of CHRIST; and as Moáwiyah made himself master of Rhodes about four or five years after he had imposed a tribute upon the island of Cyprus, that is about the year of CHRIST 651; hence it very clearly appears that the Colossus remained whole on the ground, after it had been overthrown by the aforesaid earthquake, about 869 or 870 years. Scaliger, therefore, was undoubtedly out in his computation, when he made that period to amount to 977 years; since the point relating to the identity of the year of the earthquake in Rhodes, and that of the consulate of C. Flaminius Nepos and P. Furius Philus, which he has established beyond contradiction, will most evidently overturn that computation. Dr. Pococke asserts, that the Colossus of Rhodes was thrown down by an earthquake IN THE YEAR NINE HUNDRED FIFTY FOUR; which last words must either be, as we apprehend, unintelligible, or false. If by it he means the 954th year of the Christian æra, as most of his readers will believe he does, he is altogether mistaken, as sufficiently appears from what has been here advanced; if he has not that æra in view, we take the words here pointed at to be absolutely unintelligible, as no other æra that we can think of will tally with his assertion. Nor is this learned author only mistaken in relation to the period elapsed between the erection and destruction of the Rhodian Colossus, but Theophanes likewise and Cedrenus; the former of which writers extends

T & t

The Arabs assemble in a tumultuous manner, and threaten Othmân.

NEITHER the detention of Abudar Al Akâdi in prison, nor his death there, had appeased the public discontents and commotions. Sedition was industriously propagated, after both those events had happened, through every province of the empire; and the minds of the people were so alienated from the Khalîf, in the 35th year of the Hejra, that every thing seemed to be tending to a revolt. Those who wished for a revolution, had taken care to inspire with abhorrence of most of the measures pursued by Othmân since his advancement to the Khalîfat, notwithstanding the success that had every-where attended his arms, all orders and degrees of men; and that, by suggesting to them, amongst others, the following articles of complaint. First, He called to Medina Hakem Ebn Al As, who had been banished by the prophet to Táyef, and detained there in a state of exile ever since. Secondly, he had removed from his prefecture Saad Ebn Abi Wakkâs, an officer of distinguished bravery, and conferred his post upon Okba Ebn Abu Mogheid, one who drank wine, and was in other respects person a of very scandalous conversation. Thirdly, He had squandered away vast sums of the publick money amongst his favourites; bestowing no less than 504,000 dinârs upon Merwân Ebn Hakem Ebn Al As, 400,000 upon Abd'allah Ebn Khâled, 100,000 upon Hakem, and upon Sa'id Ebn Al As 40,000 dirbêms. Fourthly, He had dismissed Amru Ebn Al As from the lieutenancy of Egypt, and substituted Abd'allah Ebn Sa'id, his foster-brother, who had been proscribed by Mohammed, in his room. Fifthly, Upon his elevation to the Khalîfat, he had presumed to place himself on the top of the pulpit where the prophet himself used to sit; whereas Abu Becr always sat one step lower, and Omar two. These, and other grievances, extremely aggravated by the principal malecontents, so incensed the people, that some of them discovered an inclination to depose the Khalîf. However, Othmân behaved with resolution at this critical juncture. He ascended the pulpit, and, in a speech from thence, told the assembly, that “the money in the treasury was sacred, and appropriated to the service of ALMIGHTY GOD; that he, as the successor of his apostle, had a right to dispose of it as he thought fit; and if any person should presume to take offence at what he had said, he begged that God would overthrow him.” Which words were no sooner uttered, than Ammâr Ebn Yâser rose up, and declared that his speech had given him just offence; upon which some of the Banu Ommiyah, then present, beat him in so merciless a manner, that they left him for dead. As Ammâr had suffered much for the Mohammedan faith from the Koreish, in the infancy of Islamism, and had been one of the prophet’s particular favourites, who is reported to have said of him, that “he was full of faith from the crown of his head to the sole of his foot, faith being mixed and incorporated with his very flesh and blood;” this cruel treatment of him made an impression upon the minds of the people greatly to the disadvantage of the Khalîf. A considerable body, therefore, of the Arabs assembled in a tumultuous manner, and encamped within a parasang of Medina; from whence they sent an insolent message to Othmân, resembling that of the Janisaries on similar occasions to the Turkish emperors, demanding of him either to act justly, that is, to do what they would have him, or to abdicate the government. This so terrified the poor Khalîf, that he offered to make the largest concessions to his rebellious subjects, to keep them within the bounds of their duty. In order to soften them, he again ascended the pulpit in the mosque at Medina, owned the faults of his administration, and said he sincerely repented of his former conduct. He also promised to restore to the treasury the money given to his friends and relations, and to do every thing in his power that should be deemed necessary for the re-establishment of the public tranquillity.<sup>2</sup>

They are appeased by Ali.

BUT the malecontents, or rather rebels, grew more insolent on these concessions. Such a spirit of discontent had diffused itself over the whole empire, that it seemed impossible, by any means that could be thought of, to stem the torrent of sedition. Many of the provinces had sent a considerable number of men to Medina, to join in the common outcry against the Khalîf’s administration, and even in any attempt that should be made to depose him. Malec Ebn Al Hâreth arrived at the head of 200 men from Cusâ; 150 more, in support of the rebellious Arabs, came from Basra; and a body of 600 more, for the same purpose, from Egypt. The junction of these forces with the disaffected Arabs struck the Khalîf with such terror, that, for some time, he was incapable of attending to the means of his own preservation. But, at last, recovering a little out of the panic into which extends that period to 1360, and the latter to 1365 to the authority of Pliny and Suidas, in the point before years; at least this must be allowed, if we pay any regard us (1).

<sup>2</sup> AL MAKIN, ubi sup. p. 33, 34. GREG. ABU’L FAR. ubi sup. p. 184. AL BEIDAWI, & AL ZAMAKHSHAR. in Al Kor. Moham. f. xvi.

(1) Plin. lib. xxxiv. c. 7. Euseb. chronic. ad ann. MDCCXCIV. Polyb. lib. v. Paul. Oros. lib. iv. c. 13. Suid. Jof. Scalig. animadv. in Euseb. chronic. p. 137, 138. Amst. 1658. Al Makin, Abu’l Far. Theophan. Cedren. Eutych. Dionys. Telmaren. D’Herbel. &c. ubi sup. Poc. descript. of the East, vol. ii. par. i. p. 237. Lond. 1745.

a he had been thrown, he sent Al Mogheirah Ebn Shaaba and Amru Ebn Al As to treat with the malecontents, and, if possible, to dispose then to an accommodation. This not succeeding, Ali, who had a considerable party amongst the mutineers, drew up a paper containing a promise to redress all the grievances of the Meslems, which was signed both by himself and the Khalif. After which, at the request of the Egyptians, Abd'allah Ebn Sa'id was removed from the government of Egypt, and Mohammed Ebn Abu Becr appointed to preside over that province in his room. These salutary steps produced the desired effect; insomuch that the body of malecontents, which before appeared so formidable, was immediately dissolved, and all the individuals that composed it retired to their respective habitations. Nor could the public repose have failed of being settled upon a lasting foundation, had it not been under-

b hand disturbed by Ayesha, whose desire to raise Telba to the dignity of Khalif rendered her capable of meditating the destruction of Othmân by any means possible, as well as Mohammed Ebn Abu Becr, the new prefect of Egypt, and Merwân Ebn Al Hakem, the Khalif's secretary of state, whose villainous project contributed more than all the other concurring causes to his master's ruin. Of which execrable scheme, formed by this traitor, for the assistance of those who were endeavouring to bring about a revolution, we shall here beg leave to insert, from Al Makin, the following particular and most authentic relation <sup>a</sup>.

THE Egyptians, on their return home, under the conduct of their new lieutenant Mohammed Ebn Abu Becr, met at Ailah, a maritime city on the sea Al Kolzom, with a courier <sup>cried by</sup> from the Khalif; amongst whose dispatches, which they took care to examine, they found Merwân, his <sup>secretary of</sup> the following letter drawn up by Merwân, the secretary of state, without his master's pri-c vity, to Abd'allah Ebn Sa'id, the then governing prefect of Egypt. “Othmân to Abd'allah Ebn Sa'id. As soon as Mohammed Ebn Abu Becr, and I. B. Ec. shall arrive in Egypt, cut off their hands and feet, and impale them.” This letter, having Othmân's seal affixed to it, in order to do the greater mischief, Merwân had contrived to get conveyed into the hands of the Egyptians, who were already but too much prejudiced against the Khalif; and it produced the tragical effect the wicked writer of it had in view. For, Mohammed Ebn Abu Becr, and his friends, taking this to be a genuine order of the Khalif, were incensed to the last degree against him; and took care to publish immediately over all the neighbouring territories the discovery they had made. Not content with this, they march-d ed back to Medina, inspiring all the country through which they moved, with an abhorrence of the Khalif, whom they represented as a most bloody and perfidious tyrant. Soon after their arrival at Medina, they were joined by the Bafran and Cifan troops, that returned as soon as they had received advice of what had happened, as well as the disaffected Arabs, who amounted to a very considerable number. With this force Mohammed Ebn Abu Becr, and the other rebel chiefs, besieged the innocent Khalif in his palace; he in the mean time professing a sincere penitence for all the false steps he might have taken, and offering all the satisfaction it was in his power to make them for his preceding errors. But all in e vain. Nothing could inspire them with sentiments of moderation, nor introduce into their hearts the least degree of compassion. They loaded him with reproaches, and breathed nothing but vengeance and destruction. In fine, they gave him the most opprobrious language that could be uttered; and resolved to be revenged of him, with all the circumstances of cruelty they could devise, for an injury which in reality he never intended them <sup>b</sup>.

OTHMAN finding himself in this deplorable situation, sent to Ali for assistance, at the same time asking him, “Whether he desired to see his cousin murdered, and his own
 f kingdom rent in pieces?” Ali answered, “By no means;” and immediately ordered his two sons, Hasan and Hosein, to defend the gates of the palace. For some time, they executed their orders with fidelity enough; not permitting the rebels to enter, nor offer any violence to the Khalif. But at last finding him reduced to great straits for want of water, they abandoned their posts, and left him to the mercy of his enraged rebellious subjects.
 g So that after all, tho' Ali did not directly join the Khalif's enemies, yet he did not assist his relation and sovereign with that vigour and activity which might have been naturally expected of him. The rebels now perceiving all the avenues open, and the palace-wall unguarded, easily made themselves masters of the Khalif's person. Mohammed Ebn Abu Becr, and two others, one of whom was Ammâr Ebn Yaser, entering into his apartment, found him there, with a copy of the Korân in his bosom. Mohammed took him presently by the beard, than which a greater indignity could not have been offered him, and soon after thrust his sword into his breast. By this time, some other of the rebel commanders were entered the apartment; two of whom, Nabar Ebn Ayad and Sowdân Ebn Hamrân, likewise pierced him with their swords. Then Omar Ebn Hamak sat upon his breast, and gave him nine other wounds; which instantly dispatched him. Some authors say, this tragical event hap-opened eighty days after the rebels had shut him up first in his palace ; others not above fifty days ; and, lastly, others only forty days. Be that as it will, his body remained three days unburied, and was at last thrown into a hole made for it in the bloody cloaths he had on when he was assassinated, without so much as receiving the usual ablution, or the least funeral solemnity. Some, however, pretend, that a prayer was said for the deceased Khalif by Jabir Ebn Motâm ; tho' this seems not to be admitted by the most approved Arabic authors. The body was interred by night, in a place called Has Kowkab, or the garden of the star. Othmân was eighty-two years old at the time of his assassination, which happened on the 18th of Dbu'lbajja, and the 35th year of the Hejra. Thus fell Othmân, after a reign of near twelve years ; whose death was occasioned by the intrigues of Telha, Zobeir, Aysba, and Mohammed Ebn Abu Becr, as well as the villainy of Merwân Ebn Al Hakem, not to say the premeditated indolence and inactivity of Ali, who was prompted to this by a prospect of the supreme dignity, to which he had long aspired. The tragical exit of so great a conqueror, and the indignity with which his body was treated after his death, ought to be considered as a lively instance of the instability of human affairs, of the vanity of worldly grandeur, and of the lubricious situation of those who seem to have arrived even at the summit of temporal felicity <sup>a</sup>.

<sup>a</sup> AL MAKIN & GREG. ABU'L FAR. ubi sup. D'HERBEL. Bibl. orient. p. 696. EUTYCH. ubi sup p. 340, 341.

<sup>b</sup> AL MAKIN, ubi sup. p. 34, 35. GREG. ABU'L FAR. ubi sup. p. 1 4

A description of Othmân's person and character, and some reflections on his tragical fate.

OTHMAN, as to his person, was very tall, of a good countenance, and a swarthy complexion. His beard was large, and tinged with Al Henna in the same manner as those of his predecessors. With regard to his disposition, he was constant and exact in the performance of religious duties. He fasted often, spent much time in reading the Korân, and meditated with the utmost attention upon what he read. His charity was very extensive, tho' he left immense riches behind him ; 500,000,000 dirbêms, and 150,000 dinârs, being found in the palace after his death, besides 200,000 dinârs set apart for charitable uses. The source of all his misfortunes was his propensity to favour too much his friends and relations ; which was so predominant in him, that he scarce ever paid any regard to merit. The consequence of which was, that few of those he advanced to the most eminent stations were qualified for the discharge of their duty ; whence it came pass, that numbers of errors were committed in the administration, which justly incurred the censure of the public, and occasioned many reflections, that ultimately terminated in the Khalif himself. And this will ever be the case in all countries, where princes, however good and virtuous they themselves may be, suffer their subjects to be pillaged and oppressed by rapacious and abandoned ministers ; whose profligate disposition, and total contempt of all religion, have rendered them as hateful to God, and all good men, as their long-continued peculations, their exclusion of persons of merit and integrity from all posts in their disposal, have to the public. For, the bulk of mankind not being able to distinguish between the prince himself, by whose abused authority these wretches are enabled to trample upon the rights, privileges, and properties, of their fellow-subjects, and those who act by the power they derived from him, and to whom he himself, in many respects, is as much a slave as the meanest of those he governs, they will be too apt to ascribe the public calamities, the servitude under which they groan, to the source of power itself. Nor can princes in such a melancholy situation as this, by any other means, do either themselves or their subjects justice, than by a vigorous exertion of the power God has given them ; which will, with the divine blessing, enable them to banish these monsters of iniquity, these pests and nuisances of civil society, from their presence, and expel them from all their councils. This must of course win the hearts of the people over whom they preside, and conciliate to them their affections. Whereas an indolent acquiescence in the wicked and arbitrary measures of those who only make use of them as tools, to enable them to serve their own vile purposes, to plunder their fellow-subjects, and to sacrifice the interest of their country either to their own avarice and ambition, or to a foreign power, will, to avoid all greater warmth and asperity of expression, produce a quite contrary effect. In short, the tragical fate of Othmân, and the means by which this was effected, may prove an instructive lesson to princes who shall live in future ages, and would reign in the affections of their subjects. That unhappy Khalif was betrayed, sacrificed, and ruined, by the villain Merwân Ebn Al Hakem, his secretary of state, who corresponded with his enemies, imparted to them his councils and designs, and set him at variance with his people. So that had he escaped the violent death that at last overtook him, he would nevertheless have been, in all probability, an unhappy prince ; since the perfidious and iniquitous conduct of some of the persons he employed, who secretly fomented the differences and dissensions set on foot by his avowed enemies themselves, with whom they joined as often as they could do it without being discovered, would have fixed the Arab nation in an aversion to him and his government <sup>d</sup>.

<sup>a</sup> EUTYCH. ubi sup. p. 340—343. AL MAKIN & GREG. ABU'L FAR. ubi sup. lioth. orient. p. 696. EUTYCH. AL MAKIN, & ABU'L FAR. ubi sup.

<sup>d</sup> D'HERBEL. Bib-

- a We have already given a full account of the conquests made by Othmán, and of the extensive territories he annexed to the Moslem empire. To which we shall now beg leave to add, that, according to some of the oriental writers, his generals subdued all the western coast of Africa, from the city of Tripoli, and its dependencies, to the streights of Sebtah; nay, if we will believe Khondemir, the Persian historian, they also penetrated into Andalusia: but this will scarce be admitted by any of our more curious and intelligent readers. By the streights of Sebtah the eastern geographers understand that narrow sea between Gibraltar and Ceuta, called for the most part by the European geographical writers, the streights of Gibraltar; to which, as has been just observed, some of the Moslem authors extend the Arab dominions on that side in the Khalifat of Othmán. We are also told by Eutychius, that in the Khalifat of Othmán, the Arabs conquered the remaining part of Armenia, that had been left unsubdued in the time of Omar. Be that as it will, this Khalif was a man of great personal bravery, as well as generosity, liberality, and magnificence. He published a new and correct edition of the Korán, as has been already remarked, and was closely attached to all the exercises of religion. The Persian poet Rashíd, or Rashídi, who pretended to deduce his origin from Othmán, has collected all the sayings, or apophthegms, of this Khalif, and put them into verse. The title he has prefixed to this work is The harmonious concert. The difference between Othmán and his successor Ali proved the source of infinite quarrels and disputes amongst the Moslems, which are far from being appeased at this very day. The latter could never rightly forgive the elevation of the former to the Khalifat; which dignity Ali apprehended to belong to him by right of succession, founding his pretensions to it upon proximity of blood. For, he was the cousin-german of Mohammed, had married his eldest and best beloved daughter Fátima, and was, in consequence of this marriage and affinity, the head of the house of Háshem, which was dignified with the title of the family of the Prophet. But notwithstanding this circumstance, which seemed to plead so strongly for him, finding the people so strongly and generally prejudiced in favour of his competitor, he was obliged, with the rest, to acquiesce in the election of Othmán <sup>c</sup>.

- With regard to the length of this Khalif's reign, authors are not perfectly agreed; tho' there seems to be no very considerable difference between them. Theophanes makes him to have governed the Moslems, or discharged the duty of Emir, as he terms it, ten years; whereas Al Makin, Abu'l Faraj, and Abu'l Walid, assert him to have presided over the Arabs about twelve complete lunar years. The symbol, motto, or inscription, on his seal was, I BELIEVE IN GOD, THE CREATOR AND ADMINISTRATOR. His principal judge was Caab Ebn Soweid, and his chamberlain Hamrán. Eutychius calls his chamberlain Hamdán, and the captain of his guards Abd'allah Ebn Fahd Al Adowi. He also tells us, that the body of the Khalif was deposited in a place named Jasar Kowkab, or the bridge of the star. According to Eutychius, Kenánab Ebn Basbar assisted Mohammed Ebn Abu Becr and Ammár Ebn Yaser, in the assassination of Othmán Ebn Affán; and Merwán Ebn Al Hakem, who occasioned his destruction in the manner already related, had a vast ascendant over him. This additional circumstance may serve farther to evince the truth of the preceding observations, naturally suggested to us by that part of the Arab history we are now upon. For, in other nations, besides that of the Arabs, it has been found by sad experience, that profligate, corrupt, and abandoned, ministers have frequently been able so far to insinuate themselves into the good graces of their sovereigns, as to gain their intire confidence; and even to prevail upon them to forward, by their power and authority, the execution of the most pernicious, destructive, and illegal, schemes; nay, that they have at last delivered the very princes, whose confidence they so notoriously abused, into the hands of their most implacable enemies, with whom they all along kept an illicit correspondence, and whom, from the beginning, they had an intention to serve, by putting their masters upon the execution of such ruinous schemes. The foregoing reflections, for the sake of the bulk of our readers, we thought ourselves here obliged to make; since, to point out the useful and instructive lessons we are supplied with by the facts recorded in the annals of former ages may prove of infinite service to mankind, and will undoubtedly be considered as a task falling within the verge of his province, by every faithful and just historian <sup>f</sup>.

<sup>c</sup> D'HERBEL. ubi sup. p. 695. EUTYCH. AL MAKIN, & ABU'L FAR. ubi sup. KHONDEMIR, RASHIDI, apud D'Herbel. ubi sup. p. 696. AL JANNAB. p. 35. AHMED BEN YUSEF, in hist. gen. sect. 40. LUDOV. MARRACC. in prodr. par. ii. p. 40. <sup>f</sup> THEOPHAN. chronograph. p. 287. AL MAKIN, ABU'L FAR. & EUTYCH. ubi sup. ABU'L WALID & DIONYS. TELMAREN. ubi sup.

C H A P. III.

The History of the Arabs, to the taking of Baghdâd by the Tartars.

S E C T. IV.

Ali is unanimously elected Khalif;

THE Arabs, as well as the foreigners at that time in the city of Medina, being informed <sup>a</sup> of Othmân's death, were divided in their sentiments about a successor. Telba and Zobeir having assembled the Anfârs and Mobâjerîn, declared for Ali, tho' in their hearts they hated him; as did also Ayesha, the youngest and best-beloved wife of Mohammed. But the Arabs being, for the most part, inclined to favour him, not only on account of the near relation he bore to the prophet, but likewise of the immediate alliance he had contracted with Mohammed's family, by marrying his daughter Fâtema, they thought proper to dissemble their aversion to him, and even the very day on which Othmân was murdered, to take the oath of allegiance to him. This, however, they resolved to break as soon as a proper opportunity of doing it offered. The Basrans, in the mean time, shewed a disposition to favour Telba; tho' Zobeir had likewise a considerable party amongst them. <sup>b</sup> The Cûfans and Egyptians had the highest regard for Ali, as well as the Arabs; so that his interest was too powerful to admit of any competitor. However, Zobeir's friends declared themselves so warmly for him, or at least for any other person whose interest he should support, that they threatened him with death, if he did not either take the government upon himself, or see it immediately conferred upon some other person. The troops likewise that had arrived from Mesopotamia, Persia, and the different parts of Arabia, as well as those from Basra and Egypt, in order to depose Othmân, resolved to cut off all the candidates for the Khalifat, if one of them was not without delay advanced to that dignity. The eyes, therefore, of all were fixed upon Ali at this critical juncture; and the principal men pressed him with unusual vehemence to accept of the honour designed him, as being the best qualified for it, both by his personal accomplishments and the affinity he bore to the prophet. <sup>c</sup> To this he discovered for some time an invincible reluctance, saying, "he had much rather serve another in the capacity of Wazîr, or Vîsir, than take upon himself the government." The troops being apprized of this, and finding that the family of Ommiyah had withdrawn themselves, they assembled in a tumultuous manner, and insisted upon the inhabitants of Medina's bringing the controversy to a decision; declaring, that they would allow them but one day to consider of it; and that if, in that time, a Khalif was not elected, they would put Telba, Zobeir, Ali, and several others, to the sword. This struck the citizens of Medina with such terror, that they again pressed Ali in the most suppliant manner to suffer himself to be inaugurated; and, upon his again declining this, they adjured him <sup>d</sup> by God to consider the lamentable condition in which they were, the miserable state of their religion, and the distraction of the whole nation. Overcome at last with such pathetic exclamations, he answered, "If I should comply with your request, I will always act according to the best of my knowledge; and if you will excuse me, I shall ever be one of the most submissive and obedient of all the Moslems to whomsoever you shall be pleased to set over me." Then addressing himself to Telba and Zobeir, who intreated him in the most moving terms to accept of the Khalifat, he said, "If you intend to recognize my authority, as the successor of Mohammed, swear to be faithful to me; otherwise permit me to take the oath of allegiance to one of you." The latter of which proposals they refused, and consequently accepted of the former; upon which, Ali was immediately proclaimed Khalif. <sup>e</sup> He was the son of Abu Tâleb, the son of Abd'almotalleb, the son of Hâshem; his mother, according to Al Makîn, being Fâtema, the daughter of Ased, the son of Hâshem. He was elected, by the unanimous suffrages of the Moslems, emperor of the faithful, to use the Arab stile, the same day that Othmân was slain. It seems to be intimated by Al Makîn, that Ali, immediately after his election, constituted Kais Ebn Sa'id, governor, or præfect, of Egypt <sup>a</sup>.

and inaugurated in the mosque at Medina.

ALI being thus advanced to the Khalifat without opposition, though many were secretly disgusted at his election, resolved to be inaugurated publickly in the mosque at Medina, that all parties might be satisfied, and have no just cause of complaint. This he judged a necessary precaution, as Ayesha, Telba, Zobeir, and the house of Ommiyah, of which Mou'wiyah, <sup>f</sup>

<sup>a</sup> AL JANAB. FEN AL ATHIR, in univers. hist. vol. i. MSS. Pocock. in Bibl. Bodl. Oxon. num. 137. ISM. ABUTTED. hist. univ. vol. i. MSS. Pocock. in Bibl. Bodl. Oxon. num. 303. GREG. ABU'L FAR. ubi sup. p. 185. AL MAKÎN. in hist. Saracen. lib. i. c. v. p. 36. ECTYCH. ubi sup. p. 342, 343.

THOUGH Ayesha was at first well pleased with the news of the murder of Othmán, to which she had not a little contributed, as hoping that her favourite Telba would succeed him in the Khalifat; yet being afterwards informed, that Ali had been elected by the unanimous suffrages of the Moslems, she expressed a great concern for that tragical event. Nay, she accused Ali, in order to render him odious to the house of Ommiyah, to which Othmán belonged, of the perpetration of that horrid fact; when there was in reality not the least ground or pretext for such an accusation. Some of the Moslems, therefore, who knew how active she had been in that bloody affair, reprehended her for endeavouring to throw the odium of so black a crime upon an innocent person; since she could not but be conscious of her own guilt, as having been one of the first who suggested, and even strongly recommended, the late Khalif's assassination to his rebellious subjects. But in answer to what was objected to her conduct on this occasion, she replied, that Othmán's infidelity obliged her at first to declare against him; but that, on his repentance and reconversion, she became reconciled to him, and would have saved him, had it been in her power. At the time of Ali's inauguration, as well as when the disaffected Arabs murdered Othmán, she was at Mecca, and enjoyed a very considerable share of influence and authority there. Not content with this, she endeavoured to animate all orders and degrees of men against the new Khalif; and was continually employed in forming schemes to embarrass the administration. Nor did she want persons of note to forward and promote all her wicked machinations. For, in the beginning of the 36th year of the Hejra, Telba Ebn Obeid'allah and Zobeir Ebn Al Awám, with others of their party, represented to Ali, that the assassins, who had embued their hands in the blood of Othmán, ought to be brought to condign punishment; offering him, at the same time, their assistance for that purpose. This they did, purely to sow amongst a the people the seeds of sedition, and occasion disturbances that might finally weaken Ali's party, and terminate in his destruction. The Khalif perceiving their intention, represented to them the impossibility of carrying their design at present into execution, by reason of the civil dissensions which so distracted the Arab nation. Upon which, they desisted from all farther solicitations on that head. However, as Ali found, by this effort of Telba and Zobeir, supported by Ayesha, to embroil his affairs, that he had very powerful enemies to contend with, he took all possible opportunities of caressing the Korish, hoping by this means to conciliate to him the affections of that powerful tribe. Which step was, indeed, very expedient; as the departure of the Ommiyan family had irritated a considerable part of his subjects, and occasioned in some provinces of the empire great murmurings and com- b motions. In the mean time, Telba and Zobeir, notwithstanding the repulse they had lately met with, desired Ali to confer upon one of them the government of Cúfa, and upon the other that of Basra; pretending, that they should thereby be enabled to extinguish with the greater ease any rebellion that might happen in the neighbourhood of either of those cities. But the Khalif, by this request, easily penetrated their designs, and excused himself from complying with it, by telling them, that as his government was not yet sufficiently esta- blished, he should stand in need of persons of their great capacity, so much superior to that of any of his other ministers, to consult with on such emergencies as might happen in an unsettled state. This answer nettled them to a great degree; but they were obliged to appear satisfied with it. However, they resolved to attempt undermining that government c they could not assail by open force; and, therefore, knowing that Ayesha was gone on pilgrimage to Mecca, they begged leave of the Khalif to go likewise on the same occasion thither. This they hoped would give them an opportunity of caballing with Ayesha, and of executing, in conjunction with her, the pernicious scheme they had formed. Ali was sufficiently aware of this, though he permitted them to go to Mecca, for the reason they assigned. However, he was determined to have a strict eye upon them, and narrowly to watch all their proceedings in that place <sup>d</sup>.

20

A strong party formed against Ali. THINGS being in this situation, a civil war, or rather an open rebellion, soon seemed abso- lutely inevitable. Every step that was taken on both sides, that is, by the Motazalites, or Separatists, for so those who adhered to the house of Ommiyah were called, and the Khalif, d after this, manifestly tended to a rupture. The Motazalites in a little time had two considerable armies on foot, ready to enter upon action; one under the command of Moâwiyah in Syria, and another headed by Ayesha, Telba, and Zobeir, at Mecca, that began to be in motion. The Khalif, contrary to the salutary advice given him by Abd'allah Ebn Abbâs, resolved to remove all the governors of provinces who had their posts assigned them by Othmân, and to appoint others in their room, that he could intirely depend upon. In pursuance of which resolution, he dispatched Sabel Ebn Hanîf, the Ansar, to Syria; Kais Ebn Sa'id to Egypt; Othmân Ebn Hanîf to Basra; Ammârah Ebn Sabal to Cúfa; and Abd'allah Ebn Abbâs to Yaman. Sabel being arrived at Tabûc, on the confines of Syria, met a party of horse that had been sent thither by Moâwiyah, whose commander obliged him to return home. A great e number of the Egyptians refused to receive Kais, and to submit to Ali's government, till the murderers of Othmân had been brought to justice. Othmân Ebn Hanîf found the people divided at Basra; however, with some difficulty, he took possession of his post; but the Cúfans being determined not to acknowledge the new Khalif, Ammârah was obliged to return to Ali, with the news of their resolution. Abd'allah Ebn Abbâs was received in Yaman; but, before his arrival, Yali, who had received his commission from Othmân, plundered the treasury, made the best of his way to Mecca, and deposited the money in the hands of Ayesha, Telba, and Zobeir. In the mean time, Ali made the necessary dispositions for his defence, and was joined by the Ansars, who came over to him almost unanimously in a body <sup>e</sup>.

Moâwiyah declares against him. MOAWIYAH having driven Sabel Ebn Hanîf out of Syria, assembled a body of troops on f the frontiers, as well as a numerous army, to take vengeance of the murderers of Othmân. He did his utmost to inspire the people under his government with an abhorrence of Ali, whom he represented, on all occasions, as the principal person concerned in the assassination of his predecessor. He exposed on the pulpit the bloody shirt in which Othmân was murdered, with his wife's fingers, that were cut off when that tragedy was acted, fixed upon it, to public view. This so incensed the Syrian forces, that they vowed to revenge the violent death of Othmân; and were undoubtedly sincere in their resolution. But as for Ayesha and her associates, they were not at all displeased with the murder of Othmân, having in reality been deeply concerned in that murder; but only exclaimed against that barbarous action, in order to be furnished with a pretext to take up arms, and to be supported by the house g

<sup>d</sup> AL MAKIN & GREG. ABU'L FAR. ubi sup. EBN AL ATHIR, D'HERBEL. ubi sup. FED. ubi sup. EBN AL ATHIR, D'HERBEL. ubi sup.

<sup>e</sup> ISM. ABU'L-

- a of Ommiyah in their attempts against the present Khalif. This was very well known to Ali, though Moawiyah seems to have been a stranger to it. Sabel arrived at Medina just before the departure of Telha and Zobeir for Mecca; and, by the news he brought from Syria, they plainly perceived that a rupture with Moawiyah was at hand. However, the Khalif, probably with a view of concealing from them his true intentions, declared his resolution to make use of all possible expedients to prevent at least the speedy commencement of hostilities. He, therefore, dispatched an express to Moawiyah in Syria, and another to Abu Mûsa at Cûfa, with a letter to each of those commanders, in order to dispose them to an accommodation. With regard to the latter, the overtures made him on this occasion were so advantageous, that he seems to have immediately closed with them. For, in answer to Ali's letter, he assured him, that all the Cûfans were intirely at his service; and moreover sent him a list of those who came in first of their own accord, as well as of those who afterwards followed their example. It can, therefore, scarce be doubted but Ali, at least, confirmed Abu Mûsa in his government of Cûfa, if he did not make some farther concessions to that general. As for Moawiyah, he did not so much as vouchsafe the Khalif an answer, till a considerable time after his letter came to hand. Then he sent one by a courier, dispatched for that purpose to Medina, sealed up, with the following direction: From Moawiyah to Ali. This the Khalif opened, and found it to be a mere blank, not so much as a single word being visible in it. Turning then to Moawiyah's courier, he asked him, "What news was stirring in Syria?" To which the messenger replied, "There are no less than 60,000 men in arms under Othmân's shirt, which is erected as a standard upon the pulpit at Damascus." Ali then asked, "Whether or no they required the blood of Othmân at his hands?" At the same time he called God to witness that he was innocent of it, and implored the divine assistance. As he could view Moawiyah's pretended letter in no other light than that of a token of the utmost defiance and contempt, and the troops assembled under Othmân's shirt were destined to act against him, he told Ziyâd, who sat by him, that a war in Syria was inevitable; which Ziyâd soon communicated to the people. The Khalif then wrote circular letters to the different provinces of Arabia, ordering them to send him a proper number of recruits; and exhorted his subjects to distinguish themselves in the war they were going to enter upon against the disturbers of the public repose.
- d We are told by Dionysius Telmarenfis, as well as Theophanes, that, about this time, Moawiyah was actually proclaimed Khalif, and inaugurated, by the western provinces, or, in other words, the Syrian and Egyptian troops<sup>f</sup>.

- TELHA* and Zobeir having made their escape to Mecca, under the pretext of performing the pilgrimage thither, gave a lamentable account of the murder of Othmân, aggravating extremely every circumstance of that barbarous action, to Ayesha; thinking by this means, as in reality they did, to make themselves more agreeable to her. Not long after their arrival, Yali, Othmân's governor of Yaman, likewise arrived at Mecca, and delivered the public money he had brought with him into the hands of Ayesha, under whose auspices Telha and Zobeir were just beginning to act. This communicating life and activity to their councils, they soon assembled a body of troops, with which, in conjunction with the forces of the house of Ommiyah, they proposed to march against Ali, and his adherents. To this Ayesha, who put herself at the head of these troops, was excited by the account of the distracted situation of the Khalif's affairs at Medina, she had received from Telha and Zobeir. They were, however, at a loss for some time what place to chuse for the scene of their military operations. Ayesha was for striking at the root, and marching directly to Medina, where Ali's affairs were so miserably embarrassed; others were of opinion, that it would be the most proper to join the Syrian army under the command of Moawiyah; and, lastly, others believed that the good of the common cause required them to move as soon as possible to Basra, where Telha had a considerable interest. After mature deliberation, the last expedient was pitched upon as the most conducive to the attainment of the salutary end they had in view; and therefore public notice was given to the inhabitants of Mecca, that "as the mother of the faithful, with Telha and Zobeir, was upon the point of setting out for Basra, all who were desirous of supporting the true religion, and revenging the death of Othmân, might join the forces that attended her in this expedition." This produced a very good effect. For, in a short time, the Meccans reinforced the troops she had already on foot with a body of 600 men, and at least an equal number of camels; so that, at her departure out of Mecca, she found herself at the head of 1000 Arabs, all determined to fight for the faith, which they apprehended to be in danger by the advancement of Ali to the Khalifat, with the most undaunted bravery. The camel on which Ayesha rode, that had been presented to her by Menbah, was called Al Ascar, that is, the army, and cost an hundred dinârs. Mounted on this camel in a litter, she led her forces out of Mecca; which, a by the accession of several other parties of Arabs on their march, before her arrival at Basra, formed a body of about 3000 men. The first place to which she advanced was Jowâb, a village of no great note, situated upon a rivulet of the same name <sup>a</sup>.

<sup>f</sup> EBN AL ATHIR, in hist. univ. MSS. Pocock. in Bibl. Bodl. Oxon. num. 137. THEOPHAN. chronograph. p. 288. DIONYS. TELMARENS, ubi sup. D'HERBEL. Bibl. orient. in art. Ali.

And arrives
there.

UPON Ayesha's approach to Jowâb, all the dogs in the place met her in a body, and barked at her with great fury. As she had a mind to rest, or rather halt, here, she made use of this accident as a pretext to take up her lodging in that village. She declared, that the prophet himself had once intimated to his wives on a journey, in her hearing, that it was adviseable to lodge within the barking of the dogs of Jowâb; and had even predicted the present uncommon event. After citing, therefore, a passage of the Korân, she struck her camel on the leg to make him kneel, in order to dismount; resolving to remain there b at least the following night. But Telha and Zobeir knowing of what vast importance a forced march would be to them at this critical juncture, when they apprehended that Ali would soon come up with them, prevailed upon fifty persons to swear, that this village went by another name; though this did not enable them to divert Ayesha from her former resolution. At last, by order of those commanders, one of the soldiers cried out, "Make haste, c " make haste, Ali appears behind us." Upon which, they all resumed their march with the utmost celerity. This the Moslem writers own to have been a solemn public lie, and assert it to have been the first that was told between the commencement of Islamism and the present defection of Ayesha. Be that as it will, the troops under her command being terrified by this rumor, propagated without any manner of foundation, made the best of their way to Basra, where they arrived much sooner than was expected. In the mean time, Moâwiyah receiving advice of the vigorous resolution taken by Ayesha, and her march to Basra, was greatly animated by those prosperous events. This induced him to send her a considerable reinforcement, which joined the forces under her conduct before they reached Basra. By the accession of which, and other auxiliary troops, her army soon amounted to 30,000 men. It has been already observed, that Othmân Ebn Hanîf was Ali's governor of that place <sup>d</sup>.

She takes Basra.

OTHMAN EBN HANIF having been informed of the enemy's approach, resolved to reconnoitre them with a party of the garison; though he was sensible that the troops he commanded in the town would make but a very feeble resistance. He soon fell in with the d vanguard of Ayesha's army, which he very briskly attacked; but was defeated after a sharp skirmish, wherein he had forty of his men killed upon the spot, and was himself taken prisoner. Ebn Al Athir relates, that Othmân having received two messengers from Ayesha, with repeated solicitations to join her, in order to revenge the tragical exit of Othmân Ebn Affân, dispatched a courier to the Khalîf, to know what part he was to act on this occasion; and received for answer, that as Ayesha, Telha, and Zobeir, had, by that expedition, declared war against the whole Arab nation, notwithstanding the oath of allegiance to him the two latter had taken, he was to oppose them to the utmost of his power, if nothing less than the election of a new Khalîf could induce them to lay down their arms. The same author also informs us, that, before the courier was dispatched to Ali, several bloody skirmishes e happened between Ayesha's troops and Telha's party in the town on one side, and Othmân's forces, with the Basrans, that adhered to Ali, on the other; in the principal of which Othmân was worsted, and lost a considerable number of men. He likewise farther relates, that, during the absence of the same courier, Telha and Zobeir found means, by favour of a tempestuous night, to post themselves with a pretty strong party in the mosque at Basra; from whence they sallied out upon Othmân's men, cut about forty of them in pieces, took the commander himself prisoner, and sent him to Ayesha. But, with regard to the fate of that general, the oriental writers are not perfectly agreed. One of them says, that Ayesha at first resolved to put him to death, but was afterwards prevailed upon by one of the women about her to convert that punishment into forty stripes, and imprisonment; whereas another f affirms, that Ayesha commanded his beard and eye-brows to be tore out by the roots, and then, after a short confinement, dismissed him. Be this as it will, Ayesha's troops, without much difficulty, and with a very small effusion of blood, made themselves masters of Basra, and plundered Ali's treasury there. Upon Othmân Ebn Hanîf's arrival afterwards at Ali's camp, he met with a gracious reception from the Khalîf; who assured him, he could not fail of receiving an ample reward from God for what he had suffered on account of his fidelity to the emperor of the faithful <sup>i</sup>.

Ali marches against her,

As soon as Ali had received the bad news of the loss of Basra, he made a formal speech to the people, who had been assembled on this occasion, and desired their assistance. But,

<sup>a</sup> EBN AL ATHIR, ubi sup. AL MAKIN, ubi sup. p. 37. GREG. ABU'L FAR. ubi sup. p. 186. <sup>b</sup> EBN AL ATHIR, ubi sup. GREG. ABU'L FAR. ubi sup. AL MAKIN, ubi sup. D'HERBEL. Biblioth. orient. p. 89. <sup>c</sup> ISM. ABU'LFED. EBN AL ATHIR, AL MAKIN, & GREG. ABU'L FAR. ubi sup. D'HERBEL. Bibl. orient. in art. Ali.

- a notwithstanding he was extremely well beloved, was acknowledged by all to have been fairly <sup>and incamps</sup> elected, and was the best orator of the age, he could not, with all the eloquence he was <sup>at Arrabdah.</sup> master of, for some time, prevail upon them to give a decisive answer in his favour. Ziyâd Ebn Hantelah, perceiving this, stepped to Ali of his own accord, and said, "Whosoever retreats, we will advance." Upon which, two Ansârs, doctors of the law, stood up, and pronounced the following decision: "The Imâm Othmân, master of the two testimonies, did not die by the master of the two testimonies;" that is, in other words, "Ali is not guilty of the death of Othmân." Where, by the two testimonies, we are to understand the two articles of the Mohammedan faith, There is but one God; Mohammed is the apostle of God. Which sentence, formally pronounced in favour of Ali, soon induced the Ansârs, b and the body of the people, to espouse his quarrel. The first of the Ansârs, who exerted himself at this juncture, was Abu Kotâdah, and he was supported by Omm Salma, who obliged her cousin-german to attend the Khalîf, in the expedition he proposed to undertake for the recovery of Basra. Ali afterwards made him governor of Babrein. Being resolved, if possible, to bring the rebels back to a sense of their duty, he left Medina at the head of 900 men, and advanced to Arrabdah, where he was joined by his son Hajân with another body of troops. That young prince here took the liberty to censure his father's conduct, and told him, that the difficulties in which at present he found himself involved, were owing partly to his not abandoning Medina, when Othmân was besieged in his palace there; c partly to the design he had formed of reducing Ayesha, and her two associates, by force of arms, before he had tried what could be effected by pacific measures. Against all which points of conduct, he said, he had before advised him; and added, that his refusing to comply with such salutary advice might prove of fatal consequence to him. But to this Ali replied, that, had he abandoned Medina, when his predecessor was surrounded by his rebellious subjects there, he should, in all probability, have met with that prince's unhappy fate himself; that, had he deferred his inauguration till the body of the Moslems had acknowledged him, he should have offered an injury to the Ansârs, in whom the right of electing a Khalîf was lodged; and that, lastly, had he sat still at home, and neglected the means of his own preservation, by refusing to make the necessary preparations for his defence, after d the public declaration of Ayesha, Telha, and Zobeir, of their intention to depose him, he should have animated them in their rebellion, and must necessarily have fallen a sacrifice to their ambition. He, therefore, enjoined his son silence, and ordered him to acquiesce in the measures that had been taken. In the mean time, Ali's army was reinforced by various parties of Arabs, that were continually joining him in his camp <sup>k</sup>.

- WHILST the Arab forces under Ali lay incamped at Arrabdah, the Khalîf dispatched Mohammed Ebn Abû Bacr and Mohammed Ebn Jaafar, with a letter to his friends at Cûfa. He did not press them in this letter to declare openly for him, but only to dispose the Motazalites to an accommodation. He extolled their fidelity to him, and assured them, that he reposed a greater confidence in them than in any of his other subjects. He likewise told them, that e he hoped providence, by means of their interposition, would heal the breaches that had been made amongst the Moslems, and restore peace and unanimity to their councils. The Khalîf also sent to Medina for farther assistance, that he might be enabled to prosecute the war with vigour; and received, in a short time, from thence a very copious supply of horses, arms, and other implements of war. In one of his public harangues to the troops, he exhibited to their view, in the strongest light, the inestimable blessing they enjoyed by the propagation of the true religion amongst them; which had effected so happy a union amongst all their tribes, that were before rendered contemptible by their animosities and divisions. At the same time, he did not fail reminding them, that they enjoyed an uninterrupted repose amongst themselves till the death of Othmân; from whence the devil took occasion f to sow amongst them the seeds of dissension; which would prove their destruction, unless they could prevail upon God, by imploring his assistance, to avert the impending evil. Then addressing himself to his son, he assured him, that the time would come when the Moslems should be divided into seventy-three sects; the worst of which would be that which should set him at nought, and not follow his example. He, therefore, advised him, as being now forewarned, always to consider the Korân as his guide and rule of faith, whatever distractions might happen in the state, to adhere to Islâm as his religion, and never to deviate from the directions of Mohammed. After he had given this salutary advice both to the army under his command, and his son, he made the necessary dispositions for moving towards the enemy; having received advice, that they were incamped in the neighbourhood g of Basra <sup>l</sup>.

<sup>k</sup> EBN AL ATHIR, ubi sup. D'HERBEL. Bibl. orient. p. 89. ISM. ABU'LFED. ubi sup. GREG. ABU'L FAR. ubi sup. p. 187. <sup>l</sup> EBN AL ATHIR, ubi sup. D'HERBEL. Biblioth. orient. p. 90.

He is joined by a party of the tribe of Tay at Arrabdah.

BEFORE the army decamped from Arrabdah, Ebn Refaa demanded of the Khalif, “ what a
“ he would have, and whither he intended to conduct the Moslem troops then ready to act “ under his command ? ” To which he replied, “ I would have the rebels to accept of “ peace ; but if they refuse this, I would leave them to their own temerity and presump“ tion.” “ What is to be the consequence of that ? ” said Ebn Refaa. “ We will suffer “ them,” answered Ali, “ to persist in their wicked opposition, without hurting them, as “ they abstain from any acts of violence ; but if they shall think fit to attack us, we will “ defend ourselves.” Upon which, one of the Ansars then present told the Khalif, that, “ though he liked his discourse, his conduct by no means pleased him ; ” adding, with an oath, that, “ as he had given their body the name of Ansars, or helpers, he would help “ God, by assisting him to the utmost of his power.” Soon after, Ali was joined by a b party of the tribe of Tay, whose leader, Said Ebn Obeid, addressed him in the following terms :
“ O emperor of the faithful ! some mens hearts do not correspond with their tongues ;
“ but that is not the case with me. I have always had for thy person the greatest respect “ and veneration ; and will not fail fighting thine enemies wheresoever I find them. I con“ sider thee as a person endued with the most excellent qualifications of any in the present “ age.” Upon this cordial declaration in his favour, Ali gave him his benediction, by saying, “ God have mercy upon thee ; ” and assured him, that he was perfectly satisfied with the sincerity of his intentions. The tribe of Tay was seated in a mountainous district, whose capital was called Taima, between Al Thâlabiya and Al Hejr, at almost an equal distance from each of those places. There was a castle here in the days of Abu'lfeda, called c Al Ablak ; which name was given it by Al Shamâl Ebn Adbia, according to that celebrated writer. Not long after the arrival of Said Ebn Obeid at the Moslem camp, another body of Arabs, composed of the tribe of Afed, and part of that of Tay, offered their service likewise to the Khalif ; but he dismissed them in a courteous manner ; telling them, that, besides the Ansars, he had a sufficient number of the Mohâjerîn to attend him in the expedition <sup>m</sup>.

Abu Mûsa refuses to join Ali.

IT has been already observed, that Abu Mûsa, the governor of Cûfa, discovered an inclination to support Ali, if he did not actually declare for him, as Ebn Al Athir gives us reason to believe he did. But receiving advice, that Ayesha, Telba, and Zobeir, with the forces under their command, had made themselves masters of Basra, he began to warp in d his fidelity to the Khalif. When Mohammed Ebn Abu Becr and Mohammed Ebn Jaasar, therefore, with Ali's letter, arrived at Cûfa, and the people were assembled in the mosque there, as usual on such occasions, to hear it read ; after the contents of it had been communicated to them, not a single person offered to interpose in favour of the Khalif. But, at last, some of the Hadji's, or pilgrims, coming in towards the evening, and asking the governor whether he intended to march with any troops to the assistance of Ali ? Abu Mûsa explained himself on that head in the following terms : “ My sentiments yesterday, and to-day, in rela“ tion to Ali, are not a little different. To remain at home in a pacific posture seems “ more agreeable to the councils of heaven ; but to enter into the war now commenced may “ perhaps appear more consistent with the dictates of worldly wisdom. Therefore act as e
“ you shall think proper.” To this none of the people answered a single word ; but Ali's embassadors gave Abu Mûsa very reproachful language, for the manifest partiality he had discovered in favour of Ayesha. However, this he little regarded ; telling them, that “ he “ would not engage in their master's quarrel, unless compelled to it by absolute necessity, “ before vengeance had been taken of the murderers of Othmân ; and that they were at “ liberty to impart this resolution to him.” This answer proved extremely agreeable to Ayesha, and her associates, who still remained with their forces incamped near Basra. Here they proposed to wait for Ali, and made the proper dispositions for meeting him in the field, in case on both sides it should be found necessary to come to a general action <sup>n</sup>.

The Cûfans at last send him a reinforcement.

AFTER the departure of the army from Arrabdah, Ali advanced to Dhûlkhar ; where f
Othmân Ebn Hanîf, the late governor of Basra, waited upon him. Othmân told the Khalif, that “ he had sent him to Basra with a beard ; but must receive him from thence without “ one.” “ Thy sufferings,” said Ali, “ are meritorious. All the Moslems acquiesced in “ the election of the three preceding Khalifs. At last I was chosen, as a proper person to “ succeed Othmân ; nor did either Telba or Zobeir refuse a recognition of my authority.
“ However, they have since violated the engagements they entered into. But they shall “ know, that I am not less capable of doing myself justice than any of my predecessors.”
As soon as Ali had received Abu Mûsa's answer, which amounted to a clear and explicit denial of interesting himself in his favour, he sent Al Ashtar, a man of great resolution, and Ebn Abbâs, to Cûfa, with a full and unlimited power to act as they should think fit for the g

<sup>m</sup> EBN AL ATHIR, ubi sup. ISM. ABU'LFED. in Arab. p. 34. Aut. lib. AL AZIZ. YAKUT, in lexic. Vide etiam
JOAN. GAGN. not. ad Abu'lfed. ubi sup. p. 34. <sup>n</sup> EBN AL ATHIR, ubi sup. D'HERBEL. Biblioth.
orient. p. 90.

a good of his service. But neither could they prevail upon Abu Mûsa to enter into a war against Ayesha. He advised the people over whom he presided not to entertain any thoughts of coming to a rupture with either of the contending parties; but only to receive the person injured, if it should be agreeable to him to accept of such an offer, into their houses, till the Moslems on both sides could be disposed to an accommodation. This not a little chagrined the Khalîf. However, he came to a resolution to make one other effort to procure the assistance of the Cûfans; and, for this purpose, dispatched his eldest son Hasan and Ammâr to their city, with instructions, that permitted them to make, on the part of the Khalîf, any concessions to Abu Mûsa that he could in reason desire. But this attempt likewise, with regard to the governor, proved ineffectual; he exerting himself to the utmost of his power to prevent the Cûfans from complying with the Khalîf's proposals. This was also for some time hindered by Zeid Ebn Sawkhân, who read the two letters he had received from Ayesha; wherein she commanded him either to stay at home, or come with a body of troops to her assistance. However, at last Hasan, by a pathetic speech he made, wherein, with great art, he expatiated upon the perfidy and prevarication of Telba and Zobeir, and the unheard-of injury offered the Khalîf, prevailed upon the people to send a reinforcement to the Moslem army, commanded by Ali, then on its march to Basra. Some authors, however, relate, that, whilst the two parties were contending with great acrimony and vehemence in the mosque, Al Ashtar, whom Ali sent after his son Hasan, found means to seize the castle of Cûfa by surprize, with a small detachment assigned him for that purpose by the Khalîf; and that he treated very roughly some of Abu Mûsa's men, whom he found there. This, continue they, made such an impression on the minds of the Cûfans in Ali's favour, and rendered Abu Mûsa so contemptible to them, that, had he not instantly closed with the Khalîf's proposals, he would have been plundered, and perhaps assassinated, by the mob. Nor would this, after all, have probably been prevented, had not Al Ashtar vigorously interposed in his favour. Be that as it will, the Cûfans immediately sent a body of 8,600 men, to reinforce Ali's troops in the camp of Dulkbâr. This we learn from Ebn Al Athir; tho' the Cûfan troops, destined to act against Ayesha at this time, did not amount to above 6000 men, according to Abu'l Faraj <sup>a</sup>.

THIS reinforcement greatly animated the troops commanded by Ali; who, being apprized of its approach, began immediately to put themselves in motion. The Khalîf himself <sup>Ali advances</sup> advanced at the head of them to meet the Cûfans; to whom, after he had come up with them, he made a speech to the following effect: "You Cûfans," said he, "have always distinguished yourselves by your bravery and conduct. You have dispersed the forces of the kings of Persia, and made yourselves masters of their dominions. You have not only secured yourselves from the insults of other powers, but likewise afforded assistance to your neighbours. I have desired your interposition, in order to bring about a pacification between me and my brethren at Basra. I shall not fail persisting in my design to pursue gentle measures, till they proceed to hostilities against the troops under my command. On my part, nothing shall be omitted that may forward an accommodation, as I shall always prefer the sweets of peace to the miseries and desolations of war." After which, having before decamped from Dulkbâr, he marched without opposition to Basra; where he found the Moslem army under Ayesha, Telba, and Zobeir, ready to receive him. The Khalîf had several conferences with the two latter in the sight of both armies, that now faced each other. In one of these Ali demanded of Zobeir, if he did not remember that Mohammed once asked him, whether he loved his dear son Ali? and that, upon his answering in the affirmative, the prophet told him, "that, notwithstanding this, he should prove the source of a long series of calamities both to him and all the Moslems." Zobeir made answer, that "he remember'd this perfectly well; and that, had he recollected it sooner, he would never have taken up arms against him." Some have affirmed, that, after this conference, Zobeir discovered a great reluctance to come to an engagement with Ali; but was confirmed in his former resolution by Ayesha, who bore an implacable hatred to the Khalîf. Others have declared, that he was diverted from his intention of remaining neuter by his son, who asked him, "whether he was afraid of Ali's colours?" and, upon his answering in the negative, but asserting, that the oath he had taken would not permit him to act against that prince, assured him, that he might free himself from the obligation he was under by the manumission of a slave. However this may be, such an expiation of an inconsiderate oath, which, by the way, was very different from the oath taken by Zobeir, as that here mentioned, provided the slave be a Moslem, is allowed by the Korân <sup>p</sup>.

<sup>a</sup> EBN AL ATHIR, ubi sup. D'HERBEL. Biblioth. orient. p. 90. GREG. ABU'L FAR. ubi sup. p. 186, 187. ISM. ABU'LFED. hist. univ. vol. i. MSS. Pocock. in Bibl. Bodl. Oxon. num. 303. <sup>p</sup> EBN AL ATHIR, ubi sup. AL KOR. MOHAM. f. v. Vide etiam LUTOVIC. MARRACC. not. in sur. quint. Alcoran. & SALE's trans. and not. on the Kor. p. 94.

Both the Khalif and Ayesha prepare for an engagement.

THE two armies being drawn up in order of battle, faced each other for some time; the commanders on both sides pretending to be extremely averse to a general engagement. But an accident happened the night before the day of the camel, that rendered this absolutely inevitable. There were some disorders committed then in one of the armies, the authors of which could never be discovered; upon which, Telba and Zobeir were told by certain persons, who must have been desirous of leaving the dispute about the Khalifat between Ali and Ayesha to the decision of the sword, that the Cúfans had fallen upon their forces in the night. Ali, said they, will put an end to this quarrel by a decisive action; and therefore he has suffered the Cúfans to begin hostilities. Being informed of this, the Khalif considered these rumours as an artifice of his enemies, propagated with a design to force him to a battle; and therefore he declared Ayesha and her associates to be the aggressors, and consequently imputed to them the effusion of the Moslem blood that was to be spilt in this war. Before the propagation of these rumours, which gave infinite disgust to both parties, Ayesha seemed greatly dismayed at the countenance of Ali's troops, and was inclined to have settled with him the preliminaries of a future treaty; but after they became current, there was no room left for an accommodation. Ayesha was animated by despair, and the Khalif incensed more than ever; tho' in one of the former conferences, he had reproached Telba and Zobeir for their infidelity, and declared, in the presence of the two armies, that the divine vengeance would most certainly overtake them. Ayesha, in order to infuse life and vigour into her troops, was mounted on her great camel, in a pavilion (or little tent, surrounded with curtains, wherein women were carried on camels in the east) resembling a sort of cage, and moved with great resolution from one part of her army to another in the heat of the action. Hence it came to pass, that the day on which the battle was fought was called the day of the camel by some of the Arab historians; tho' the engagement itself seems to have been denominated the battle of Khoraiba by Abu'l Faraj <sup>a</sup>.

The battle of Khoraiba.

THE army Ali brought into the field on this occasion did not exceed 20,000 men, according to Al Makín; but it amounted to 30,000, if we will believe Ebn Al Athir. Ayesha's forces are said to have consisted of 30,000 men by the former of those authors, and to have exceeded that number by the latter; so that it is agreed on all hands, that the army commanded by Ayesha was more numerous than that of the Khalif. But notwithstanding this, the odds were apparently on Ali's side. For Ayesha's troops were composed of raw and undisciplined men, drawn together in haste; whereas those of the Khalif were the flower of the Moslem soldiery, consisting chiefly of the Ansárs and Mobájerín, as well as the Cúfan veterans, who had so eminently distinguished themselves in the conquest of Persia, and consequently such as might be intirely depended upon. Besides, Ali himself was infinitely superior, both in point of valour and capacity, to any of the enemy's generals. The dispute, therefore, was not of any long continuance; the enemy being quickly routed. Abn Al Athir relates, that Merwán perceiving the victory to incline to Ali, in the heat of the action, said to him, "Telba lately imbrued his hands in the blood of Othmán, and now, infatuated by ambition, he pretends to revenge his death;" and immediately letting fly an arrow at him, wounded him in the leg. Upon which his horse throwing him, he called for help; saying at the same time, "O God, take vengeance of me for the blood of Othmán, in the manner THOU shalt think most proper." His man then took him up behind him, and conveyed him to a house in Basra, where he in very short time expired. But just before his death, he said to one of the Khalif's men, "Give me your hand, that I may put mine into it, and by that action renew the oath of fidelity to Ali, which I have already taken to him." Of which the Khalif being informed, declared publickly, "that God would not call Telba to heaven, till he had atoned for the former violation of his oath by this last protestation of fidelity to him". As for Zobeir, having made his escape out of the battle, he retired to a valley crossed by a rivulet called Sabaa, on the road to Mecca; where he found Hanaf Ebn Kais incamped with a body of troops, with which he intended to join the victor, after the end of the action. Soon after his arrival there, Amru Ebn Jarmúz, one of Hanaf's men, struck off his head whilst he was at prayers, performing the prostration, and carried it to Ali. But the Khalif receiving it with indignation, and, at the sight of it, bidding him "go carry the good news to Ebn Safia in hell;" he could not forbear breaking out into the following exclamation: "You are the evil genius of the Moslems. If a person delivers you from any of your enemies, he is presently doomed to hell for such deliverance; and if he kills one of your men, you instantly pronounce him one of the devil's companions." Then, not being able to survive the indignity offered him, he drew his sword, and put a period to his days. With regard to Ayesha, the victory was by no means complete, till the Khalif had obliged her to make her submission. As long as her camel stood upon his legs, her troops made a tolerable resistance; and Ali

<sup>a</sup> EBN AL ATHIR, ubi sup. GREG. ABU'L. FAR. ubi sup. p. 187

- a found it not so easy to disperse them. Al Tabari relates, that seventy men, of the Banu Daba, who held his bridle, had their hands cut off successively in the dispute; and that the pavilion in which she sat was stuck so full of javelins and arrows, that it resembled a porcupine. At last, the camel was hamstringed, and Ayesha forced to lie there till the conclusion of the engagement; when Ali treated her with great politeness, dismissed her in a courteous manner, and ordered his sons Hasan and Hosein to attend her, with a splendid equipage, a day's journey on her return home. However, he thought fit afterwards to confine her to her house at Medina, and commanded her from thenceforth never to concern herself with state-affairs; tho he permitted her, in order to ingratiate himself the more with the Arabs, who still retained a secret regard and veneration for her, to perform the pilgrimage to Mecca. We
- b are told by an Arab author of good repute, that, when her camel failed her, Ali sent Mohammed Ebn Abu Becr to see whether she was dead or alive; and that, upon his presenting himself before her pavilion, she gave him opprobrious language. Thus ended the battle of Khoraiba, or, as 'tis called by Eutychius, the battle of the camel; wherein both Telha and Zobeir, who violated the oath they had taken to Ali, lost their lives. The Arab, who killed the latter, is named, by Abu'l Faraj, Omar Ebn Jirmus, but, by Ebn Al Athir and Al Makin, Amru Ebn Jarmuz, as has been already observed. The people of the camel, as Al Makin calls Ayesha's troops, according to some of the Arab writers, had 8000, or, as others say, 17000 men killed in the action; whereas the whole loss sustained by Ali did not exceed 1000 men. The spoil taken at the battle the Khalif distributed among the heirs of his soldiers who fell in it,
- c as a just reward for the bravery of their fathers and relations. He also constituted Abd'allah Ebn Abbās governor of Basra; and reprehended, with some asperity, the people of that place, for their disaffection to him. From thence he went to Cufa, which he made the seat of his government. Some of the Arab historians relate, that, on both sides, above 30,000 men were killed in the battle of Khoraiba, which was fought on Thursday, the 10th of the former Jomada, in the 36th year of the Hejra, nearly answering to the year of our LORD 656<sup>r</sup>.

- AFTER so complete a victory, Ali could have no enemies to contend with either in Moawiyah Arabia, Irak, Egypt, Persia, or Khorasan; so that it must have rendered him extremely formidable. However, there was still a very powerful party formed against him in Syria; Moawiyah persisting in his resolution to dispute the Khalifat with him, and having all the Syrian troops at his devotion. Notwithstanding some overtures that had been made to him by Ali for an accommodation, he refused to acknowledge him Khalif; and even still continued to animate the Syrians, in order to advance his own affairs, against him. Whilst matters were in this situation, Amru Ebn Al As, and not Amru Ebn Ali, as he is called by Mr. Ockley, who commanded in Palestine, arrived at Damascus, then the residence of Moawiyah, and took the oath of allegiance to him. This was done in the presence of all the army, and had before been concerted between Amru and Moawiyah; the latter having engaged to confer upon the former, in order to procure his assistance, the lieutenancy of Egypt, if he could be advanced to the Khalifat. In consequence of this recognition of Moawiyah's authority, Amru gave his new master the titles of lawful KHALIF and Prince of the MOSLEMS. The foregoing action was followed by the acclamations of the people, who likewise unanimously took the oath of fidelity to Moawiyah, and inaugurated him by the title of Emir. Al Makin relates, that the Khalif dispatched Khariz Ebn Abd'allah Al Nahali to Damascus, to dispose Moawiyah to an accommodation; but that all his endeavours in this point proved ineffectual<sup>s</sup>.
- d
- e

- As soon as Ali received advice of these commotions, he endeavoured, first by gentle Ali marches means, to bring the rebels of Syria back to a sense of their duty. But finding afterwards, to Seffein, that the people of that large province had unanimously declared against him, he feared it would be in vain to set on foot any other negotiation. As, therefore, he perceived it would
- f
- be necessary to invade Syria, in order to reduce the rebels to his obedience, he advanced to the frontiers at the head of an army of 70,000 men; but had scarce entered that country, when he was obliged to incamp upon a spot of ground, where he found himself greatly distressed for want of water. In these calamitous circumstances, he met with a Christian hermit, who told him, that there was a small cistern in the neighbourhood; but that this would scarce supply him with three hogsheads of water for his troops. However, upon Ali's saying, that the antient prophets of the people of Israel formerly made their abode, and dug a pit, there, the hermit farther told him, that he had been informed by some old men, that there was really a pit, or well, shut up near the place where he had incamped, which, according to a tradition prevailing in the country, could only be discovered and opened by a prophet, or one sent by him. Upon this, Ali went in quest of it, soon found it, and removed a stone that covered it, of an immense size, with the greatest facility; which so surprized the hermit, that he immediately embraced his knees, and would never after leave him. To which some of the eastern writers add, that this hermit presented the Khalif with an old parchment manuscript, said to have been written by Simon Ebn Sefa, or Simon Cephas, that is, Simon Peter, or St. Peter, surnamed Cephas, one of the apostles of JESUS CHRIST, which contained an account of the advent of Mohammed, of the arrival of his lawful successor in those parts, and of the miraculous discovery of this well. After Ali had returned God thanks for so signal a blessing, and furnished his troops with a sufficient quantity of water, he continued his march to Seffein, a place between Syria and Irak, where Moawiyah had posted himself with an army of 80,000 men. Before his arrival there, Ali sent a strong detachment, under the command of Ashtar Al Nakbai, to attack a body of troops posted by Moawiyah on that part of the road leading to the Euphrates, in order to render it impracticable, and impede the Khalif's march. Ashtar executed his orders with so much bravery, that he drove the enemy from their post, cut several of them in pieces, and opened a passage from the army to Seffein. According to Al Makin, Ali's troops amounted to 90,000 men, and Moawiyah's to 120,000; so that, if this author is to be credited, all the Moslem forces on both sides assembled on this occasion, consisted of 210,000 men<sup>a</sup>.

<sup>r</sup> EBN AL ATHIR, ubi sup. ABU JAAFAR AL TABAR, apud AL MAKIN, ubi sup. ut & ipse AL MAKIN, ibid. GREG. ABU'L FAR. ubi sup. p. 187, 188. MIRKHOND, D'HERBEL Bibl. orient. in Ali. EUTYCH. patriarch. Alexandrin. annal. p. 342, 343. ISM. ABU'LFED. ubi sup. <sup>s</sup> ISM. ABU'LFED. ubi sup. AL MAKIN, ubi sup. p. 38. GREG ABU'L FAR. ubi sup. p. 188. D'HERBEL. Biblioth. orient. p. 90, 91. OCKLEY's hist. of the Sarac. vol. ii. p. 47.

The battle of Seffein.

TOWARDS the close of the 36th year of the Hejra, the two armies came in sight of each other, and seemed to be ready to enter upon action. Some skirmishes happened between their advanced guards, wherein neither the Khalif nor Moawiyah sustained any considerable loss. The first month of the following year was spent in attempts to forward an accommodation but without effect. The next month being Safar, they began to fight in parties or plottoons, without hazarding a general engagement. The continuance of these encounters is variously related by the Arab historians. Some extend it to forty days, others to an hundred, and others to an hundred and ten. In that space, Ali lost 5000, or, as others say, 25,000 men, twenty-six of whom had been intimately acquainted with the prophet, attended him at the battle of Bedr, and were dignified with the title of the COMPANIONS. The most famous of these was Anmar Ebn Jassar, or rather Ammar Ebn Yâser, Ali's general of horse, who was about ninety years of age, and had been in three several engagements with Mohammed himself. The Syrian forces suffered still more than those of the Khalif; 45,000 of the them having been killed upon the spot in these rencounters. Ali commanded his men never to begin the attack, never to kill any one that fled, never to take any plunder, and always to treat the women that should fall into their hands in a decent manner. He also, before the beginning of these rencounters, which Al Makin, or rather Abu Jaasar, makes to amount in all to 90, intreated Moawiyah to take the oath of fidelity to him, and prevent the farther effusion of Moslem blood. But this Moawiyah constantly, till the death of Ammar, refused; declaring publickly, that he would not lay down his arms till he had taken vengeance of the murderers of Othman, deposed Ali, and enabled the people to proceed to a new election. But that fatal event made a deep impression both upon Amru and Moawiyah; the former declaring that he would rather have died twenty years before, than have survived so worthy a person as Ammar Ebn Yâser, who had deserved so well of all the Moslems. The loss of this general so exasperated Ali, that he charged the Syrians with a body of 12,000 men, broke them, and challenged Moawiyah to fight him in single combat. This challenge Amru would have persuaded Moawiyah to have accepted; but he absolutely declined it, insisting that it was not a fair one, since Ali could not but be conscious of his superior strength; he having killed every person who had to that time entered the lists against him. Amru urged, that it would be dishonourable, and argue a want of courage, to refuse so fair an offer. To which Moawiyah made no other reply than this; “You aspire to the Khalifat yourself, and desire to enjoy it after I am gone.” The last action at Seffein continued all night, to the great disadvantage of the Syrians. Al Ashtar pushed them to their camp; which, being vigorously supported by Ali, he was upon the point of making himself master of. Moawiyah seeing things in such a desperate situation, resolved, in concert with Amru, to make use of an artifice, that might possibly excite the Khalif's men to desert; since nothing, at that perilous conjuncture, could, as he apprehended, save both him and his troops, but such a desertion. He, therefore, instantly ordered some of his men to fix several copies of the Korân upon their lances points, and to carry them at the head of his troops; at the same time crying out, “This is the book that ought to decide all differences between us; this is the book of God between us and you, which absolutely prohibits the effusion of Moslem blood.” Nor did this stratagem, coarse as it was, fail of produce-

<sup>a</sup> ISM. ABU'LFED. ubi sup. D'HERBEL. Biblioth. orient. p. 91. JOH. i. 42. MAT. x. 2. xvi. 16. GREG. ABU'LFAR. ubi sup. p. 123. AL MAKIN, ubi sup. p. 39.

a ing the desired effect. For, the troops of Irāk, that were the flower of the Khalif's forces, immediately threw down their arms; threatening to abandon him, and even to deliver him into the hands of his enemies, if he would not found a retreat. This, therefore, he found himself obliged to do; tho' he most bitterly exclaimed against that point of conduct in the strongest manner; assuring the mutineers, that Amru and Moāwiyah had not the least regard for the Korān; and that his view in the present war was only to force them to act according to the tenets and decisions of that book. But he found it impossible to stem the torrent that now threatened to overwhelm him, without an immediate compliance with what they required; especially as the Khārejites, an enthusiastic sect, openly declared, that, unless he instantly ordered the troops under Al Ashtar to desist from the attack of the Syrian camp, they would serve him in the same manner they had done the son of Affān, meaning the last Khalif Othmān, whom they had inhumanly murdered. Al Ashtar, therefore, by the Khalif's command, was obliged, tho' with the greatest reluctance, to retire, and suffer the victory, of which he thought himself so secure, by this stratagem, to be wrested out of his hands. The night in which this battle was fought has been named by the Arab historians THE VALIANT NIGHT; because, says Al Makin, the Moslems behaved so valiantly in it, that they broke all their spears, and spent the remainder of it in a close engagement. About 70,000 fell on both sides that fatal night, according to some of the Arab historians, if we will believe the same author; 25,000 on the Khalif's and 45,000 on that of the Syrians. But others of them, as he also observes, and with a greater appearance of truth, as we apprehend, affirm, that Ali lost 25,000 men, and Moāwiyah 45,000, in all the actions that happened at Seffein. Upon the return of the day, Ali was obliged to cool the ardour of his victorious troops, when they had, as it were, rendered the action decisive in his favour, in the manner already related. The stratagem that occasioned this was contrived, and suggested to Moāwiyah, by Amru Ebn Al As, if any credit be due to Abu Jaafar Al Tabari <sup>b</sup>.

MOAWIYAH, after the end of the action, desiring that the dispute betwixt him and Ali might be brought to a decision by two persons nominated by the parties concerned, according to the true and genuine sense of the Korān; Asbaath Ebn Kais, who was supposed to have been corrupted by Moāwiyah, asked Ali how he approved of that expedient. The Khalif answered him coldly, "He that is not at liberty cannot give his advice. You are <sup>The dispute between Ali and Moāwiyah referred to the arbitration of two persons.</sup> to conduct this affair as you shall think proper." This apparently glanced at the late perfidious conduct of the troops of Irāk, who considered Asbaath as their chief. Not content with offering so gross an affront as they had done to the poor Khalif, they insisted upon nominating for him Abu Mūsa Al Ashari, a very weak man, and one who had once betrayed him; refusing to admit, as he desired, either Ebn Abbās, or Ashtar, or indeed any other person that they thought had the least regard for him. Moāwiyah, on the other hand, was treated in quite a different manner. He was allowed to trust his interest with whom he pleased; and accordingly he nominated Amru Ebn Al As, one of the greatest men of the age, to assert his right to the Khalifat, and explain the Korān in his favour. The two arbitrators, with whom the determination of this affair was intrusted, were enjoined to decide it the next Ramadān, agreeably to the tenor of the Korān, and the collection of the prophet's traditions. This point being agreed upon, tho' by no means of to the satisfaction of the Khalif, Moāwiyah retired to Damascus, and Ali to Cūsa, in order to wait the event of that arbitration. But, before their departure, each of them left the command of his army to one of his generals; and invested with a proper authority, that he might better be enabled to settle every thing relating to religion, in their absence, a particular Imām. We find it intimated by Abu Jaafar, that the Syrian and Irākian troops chose the arbitrators; and consequently, that Ali and Moāwiyah had no hand in that election. The place appointed for the scene of this arduous transaction, upon which the fate of the Moslem empire, yet in its infancy, seemed to depend, was Dawmat Al Jandal, a town on the borders of Syria, about fifteen or sixteen days journey from Medina, and five from Damascus. The ancient inhabitants of this place, as well as those of Tabūk, were the Calbites, descended from Calb, and consequently a branch of the tribe of Hamyar <sup>c</sup>.

ABOUT eight months after the battle of Seffein, Abu Mūsa and Amru Ebn Al As came to Ali <sup>deposed by both the arbitrators.</sup> Dawmat Al Jandal, attended by several of the companions, and escorted by a detachment of the Moslem forces. Ebn Abbās, before the opening of the conferences, desired Abu Mūsa to remember this, whatever else he forgot, that Ali had no blemish to render him incapable of the government, nor Moāwiyah any virtue to qualify him for it. But, notwithstanding this salutary admonition, Amru, who was perfectly well acquainted with the genius of his colleague, by his artful address, so far insinuated himself into his good graces, that he could bring him into any measures which he should think proper to suggest to him. He, therefore, easily persuaded Abu Mûsa, that, in order to re-establish peace amongst the Moslems, it would be absolutely necessary to depose both Ali and Moâwiyah; that a new Khalîf might be elected, who should be acceptable to all the people. This important article being settled, a tribunal was erected between the two armies, on which each of the arbitrators was to declare publicly his opinion. This Abu Mûsa, at Amru's request, mounted first, and with a loud voice pronounced the following words: "I depose from the Khalîfat both Ali and Moâwiyah, in the same manner that I now take this ring off my finger;" and having made this declaration, he immediately came down. Then Amru, in his turn, ascended the tribunal, and said, "You have heard, gentlemen, how Abu Mûsa has deposed Ali, whom I likewise depose, and confer the Khalîfat upon Moâwiyah. I therefore invest that prince with the supreme authority, in the same manner that I put this ring upon my finger. And this I am the more readily disposed to do, as having justice on my side; he having been declared by Othmân his successor, and being now the avenger of his blood, as well as the most worthy of all the Moslems of that sublime station to which I now advance him." This unexpected declaration greatly shocked all the partizans of Ali, who complained bitterly of Abu Mûsa; and he, on his part, in very severe terms, reflected upon Amru's conduct, who had so shamefully violated the principal article stipulated in the late convention. In fine, Abu Mûsa, after having been so outwitted by Amru, not thinking himself safe in Ali's camp, fled to Mecca for his farther security. Some of the Arab writers relate, that this Abu Mûsa had the most musical voice of any person of his time. According to Abu Jaafar, the two arbitrators did not only agree to depose both Ali and Moâwiyah but likewise to promote to the Khalîfat Abd'allah, the son of Omar Ebn Al Khattâb. For a circumstantial detail of Amru's perfidious conduct on this occasion, we must beg leave to refer our curious readers to Abul Faraj, who, in that point, will give them full and ample satisfaction <sup>a</sup>.

<sup>b</sup> AL MAKIN & D'HERBEL. ubi sup. GREG. ABU'L FAR. ubi sup. p. 188, 189. ABU JAAFAR AL TABAR. apud Al Makin, ubi sup. ISM. ABU'LFED. ubi sup. <sup>c</sup> ISM. ABU'LFED. ubi sup. AL MAKIN, ubi sup. p. 39, 40. GREG. ABU'L FAR. hist. dynast. p. 189. SAAD AL YAMANI, SHARIF AL EDRISI, ABU'LFED. in cap. de Arab. pur. D'HERBEL. ubi sup.

Ali's interest begins to decline.

THE preceding determination, far from effecting a reconciliation between the contending parties, incensed their adherents to such a degree, that they publicly cursed and excommunicated one another in a very dreadful manner. Nor did the houses of Ali and Ommiyah, to the last of which belonged both Othmân and Moâwiyah, for a long time lay aside that reciprocal malediction. Nay, it may be said still to subsist in that rivetted antipathy between the Turks and the Persians, which is visible at this very day. However, Amru, after the public declaration he had made, and the Syrian troops he commanded, returned to Damascus, and complimented Moâwiyah upon his new election. On the other hand, Ali being determined to assert his right to the Khalîfat, and even in a short time to march against Moâwiyah; no less than 60,000 of his subjects took a fresh oath of allegiance to him, and even obliged themselves to support him to the last drop of their blood. But notwithstanding this vigorous resolution taken in his favour, that Khalîf's interest, from the fatal period we are now upon, began greatly to decline <sup>c</sup>.

Ali drops his title of Khalîf.

IT may not be improper here to remark, that before the articles of the treaty of peace, which followed the late suspension of arms between Ali and Moâwiyah, could be perfectly reduced to writing, both Amru and Moâwiyah insisted, that the title of emperor of the faithful, which Ali had assumed, and prefixed to a copy of those articles, should be intirely effaced. To this Abnaf Ebn Kais would have persuaded the Khalîf never to give his consent. But Ali told him, that, when he was secretary to his father-in-law Mohammed, Sobail Ebn Amru refused to treat with the prophet, on the part of the people of Mecca, unless he would renounce the title of the APOSTLE OF GOD. Which, for the sake of peace, he accordingly did, without hesitation; and ordered me, said Ali, to efface that title, after it had been inserted at the head of the instrument containing the articles of the treaty to be signed by both parties, and substitute in its room the following words, Mohammed the son of Abd'allah. At the same time, he addressed himself to me, continued the Khalîf, in the following remarkable terms: Remember, there will hereafter come a day when you shall find yourself in a similar case. Ali, therefore, agreed to the omission of that title, of which, by his own arbitrator, Abu Mûsa, he had been so solemnly deprived. All these transactions happened in the 37th year of the Hejra, or of CHRIST 657, as did also the defection of the Khârejites, or rebels, for that the word really signifies; of which, as it is a very curious article of the Arabic history, in the Khalîfat of Ali, we must beg leave to give our readers here a distinct and particular relation <sup>f</sup>.

<sup>a</sup> ABU'LFED. & AL MAKIN, ubi sup. ABU JAAFAR AL TABARI, apud Al Makin, ubi sup. D'HERBEL. ubi sup. p. 91, 92. GREG. ABU'L FAR. ubi sup. p. 189, 190.

<sup>c</sup> AL MAKIN, GREG. ABU'L FAR. & D'HERBEL. ubi sup. <sup>f</sup> EBN AL ATHIR, ubi sup. D'HERBEL. ubi sup. p. 92. AL BEIDAWI, ISM. ABU'LFED. de vit. Moham. cap. xlv. p. 87. AL SHAHRESTAN. apud Pocockium, not. in spec. hist. Arab. p. 269.

a AFTER Ali had submitted the decision of his right to the Khalifat, which Moâwiyah <sup>The defection of the Khâ-rejites</sup> disputed with him, to arbitration, he retired to Cûfa, as has been already observed. But he was no sooner arrived there, than 12,000 Khârejites, that is, rebels, or revolters, who had fought under him at the battle of Seffein, and themselves forced him to take that ignominious step, pretending to be offended at this submission, revolted from him. These were also called Mobakkemites, or Judiciarians; because the reason they gave for their revolt was, that Ali had referred a matter concerning the religion of God to the judgment of men; whereas the judgment, in such case, belonged to God alone. In consequence of this notion, they urged, that, instead of standing to the peace he had made, he ought to pursue his enemies, who were likewise the enemies of God, without mercy. But Ali answered, that, as he had given his word, he ought to keep it; and that in so doing, he should follow what the law of God prescribed. The Khârejites replied, that God was the only judge between him and Moâwiyah; and that consequently he had committed an enormous sin, of which he ought sincerely to repent. This irritating Ali, he, with some warmth, remonstrated to them, that, if any sin had been committed on this occasion, the world would justly impute the guilt of it to them; who, contrary to their oath of allegiance to him, had abandoned him in the heat of the late action, and obliged him to pursue those very measures, which, at that time, as they pretended, gave them so much offence <sup>e</sup>.

b THE rebels, not at all satisfied with these reasons, chose, for their general, Abd'allah Ebn Wabeh, who appointed Naharwan, a town situated between Wâset and Baghdâd, about <sup>Their rebellion is extinguished by Ali.</sup> four miles to the east of the Tigris, the place of their rendezvous. They had not been here long before they were joined by great numbers of Ali's disaffected subjects from Cûfa, Basra, and various parts of Arabia. The Khalif at first took little notice of them; his thoughts being chiefly bent upon reducing Moâwiyah, whom he considered as much the more formidable enemy. But being informed, that they were increased to the number of 25,000 men, that they condemned as impious all who did not fall in with their sentiments, and that they had already put to death several Moslems, for refusing to comply with their iniquitous measures; he resolved, in fine, to exterminate a sect, which tended to the subversion of the very foundations of Mohammedism. However, he thought fit, before he proceeded to extremities, to try gentle methods; but these proving ineffectual, he assembled a considerable body of troops, at the head of which he presented himself to their view. Nevertheless, before he attacked them, he had the precaution to plant a standard without the camp, and to make proclamation by sound of trumpet, that whosoever would come under it, should have quarter, and whosoever would retire to Cûfa, should find a sanctuary there. This stratagem produced the desired effect; insomuch that Abd'allah Ebn Wabeh soon found his army reduced to 4000 men. However, being animated by despair, he attacked the Khalif's forces, notwithstanding the inequality of his troops. But he received the just reward of his temerity and presumption; being cut to pieces, with all his men, except nine who escaped. Of these, as we are told by some historians, two fled into Omân, two into Kermân, two into Sijistân, two into Mesopotamia, and one into Tel Mawrûn, in Yaman; in all which places they propagated their heresy, where, as we are told, it remains to this day. Others maintain, tho' not with such an appearance of truth, in our opinion, that, of the 4000 Khârejites, commanded by Abd'allah Ebn Wabeh, not a man survived the general destruction; Ali being resolved to pursue this impious and rebellious sect even to excision. Before the beginning of the action, Ali told some of his friends, that “ the rebels, who pretended “ to spend so much of their time in reading the Korân, without observing its precepts, “ would desert their profession, at the approach of danger, with as great celerity as arrows “ fly from a bow, when they are discharged from it; which accordingly came to pass. It will be proper to observe here, that the heresy of the Khârejites consisted chiefly in two things: 1. In that they affirmed a man might be promoted to the dignity of Imâm, or prince, tho' he was not of the tribe of Koreish, nor even a free man, provided he was a just and pious person, and endued with the other requisite qualifications; and also held, that if the Imâm turned aside from the truth, he might be put to death, or deposed; and that there was no absolute necessity for any Imâm at all in the world. 2. In that they charged Ali with sin, for having left an affair to the judgment of men, which ought to have been determined by God alone; and went so far as to declare him guilty of infidelity, and to curse him on that account. The principal sects, or branches, of the Khârejites, besides the Mobakkemites here mentioned, are six; which, tho' they greatly differ amongst themselves in other matters, yet agree in these, viz. that they absolutely reject Othmân and Ali, preferring the doing of this to the greatest obedience, and allowing marriages to be contracted on no other terms; that they account those who are guilty of grievous sins to be infidels; and that they hold it necessary to resist the Imâm when he transgresses the law. The most celebrated of the Khârejites seem to be the

<sup>e</sup> AL MAKIN & GREG. ABU'L FAR. ubi sup. AL SHAHRESTAN. apud Pocockium, ubi sup. p. 270. D'HERBEL. ubi sup. p. 92.

Waidians, so called from Al Waid, which signifies the threats denounced by God against the wicked. These are the antagonists of the Morgians, and assert, that he who is guilty of an enormous sin ought to be declared an infidel, or an apostate, and will be eternally punished in hell, though he were a true believer; which opinion of theirs occasioned the first rise of the Motazelites. One Jaafar Ebn Mobashar, of the sect of the Nodbamians, was yet more severe than the Waidians, pronouncing him to be a reprobate, and an apostate, who steals but a grain of corn. The defeat, or rather almost total extirpation; of the Kharejites, who persisted in their rebellion, whose name also; according to Ebn Al Kossa, signified tribute, as they received tribute without the leave of the prince, and even in opposition to him, happened in the 38th year of the Hejra, the year following their revolt; at a place; as should seem from Eutychius, called Khorûzi, or Khorûzia, at a small distance from Nabarwan. Their leader, Abd'allah Ebn Wabeh, lost his life in the action; and the glorious victory gained on this occasion reunited under the government of Ali the whole body of the Moslems settled in Arabia <sup>a</sup>.

The Khalif's
camp at Cûfa abandoned by his troops.

THE Khalif having thus happily extinguished this rebellion, which struck at the very foundations of Islamism itself, as well as the supreme authority with which he was at first so legally invested by the unanimous suffrages of the Moslems, he made the necessary dispositions for marching immediately against Moâwiyah, in order to reduce him likewise to his obedience. But he was diverted from this design by some persons about him, who probably were secret well-wishers to Moâwiyah, as this would have been the most proper season to have attacked him, when his men were so flushed with their late success, under the pretence, that he had not yet made sufficient preparations for so long a war as this was like to be; and that he ought to allow his troops some refreshment, after the fatigues they had sustained. Ali, therefore, following their advice, formed a camp at Nakilah, in the neighbourhood of Cûfa; and permitted his men to retire to Cûfa, to follow their occupations there one day, and return to the posts assigned them the next, during the time of his incampment there. The consequence of which was, that the camp was soon intirely deserted by the troops that formed it, and of course the Khalif himself obliged to retire to Cûfa, then the receptacle of those troops <sup>c</sup>.

Egypt conquered by Am-ru Ebn Al As.

IT has been already observed, that Ali, in the beginning of his Khalifat, conferred the government of Egypt upon Kais Ebn Sa'id, who acquitted himself of his charge with great d prudence. Finding, on his arrival there, that the partizans of Othmân, or rather Moâwiyah, formed a very considerable faction, he thought it proper to accommodate himself to the times; which he did with so much address, that he kept every thing in good order; inso-much that the whole body of the people were very well pleased with his administration. This conduct of Kais furnished Moâwiyah with an occasion of publishing every-where, that the governor of Egypt was his friend, and acted in concert with him; which he did, in order to render him suspected to Ali, who yet had not a more faithful friend amongst his subjects. That he might the more effectually carry his point, Moâwiyah forged a letter in Kais's name, directed to himself; wherein it was insinuated, that the reason why he had not treated with more severity the adherents of the house of Ommiyah was, because he was him- e self intirely in their measures. Which artifice of Moâwiyah had the desired effect. For Ali hereby entertaining a suspicion of Kais's fidelity to him, immediately recalled him, and appointed Mohammed Ebn Abu Becr governor of Egypt in his room; which occasioned great commotions in that province. For the new governor no sooner set his foot there, than he began to chase out of that country all those who professed any regard for Othmân, or preserved any veneration for his memory. Upon which, such civil wars and dissensions ensued, that Ali was obliged to send for Mohammed home, and to dispatch Malec Shatur, sometimes called Ushur Malec Ebn Hâreth Al Najai, into Egypt, to re-establish his authority there. Moâwiyah being apprized of this, prevailed upon a friend of his at Kolzom, a town upon the Red Sea, where Ushur Malec was to lodge, in his passage to Egypt, to poison him; which f he accordingly did, by giving him some poisoned honey at an entertainment he had prepared for him. This obliged Ali to continue Mohammed Ebn Abu Becr some time longer in the government of Egypt; from whence he immediately expelled all the Banu Hâreth, probably on account of the relation they bore to Ushur Malec his successor, who were some of the blackest and most swarthy kind of Arabs; which proved the total ruin of Ali's interest in that region. For, they instantly retired to Damascus, where they informed Moâwiyah of the treatment they had met with from Mohammed; at the same time assuring him, that he might easily make himself master of Egypt. Upon receiving this intelligence, Moâwiyah sent Amru Ebn Al As with a body of 6000 men, to take possession, in his name, of the

<sup>a</sup> AL MAKIN, ubi sup. p. 39. Poc. in not. ad spec. hist. Arab. p. 270. D'HERBEL. ubi sup. AL SHAHRESTAN. apud Pocockium, ubi sup. p. 256. AL JANNAB. & ABU'LFED. ubi sup. GREG. ABU' L FAR. ubi sup. & p. 169. EBN AL KOSSA, apud Pocock. ubi sup. EUTYCH. ubi sup. p. 342, 343. <sup>c</sup> D'HERBEL. biblioth. orient. p. 92, 93.

- a government of that country. Amru, in pursuance of his orders, marched with all possible expedition into Egypt, seized the capital city, and was soon joined by Ebn Sharig, who had put himself at the head of Othmân's party, with a considerable force. After this junction, Amru attacked Mohammed Ebn Abu Becr, Ali's governor, intirely defeated him, and took him prisoner. Not satisfied with this, he put him to death; and, inclosing his body in that of an ass, burnt it to ashes. This barbarity gave great offence to his sister Ayesha, who begged a curse upon Amru and Moâwiyah for it at the end of all her prayers, and took Mohammed's dependents and domestics under her protection. Ali also himself was greatly concerned at this tragical event; saying, "We shall account for him before God." Abu Jaasar relates, that Mohammed Ebn Abu Becr, after the defeat of his forces, escaped out of the battle, and
- b hid himself; but was discovered, and brought to Amru, by Moawiyah Ebn Kbedej, who treated him in the cruel manner above-mentioned. He was cut off in the fortieth year of his age, after he had been five months only governor of Egypt. After his death, the post he filled was occupied by Amru Ebn Al As; upon whom it was conferred by Moâwiyah, who then acted as Khalîf in Syria <sup>k</sup>.

THE next year, being the 39th of the Hejra, Moâwiyah sent several detachments to make incursions into Ali's territories, where they committed dreadful depredations. The most considerable of these detachments, under the command of Dabak Ebn Kais, consisting of 3000 men, plundered several districts of Irâk, and then penetrated into Hejâz. But Dabak was met by a body of the Khalîf's troops, consisting of 4000 men, under the conduct of Hajar Ebn Adi, after he had retired out of that province, at Tadmor. Here Hajar attacked the enemy with such bravery, that he put them to flight, killed several of them upon the spot, and recovered the booty they had acquired. This vigorous action was of considerable service to the Khalîf's subjects in those parts, who had been thrown into the utmost consternation. For, the Syrians had not only pillaged the country through which they moved, but likewise put all the Arabs they could meet with to the sword; which had struck the Moslems there with such terror, that, for some time, none of them durst even perform the pilgrimage to Mecca <sup>l</sup>.

- THE same year, as we apprehend, and not the preceding, as has been intimated by D'Herbelot, without any manner of foundation, who has been followed herein by Mr. Ockley, Ali sent for his faithful friend, Abd'allah Ebn Abbâs, from Basra, of which place he was then governor, to Medina, that he might with him take such resolutions as were suitable to the present situation of his affairs. Moâwiyah receiving advice of this event, immediately ordered Abd'allah Ebn Hadrâmi to march to Basra with a body of 2000 horse, and possess himself of that city. These orders he easily executed, as Ziyâd, Ebn Abbâs's lieutenant there, had not a sufficient number of troops to oppose him, and the city itself was not capable of making any defence. Ali being informed of this, sent a reinforcement to Ziyâd, who had abandoned Basra at Abd'allah's approach, under the command of Hâreth, who joined Ziyâd at a small distance from Basra without any loss. After this junction, the combined forces attacked Abd'allah Al Hadrâmi near that city, overthrew him, and killed him upon the spot.
- c Upon which, Basra surrendered again to Ali; who immediately sent back thither Abd'allah Ebn Abbâs, to command there as he had done before. Which transactions we have thought fit to place in the 39th year of the Hejra, as the incursions mentioned by Mr. Ockley immediately before them seem to correspond exactly with those that Al Makin assures us were made by Moâwiyah's detachments that year. Our learned and curious readers, therefore, we hope, will not censure us for preferring the authority of Al Makin to that of M. D'Herbelot, in the point before us <sup>m</sup>.

- BUT notwithstanding several incursions were made, and some few expeditions of little note undertaken by the troops of Ali and Moâwiyah this year, no action of eclat seems to have happened in it. The Syrians having already sustained very considerable losses in this
- f war, were not in a condition to make any great impression upon the Arabs; and the Arabs, on the other side, being still harrassed by dissensions, did with no small difficulty maintain themselves in a state of independency. As the dispute betwixt Ali and Moâwiyah had disturbed the repose of Syria and Arabia, so the tranquillity of Persia was likewise not a little affected by the present commotions. This induced Abd'allah Ebn Abbâs, Ali's lieutenant of Basra, to send Ziyâd, a person of great prudence and moderation, who had lately, in conjunction with Hâreth, defeated Abd'allah Al Hadrâmi, one of Moâwiyah's generals, into Persia, that he might take upon him the government of that country; in which post he behaved himself so well, that the Persians declared they had never been blessed with so happy an administration since the days of Anushirwân. After the late defeat, Dabak, who

<sup>k</sup> AL MAKIN, ubi sup. p. 36, 40. D'HERBEL. ubi sup. p. 93. ISM. ABU'LFED. MS. Pocock. in Bibl. Bodl. Oxon. ubi sup.

<sup>l</sup> AL MAKIN, ubi sup. p. 41. GREG. ABU'L FAR. ubi sup. p. 190. ABU'LFED.

ubi sup.

<sup>m</sup> AL MAKIN & D'HERBEL. ubi sup. OCKLEY'S hist. of the Sarac. vol. ii. p. 67, 68.

then lost a considerable number of men upon the spot, with great precipitation abandoned <sup>a</sup> the district of Hems; and with much difficulty, by favour of the night, made his escape into the interior part of Syria <sup>a</sup>.

Moâwiyah's troops make incursions into Ali's territories.

In the 40th year of the Hejra, or the year of our LORD 660, Moâwiyah Ebn Abu Sofiân sent Basheer Ebn Artab, with a body of 3000 horse, to make an irruption into Hejâz; with orders to possess himself of Mecca and Medina, the inhabitants of those places having kept a correspondence with him ever since the death of Othmân, and by this means open himself a passage into Yaman. Abu Ayub, the Ansâr, and Fâtham Ebn Abbâs, who commanded in those places for Ali, abandoned them at Basheer's approach; upon which, he obliged the inhabitants to take the oath of allegiance to Moâwiyah, and threw down the walls of Medina. Abu Ayub, the commandant of that city, before Basheer entered it, with a few attendants, <sup>b</sup> made his escape to Cûfa <sup>o</sup>.

Ebn Artah's cruelty in Arabia.

ABD'ALLAH EBN ABBÂS, surnamed the Ansâr, in order to distinguish him from Abd'allah Ebn Abbâs, one of Ali's most faithful friends, and governor of Basra, Ali's lieutenant of Yaman, fearing a visit from Ebn Artab, and being in no condition to oppose him, upon the rumour of what had happened to Mecca and Medina, fled likewise to Cûfa. He attempted to carry off with him his two sons, who were boys; but they had the misfortune to fall into Ebn Artab's hands upon the road, who caused them to be barbarously murdered. He also put to the sword a great number of Arabs in Yaman, and particular at Sanaa, who had declared themselves adherents to Ali. Then he returned to Mecca, and afterwards cut off 30,000 Arabs more at Al Tâyes, Yamâma, and Medina. Ali being apprized of what had <sup>c</sup> happened, sent a detachment of 4000 horse, under the command of Jariyah, to pursue Ebn Artab; but he found it impossible to come up with him. We are told, that Ali was so extremely touched at hearing the news of the murder committed on the young sons of Abd'allah, that he cursed Ebn Artab, and begged of God to deprive him of his senses and understanding. Which petition, according to some of the eastern writers, was heard; that commander really becoming an idiot towards the close of his days, and dying in that miserable condition. Notwithstanding the war was carried on with such circumstances of cruelty on the part of Moâwiyah, that prince, at this juncture, prayed publicly for Ali, Hasan, and Hosein; as the Khalif did for him, Amru, and Dahak. About this time, Ali's brother, Okail, went over to Moâwiyah, who assigned him a large revenue for his defection. <sup>d</sup> Okail alledged no other reason for this infamous conduct, than that his brother had not treated him with such marks of distinction as he thought he might justly have expected of him. We must not forget to inform our readers here, that M. D'Herbelot is guilty of a most egregious blunder, when he confounds Abd'allah Ebn Abbâs, governor of Yaman, with Ali's lieutenant of Basra, who had the very same name; and that, in consequence of this mistake, he has committed several others, which he has taken care to insert in his history of Ali. The former Abd'allah seems to have been distinguished from the latter by the additional term, or cognomen, Al Ansâri, the Ansâr; as may be inferred from at least one of the oriental historians. Which observation had Mr. Ockley sufficiently attended to, as well as to what has been advanced in the point before us by Al Makin, he would not only have evinced, <sup>e</sup> but also rectified, M. D'Herbelot's mistake, much more to the satisfaction of his curious and intelligent readers <sup>p</sup>.

A Khârejite attempts to assassinate Moâwiyah;

A LITTLE after the battle of Nabarwan, or, as Eutychius will have it, Khorûzia, three of the Khârejites, that were extremely zealous for the advancement of their sect, happened to meet at Mecca; where they made frequent mention of those that were killed in that battle, magnified their own merit, and greatly lamented the loss of their companions. These three men, called Abd'alrahmân Ebn Meljem, Barak Ebn Abd'allah, and Amru Ebn Becr, said one to another, "If the three erroneous Imâms, Ali, Moâwiyah, and Amru Ebn Al As, were "dead, the affairs of the Moslems would soon be in a more flourishing condition; let us, "therefore, without hesitation, dispatch them." This being immediately agreed upon, <sup>f</sup> they pitched upon Friday, the day of the solemn assembly of the Moslems, the 17th of Ramadân, for the execution of their bloody design; and, having poisoned their swords, took all their respective routes. Barak Ebn Abd'allah, one of the assassins, being arrived at Damascus, struck Moâwiyah in the reins; but the wound did not prove mortal. However, the surgeon told him, that it would not be cured, unless he would either submit to be cauterized, or to drink a potion that would render him incapable of generation. He chose the latter of these, and, in consequence of that choice, had no other children besides those that were born to him before he received his wound. The assassin was instantly seized, discovered the conspiracy he had entered into, and had his hands and feet cut off; but was suffered to a live. However, afterwards marrying, it was thought unreasonable that he should enjoy the pleasures of a conjugal state, as he had rendered the Syrian Khalif incapable of these; and therefore one of Moawiyah's friends, tho' he had no order for this, killed him with his own hands <sup>1</sup>.

<sup>n</sup> ISM. ABU'LFED. ubi sup. D'HERBEL. Biblioth. orient. p. 93. AL MAKIN, ubi sup. p. 41. <sup>o</sup> D'HERBEL. & AL MAKIN. ubi sup. <sup>p</sup> Idem ibid. ISM. ABU'LFED. ubi sup. OCKLEY's hist. of the Sarac. vol. ii. p. 70.

AMRU EBN BECR, the second of the conspirators, went to Egypt, and appeared in the mosque, where Amru performed his devotions, on the 17th of the month of Ramadân. But fortunately for him, Amru being then troubled with a violent fit of the cholic, did not officiate that day in the mosque as Imâm. Wherefore, Kharijab, whom he appointed to perform the office for him, and who then actually supplied his place, being struck by the villain, who mistook him for Amru, fell down dead with the blow. As the assassin was led to execution, he said, without the least concern, I designed Amru; but God designed another. Abu'lfeda relates, that, when he was brought before Amru, he asked who that person was? Upon which, they told him Amru. "Whom then," said he, "have I killed?" They answered, Kharijab. Then Amru himself cried out to him, according to this historian, You meant Amru; but God meant Kharijab. This Kharijab, according to Al Makin, was the captain of Amru's guards. The same writer seems likewise to intimate, that Barak Ebn Abd'allah, the first assassin, was cut to pieces immediately after he had attempted to murder Moawiyah; notwithstanding what may have been advanced to the contrary by some other authors <sup>2</sup>.

THE third of the conspirators, Abd'alrahmân Ebn Meljem, who undertook to assassinate Ali <sup>as another does Amru Ebn Al As.</sup> met with better success, in the execution of his wicked design, than either of his profligate companions. Being arrived at Cûfa, he engaged a woman, whose nearest relations had been killed at the battle of Nabarwan, and who, for that reason, bore an implacable hatred to Ali, by marrying her, and the assistance of a dower, consisting of 3000 dirhems, a slave, a maid, and a promise of Ali's head, to enable him to perpetrate the horrid crime he had in view. To facilitate this, she joined to him two associates, called Werdân and Shabib by Abu'lfeda, who attended him into the mosque, where Ali officiated as Imâm, the 17th of the month of Ramadân. Here, whilst these three villains pretended to quarrel amongst themselves, Werdân struck at the Khalif with his sword, but missed him, and the blow fell upon the gate of the mosque. Then Abd'alrahmân Ebn Meljem gave him a blow on the head, just in the same place where he had received a wound before, at the battle of Ahzâb, or Asab, which was fought in Mohammed's time; and that stroke proved mortal. After which, the villain took to his heels, saying as he made off, By the lord of the Caaba, I have killed him. Of the assassins Shabib only escaped the punishment due to so atrocious a crime. For Werdân, having been seen with a sword in his hand lifted up against Ali, was pursued home by a Moslem, who killed him upon the spot; and Abd'alrahmân was seized, lurking in a corner, with his sword in his hand, and soon constrained, by a consciousness of his guilt, to own himself the murderer of Ali. The Khalif ordered his son Hasan to put him under arrest, to supply him with necessaries of every kind, and, if he died, to execute him at one stroke only. Hasan, according to the authors followed by M. D'Herbelot, probably some of the Persian historians, punctually observed what had been enjoined him by his father, who died either on the 19th, 20th, or 21st, of Ramadân, in the 60th year of the Hejra, or of CHRIST 660. With these, however, the Arab authors by no means agree. Abu Jaafar Al Tabari and Abu'lfeda relate this matter after a quite different manner. According to them, the hands and feet of the assassin were cut off, his eyes put out with a red hot iron, his tongue cut out, and then he was reduced to ashes. Others say, that he was first beheaded, and his body afterwards burnt. Here we must beg leave to observe, that the account given by Abu Jaafar and Abu'lfeda of this tragical affair seems to have the greatest appearance of truth on its side; since the enormity of the crime and the vindictive disposition of the Arabs render it highly probable, that, whatever orders Ali might give in his life-time to the contrary, the bloody villain Abd'alrahmân Ebn Meljem, for so execrable a fact as the assassination of the Khalif, would be put to a most cruel death. Abu Jaafar writes, that Ali said to the people about him, "If I recover, spare Abd'alrahmân; but if I die, send him after me, that I may have an immediate opportunity of accusing him before the divine tribunal." With regard to the place of his interment, authors are not perfectly agreed. Some say, he was buried opposite to the mosque in Cûfa; others in the royal palace there; and others, that his son Hasan deposited his remains by those of his wife Fâtema at Medina. But according to Ebn Al Athir and Abu'lfeda, he was buried in that place which is visited by the Moslems as his tomb at this day. The sepulchre of Ali was kept concealed during the reigns of the Khalifs of the family of Ommiyah, and discovered whilst one of those of the house of Abbâs sat upon the Moslem throne,

<sup>1</sup> AL MAKIN. & GREG. ABU'L FAR. ubi sup. D'HERBEL. in Ali. ABU JAAFAR, apud Al Makin, ubi sup. EUTYCH. ubi sup. p. 342, 343.

<sup>2</sup> ABU JAAFAR AL TABARI, AL MAKIN, & GREG. ABU'L FAR. ubi sup. ABU'LFED. & D'HERBEL. ubi sup.

throne. Adado'ddawla, the second prince or Soltân of the house of Bâiyab, who began to a reign at Baghdâd, in the year of the Hejra 366, or of CHRIST 976, under the Khalîf Al Tay' Ebn Al Moty', erected a superb monument on the spot where Ali was interred, which is called by the Persians Konbud Faïd Al Anwâr, that is, the dome of the distributor of lights and graces <sup>1</sup>.

The Christian writers say little of the Khalîfat of Ali.

It has been observed by some of the Moslem writers, that Ali, during the month in which he was killed, had several presages of his death; and that some words, when he was in private with his particular friends, to this effect escaped him. He was heard once to say, after he had suffered a good deal of inquietude, Alas! my heart, there is need of patience, as no remedy can be found out against death. In fine, on Friday, the 17th of Ramadân, early in the morning, when he set out for the mosque, it was remarked, that a large troop of b domestic birds made an uncommon noise, as he passed through his yard; and that, when one of his slaves threw a stick at them, to make them silent, he said, Let them alone, for their cries are only lamentations foreboding my death. He was assassinated by Abd'alrahmân Ebn Meljem Al Mazadi, in the month of Ramadân, in the 40th year of the Hejra; being then about 63, or, according to some 57, or lastly, as others will have it, 58 years of age. But, if we will believe Abu'lfeda, he was either 63, 56, or 59 years old, when he met with his tragical fate. The wound would not have been attended with any fatal consequences, had not the sword that gave it been poisoned; but the poison, soon diffusing itself over the whole mass of blood, rendered it mortal. He reigned about four years and nine, or, as others say, ten, months. The Christian historians take little notice of what happened during c his Khalîfat. One of them, however, observes, that in an engagement between him and Moâwiyah near the Euphrates, by which he must undoubtedly mean the battle of Seffein, the latter had the advantage; which, according to him, was owing to the want of water that Ali's troops laboured under, Moâwiyah having taken care to cut off all communication between them and the Euphrates. This single instance is a demonstrative proof, to omit an infinite number of others that occur, of the little light given by the Greek writers to the Arabic history, during the infancy of Islamism; and, of course, clearly shews how much we are obliged to the oriental historians for the assistance they afford us in compiling that history for this particular period. The Christian author here referred to calls Ali the prince of Persia, because, as we suppose, he was in some measure supported by the troops of Irâk, and d the Persian forces; and only in general insinuates, that he came to a violent death. Another Christian writer, of the Jacobite persuasion, only intimates, that a battle was fought by the Arabs engaged in a civil war, meaning that of Seffein, in the year of CHRIST 657, without informing us of the consequences of it, or communicating to us any particulars of that action; and that the Moslems were harassed during the space of five years after Othmân's death with intestine commotions. That author, by mistake, gives Ali the name of Abbâs, and says, that this prince was assassinated by his own subjects, whilst he was on his knees at prayers. He also intirely omits the Khalîfat of Hasan, Ali's son; which was, indeed, but of a very short and inconsiderable duration <sup>1</sup>.

Ali's person and character.

As to his person, Ali had a very red face, large eyes, a prominent belly, a large beard, e a hairy breast, a bald head, and a very swarthy complexion. He was rather short than middle-sized; of a youthful, florid, and frequently smiling, countenance. Some, however, write, that he had hair on his head, which was not very grey, but formed into curls. With regard to his disposition, this Khalîf, if we will believe the Moslem writers, had the fear of God constantly before his eyes, was extremely charitable, just, humble, and a strenuous defender of what they call the true religion. He was also very acute, learned, and extremely well versed in all useful arts and sciences. His bravery never failed him; nor was he more eminent and conspicuous for that than for his liberality and munificence, as well as that sweetness of temper which so remarkably distinguished him on all occasions. His secretaries were Abd'allah Ebn Rafi' and Sa'id Ebn Nemrân, of Hamadan; his principal f judge, Sharib Ebn Al Hâreth; the captain of his guards, Ma'kal Ebn Kisi Al Zubaji; and his chamberlain Basher, or, according to Eutychius, Kanbar, his servant. The inscription of his seal was, The kingdom belongs to the only the mighty God <sup>2</sup>.

His family.

ALI had in all nine wives; the first of which was Fâtema, the daughter of Mohammed, during whose life he married no other woman. He had by her three sons, Hasan, Hosein, and Mobassan; the last of which died in his infancy. His second wife was Omm Al Nebiyin, who bore him four children, Abd'allah, Abbâs, Othmân, and Jaasar, who were all killed at the battle of Kerbelah. Asmah, his third wife, was the mother of Yahya and Aîn; as

<sup>1</sup> ABU JAAFAR AL TABARI, AL MAKIN, ISM. ABU'LFED, & EBN AL ATHIR, ubi sup. EUTYCH. D'HERBEL. & GREG. ABU'L FAR, ubi sup. <sup>2</sup> D'HERBEL. Biblioth. orient. p. 94. ABU JAAFAR AL TABARI, AL MAKIN, ABU'LFED. EUTYCH. & GREG. ABU'L FAR. ubi sup. THEOPHAN. chronograph. p. 288. DIONYS. TELMARENS. apud Joseph. Simon. Asséman ubi sup. p. 107. <sup>3</sup> ABU JAAFAR AL TABARI, apud Al Makin, ubi sup. ut & ipse AL MAKIN, ibid. EUTYCH. ubi sup. p. 342—345.

- a Omm Habiba, was of Omar. His sixth wife, Khaulab, was the mother of Mohammed, surnamed Ebn Hanifyah, of whom a farther account will be given hereafter. The names of the other three wives have not been handed down to us by any of the oriental historians; though three more of his sons, Mohammed the second, Mohammed the younger, and Amru, have been mentioned by some of them. Besides which, there was another that has been passed over in silence by all the eastern writers. For, it clearly appears from some authors of good repute, that he had fifteen sons, five of whom only, Hasan, Hosein, Mohammed Ebn Hanifyah, Abbās, and Amru, left issue behind them. As for his daughters, who were no fewer than eighteen, we find no material particulars concerning them, preserved by the Arab historians. And let this suffice for an account of the family of Ali, which we could not prevail upon ourselves to omit here, as it will be of singular service to us hereafter, by enabling us to understand several passages of the Moslem historians; which, without it, would be almost, if not altogether, unintelligible<sup>w</sup>.

- A VAST number of the Moslems, and particularly all the Shiites, pretend, that Ali was the first who embraced their religion. Nay, some of them go so far as to assert, that he made profession of it in his mother's womb; and even hindered her, during her pregnancy, from prostrating herself before an idol she commonly worshipped. They also say, that his mother was delivered of him in the very temple of Mecca itself; which never happened to any one else. The name his mother gave him first was Kaid; but Mohammed changed it into Ali. The form of benediction added by the Moslems, when they name him, is, God glorify the face of him. Mohammed himself is reported to have said of him, Ali is for me, and I for him; he bears the same relation to me that Aaron did to Moses; I am the city in which all knowledge is shut up, and he is the gate of it. Several of the eastern writers have been very prolix in their accounts of the excellence and prerogatives of the house of Ali. One of them in particular, named Amūd, has produced a thousand pretended traditions of Mohammed concerning the excellence of this Khalīf, and in favour of the Shiites; who gave him a large sum of money for drawing up that composition<sup>x</sup>.

- THE Shiites are the opponents of the Khārejites, of whom we have already given our readers some account. Their name properly signifies seſtaries, or adherents, in general; but is particularly used to denote those of Ali Ebn Abu Tāleb; who maintain him to be lawful Khalīf and Imām, and that the supreme authority, both in spirituals and temporals, of right belongs to his descendants. They also teach, that the office of Imām is not a common thing, depending on the will of the vulgar, but a fundamental article of religion, that could not have been left by the prophet to the fancy of the common people. Nay, some of them, thence called Imāmians, have not scrupled to assert, that religion consists solely in the knowledge of the true Imām. The principal sects, or branches, of the Shiites are five, which are subdivided into an almost infinite number; so that some understand Mohammed's prophecy of the seventy odd sects of the Shiites only. But Ali himself, according to Ebn Al Athir, was of a different opinion; since, a little before the day of the camel, he assured his subjects, that the worst of the seventy-three sects into which the Moslems were to be divided, would be that which set him at nought, and refused to follow his example. The Kassabians, one of the five primary sects of the Shiites, entertain very extravagant sentiments in several points. They believe, that Ali was more than a man; and that this supreme pontiff and director of Islamism is still living. They also reckon the succession of the twelve Imāms of the posterity of Ali in a manner peculiar to themselves, and different from the computation observed by every other sect. The general opinions of the Shiites are, 1. That the peculiar designation of the Imām, and the testimonies of the Korān and Mohammed concerning him, are necessary points. 2. That the Imāms ought necessarily to keep themselves free from light sins, as well as those that are more grievous. 3. That every one ought publicly to declare who it is that he adheres to, and from whom he separates himself, by word, deed, and engagement; and that herein there should be not the least dissimulation. In this last point, however, the Zeidians, a sect of the Shiites, so named from Zeid, the great grandson of Ali, dissented from all the rest of the Moslems, whose tenets we are here considering. The great schism between the Sonnites, or Traditionists, that is, those of the Moslems who acknowledge the authority of the Sonna, or collection of moral traditions of the sayings and actions of Mohammed, and the Shiites, or partizans of Ali, still subsists, and is maintained on both sides with implacable hatred and most furious zeal at this very day. This most remarkable difference at first arose upon a political occasion, which commenced in the Khalīfat of Ali, as sufficiently appears from the preceding history of that reign; and was afterwards so well improved by additional circumstances, and the spirit of contradiction, that, at present, both parties detest and anathematize one another, as the most abominable of heretics, and even farther from the truth than either the Christians or the Jews. The chief points wherein they differ are, 1. The Shiites reject Abu Becr, Omar, and Othmán, the three first Khalifs, as usurpers and intruders; whereas the Sunnites acknowledge and respect them as rightful Imáms. 2. The Shiites prefer Ali to Mohammed, or, at least, esteem them both equal; but the Sunnites admit neither Ali, nor any of the prophets, to be equal to Mohammed. 3. The Sunnites charge the Shiites with corrupting the Korán, and neglecting its precepts; and the Shiites retort the same charge upon the Sunnites. 4. The Sunnites receive the Sonna, or book of traditions of their prophet, from whence they derive their name, as of canonical authority; whereas the Shiites reject it as apocryphal, and unworthy of credit. And to these disputes, and some others of less moment, is principally owing the antipathy which has so long reigned between the Turks, who are Sunnites, and the Persians, who are of the sect of Ali. Some authors maintain, that these last are subdivided into no less than seventy different branches, or smaller sects; all of which hold a metempsychosis, or transmigration of souls, and the Al Holúl, or descent of God upon his creatures, or the transmission of the spirit of sanctity from one person to another. The Khalifs of the house of Ommiyah likewise, and their successors, the Shiites consider in the same light as they do the three first Khalifs, Abu Becr, Omar, and Othmán. The Sunnites make use of the word Shiites, or Shii, and apply it to their adversaries, as a term of reproach, formed from Shiyah, denoting properly a scandalous reprobate sect. For, a sect that follows approved opinions is called by the Arabs Medheb. The partizans of Ali, therefore, stile themselves Adaliyah, which signifies the religion of them who follow justice and the right side; and stigmatize the Sunnites with the odious appellation of Shiites. At this day, the powerful kingdom of Persia, one half of the princes of the Uzbeks, whose dominions lie beyond the Jibán, or the Amú, the Oxus of the antients, and some Mohammedan kings of the Indies, are followers of Ali, and, amongst the other Mohammedans, go under the afore said opprobrious denomination *.

<sup>w</sup> ISM. ABU'LFED. EBN AL ATHIR, AL JANNAB. AL KODAI, AHMED EBN YUSEF, &c. Vide etiam D'HERBEL. ubi sup. p. 94, 95. <sup>x</sup> ISM. ABU'LFED. de vit. Mohammed. c. viii. p. 19, 20, & alib. AL EOKHARI, MOSLEM, &c. Vide etiam D'HEREEL. ubi sup. p. 95. & GAGN. la vie Mahom. tom. ii. p. 212.

The extravagant notions the Shiites entertain of Ali.

NOTWITHSTANDING the sepulchre of Ali is so well known to be near Cáísa, many of his followers believe him to be still alive; and affirm, that he shall come at the end of the world with Elias in the clouds, and fill the earth with piety and justice. Nay, several of his votaries have carried their veneration for him and his descendents so far, that they have transgressed all bounds of reason and decency; tho' some of them have been less extravagant than others. The Gholaïtes, who had their name from their excessive zeal for their Imáms, were so highly transported therewith, that they raised them above the degree of created beings, and attributed divine properties to them; transgressing in both extremes, by deifying of mortal men, and by making God corporeal: for one while they assimilated one of their Imáms to God, which was sinning in excess; and another while they made God to resemble a creature, which may be considered as a sin in defect, and is consequently placed in the opposite extreme. The sects of these are various, and have various appellations assigned them in different countries. Abd'allah Ebn Saba, who had been a Jew, and had asserted the same thing of Joshua the son of Nun, was the ring-leader of one of them. This man gave the following salutation to Ali, viz. Thou art Ikou, i. e. Thou art God. And another, named Alabâ Ebn Darâ Al Hafâdi, preferred Ali to Mohammed; pretending that the latter was sent by the former to call all men to him; but that, being an impostor, he called them to himself. Some of the Shiites assert, that the angel Gabriel, by mistake, took Mohammed for Ali, being deceived by the resemblance they bore to each other; those two prophets having been as like one another as are two crows; whence it came to pass, that they were called Gorabites, or the Corvine sect. The Gholaïtes above-mentioned were divided into several classes or branches; some maintaining the divinity, or something like it, of Ali, and others of some one of his descendents. By the Al Holúl hinted at above, according to Al Shab-restâni, they mean that God is present in every place, speaks with every tongue, and appears in some individual person: whence several of them have asserted their Imáms to be prophets, and at length gods. The Nosairians and the Ishâkians taught, that spiritual substances appear in grosser bodies; and that the angels and the devil have appeared in this manner. They also assert, that God hath appeared in the form of certain men; and since, after Mohammed, there hath been no man more excellent than Ali, and, after him, his sons have excelled all other men, that God hath appeared in their form, spoken with their tongue, and made use of their hands; for which reason, say they, we attribute divinity to them. And, in support of these blasphemies, they tell several miraculous things of Ali; as his moving the gates of Khaibar, which they urge as a plain proof that he was endued with a particle of divinity, * AL SHAHRESTAN. apud Pocockium, in not. ad spec. hist. Arab. p. 261, 262, 263, ut & ipse Poc. ibid. GREG. ABU'L FAR. in hist. dynast. p. 169. EBN AL ATHIR, ubi sup. D'HÉREL. Biblioth. orient. art. Schiab. RYCAUT's state of the Ottoman empire, b. ii. c. 10, 12. CHARD. voy. de Perse, tom. ii. p. 169, 170, &c. GOLII not. ad Alfragan. p. 181, 182. See also OCKLEY's hist. of the Sarac. vol. ii. p. 30, 33.

- a and with sovereign power, and that he was the person in whose form God appeared, with whose hands he created all things, and with whose tongue he published his commands; wherefore, say they, he was in being before the creation of heaven and earth. In so impious a manner do they seem to wrest those things which are said in Scripture of CHRIST, by applying them to Ali. These extravagant fancies of the Shiites, however, in making their Imâms partake of the divine nature, and the impiety of some of those Imâms in laying claim thereto, are so far from being peculiar to this sect, that most of the other Mohammedan sects are tainted with the same madness; there being found many amongst them, and amongst the Sîffis especially, who pretend to be nearly related to heaven, and who boast of strange revelations before the credulous people. We must not forget to observe here, that, amongst
- b the descendents of Ali, there was one Mohammed, for whom one branch of the Shiites, ever since his death, have expressed a most particular regard and veneration. They are so firmly persuaded of the certainty of his second advent at the end of the world, that this notion is received amongst them as an article of faith, and he is deemed guilty of infidelity, who entertains the least doubt about so indubitable a point. Some of the Shiites believe, that there has been an interruption of the series of their Imâms, who are known by the name of Al Wakefians; though others contend for the uninterrupted succession of those Imâms, and maintain, that there shall never be one of them wanting to supply the place of their great prophet Ali: nay, several of them affirm, that there may be two lawful Imâms in different parts of the world at the same time, and even admit of the validity of all their decisions,
- c how opposite and contradictory soever<sup>z</sup>.

WE have already observed, that Ali, on account of his superior bravery, was sometimes *Ali's sur-*denominated by the Arabs the valorous lion of God; to which we shall now beg leave to names.

add, that they frequently gave him the appellation likewise of Al Haider, or Al Haidara, which also denotes a lion in the Arabic language. The former of which appellations, the valorous lion of God, or the lion of God, was applied to persons remarkable for their valour by the Hebrews themselves, as may be inferred from Scripture. This ought to be considered as a proof of the great affinity between the proverbial expressions, as well as idioms, of the Hebrew and Arabic tongues, to omit an infinite number of similar instances that might be produced and viewed in the same light. But this point is so clear, that it

- d will not be disputed by any one who is at all acquainted with the spirit and genius of those languages (the latter of which is undoubtedly the daughter, or descendent, of the former) as well as the history of the nations to which they belong. The Arabs have also conferred upon Ali the surnames, or honourable titles, of Wâsi, legatee, or heir, that is, of Mohammed, and Mortada, or Mortadi, which signifies beloved by, or acceptable to, God. The latter of which surnames corrupted, as has been observed by Mr. Ockley, some European travellers have prefixed to his name, and absurdly called him Mortis Ali. The Shii, who are his followers, or rather adorers, often denominate him Faid Al Anwâr, the distributor of lights and graces; and in Persian, Shâh Mordman, the king of men, and Shîr Khoda, the lion of God; which last seems to be a sort of translation of the first Arabic title here mentioned, that is
- e undoubtedly of Hebrew extraction<sup>a</sup>.

BUT notwithstanding the fulsom, or rather impious, eulogies bestowed on Ali and his Ali and his family, they were cursed publicly, and excommunicated, in all the mosques of the empire, family cursed during the reigns of the Khalîfs of the house of Ommiyah, from the accession of Moâwiyah by the Khalîfs to the time of Omar Ebn Abd'alaziz, who suppressed that solemn malediction. Several of the house of Khalîfs likewise of the family of Abbâs expressed a great aversion both to him and his posterity; such were Al Mo'taded and Al Motawakkel, to whom he is reported to have appeared in their sleep, and threatened them with his indignation. On the contrary, the Fâtemite Khalîfs of Egypt ordered his name to be added to that of Mohammed in the publication of the times of prayer, which the Muedhabins, or criers, made from the minârets, or steeples,

- f of their mosques. The oriental writers mention several apparitions of Ali, after his death, and particularly those that happened in the days of the Khalîfs Al Mo'tasem, Al Mo'taded, Al Motawakkel, and Al Kader; in the last of which Ali seemed to be of an extraordinary stature, told Al Kader he should soon be advanced to the Khalîfat, and recommended the care of his posterity to him<sup>b</sup>.

AFTER what has been said, it cannot appear wonderful, that Ali's wisdom should be so *The pieces aj-*celebrated amongst all the Mohammedans. There is extant of his a Centiloquium, or an *hun-*cribed to Ali.

<sup>z</sup> AL SHAHRESTAN. apud Pocockium, ubi sup. ut & ipse Pocock. ibid. ISM. ABU'LFED. in his. gen. cap. de gent. Moslem. five Mohammedan. LODOVIC. MARRACC. prodr. par. iii. p. 80, &c. GREG. ABU'L FAR. ubi sup. ISM. ABU'LFED. de vit. Moham. c. xlv. p. 90. ABU RAFE', apud Abu'lfed. ibid. AL SHAHREST. & POC. ubi sup. p. 266, 267. AL GHAZAL. apud Pocockium, ibid. p. 267—269. Vide etiam D'HERBEL. Bibl. orient. p. 96, 786, &c.

<sup>a</sup> ISM. ABU'LFED. ubi sup. D'HERBEL. ubi sup. p. 94. JOAN. GAGN. not. ad ISM. ABU'LFED. de vit. Moham. c. xlv. p. 90. <sup>z</sup> SAM. xxiii. 20. VAL. SCHIND. Lex. Pentaglot. p. 117. Hanov. 1612.

<sup>b</sup> AL MAKIN & GREG. ABU'L FAR. pass. D'HERBEL. Bibl. orient. pass.

dred sentences, which have been translated into Turkish and Persian out of the Arabic; as likewise a collection of verses under the title of Anwair Al Okail men ashar waqf al rejil, which is to be met with in the French king's library. We have in the Bodleian library at Oxford a large book of his sentences, or maxims; an English translation of which has been annexed to his history of the Saracens by the learned Mr. Ockley. But the most celebrated piece of all is intitled Jefr we Fame. It is written upon parchment in mysterious characters intermixed with figures, wherein are couched all the grand events that are to happen from the beginning of Islamism to the end of the world. This parchment is deposited in the hands of those of his family, and even to this time nobody has decyphered it in any manner but Jaafar Sadek. For, as to the intire explication of it, that is reserved for the twelfth Imâm, who is surnamed, by way of excellence, Al Mohdi, or the grand director <sup>c</sup>.

Some of his sentences and maxims

BESIDES the books above-mentioned, several sentences and apophthegms, under the name of Ali, occur in the oriental writers. The author of Rabi Al Akyar quotes this, which is one of the most striking and instructive: If a man would be rich without means, powerful without subjects, and subject with a master; let him depart from sin, and serve God, and he will find these three things. One of his captains having one day asked him, with impudence enough, what was the reason that the reigns of Abu Becr and Omar, his predecessors, were so peaceable, and that of Othman and his own so full of troubles? the Khalif answered, with great acuteness and sagacity, in the following terms: "The reason is plain. It is because Othmân and I served Abu Becr and Omar, during their reigns; and Othmân and I found no body to serve us but you, and such as are like you" <sup>b</sup>.

THERE is in the book Rabi Al Akyar likewise another of Ali's maxims, which is extremely remarkable, and diametrically opposite to the conduct of those who so highly value themselves upon account of their being his followers: "Take care," said he, "never to separate yourselves from the society of the other Moslems. For, he that separates himself from them belongs to the devil, as the sheep that leave the flock appertain to the wolf. Give no quarter, therefore, to him who marches under the standard of schism, though he wears my turbant on his head; since he carries along with him the infallible mark of a man that walketh wrong." It has been remarked by M. D'Herbelot, that the sectaries who entertain such elevated sentiments of Ali have not only a turbant of a particular form, but likewise that they twist their hair in a different manner from that of the rest of the Moslems. The family of Ali is divided into several branches; the principal of which is formed by the descendents of Hosein, the second son of that Khalif; as this branch continues the lineal descent of the twelve Imâms. Nevertheless, the family of Hasan, his eldest son, who succeeded his father in the Khalifat, has produced several persons, who have made a considerable figure, and even occasioned insurrections in different provinces of the empire, under the government of the Khalifs both of the house of Ommiyah and Al Abbâs. From the former of these branches, and not the latter of them, as M. D'Herbelot has been pleased to assert, sprung Mohammed, who was proclaimed Khalif at Medina in the year of the Hegra 145, and who assumed the title of Al Mohdi, or Mahadi, that is, the supreme, or general, director of the Moslems. This new Khalif, who was the great grandson of Hosein, had a brother called Ibrahim, who caused Irâk, and a great part of Persia, to revolt at the same time from the Khalif Abu Jaafar Al Mansûr. But the movements occasioned in the empire by these two princes were not of any long continuance; they having both been soon defeated by that Khalif's nephew, who sent their heads to his uncle, who was then building the city of Baghdâd. Al Mansûr having received advice of that victory, which restored peace to his dominions, took occasion from thence to honour his new city with the title, or surname, of Dar al Salâm, that is, the house, or habitation, of peace <sup>c</sup>.

Another of his sayings.

BESIDES the aforesaid maxims, or sentences, attributed to Ali, we find the following passage ascribed to him by Hosein Waez, in his paraphrase and commentary upon the Korân: "God has given men two Imâms, that is to say, two pontiffs, or mediators, between him and them. The first is the prophet, who is gone, and is no more amongst them. The second, which remains, and always shall continue with them, is the prayer that they make to obtain pardon of their sins" <sup>d</sup>.

The descendents of Ali occasion some disturbances in the empire.

THERE was another great grandson of Hosein, notwithstanding what has been advanced to the contrary by M. D'Herbelot, besides that above-mentioned, who began to make a noise in the Khalifat of Harûn Al Rashîd, named Tahya Ebn Ad'allah; but he was soon rendered incapable of executing any seditious designs. This ill success, however, did not hinder others of Ali's descendents, in successive periods of time, from making themselves masters of several provinces; as of Mazanderân, in the Khalifat of Al Mestain and Al Motadel, of Kermân, in the times of the princes of the family of Seljûk, of part of Kberasân and Taba- <sup>e</sup>

<sup>c</sup> D'HERBEL. Bibl. orient. in art. Ali, p. 95. OCKLEY'S hist. of the Sarac vol i<sup>e</sup> p. 84—87.

<sup>d</sup> D'HERBEL. & OCKLEY, ubi sup. <sup>e</sup> D'HERBEL. Biblioth. orient. p. 95, 96. AL MAKIN & GREG. ABU'L FAR. pass.

<sup>f</sup> HOSEIN WAEZ, apud D'Herbel. ubi sup. p. 95. ut & ipse D'HERBEL. ibid.

- a rifân, in the days of the Sultâns of Khowerzân, of Yaman and Cûfa, and, in fine, of a great part of the provinces conquered by the Moslems in Africa. The Khalifat being afterwards transferred from the house of Omniyab to that of Al Abbâs, which was nearly related to Ali, as being descended from their common ancestor Hâshem, the Khalifs of the former family were excommunicated in their turn, in the same solemn manner that Moâwiyab had excommunicated Ali and his family, in all the mosques within his jurisdiction. Abmed, the third son of Al Bâiyab, surnamed Meczo'ddawla, having made himself master of Baghdâd, and consequently of the person of the Khalif Al Mestakfi, of the house of Abbâs, did not content himself with cursing and anathematizing publicly the family of Omniyab by word of mouth, but he likewise ordered the malediction to be engraved in large characters upon the gates of all the mosques; together with the principal causes of that fulmination. These were, 1. Because Moâwiyab and his family had deprived Ali's descendents of the territory of Fiddk, which Mohammed had given his daughter Fâtéma as a dower, when he married her to Ali. 2. Because the members of that family would not suffer Hasan to be buried near the remains of his grandfather Mohammed. 3. Because the house of Omniyab had excluded Abbâs, from whom the Khalifs of his family deduced their origin, from the number of those who were rendered capable of aspiring to the Khalifat after the death of Omar. The same Abmed had so high a regard for the memory of Ali, that he once intended to transfer the Khalifat of Baghdâd from the branch of the house of Ali, or rather of Hejsem, that then reigned, to his lineal descendents; though this design, however sanguine that prince might be in the formation of it, was never carried into execution<sup>g</sup>.

- Thus have we finished our history of the Khalifat of Ali, and given our readers a fuller and more perfect account of the memorable transactions of that great prince's reign than is to be met with in any other author. And if we have been a little more prolix than usual in our description of the principal events that happened during the short interval he sat upon the Moslem throne, as well as of the principal tenets, and fate of his followers, even to the present time; this, we flatter ourselves, will not only be excused by, but even prove acceptable to, our curious readers; as it contains in it so very considerable a part of the Arab history, and renders much more intelligible what is hereafter to follow. Besides, it would have been unpardonable in us, and so deemed by all our judicious and intelligent readers, to have been in any respect deficient in our relation of the glorious exploits of Ali, who was certainly by much the most considerable person, after Mohammed, that ever was born in the peninsula of the Arabs. Nay, with regard to his courage, temper, and understanding, he seems to have been at least equal, if not superior, to the Moslem prophet himself; and consequently from those who paid so great a deference to Mohammed's decisions, he ought to have met with a better fate<sup>h</sup>.

<sup>g</sup> AL MAKIN, GREG. ABU'L FAR. & D'HERBEL. in Biblioth. orient. pass. in art. Ali. OCKLEY's introduct. to his hist. of the Sarac. vol. ii. p. xxxviii. and his hist. of the Sarac. vol. ii. p. 89.

S E C T. V.

- c THE poison communicated to the mass of blood by Abd'alrahmân Ebn Meljem Al Mazadi's sword having rendered the wound received by Ali from that assassin mortal, his friends desired him to nominate a successor before his death. But he told them, that, with regard to this affair, he would follow the example of the apostle of God, who left the election to the people. However, his son Hasan, inheriting his father's piety, though not his courage, and being greatly esteemed on Ali's account, was advanced to the Khalifat, without any scruple or debate. In the public harangue that, as eldest son, he made to the people, immediately after his father was dead, he expressed his sense of the late Khalif's assassination, as well as his superior merit, in the following remarkable terms: "You have killed," said he, "a man on the same night in which the Korân came down from heaven, in which Isa ascended into heaven, and in which Joshua, the son of Nun, was slain. None of his predecessors excelled him, nor will any of his successors be ever equal to him." At his inauguration, which soon after followed, Kais addressed himself to him in this form: "Stretch out your hand, as a token that you will adhere to the book of God, as well as the collection of apostolic traditions, and make war against all their opposers." Hasan answered, "Very willingly, as the book of God, and the traditions of his apostle, will always stand their ground." The principal of his other subjects then approaching, he insisted upon their being obedient to him, at peace with his friends, and at war with his enemies. The last of which articles by no means pleased the troops of Irâk, who, being greatly fatigued with the Syrian war, had flattered themselves with the hopes of enjoying the sweets of a durable peace, after the new Khalif had mounted the Moslem throne<sup>i</sup>.

<sup>i</sup> FEN AL ATHIR, ubi sup. EUTYCH. ubi sup. IEM. ABU'LFED. in hist. univ. MS. Pocock. in Bibl. Bodl. Oxon.

A rupture apprehended between Hasan and Moâwiyah.

BUT it was soon perceived, that, notwithstanding a sort of treaty had been precipitately struck up between Ali and Moâwiyah, a little before the violent death of the former, such measures were pursued by the latter, as must in a short time infallibly disturb the public repose. That prince kept on foot a powerful army, with which he threatened to make an irruption into Irâk. He looked with an evil eye upon Hasan, both before and after his father's death; and even refused to recognize his authority after his accession. Nay, he assigned as a reason for this, that Hasan had been an accomplice in the murder of Othmân; which was a plain indication of his hostile intentions, as a greater affront than that could not have been offered him<sup>k</sup>.

Hasan offers to resign the Khalifat to Moâwiyah;

IN the mean time, Hasan was pressed by those about him to come to an open rupture with Moâwiyah; though he was of a most pacific disposition, looked upon the effusion of Moslem blood with the greatest horror, and consequently was by no means qualified for such an undertaking. However, he was at last prevailed upon, contrary to his inclination, to declare war against Moâwiyah, and even to begin his march for the invasion of that prince's territories. As Ali had left behind him a well-disciplined army, consisting of 60,000 men, who had entered into an engagement to support him, and his pretensions, to the last drop of their blood; Hasan was persuaded to carry on the war with vigour, and to exert himself in the prosecution of it. Before the new Khalif, therefore, began his march, he sent Kais Ebn Saad towards the frontiers with a body of 12,000 men; of which Moâwiyah receiving advice, he advanced to Mosken, a place in the neighbourhood and district of Cûfa, where he took post with all his forces. But, before his arrival there, he sent Basbar, or Basbar, Ebn Artab with a strong detachment to reconnoitre the enemy, and give him intelligence of their motions. Basbar happening to meet with the troops commanded by Kais Ebn Saad, a brisk dispute ensued between them; but which side had the advantage, we are not informed by any of the Arab historians. Soon after the end of the action, Hasan, with the army he led against Moâwiyah, reached Al Madâyen; but had scarce entered that place, when a spirit of mutiny, excited by the sudden murder of one of his men, inflamed the troops, and had like to have proved fatal to him. He was not only, without any regard to his distinction, thrown from his seat, but likewise wounded by some of the soldiery. Nay, upon his retiring into the castle of Al Madâyen, in order to avoid a more tragical fate, the governor's nephew solicited his uncle to deliver him up into the hands of Moâwiyah. To this the governor turned a deaf ear, and even rejected the proposal made by his nephew with indignation. However, Hasan, finding himself deserted by the troops of Irâk, perceiving the other part of the army wavering in their fidelity to him, and being sufficiently frightened by the disturbance that had lately happened, wrote a letter to Moâwiyah, offering, upon certain terms, to resign the Khalifat to him<sup>l</sup>.

and actually resigns it.

BEFORE the letter was sent away, his brother Hosein did his utmost to divert him from the resolution he seemed too precipitately to have taken; representing to him, that nothing could be a more severe reflection upon his father's memory than such an unseasonable and ill-timed abdication. But Hasan being well apprized of Moâwiyah's courage and activity on one side, and of the perfidious disposition of the forces drawn from Irâk on the other, was determined to persist in his former resolution. Nay, according to some authors, he had before rendered himself incapable of departing from it, by making a similar proposal to Moâwiyah before the last action between Basbar Ebn Artab and Kais Ebn Saad, or Kais Ebn Said, and the disturbance that had happened at Al Madâyen. In answer to which, as we find intimated by the same authors, Moâwiyah had sent him a carte blanche, or a full and unlimited power to prescribe what terms he should think fit; assuring him of an absolute compliance with them. This paper, however, according to what has been suggested by them, seems not to have reached Hasan till he had sent his second letter; which induced him to desire an interview with Moâwiyah; wherein he insisted upon more advantageous conditions than those he had formerly demanded. But with these Moâwiyah refused to comply; alledging, that it would be dishonourable in Hasan to deviate from his own terms. However, at last a treaty was signed by them both, which consisted of the following articles. First, Hasan shall receive all the money in the treasury at Cûfa. Secondly, Moâwiyah shall assign him the revenue arising from Daraljerd, a district of considerable extent in Persia. Thirdly, He shall never reflect upon the late Khalif in the presence of Hasan. Fourthly, He shall grant a pardon and amnesty to all those who adhered to Ali; and, after his death, to Hasan, in the former troubles that so distracted the Moslems. Fifthly, in consideration of these concessions, Hasan shall renounce all pretensions to the Khalifat, and consequently henceforth recognize the authority of Moâwiyah, as supreme director of the Moslems, and emperor of the faithful. The money found in the treasury at Cûfa amounted to 5,000,000 g a dirbêms; but this never came into Hasan's hands, as will hereafter more fully appear. Abu'l Faraj relates, that the effusion of blood in the engagement between Basbar and Kais, which struck him with horror, first disposed Hasan to an accommodation; which manifestly implies, that, on both sides, many men must have been killed in that action. It has been observed by Al Makin, that Hasan and Moâwiyah had an interview at Masken, in the 41st year of the Hejra, a little before the conclusion of the aforesaid treaty <sup>m</sup>.

<sup>k</sup> ISM. ABU'LFED. ubi sup. <sup>l</sup> ISM. ABU'LFED. & EBN AL ATHIR, ubi sup. ABU JAAFAR AL TABARI, apud Al Makin, in hist. Saracen. lib. i. c. vi. p. 44. ut & ipse AL MAKIN, ibid. GREG. ABU'LFAR. in hist. dynast. p. 191, 192.

FROM Masken, which seems to have been the scene of the late negotiation, Hasan and Moâwiyah, after they had settled the terms of the pacification, set out in company for Cûfa; <sup>Hasan retires to Medina.</sup> into which they made their public entry together, in a very amicable manner. Upon their arrival there, Moâwiyah commanded Hasan, by Amru Ebn Al As's advice, to notify to the people in a speech his abdication; which he did in such terms as seemed to presage a new revolution. This so exasperated Moâwiyah, that he ordered Hasan instantly to sit down, and severely reprimanded Amru for the advice he had given him. Nay, some authors say, that he was never afterwards thoroughly reconciled to that general. Be that as it will, as such a public speech from Hasan was altogether superfluous, it seemed to indicate a great want of judgment and discretion in Moâwiyah to require this of him, especially as he might have been sensible that it would furnish an unhappy man with an opportunity of lashing him who had been the source of all his misfortunes. Before his departure from Cûfa, Hasan accused publicly the people of Irâk of his father's murder, of several insults offered to his person, and of plundering him of his lawful effects. The last crime he laid to their charge, their conduct after the conclusion of the late treaty proved them to be guilty of; for tho', by one of the articles of that treaty, the public money at Cûfa ought to have been deposited in his hands, Moâwiyah could not prevail upon the inhabitants of that city, the capital of the Arab Irâk, to put him in possession of it, by any motive whatsoever. However, in order to compensate the loss Hasan sustained on this occasion, Moâwiyah, whose ambition had been so fully gratified, assigned him an annual pension of 150,000 dinârs, and made him several presents of very considerable value. Being thus reduced to the condition of a private person, he and his brother Hosein retired to Medina, where he spent the remainder of his days. Most of his vast revenue he disposed of in acts of charity; and was so little attached to the things of this world, that he twice stripped himself of all he had, and thrice divided half of his substance amongst the poor. Notwithstanding his abdication, the Persians affirm, that he was Khalîf and Imâm to the day of his death. They also, as well as the other followers of Ali, maintain, that he and his two sons were the three first lawful Imâms <sup>n</sup>.

AL MAKIN observes, that the first day of Hasan's Khalîfat was Monday, and the last Fri- <sup>He reigns only day; as also that he reigned six months and five days; but, according to Abu'l Faraj, he sat upon the throne five months only. His father's last secretary continued in his post during the short Khalîfat of Hasan; whose symbol, or motto, on his seal was, There is no God but God, the true and manifest king. Sharîh Ebn Al Hâreth, who had been Ali's principal judge, served his son Hasan also in the same capacity. After the conclusion of the late treaty, Hasan immediately ceded Cûfa to Moâwiyah, who, with his former competitor, made his public entry into that city on the 26th day of the former Rabî, or, as others will have it, on the same day of the former Jomâda, in the 41st year of the Hejra. That Masken, the place where Hasan and Moâwiyah had had an interview before that entry, was about a station distant from Cûfa, we may infer from Abu'l Faraj <sup>o</sup>.</sup>

UPON Hasan's arrival at Medina, some of his friends there greatly censured his conduct; <sup>He declines the which nevertheless has always been urged by the Shiites as a demonstrative proof of the excellence of his disposition, and his tenderness for the people over whom, by their unanimous suffrages, he was appointed to preside. The reasons he himself assigned for his conduct on this occasion were, that he was tired of the world, and that the Cûfans were so faith-</sup> <sup>command of a body of troops.</sup> less, perfidious, and mischievous a people, that it would be impossible for him ever to meet with any assistance from them. Which character of them was extremely just, tho' afterwards they seemed to be touched with remorse for their traiterous behaviour to him. For, when he first entertained thoughts of a resignation, and told them, that "he was their commander and chief, of their prophet's family, from which all pollution had been removed, and which God had purified," they all burst out into tears, and wept so loud, that every one of them might have been heard to sob. They also shed many tears at his final departure from Cûfa, after he had come to a fixed resolution to make Medina the place of his residence. Nor did that restless people fail giving some disturbance to his successor Moâwiyah; tho' we do not find, that this was attended with any fatal effects.

<sup>m</sup> ABU JAAFAR AL TABARI & AL MAKIN, ubi sup. GREG. ABU'L FAR. ubi sup. p. 192. ISM. ABU'L-FED. ubi sup. <sup>n</sup> Ibidem ibid. GOLII not. ad Alfragan. p. 119, 123. KHONDEMIR, D'HERBEL. Biblioth.

orient in art. Hassan. MSS. Huntingt. num. 495. in Bibl. Bodl. Oxon. <sup>o</sup> ABU JAAFAR AL TABARI, AL MAKIN, & GREG. ABU'L FAR. ubi sup. D'HERBEL. bibl. Orient. p. 434.

For, the Khárejites, not long after Hasan's arrival at Medina, made an insurrection against Moáwiyah, who thereupon desired him to lead an army against them. But Hasan declined the command of the army offered him, telling the Khalif, that, had he had a military genius, he should have exercised it against him, and not have taken leave of public affairs. Moáwiyah probably offered him that command, with a view of shortening his days; since it is certain he conceived an aversion to him, on account of the foregoing speech, which, in all likelihood, was never afterwards thoroughly obliterated or effaced<sup>a</sup>.

He is poisoned in the year of the Hejra 49.

HASAN enjoyed the sweets of a private life about eight years after his abdication, and died at Medina in the 49th year of the Hejra, coincident with the year of our LORD 669. He was poisoned by his wife Jaadab, according to Hafedh Abru, who had been bribed by Moáwiyah with large presents to perpetrate that execrable crime. We are told by a very learned author, extremely well versed in oriental history, that, by an article of the foregoing treaty, Moáwiyah engaged himself not to nominate a successor during the life of Hasan; but to leave him the power of chusing a certain number of persons, in whose hands the election of a new Khalif was to be lodged, as had formerly been done by Omar. But Moáwiyah having afterwards an inclination to leave the Khalifat to his son Yezid, and not finding this practicable without the death of Hasan; in order to gratify his inclination, he prevailed upon Jaadab, by valuable presents, and by promising her his son Yezid in marriage, to put a period to her husband's days. This she did, by rubbing him with a poisoned linen cloth, that had been sent her by Moáwiyah for that purpose, which was the immediate cause of his death. Of which Moáwiyah being apprized, he remitted her a sum of 500,000 dirhems, as a reward for her villainy; but took care to keep far enough from her embraces his son Yezid. Hasan was born in the third year of the Hejra, and died when he was about 47 lunar years of age. When he was at the point of death, his physician told his brother Hosein, that his bowels were consumed with poison. This greatly affected Hosein, who begged Hasan to impart to him the name of the murderer, which it seems he knew, that he might take vengeance of him for so barbarous an action. But this Hasan refused to do, saying, "O brother! the life of this world is made up of nights that vanish away. Let him alone, till he and I meet before the divine tribunal, where he will certainly have justice done him." Some authors relate, that Jaadab was clear of the horrid fact laid here to her charge; and that certain of his servants, at the instigation of Moáwiyah, found means to dispatch him. Be that as it will, it is universally agreed, that Moáwiyah was the principal agent in this tragical affair, and had the chief hand in effecting his destruction. Hasan was born in the middle of the month of Ramadán, and died either in the former Rabí, or Safar. Those who assert his wife to be innocent relate, that he had a poisonous draught given him by one of his servants, at the request, or rather command, of Moáwiyah, which almost instantly destroyed him. Hasan was of a very mild, humane, beneficent, and pious disposition; and deserved a much better fate. From the year of the Hejra, in which this prince was born, it appears pretty plainly, that his father Ali must have been at least sixty-three years of age at the time of his death, in agreement with what we find advanced by some good authors; and therefore could not have been then so young as others have made him. Hasan performed five-and-twenty journies on foot, according to Al Makin, though he had horses attending him in all those peregrinations<sup>a</sup>.

Some remarkable particulars relating to him and his family.

AMONGST other traditions concerning this Khalif, current in all places where Islamism prevails, there is one that has been handed down to succeeding generations, containing several remarkable particulars of him. According to this, he was extremely like his grandfather Mohammed, who, as soon as he was born, spat in his mouth, and named him Hasan. That pretended prophet frequently expressed his fondness of this favourite child, says the same tradition, in a very disagreeable manner. When he was officiating in the mosque, little Hasan would sometimes clamber up to him; when, in order to please the boy, he would designedly prolong the prayers. Nay, sometimes in the midst of a discourse to the people, if he saw Hasan and Hosein approaching him, he would come down, embrace them, and take them up with him into the pulpit; and, after making an apology for his conduct on that occasion, proceed in his harangue. This could not but greatly endear Hasan to all the Arabs, who had any real regard or veneration for the memory of Mohammed. Nor is it to be doubted but he would have firmly seated himself upon the Moslem throne, had he been a man versed in military affairs; since the Syrians only set up Moáwiyah, because there was none to oppose them. We are told by an anonymous Arab writer, that, according to a tradition of Sefinah, the apostle's freed-man, Mohammed said, "The Khalifat shall continue after me thirty years, and then shall commence a kingdom." From whence he inferred, that, as Mohammed's death preceded Hasan's abdication just thirty years, their

<sup>a</sup> MSS. Huntingt. num. 495. in Bibl. Bodl. Oxon. GREG. ARV'L. FAR. ubi sup. p. 193. <sup>a</sup> HAFEDH ABRU, apud D'Herbel. ubi sup. p. 434. AL MAKIN, ubi sup. p. 47. EBN AL ATHIR, OCKLEY'S hist. of the Sarac. vol. ii. p. 97—101.

a apostle was a true prophet, and Hasan his rightful successor. Al Bokbâri also relates, that Mohammed, one day looking earnestly on little Hasan, then with him in the pulpit, broke out into the following prophetic exclamation: "O people! by means of this son of mine, the " LORD GOD shall unite two great contending parties of the Moslems." No wonder then that Hasan should still be reckoned, even by a vast number of the Sunnites themselves, so illustrious an Imâm. He had in all twenty children; fifteen of whom were sons, and five daughters. The Persians maintain, that the succession of Imâms passed from Hasan to his younger brother Hosein. It may not be amiss to observe here, that Hosein, one of the descendants of Hasan, revolted in the Khalîfat of Al Hadi Ebn Al Mohdi, according to M. D'Herbelot, and caused himself to be proclaimed Khalîf at Medina, in the year of the Hejra

b 169. But of this our readers may expect a full and particular account in its proper place<sup>r</sup>.

ANS EBN MALEC reports, that a woman having once made him a present of a bunch of fine herbs, he asked, whether she was a free-woman, or a slave? To which she replied, a slave; but that nevertheless the herbs she had presented him with were rare and curious. Upon which, he gave her her liberty, and said to those about him, "We have been " instructed by God himself to give to those that make us presents something more valuable " than what they bring us." By which he intimated, that this moral instruction was contained in the Korân; which the Moslems are taught to receive as the word of God. This may be considered as an instance of that generous and munificent disposition for which he has been celebrated by some of the Arab historians<sup>s</sup>.

c IT has also been related of this Khalîf, that a slave having once thrown a dish of broth boiling hot, as he sat at table, upon him, and, fearing his resentment, immediately fell on his knees, and repeated these words: "Paradise is for those who bridle their anger." Hasan answered, "I am not angry." The slave proceeded; "and for those who forgive men." "I forgive you," said Hasan. The slave, however, finished the verse; adding, "for God " loveth the beneficent. " Since it is so," said Hasan, "I give you your liberty, and four " hundred pieces of silver." A noble instance this of moderation and generosity<sup>t</sup>!

THE following sentence of Hasan has been quoted by some of the Moslems. "The tears " which are let fall through devotion should not be wiped off, nor the water which remains " upon the body after legal ablution; because this water makes the face of the faithful

d " shine, when they present themselves before God." In fine, the beneficent actions, and moral maxims, of this pious Imâm are considered almost in the same light, by a great number of the Moslems, as even those of his father Ali and the prophet Mohammed himself<sup>u</sup>.

SOME of the Shiites, in opposition to the body of the Persian nation, deduce the line, or descent, of the Imâms from Abd'allah, one of Hasan's sons, or rather from his son Yahya, and not from the descendants of Hosein. Tho' Hasan's wives were all extremely fond of him, yet he frequently divorced them, and married new ones. As Hasan and Hosein were the sons of Fâtema, they were looked upon as the children of Mohammed himself, who in all respects ever treated them as such<sup>w</sup>.

e THOUGH Hasan, in his will, desired to be buried near his grandfather Mohammed, and therein left directions for that purpose; yet, as this was opposed by Said, the governor of Medina, Merwân Ebn Al Hakem, and all the grandees of the house of Ommiyah then in that place, Ayesha, in whose house the body of the prophet lay interred, would not suffer his remains to be deposited there. This gave great disgust to all the members of Ali's family; so that the animosities between them and the house of Ommiyah rose to a greater height than ever. According to some authors, therefore, he was inhumed in the common burying-place, called Al Baki, at Medina. Others say, his body was placed in his mother Fatema's tomb; and, lastly, others relate, that it was buried at Yanbo, a town on the sea Al Kolzom, at no very great distance from Medina, without handing down to us any account of the circumstances attending that event<sup>x</sup>.

<sup>r</sup> MSS. Hunt. in Bibl. Bodl. Oxon. ubi sup. D'HERBEL. ubi sup. p. 414, 415, 434. KHONDEMIR, AL MAKIN, GREG. ABU'L FAR. &c.

<sup>s</sup> ANS EBN MALEC, apud D'Herbelot. ubi sup. ABU JAAFAR AL TABAR. & AL MAKIN, ubi sup. p. 47.

<sup>t</sup> Aut. RAEI AL AKYAR, apud D'Herbel. ubi sup. ut & ipse D'HERBEL. ibid.

<sup>u</sup> D'HERBEL. ubi sup. p. 435.

<sup>w</sup> KHONDEMIR, D'HERBEL. ubi sup. p. 435.

<sup>x</sup> EBN AL ATHIR, D'HERBEL. ubi sup. ABU JAAFAR AL TABAR. & AL MAKIN, ubi sup. ABU'LFED. in descript. Arab. p. 45. Oxon. 1712.

S E C T. VI.

a BY Hasan's resignation of the Khalîfat, and the cession he made of the territories over which he presided, Moâwiyah became sole and supreme emperor of the Moslems. Hosein, indeed, Ali's second son, possessed the hearts of the people; but Moâwiyah, who was a man of steady conduct and great abilities, had the army at his devotion. He was the son of Abu Sofiân, who was one of the principal persons of the tribe of Kereish, and commanded the forces of that tribe both at the battles of Bedr and Obod; in the latter of which he was victorious over the Moslems. His courage, riches, and great capacity, rendered him the most conspicuous person of his tribe; so that Mohammed met with vast opposition from him in the execution of his designs. After the action of Obod, as one of the commentators on the Korân pretends, the Meccans were afflicted, at the prayer of the prophet, with so terrible a famine, that they were obliged to feed upon dogs, carrion, burnt bones, and a sort of miserable food made of blood and camel's hair, called ilbiz, which the Arabs never used to eat but in times of extreme scarcity. At this sorrowful juncture, Abu Sofiân expostulated with Mohammed in the following terms: "Tell me, I adjure thee by God and the relation that is between us, dost thou think thou art sent as a mercy unto all creatures; since thou hast slain the fathers with the sword, and the children with hunger." This discovered a fixed and settled aversion at that time in this noble Arab to Mohammed and his followers; notwithstanding which, he found himself obliged to submit to that impostor, and embrace Islamism, in order to save himself and his family from immediate destruction, after the reduction of Mecca. Moâwiyah and his wife declared their assent to the two fundamental articles of the Moslem creed, the same day that their father Abu Sofiân made profession of the Mohammedan faith. Abu Sofiân, after his conversion, begged three things of Mohammed; that he would appoint him commander in chief of all his forces that were to act against the infidels; that he would make his son Moâwiyah his secretary, and marry his second daughter Gazab. The two first of which petitions he readily granted, but refused to comply with the third. Our curious readers will not be displeased to find here the substance of the prophet's prayer mentioned above, which was conceived in the following terms: "O God, set thy foot strongly upon Modâr," an ancestor of the Koreish, "and give them years like the years of Joseph." Whereupon, as the commentator here referred to intimates, the aforesaid dreadful famine immediately ensued <sup>a</sup>.

The Khârejites rebel.

SOON after Moâwiyah had assumed the government, the Khârejites took the field against him with a considerable army. The Khalîf first made application to Hasan, to march against them with a body of Arabs; but that prince refusing to undertake such an expedition, he sent the Syrian troops to reduce the rebels to his obedience. These soon brought the Khârejites to a general action; but they were defeated with considerable loss, and the rebels remained masters of the field of battle. The Cûfans, however, who were much better troops than the Syrians, being prevailed upon to take up arms, soon extinguished the rebellion, and settled Moâwiyah more firmly than ever upon the Moslem throne. We find this pernicious sect of the Khârejites called Charurgites by Theophanes, who just touches upon the rebellion mentioned here. He also denominates the Hâshemites, or family of Hâshem, Isamites, and the people of Irâk, Heracites, or Herakites; but has handed down to us very few particulars relating to them. This Khalîf had been an officer twenty years under Omar and Othmân, and had greatly distinguished himself in several expeditions. He was inaugurated in the month of the former Rabi, and the forty-first year of the Hejra. Soon after Hasan's abdication, he constituted Al Mogheirak Ebn Shaaba governor of Cûfa, Abd'allah Ebn Amer of Basra and Khorasân, Merwân Ebn Al Hakem of Medina, and Abd'allah Ebn Hazem of Damascus, where, immediately after his departure from Cûfa, he fixed his residence. He also appointed again this year, that is, the 41st year of the Hejra, according to Al Makîn, Amru Ebn Al As, who had adhered to him with so much fidelity, lieutenant, or viceroy, of Egypt <sup>b</sup>.

Moâwiyah secures Ziyâd in his interest.

BUT notwithstanding the success Moâwiyah had hitherto met with, Ziyâd, his brother by the father's side, tho' a bastard, refused a recognition of his authority. Ziyâd was made governor of Persia in the Khalîfat of Ali, as has been already observed; and discharged his duty in that post with great reputation to himself, and advantage to the people. He was magnanimous and brave, and of an exceeding good capacity; tho' Abu Sofiân durst not own him for fear of Omar. He was born in the very year of the Hejra, and, by his eloquence and great abilities, so distinguished himself, that, at a meeting of the COMPANIONS in Omar's reign, Amru Ebn Al As publickly declared, that, had he been of the tribe of Koreish, he would have driven all the Arabs before him with his walking-stick. In Omar's time, he had been made a Kâdi, or judge; and Al Mogheirak, for incontinency, had been brought before him; but either out of favour, or because the witnesses failed in point of proof, he dismissed the person accused, and ordered the witnesses to be scourged severely. This could not but greatly indear him to Al Mogheirak, who, from that moment contracted a most intimate acquaintance and cordial friendship with him. When Hasan resigned the Khalîfat to Moâwiyah, Ziyâd was lieutenant of Persia, and resided in that quality at Istakbra, <sup>c</sup>

<sup>a</sup> MS. Hunt. ubi sup. ISM. ABU'LFED. de vit. Moham. c. xxvii. p. 56—51. c. xxxi. p. 64—66. & c. li. p. 102—108. AL BEIDAWI. <sup>b</sup> EBN AL ATHIR, GREG. ABU'L FAR. ubi sup. p. 193. ABU JAAFAR AL TABARI, apud Al Makîn, ubi sup. p. 46. ut & ipse AL MAKÎN, ibid. THEOPHAN. chronograph. p. 289. EUTYCH. annal. tom. ii. p. 344, 345.

- a or Eftakbr. Here he had erected a very strong citadel, for his farther security, which he made the place of his habitation. Moâwiyah fearing lest he should join the house of Hâshem, and by that junction give him no small disturbance, owned him publicly for his brother; thinking this might be a means of bringing him over to his interest. In order likewise to facilitate the execution of his scheme, he procured the assistance of Al Mogbeirah Ebn Shaaba, his governor of Cûfa; who made so good a use of his friendship with Ziyâd, that at last he prevailed upon him to take the oath of allegiance to Moâwiyah. The Khalîf, in return, by the testimony of the Greek slave, still living, on whose wife Abu Sofiân, being heated with wine, before the publication of the Korân, had begotten Ziyâd, proved his bastard brother to be the real son of Abu Sofiân, and consequently a member of the tribe
- b of Koreish. This testimony was so decisive, that it amounted to a full eviction of the point to be proved, and of course demonstrated, that Ziyâd was most nearly related to the Khalîf. However, this was the first time that the Korân was openly violated in a judicial way of proceeding. For, by the decision of that book, the child belonged to the Greek, as its legal father, who had married its mother; since, according to this decision, which had been left by Mohammed as a direction in all such cases, the child was adjudged to the blankets, and the whore to the stone; that is, the child was to be brought up, and the whore to be stoned. This conduct, therefore, of the Khalîf gave great disgust to his family, as a bastard had been thereby introduced into it, and his father's memory severely reflected upon. But this gave no manner of uneasiness to Moâwiyah; as, by bringing his scheme to bear, he had
- c secured intirely in his interest the greatest man of the age. This important affair was thus happily terminated in the 42d year of the Hejra, according to Al Makîn, and not the 44th, as we find asserted by Mr. Ockley; who does not only oppose the aforesaid author, but is likewise inconsistent with himself in what he has advanced on this occasion <sup>a</sup>.

THE 43d year of the Hejra was remarkable for the death of the famous Amru Ebn Al As, Amru Ebn Al As and Abd'allah Ebn Salâm dis. of whom Mohammed is reported to have said, There is no truer a Moslem, nor any one more stedfast in the faith, than Amru. He was justly esteemed one of the greatest men amongst the Arabs of the age in which he lived, as standing distinguished from almost all his countrymen by his quick apprehension, his solid judgment, his undaunted courage, his singular resolution, as well as his most profound sagacity and penetration. He was always excellent in d his advice, sure and fixed in his resolves, and speedy in their execution. He was made lieutenant of Egypt, which he conquered in the Khalîfat of Omar, and was continued by Othmân four years in that post. Being afterwards dismissed by the last Khalîf from that high office, he retired into Palestine, where he lived a private life. After Othmân's death, at Moâwiyah's invitation, he entered into his service, and was, indeed, his principal support. That Khalîf sent him once more into Egypt, in the quality of lieutenant of that rich and fertile country; the whole revenue of which he allowed him, upon condition that he kept on foot a body of troops sufficient for its defence. We are told by an oriental author, that, before he embraced Islamism, he wrote some satirical pieces upon Mohammed; and that some of his proverbs and poetry are still extant. The dying speech he made to his children is said to be masculine and pathetic. In it he laments that he ever exercised his wit in exposing the prophet. This year likewise died Abd'allah Ebn Salâm, a Jew, very intimate with Mohammed, and an early convert to his religion. One of the Koreish lent him once 1200 ounces of gold, which he very punctually paid at the time appointed; and to this honest action a passage of the Korân is supposed to allude. He was believed by some to have assisted Mohammed in the compiling his pretended revelations; which if we admit, it is no wonder he should be so commended for his knowledge and faith in the Korân. After the death of Amru, Moâwiyah made his brother Atba Ebn Abu Sofiân, governor of Egypt, who died the following year. Okba Ebn Amer succeeded him, and was removed from his post in the year of the Hejra 45. After him came Moseilama Ebn Mokballed of Medina, who

f exercised the function of lieutenant of Egypt till the death of Moâwiyah. Amru died on the festival of Al Fatar, and his son Abd'allah prayed over him at the place of his interment. About this time, Moâwiyah proscribed and exercised great cruelties upon the followers of Ali, as we learn from Abu'l Faraj <sup>b</sup>.

MOAWIYAH being informed, that the territory of Basra was infested with robbers to such a degree, that the people there could not follow their lawful occupations; and that this was chiefly occasioned by Abd'allah's ill-judged lenity, who would bring none of them to condign punishment; he sent Al Hâreth to preside over the Basrans in Abd'allah's room,

The Khalîf makes Ziyâd governor of Basra, Cûfa, Sijistân, India, Bahrein, and Ammân.

<sup>a</sup> ABU JAAFAR AL TABARI & AL MAKIN, ubi sup. ISM. ABU'LFED. univers. hist. vol. i. MS. Pocock. in Bibl. Bodl. Oxon. GOLII not. ad Alfragan. p. 113. OCKLEY's hist. of the Saracen. vol. ii. p. 112—116.

<sup>b</sup> ABU JAAFAR AL TABAR. & AL MAKIN, ubi sup. p. 47. MS. Hunt. in Bibl. Bodl. Oxon. ubi sup. AL BEIDAWI, JALLALO'DDIN, RICHARDI confutat. legis Saracenicæ, c. 13. JOH. ANDREAS, de confus. secta Mohammedanæ, c. 2. PRID. life of Mahom. p. 33, 34. AL KOR. MOHAM. f. iii, iv. xvi. GREG. ABU'L FAR. ubi sup. OCKLEY, ubi sup. p. 110—112.

and

and commanded him positively to put an end to all those disorders. But this Hareth not a being able to effect, Ziyâd was dispatched to Basra, to extirpate the gang of banditti that so harassed the inhabitants of that place and the neighbouring district. When Ziyâd first came thither, he found such violences, and even murders, committed in the night-time there, that it was not safe to walk in the streets after sun-set. Having, therefore, convened the principal citizens, he expressed his abhorrence of those disorders that so disturbed the public repose in very severe terms; declaring, at the same time, his firm resolution to put an end to them. As he was the best orator of the age, except Ali, and the more he spoke the more he excelled, his speech made a deep impression upon the minds of all that heard it; and, to enforce what he there advanced with the greater spirit, he published an order, forbidding any person of what quality soever to appear in the streets, or in any public b place, after the hour of evening-prayer, upon pain of death. To have this order punctually executed, he appointed parties of soldiers to patrol, and commanded them to put to the sword all that they should meet with out of their houses after that hour. This regulation produced an exceeding good effect. For, tho' the first night 200 persons were killed, the second night only five were slain, and the third none at all. In fine, by the prudent, as well as vigorous, measures taken on this occasion, the public tranquillity was restored; which so pleased Moâwiyah, that he annexed the lieutenancy of Khorasân, Sijistân, India, Babrein, and Ammân, to Ziyâd's government. The very name of Ziyâd made all the villains within his jurisdiction tremble; tho' he was by no means of a cruel or barbarous disposition. However, as he ruled with the strictest justice, and obliged all men to pay a proper c regard to his authority, the profligate part of the Khalîf's subjects in those parts stood in great awe of him. He was sent to Basra, according to Al Makin, in the 43d year of the Hejra; which renders it probable that he was constituted governor of Khorasân, Sejestân, Sejistan, or Sijistân, India, Babrein, and Ammân, the following year. Nor can it well be doubted but that peace and harmony reigned in all those countries at least the remaining part of that year e.

Hakem Ebn
Amer and Zeid Ebn
Thabet die.

In the 45th year of the Hejra, Ziyâd sent Hakem Ebn Amer with a body of troops to possess himself of a fortress situated on mount Asbal. Hakem executed his orders with such success, that he killed a great number of the enemy, seized the place, and brought off with him all the riches he found in it. Ziyâd receiving advice of this, dispatched a courier to d him, to demand the white and the yellow, that is, the silver and the gold, which had fallen into his hands, by virtue of a letter he had received from the Khalîf; commanding him to send this, in order to have it deposited in the treasury for public use. But Hakem refused to comply with this demand; intimating to Ziyâd, at the same time, that an injunction of the Korân, which had settled the distribution of the spoil in such a manner as rendered his compliance unlawful, was superior in point of authority to any of the Khalîf's letters. He, therefore, took out the fifth part of the spoil, declared by the Korân to belong to God, to the apostle, his kindred, the orphans, the poor, and the traveller, and divided the rest amongst the captors. After which, as he expected to fall a sacrifice to the Khalîf's resentment, for adhering so closely to the text of the Korân, he said, "O God! if I be in thy favour, take e "me." Which request, says a Moslem writer, was granted, and he soon after died. This year was likewise fatal to Zeid Ebn Thabet, one of Mohammed's secretaries, when he dictated the Korân, who departed this life in it. He wrote the copy which was used by the Khalîfs, or Imâms, at the command of Othmân Ebn Affân, that remained many years after, and was written in an exceeding fair hand. Zeid was a man of surprising parts. He learned Hebrew so well in fifteen days, as to be able to read the books of the Jews with great facility. Persic he also learned of one of Khosrû's ambassadors, in eighteen days; as likewise Ethiopic, Greek, and Coptic, of one of Mohammed's slaves, in a very short time. He was extremely pleasant and facetious at home, but very reserved abroad. We are told by an Arab author, that, at the battle of the ditch, he was fifteen years old. One of his remarkable f sentences was, He that pays not a proper regard to men will not reverence God. In the year we are now upon, Merwân Ebn Al Hakem, the governor of Medina, performed the pilgrimage to Mecca. We must not forget to observe, that, according to Mr. Ockley's writers, Ziyâd was appointed lieutenant of Basra by Moâwiyah, in the 45th year of the Hejra; nor that this is confirmed by the concurrent testimony of Abu Jaafar Al Tabari a.

Remarkable events that happened in the 46th year of the Hejra.

THE following year, Moâwiyah bribed a Christian slave to poison Abd'alrahmân, the son of the famous Khâled Ebn Al Walid, who was become extremely popular amongst the soldiers, both on his father's account and his own, being himself a person of distinguished merit; which not a little excited the jealousy of the Khalîf. Abd'alrahmân had just before made an

a ISM. ABU'LFED. ubi sup. D'HERBEL. biblioth. Orient. in art. Ziyâd. KHONDAMIR, MS. Hunt. ubi sup. in Bibl. Bodl. Oxon. ABU JAAFAR AL TABAR. & AL MAKIN, ubi sup. GOLII not. ad Aliragan. p. 110, 111, & alib. d MS. Hunt. ubi sup. AL KOR. MOHAM. f. viii. SALE's prelim. dis. p. 144, 145. OCKLEY, ubi sup. p. 116. ABU JAAFAR AL TABAR. & AL MAKIN, ubi sup.

- a incursion into the imperial territories, where, notwithstanding the Greek garisons left to defend them, he committed dreadful depredations; laying waste almost whole provinces, without opposition. The slave was prevailed upon to perpetrate this villainy, by a promise Moâwiyah made him, not only to remit his tribute, but likewise to confer upon him the government of Hems. However, he did not long enjoy the fruits of his wickedness, having been soon cut off by Abd'alrahmân's son, Khâled; who was imprisoned for this by the Khalîf, but afterwards released on paying the money for expiation demanded in all such cases. This year was also remarkable for the execution of Hejer, a person of singular piety and austerity of life, but a great friend to Ali, and consequently an avowed enemy to the house of Ommiyah. He was not afraid several times to affront Ziyâd, nor even to curse him
- b to his face; which induced that governor, who resided six months of the year at Cûfa, where Hejer had his habitation, and the other six at Basra, to press the Khalîf to put him to death, lest, during the time of his absence, he should raise at Cûfa some commotions. Moâwiyah, therefore, especially as he had not scrupled likewise to speak reproachfully of him, sent an order for his execution; which was performed at Gadrah, or Gadarah, a village near Damascus, where Hejer behaved with surprizing intrepidity and resolution. After his head was struck off, his body was washed, and buried in the chains that had been fastened upon it before his death, in pursuance of the directions he had given. Several of his accomplices also suffered with him. These executions not a little displeased Ayesha, who had interceded for Hejer and his companions in vain, and who did not fail to upbraid Moâwiyah with the
- c cruelty he discovered on this occasion, the next time she saw him at Medina. In the mean time, according to Abu'l Faraj, one Sapor, who had seized Armenia, sent an embassador to Moâwiyah, named Serji, or Sergius, to desire his assistance against the Greeks. Another embassador likewise came at the same time from the Greek emperor, called Andrew, who was a eunuch, and one of that prince's particular favourites, in order to hinder Moâwiyah from sending any succours to the rebel Sapor. Moâwiyah did not seem strongly disposed to listen to either of them; but only in general told them, that, as both their masters were enemies to him, he would grant his protection to that prince who would pay him the most for it. Upon which, Andrew retired, and had the next day another audience of the Khalîf, whom he found in conference with Sergius, his antagonist. As the latter did not rise from his seat,
- d when Andrew made his appearance, the Greek embassador took great offence at his conduct, and gave him some very opprobrious language for it; which the other returned, by reproaching him with the loss of his virility. This so incensed Andrew, that he threatened him with the infliction of a certain punishment that should occasion a similar defect in him. After which, begging the Khalîf again not to assist Sapor, that prince answered him in the following terms: "Give us the whole revenue of your dominions, and we will permit you
- e "to be called the lords of them; which if you refuse, we will drive you out of them."
- "Then," replied Andrew, "you look upon the Arabs as the substance, and the Greeks as
- "the shadow only; we must, therefore, implore the assistance of the Lord of heaven and
- "earth." Then, after having obtained an audience of leave, he returned home, by the
- e way of Malatia, the Melitene of Ptolemy, which some place in Cappadocia, and others in Armenia; acquainting the imperial governors, or prefects, posted on the frontiers, with the affront he had received from Sergius, whom he begged them to intercept in his passage through the emperor's territories. This they did, carried him to Malatia, castrated him there, and then dismissed him with his testicles hung about his neck. Moâwiyah Ebn Amer and Bashar Ebn Artab greatly extended the Moslem conquests in Africa this present year, penetrating to the very heart of Africa Propria, or the territory of Carthage, and the spot on which the city of Kairwân stood. The forces commanded by those generals in this expedition, consisting of about 10,000 men, reduced Karan, or Karana, Cafsa, and several other towns. When they came to the spot above-mentioned, they found that a town had
- f been erected there by Moâwiyah Ebn Khodhaj, which, according to Abu Jaafar Al Tabari and Al Makîn, by no means pleased them. We are told by a very learned author, that the city of Kairwân was either built, repaired, or enlarged, by Okba Ebn Nafe', who formed a settlement upon this spot immediately after Amru Ebn Al As had conquered Barka. The same author also relates, that the Khalîf Moâwiyah ordered a proper garison to be left at Kairwân, which stood about 33 parasangs of Carthage, and 12 of the sea, in order to secure the country from the insults of the Roman and Sicilian fleets, to keep the perfidious Africans in awe, and to have a place of safety in which he might deposite the prodigious treasures he had amassed. Some of the writers followed by Golius affirm, that the Moslems carried their arms as far as the borders of Nigritia this campaign; which may not be very remote
- g from truth: but that the conquests here mentioned were made in the 40th year of the Hejra, as Golius seems to believe, or rather positively asserts, we must not admit; since certain Arab historians of good repute, who place this expedition in the 46th year of that æra, will not a permit us to give our assent to such an opinion <sup>c</sup>.

Nothing very remarkable happens in the year of the Hejra 47.

THE next year, being the 47th year of the Hejra, we meet with scarce any thing remarkable performed by the Khalif Moâwiyah; except we will allow, that he first harangued the people this year from the pulpit in a sitting posture, to which he was obliged by the prominence of his belly, and the great quantity of fat he carried about with him; and that he began this year to preach before he said prayers, fearing that the people would otherwise retire out of the mosque before he had delivered all that he had to say to them. As the introduction of these two customs may be considered as a variation from the practice of all his predecessors, it has been looked upon as a remarkable event, and seems to have been placed in the 47th year of the Hejra by Abu'l Faraj. About this time also Basbar, one of Moâwiyah's commanders, as we learn from Theophanes, made several dreadful incursions into the Christian territories, plundering and laying waste all the country through which he moved <sup>f</sup>.

The Arabs besiege Constantinople in vain.

ABOUT the latter end of the following year, Moâwiyah sent his son Yezid with a powerful army to besiege Constantinople. The Arab authors have transmitted down to us no account of the particulars of that siege; but only mention three or four of the most eminent of the COMPANIONS, whose zeal, notwithstanding their great age, prompted them to attend the army on this occasion, and to sustain incredible fatigues. The Moslem forces suffered extremely in their march; but they were animated to surmount all difficulties by a famous tradition; according to which, the prophet, in his life-time, declared, that <sup>c</sup> “the sins of the first army which should take the city of Cæsar were forgiven.” According to Theophanes, this army, when on its march, was joined by a body of Arab troops, under the command of one Fadal, or Fadl, an Arab general, sent by Moâwiyah to the assistance of Sapor, who came to an untimely death. After which event, Fadl had been reduced to great straits, out of which he was happily delivered by the forces under the conduct of Yezid. After this junction, Yezid marched to Chalcedon, where for some time he remained, and consequently kept Constantinople in a manner blocked up; tho' it does not appear from Theophanes, notwithstanding what has been advanced to the contrary by the Moslem historians, that he ever formed the siege of that city. After a short stay in the neighbourhood of Chalcedon, the Moslem army decamped, and took its rout through Phrygia, on its return home, <sup>d</sup> with a considerable number of prisoners. In their passage, the Arabs possessed themselves of Amorium, a city of Phrygia, in which they left a garison of 5000 men. In this expedition, the famous Abu Ayub, who had been with Mohammed at the battles of Bedr and Obod, lost his life. His tomb is held in such veneration amongst the Moslems, that the Soltâns of the Othmân family gird their swords on at it, upon their accession to the throne. A detachment of the imperial forces retook Amorium the following winter, when all the neighbouring tract was covered with snow, by surprize, and put all the Arab garison they found therein to the sword <sup>e</sup>.

The death of Hasan.

THE 49th year of the Hejra produced no remarkable event, an account of which has been handed down to us by the Moslem historians, except the death of Hasan, the last Khalif, who was poisoned in the manner already related. Moâwiyah is said to have insulted his ashes in an indecent manner; which occasioned some verses to be written upon him by one, who seems not to have been a friend of the house of Ommiyah. These verses, or rather some few of them, have been preserved by Abu Jaafar Al Tabari <sup>h</sup>.

Yezid declared Moâwiyah's successor.

THE next year Al Mogheirah died of the plague, which made great havock there, at Cûsa. He was the governor of that city at the time of his death, a very active man, of quick parts, and had lost one of his eyes at the battle of Termouk; tho' some pretend, that this loss was occasioned by viewing an eclipse. According to Abu'lfeda, the new city of Kairwân was pretty near finished this year, though the last hand was not put to it till the 55th year of the Hejra. Some authors affirm, that the Arabs considered it as the capital of Africa Propria, or the territory of Carthage; and that it stood upon the spot which had been formerly occupied by the antient Cyrene. We have a confused and indistinct account of this city given us by Mr. Ockley, that does not sufficiently correspond with what has been related of it by the authors to whom he refers his readers. Kairwân afterwards became very eminent not only for its stately buildings and immense wealth, but likewise for the study of the sciences and polite literature, which flourished there. This year also Moâwiyah <sup>f</sup>

<sup>c</sup> MS. HUNT. ISM. ABU'LFED. ubi sup. EBN AL ATHIR, GREG. ABU'L FAR. ubi sup. p. 193, 194. ABU JAAFAR AL TABAR. et AL MAKIN, ubi sup. GOLII not. ad Alfragan. p. 162—164, 264—269, et alib. D'HEREBEL. Biblioth. orient. in art. Moawiah, p. 587. THEOPHAN. chronograph. p. 289. <sup>f</sup> GREG. ABU'L FAR. ubi sup. p. 194. THEOPHAN. ubi sup. p. 289, 290. <sup>h</sup> EBN AL ATHIR, MS. HUNT. D'HERBEL. Biblioth. orient. in art. Moawiah, p. 587. THEOPHAN. ubi sup. p. 291, 292. GEORG. CEDREN. historiar. compend. p. 436. <sup>h</sup> ABU JAAFAR, AL TABAR. apud Al Makin, ubi sup. p. 47, 48. ut et ipse AL MAKIN, ibid.

a prevailed upon many of the Moslems to take the oath of allegiance to his son Yezid, as his partner, or colleague, in the Khalifat; but neither Abd'alrahmán Ebn Abu Becr, Hosein Ebn Ali, Abd'allah Ebn Omar Ebn Al Khattáb, nor Abd'allah Ebn Zobair Ebn Al Awám, would concur with the other principal Arabs in this particular. About this time died Rabiya, one of the earliest converts to Islamism, who, according to Mohammed, resembled more than any of his countrymen the angel Gabriel<sup>1</sup>.

THE following year, being the 51st year of the Hejra, Saad Ebn Zend, the last of those who had a positive promise of paradise from Mohammed, departed this life. About the same time, Moâwiyah, who then resided at Damascus, not thinking it proper, that the pulpit and walking-stick of the prophet should remain in the hands of the murderers of Othmán, gave orders to have them both carried from Medina. But the moment some of the Arabs, in obedience to the Khalif's commands, were upon the point of removing them, to their great astonishment and surprize, there happened such an eclipse of the sun, that the stars themselves very clearly appeared. This threw them into the utmost consternation, as it seemed to them a manifest indication of the divine displeasure, for their presuming to lay hands upon the apostle's pulpit, in order to remove it from the place where he himself had ordered it to be fixed. Being, therefore, extremely frighten'd at so unusual, and, as they apprehended, so supernatural, an event, they immediately desisted from carrying the Khalif's design into execution. Nay, it made so deep an impression upon their minds, that it was not forgotten some years afterwards, when the Khalif Abd'almalec had the same design in view. One of the citizens of Medina, in order to divert him from it, then represented to him, that a prodigy had happened on a similar occasion in the reign of Moâwiyah; and that a tradition, derived from Mohammed himself, pronounced such an attempt highly criminal: upon which, that prince laid aside all thoughts of executing any part of the scheme he had formed. After him, Al Walid, in his pilgrimage, meditated the removal of the prophet's pulpit from Medina; but the people of that city discovering a great reluctance to put it into the hands of the messenger he sent for it; telling him, that "his master, " by removing it, would expose himself to the divine displeasure;" he permitted it to remain in its former situation. Amru Ebn Abd'alaziz afterwards proposed the attempt Moâwiyah, Abd'almálec, and Al Walid, intended to have made, to Solimán Ebn Abd'almálec, when he came in pilgrimage that way; but neither would he give his consent that the pulpit should be taken from the spot on which it had been first erected. Moâwiyah's intention in the point above-mentioned, or rather his discovery of that intention, has been placed by Ebn Al Athir some where near the 51st, or the 52d year of the Hejra; but as a remarkable solar eclipse is said to have happened in the 54th year of this æra, it may perhaps, with greater propriety, be ranked amongst the principal events of that year<sup>2</sup>.

THO' the authors followed by Mr. Ockley place Yezid's expedition to Constantinople, or rather Chalcedon, in the 48th year of the Hejra, as has been already observed; yet it was not in reality undertaken till four years after, if we will believe Abu Jaafar Al Tabari. According to that historian, Abu Ayub, who either was killed, or died a natural death, whilst the Moslem army remained in the neighbourhood of Constantinople, was buried at the foot of the wall of that city. He had distinguished himself in Mohammed's life-time against those who endeavoured to obstruct the progress of Islamism, and was one of the most celebrated of the

When the expedition to Constantinople was undertaken.

COMPANIONS<sup>3</sup>.
IN the 53d year of the Hejra, the famous Ziyád, who makes so considerable a figure in the Arab history, departed this life; being at his death about fifty-three years of age. He died of the plague on the third day of the month of Ramadán. A little before he was seized by the fatal distemper that put a period to his days, he informed the Khalif, that he had intirely reduced Irák to a state of subjection to him, and begged that he might have the lieutenancy of Arabia Petrea conferred upon him; which was immediately granted. The Arabs of that country, being apprized of this, were struck with great terror and consternation, as knowing with what rigour and severity he had governed the people of Irák. Upon the first news of it, Ebn Amer, attended by a vast number of the people, went to the temple of Mecca, and with great fervency and devotion, begged, that God would never permit him to come amongst them. In the mean time, Ziyád being seized with the plague, felt such an intolerable pain in one of his hands, that he consulted a Kâdi, as a spiritual director, whether he might not cut it off, without being guilty of any crime; but received for answer from him, that such an action was absolutely unlawful. However, notwithstanding this decision, the pain increasing to such a degree as rendered it insupportable, he came to a resolution to submit to amputation; tho', at the sight of the fire and the cauterizing irons, that were to be made use of in the operation, his heart immediately failed him. We are told <sup>a</sup> by a Moslem author of good repute, that, at this time, Ziyâd had an hundred and fifty physicians about him; three of whom had formerly belonged to Khoṣrû, the son of Hormuz, king of Persia; but as the time of his death was coming on, or, to make use of our author's words, the decree was sealed, and the thing determined, they found it impossible to save him. He was buried near Cûsa, by which place he passed in his journey to Arabia, whither he was going, in order to take possession of his new government there. When Abd'allah Ebn Amer heard of his death, he is reported to have said, "Go thy way, thou son of Somyah; this world did not stay with thee, neither hast thou attained to the other." In order to understand which sentence more perfectly, it will be proper to observe, that Somyah was the name of the Greek slave's wife, on whose body Abu Sofiân was supposed to <sup>b</sup> have begotten Ziyâd; and that Abd'allah Ebn Amer was the person Ziyâd succeeded in the government of Basra <sup>m</sup>.

Ziyád dies.

<sup>1</sup> MS. HUNT. ISM. ABU'LFED. in hist. univ. GOLII not. ad Alfragan. p. 162, 163, 164. EBN AL ATHIR, ABU JAAFAR AL TABAR. et AL MAKIN, ubi sup. p. 48. <sup>2</sup> ISM. ABU'LFED. ubi sup. EBN AL ATHIR, ABU JAAFAR AL TABAR. OCKLEY'S hist. of the Saracens, vol. ii. p. 130—132. <sup>3</sup> ABU JAAFAR AL TABAR. et AL MAKIN, ubi sup. p. 48.

Some account of him.

UPON Ziyâd's first arrival at Cûsa, the lieutenancy of which place was annexed in his favour to that of Basra, as has been already observed, he told the Cûsans, that at first he proposed to have brought with him a body of 2000 men, as his guards; but that afterwards considering that they were honest men, he had taken care only to be attended by his own family. This did not hinder them from throwing dust, or rather gravel, at him. Upon which, he ordered his domestics to secure the doors of the mosque where the people of the city were assembled, and commanded every man there to seize his neighbour. Then he had the persons seized brought before him, and as many of them as would purge themselves by oath of the late insult that had been offered him, he immediately dismissed; but ordered the hands of all the others, who amounted to about eighty, to be cut off upon the spot. Soon after which, he issued an order, injoining all the citizens of Cûsa to leave their doors open all night; engaging himself to indemnify every particular person for any loss he should sustain by complying with it. No theft, or robbery, was committed after the introduction of this custom; but some cattle one night finding their way into a shop, did considerable damage there. Of which when Ziyâd was informed, he permitted every one of the inhabitants to leave a hurdle, or rake, at his door; which practice prevailed ever after at Basra, and many other towns of Irâk. As no one durst appear out of his house after the hour of evening-prayer, 'tis no wonder the Cûsans should have been so secure in the possession of their <sup>c</sup> properties and effects; nor can it be any matter of surprize, that the order injoining this should have been so punctually observed, when it is known, that the least contravention of that order was punished with immediate death. Of this the following instance may serve as an evident proof: A shepherd coming one night through the town with his flock, was seized by one of Ziyâd's patrols, and instantly brought before him. The poor man, in defence of himself, when he was accused of having contemned the governor's late edict, said, that he was intirely ignorant of it. Ziyâd replied, "I am willing to believe, that what thou tellest me is true; but as the safety of all the Cûsans depends upon thy death, it is necessary that thou shouldst die." The sentence was no sooner pronounced than his head was struck off, to the inexpressible terror of all those who were present at the execution. <sup>d</sup> But tho' Ziyâd's wholesome severities fell heavy upon certain individuals, and in some other countries might seem to have favoured of cruelty, yet they kept the inhabitants of Irâk, a very faithless and treacherous people, in awe of him; insomuch that, according to Abu Jaafar Al Tabari, the citizens of Basra, as well as those of Cûsa, never feared any one more than Ziyâd, tho' they enjoyed an uninterrupted repose under his just and impartial administration <sup>e</sup>.

BUT whatever may have been advanced to the contrary by the last-mentioned author, the following remarkable story of him is an evident proof that he had something cruel and savage in his disposition. One Abu'l Mogbeirah having been once brought before him, by his command, as the most religious man in Cûsa, he offered to give him as much money as <sup>f</sup> he should desire, if he would confine himself to his apartment, and not go to the mosque to perform his devotions. Abu'l Mogbeirah replied, that he would not omit saying his prayers publicly on the congregation-day, or Friday, for the empire of the world. "Then," said Ziyâd, "go to the congregation, but do not talk in the mosque when you are there." "I must," answered the religious, "encourage that which is good, and reprove that which is bad." For which answer, tho' it be a precept pretty frequently mentioned in the Korân, Ziyâd commanded him to be immediately beheaded. Nay, as a farther instance of something that at least resembled cruelty in him, it may be observed, that he assembled the people a little before his death, in order to impose upon them a sort of abjuration, or renunciation by oath of every kind of connexion with the friends of the house of Hûshem, <sup>g</sup>

<sup>m</sup> MS. Hunt. in Bibl. Bodl. Oxon. num. 495. EBN AL ATHIR, ABU JAAFAR AL T. BAR. ET AL MAKIN, ubi sup. p. 46. <sup>a</sup> Ibidem ibid. D'HERBEL. Biblioth. orient. in art. Ziad, p. 933. KHONDEMIR, &c.

- a threatening with death all who would not submit to such a renunciation. But at the appointed time, when this affair should have been brought to a conclusion, the people being assembled for that purpose, he was seized with the plague, and never afterwards made his appearance amongst them; which they all, and especially those who retained any veneration for the memory of Ali, considered as a very providential deliverance. To what has been said of this famous Moslem, we may add, from Kondemir, the Persian historian, that the last letter he wrote to Moâwiyah was couched in the following terms: "My left-hand is here employed in governing the people of Irâk; but my right-hand is idle; put Arabia into it, to be governed, and it will give you a good account of it." Which request being granted, and the inhabitants of Medina thereby greatly alarmed, Abd'allah Ebn Zobeir,
- b one of them, in his public prayers, offered up to God this petition: "O God! satisfy this right hand, which is idle and superfluous to Ziyâd." Which words, as has been justly remarked by Mr. Ockley, contain a very beautiful allusion to the name of Ziyâd; signifying, in Arabic, abundant, or superfluous; and are perfectly consonant to the spirit and genius of that expressive and harmonious language. Soon after this prayer, according to an Arab author, a pestilential ulcer seized one of the fingers of his right-hand, of which he lay ill a few days, and then expired in exquisite torture. Some of his descendents formed a dynasty in Yaman, where they reigned under the name of the Banu Ziyâd. The Khâ-rejites, as well as the partisans of Ali, made some attempts to disturb his administration; but, by his severe and rigorous conduct, he proved superior to them, and in a short time extinguished all their commotions. In fine, by the sword which he drew, to make use of
- c Abu Jaafar's expression, he smoothed the Khalîf's government in Irâk, and so effectually silenced all murmurings and complaints there, that not one of the Irâkians, how powerful soever he might be, durst open his mouth against him °.

- But Ziyâd's administration, rigorous and severe as it was, must have been deemed gentle Samrah's and mild in respect of that of Samrah, his lieutenant at Basra, who was abhorred by all cruelty. men for his cruelty. During Ziyâd's six months absence from Basra, he residing one half of the year at Cûfa, Samrah had put to death no less than 8000 persons there; which greatly shocked Ziyâd; who asked him, whether he was not afraid, lest, in such a number, he might have murdered one innocent Moslem? Samrah replied, that, if he had destroyed double that number of Basrans, it would not have given him the least uneasiness or concern.
- d According to Abu Sawâr, he killed forty-seven Moslems one morning; every one of which had got the Korân by heart. A party of his horse marching out of the city on a certain occasion, and meeting a peasant at a little distance from it, one of them struck him through with his lance. Samrah, soon after coming up, found the poor wretch wallowing in his own blood; and, upon inquiry, was told, that one of his men had accidentally killed him. To which he made no other reply than, "When you hear we are mounted, beware of our lances." This year, being the fifty-third of the Hejra, Jabalab Ebn Al Ayham, the last king of Ghassân, a large account of whom our readers will find in a preceding part of the history we are now upon, departed this life; but what country, city, or town, was the scene of this event, we are not certainly informed. If Yezid did not penetrate through
- e Armenia and Natolia, and advance as far as the suburbs of Constantinople with his army, before the 52d year of the Hejra, as we find asserted by M. D'Herbelot, he could not well have finished his expedition, and arrived at Damascus, before the commencement of the following year; especially if we will admit, with the last-mentioned author, that he sowed and reaped whilst his forces remained in the neighbourhood of that capital. Be that as it will, the Turks, even at this day, visit the tomb of Abu Ayub above-mentioned with great devotion, and call the spot where his body lies interred Eyub. Some of the writers followed by D'Herbelot seem to intimate, that, soon after the foregoing expedition, Moâwiyah sent his son Yezid with an army to reduce the rebels of Abwâz, who refused a recognition of his authority.
- f Yezid, in pursuance of his orders, according to these writers, marched with great celerity to the plain of Dowlâb, on the confines of Syria and Arabia, where the rebels had assembled a considerable body of troops. These he attacked with so much bravery, that, after a sharp engagement, he intirely defeated them, and thereby restored peace to that part of the Khalîf's dominions. The authors who mention this action, call the people out of whom the rebel army was formed, and who exerted themselves the most on this occasion, in favour of the house of Hâshem, Azrakbeens °.

In the 54th year of the Hejra, Moâwiyah dismissed Saad from the government of Medina, The Arabs and restored Merwân Ebn Al Hakem to that honourable post. After this, he dispatched an order to Merwân, to demolish Saad's house, and seize all his effects in Hejâz. Upon Mer- make an incur- son into Buk- haria.

° ABU JAAFAR AL TABAR. et AL MAKIN, ubi sup. p. 47. EBN AL ATHIR, MS. Hunt. num. 495. D'HERBEL. ubi sup. KHONDEMIR. OCKLEY, ubi sup. p. 139, 140. ° EBN AL ATHIR, MS. Hunt. in Bibl. Bodl. Oxon. num. 495. ABU SAWAR, D'HERBEL. Bibl. orient. in art. Moâwiyah, p. 587.

ṭwān's appearance at Medina, with a mule to carry off every thing valuable that belonged to Saad, the latter was extremely surprized, and begged Merwān not to strip him in so unmerciful a manner. But the new governor told him, that the Khalif must be obeyed; and that if he had received an order, during his government, to have pulled down his, Merwān's, house, he would not have failed executing it. Upon this, Saad produced a letter, formerly sent him by Moāwiyah, commanding him to demolish Merwān's house; which, out of friendship, he had ventured to disobey, and thereby incurred the Khalif's displeasure. This generous action of Saad so struck Merwān, that he never ceased interceding with Moāwiyah for his friend, till he had prevailed upon him to revoke the late unjust command. Both the governors now clearly perceived, that the Khalif's view in issuing the foregoing orders, was to set them at variance; but the discovery of this wicked design served only the more effectually to strengthen the ties of friendship between them. About the same time Moāwiyah deposed Samrah, Ziyād's deputy at Basra, whose enormous cruelty had rendered him justly odious to all the inhabitants of that city. As soon as Samrah heard this news, he is reported to have said, "God curse Moāwiyah. If I had served God so well as I have served him, he would not have damned me to all eternity." A saying this, which sufficiently discovered the internal deformity of his soul, and the desperation to which he had been driven by a consciousness of his crimes. Within the course of this year, the Khalif likewise appointed Obeid'allah, the son of Ziyād, who gave him a very satisfactory account of the conduct of all his father's deputies, in their respective provinces, lieutenant of Khorasān. Soon after he had taken possession of his new government, Obeid'allah, tho' not then above twenty-five years of age, advanced at the head of a body of troops as far as the mountains of Bukhāria, and defeated a Turkish army that pretended to oppose him. The Turks lost a considerable number of men in the action, and the queen, who commanded them, with great difficulty made her escape. She had only time to put on one of her buskins; so that she was obliged to leave the other behind her. This, therefore, fell into the hands of the Arabs, who valued it at no less than 2000 dinārs <sup>a</sup>.

It has been remarked by Mr. Ockley, that there was a pretty extraordinary eclipse, and such a one as happened at Medina, when Moāwiyah ordered Mohammed's pulpit to be removed from that place, in the 54th year of the Hejra; from whence he seems to infer, that the command relative to this affair was given in that year, tho' he actually places it two or three years earlier. But perhaps this inference is not altogether to be depended upon, as he has produced no authority in support of the observations from whence it is drawn, and as Eutychius asserts that a solar eclipse, equally remarkable, happened in the 50th year of that æra. For, from thence we may with at least equal justice infer, that the aforesaid attempt was made in the 50th year of the Hejra <sup>b</sup>.

ABD'ALLAH, the son of Amru, having commanded a Moslem's hand to be cut off, for throwing dust, or gravel, at him whilst he was preaching to the people of Basra, of which place he then was governor; some of the principal men of the city complained of his conduct to Moāwiyah, who removed him from his post, and substituted Obeid'allah Ebn Ziyād in his room. The lieutenancy, therefore, of Khorasān becoming vacant by his removal, the Khalif conferred it upon one Aflam, who had not the least merit to recommend him to his master's favour; so that nothing worthy the attention of an historian happened in that province during the short term he presided over the people there. Nor did the year we are now upon, that is, the 55th year of the Hejra, produce any other remarkable occurrences, at least such as have been taken notice of by the Moslem historians <sup>c</sup>.

BUT notwithstanding the taciturnity of the Moslem historians, the Christians writers have mentioned several remarkable events, as happening about the present time, that are not to be passed over altogether in silence. Basbar, or as he is called by Theophanes, Busur, continued his incursions into the Christian territories, which he ravaged without opposition, and conducted from thence a vast number of captives into the Khalif's dominions. Mohammed Ebn Abd'allah and Kais, two Moslem commanders, appeared at the head of a considerable squadron of ships on the coast of Cilicia, with a body of land-forces on board; the first of whom took up his winter-quarters at Smyrna, and the other in Lycia and Cilicia. The Khalif also fitted out another fleet, the command of which he gave to one Kbāled, called by Theophanes Chale, with orders to sustain that sent to cruise on the coast of Cilicia, in case of need. The following spring the combined Moslem fleet presented itself to the view of the Christians on the coast of Thrace, stretching along from the western promontory, known by the name of Magnauro, to the eastern one, called Cyclobium. Frequent conflicts happened between it and that of the Christians; the particulars of which have not been handed down to us. However, it should seem as if the Arabs were superior in those engagements; since we have

<sup>a</sup> EBN AL ATHIR, MS. Hunt. in Bibl. Bodl. Oxon. num. 495. <sup>b</sup> OCKLEY, ubi sup. p. 130. EUTYCH. patriarch. Alexandrin. annal. tom. ii. p. 360, 361. <sup>c</sup> MS. Hunt. in Bibl. Bodl. Oxon. num. 495.

- a been told by some writers, that they besieged Constantinople the whole summer and spring for several years after the 53d year of the Hejra, or of CHRIST 672; but were received with such vigour and resolution by the emperor, that they thought it adviseable to withdraw always in the month of September to Cyzicus. In this long siege, or rather repeated sieges, the Arabs lost incredible numbers of men, and many ships consumed by sea-fire, as it was called, because it burnt under water; being the invention of one Callinicus, a native of Heliopolis in Egypt. The Arabs at length, despairing of success, abandoned the enterprize; but as they were returning home, their fleet was shipwrecked off the Scyllæan promontory. About the same time, three of the emperor's lieutenants, Florus, Petronius, and Cyprianus, gained a signal victory in Syria over Sofian Ebn Araf, who commanded there a numerous body of Arabs; but lost in the engagement 30,000 of his men. These misfortunes encouraged the Mardaites, or Maronites, to seize on mount Libanus, where they fortified themselves; and being joined by multitudes of Christian captives, slaves, and others, flocking to them from all parts, they reduced the whole country between mount Taurus, written corruptly Maurus in the present copies of Theophanes and Cedrenus, and Jerusalem, made frequent incursions into Syria, and so harrassed and terrified the Arabs, who thought that God himself at this juncture interposed, in favour of the Christians, that Moâwiyah not imagining himself able to contend with them and the Romans at the same time, sent ambassadors to Constantine, who met with a gracious reception at the imperial court. Constantine offered him an accommodation, which Moâwiyah seemed so ardently to accept, that with the Arab ambassadors, on their return home, John Pitzigaudes, a person of great age and experience, to Syria; where, after several conferences, a peace was concluded on the following terms. 1. That it should be inviolably observed by both nations for the space of thirty years. 2. That the Arabs should retain the provinces they had seized. 3. That they should pay yearly, by way of tribute, to the emperor and his successors 3000 pounds weight of gold, fifty slaves, and as many choice horses. It may not be improper to observe here, that, according to the Christian historians referred to, in the 53d year of the Hejra, there was a dreadful mortality in Egypt; in the 54th, Sofian Ebn Araf was defeated by Florus, Petronius, and Cyprianus, in Syria; in the 55th, the year we are now upon, Abd'allah Ebn Kais and Fadl, two Arab generals, made a descent on Crete, with a body of Moslem troops, and passed the ensuing winter there; and, in the 58th, a treaty was signed between Constantine and Moâwiyah. The articles of the treaty here mentioned not having been extremely honourable to the Arabs, 'tis not so much to be wondered at, that both they, and the military operations that preceded them, should have been denied a place in the writings of the Moslem historians<sup>1</sup>.

- THE next year, Moâwiyah conferred upon Saad, Othmân's grandson, the government of Saad takes Khorasân; having removed his predecessor, Aflam, as utterly unqualified for that post. Saad, Samarkand, and defeats the Uzbeks. soon after his promotion to that dignity, passed the Jikûn, or Amu, the Oxus of the antients, with a body of the Moslem forces, and advanced to Samarkand, which open'd its gates to him at his approach. Having soon after overthrown an army of the idolatrous Uzbeks, he marched directly to Tarmud, or Tirmid, which immediately surrendered to him. Nor is it said that he lost any considerable number of men in this successful expedition<sup>2</sup>.

- IT has been already observed, from Abu Jaesar Al Tabari, that, in the 50th year of the Hejra, Moâwiyah prevailed upon many of the Moslems to take the oath of fidelity to his son Yezid, as his partner, or colleague, in the Khalifat; but that Abd'alrahmân Ebn Abu Becr, Hosein Ebn Ali Ebn Abu Tâleb, Abd'allah Ebn Omar Ebn Al Khattâb, and Abd'allah Ebn Zobair Ebn Al Awâm, would not comply with the Khalif's request in that particular. This memorable event, however, has not been set in a full light by that author; so that we shall find ourselves obliged to have recourse to another Arab writer, who places it in the 56th year of the Moslem æra, in order to give our readers a more perfect and satisfactory account of it. Moâwiyah intending to secure the succession in his family, formed a design to render the government, that had been hitherto elective, hereditary; and, for this purpose, used all means imaginable to oblige the people to declare Yezid his heir and successor. In order to carry which design effectually into execution, he imagined nothing farther would be requisite than to engage them to take an oath of fidelity to Yezid, as his colleague, and partner in the empire. This had been first suggested to Moâwiyah by Al Mogbeirah, the late governor of Cîsa; but was disapproved of by Ziyâd, whom the Khalif had consulted upon the affair, because he knew Yezid to be a profligate young fellow, addicted to gaming and drinking, and by no means qualified to govern the Arabs. He, therefore, persuaded both Yezid and Moâwiyah, at least for the present, to lay all thoughts of it aside. But, after Ziyâd's death, Moâwiyah, who was always fond of the project, in the 56th year of the Hejra, revived it, and wrote circular letters to the principal men in all the provinces about it. The Syrians, and a people of Irâk, came readily into the scheme; as did also Malec, the commandant of Medina, who advised the Khalif to cause Yezid to be proclaimed his heir apparent, or rather as we should imagine, such a notion being countenanced by Abu Jaafar, Al Makin, and Abu'l Faraj, his partner and colleague, in that city. But Hosein Ebn Ali, Abd'allah Ebn Amer, Abd'alrahmân Ebn Abu Becr, the brother of Ayesha, and Abd'allah Ebn Zobeir, refusing to give their consent to it, the people could by no means be induced to concur with such a measure; tho' Moâwiyah did his utmost to prevail upon those chiefs to oblige him in this particular. He came in person to Medina, at the head of 1000 horse. He had a conference there with Ayesha about the affair; the result of which was, that the Arabs in general of the province of Hejâz took the oath of allegiance to Yezid. He even threatened those that b opposed him in this favourite point with his resentment. But all his efforts, with regard to the above-mentioned chiefs, proved ineffectual. They were too powerful to be brought into any of his measures by compulsion. However, as Hosein was a man of merit, a near relation, and had the people of Irâk at his devotion, he advised Yezid never to offer him any violence, if he ever came into his power. Abd'allah Ebn Amer, being wholly given up to devotion, would, as he told him, declare in his favour, when nobody else opposed him; and therefore would be a proper object of his mercy, if he should ever prove superior to all his enemies. With regard to Abd'alrahmân Ebn Abu Becr, his attention being solely fixed on women and play, and he being altogether influenced by the example of others, continued c Moâwiyah to his son Yezid, if ever he comes in, he is to be treated with lenity and moderation. But as for Abd'allah Ebn Zobeir, he has the subtilty of the fox, as well as the strength of the lion, said the Khalif; and therefore, if ever he can be seized, he must be cut to pieces. These Arab leaders persisting in their refusal to acknowledge Yezid either his father's colleague or heir apparent, Moâwiyah found himself obliged to acquiesce in the measures that had already been taken, and durst not proceed to any acts of violence against them. However, he so far carried his point, that the Syrians, the people of Irâk, and the bulk of the Arab nation, took the oath of fidelity to Yezid; to which they were bribed by large sums of money, according to Al Tabari; tho', if we will believe Abu'l Faraj, this oath was extorted by force from the inhabitants of Mecca and Medina. Be this as it will, it was certainly a great action, at this juncture, to change an elective monarchy into an hereditary one, when d the family of Hâshem had so powerful a party amongst the Arabs and the people of Irâk, that would infallibly in all points oppose Moâwiyah, whom they considered as their mortal enemy; when there were still living several of the COMPANIONS, who themselves aspired to the Khalifat, and who consequently with great impatience expected Moâwiyah's dissolution; and when, lastly, Yezid was so abandon'd a youth, that his uncle Ziyâd, a man of great experience and capacity, thought that nothing could be more disagreeable than the preceding scheme to all the provinces. To which we may add, that the attempt itself was an innovation, and might therefore have been attended with fatal consequences in an empire that had not long been formed, and that had been lately very much weakened by civil dissensions. This affair, which had been for some time in agitation, being thus brought to a happy conclusion, e Yezid gave audience to several ambassadors, who came to congratulate him on the occasion, as well as to several of the Arabs, who had undertaken a journey to Damascus, then the seat of the Moslem emperor, to offer him their allegiance. Amongst the latter, Al Abnâf, Yezid's uncle, made his appearance; and at his father's request, took an opportunity of conversing with him: after which, being asked by Moâwiyah what he thought of his nephew's capacity, he scrupled not to answer him in the following terms: "The fear of " God will not permit us to lie, and that of you not to speak truth. You know best " both his night and his day; his outside and his inside; his going out and his coming " in. You also know best what you design to do. It is our business to hear and obey; " yours to give counsel to the people." The Damascenes seem to have been some of Yezid's f most zealous adherents, and to have distinguished themselves in a particular manner on this occasion w.

<sup>1</sup> THEOPHAN. chronograph. p. 293—296. GEORG. CEDREN. historiar. compend. p. 437. ABU'LFED. ubi sup. GOLII not. ad Alfragan. p. 181, 182, et alib.

<sup>2</sup> ISM.

Moâwiyah
extremely fond of his son.

As Yezid was now destined to be his father's successor, the old Khalif grew extremely fond of him; imagining him to have something grand and majestic in his deportment, and that he was every way qualified to sit at the helm of a puissant empire. Nay, Moâwiyah, tho' in other respects a person of great discernment and penetration, could not forbear frequently expressing in conversation the high opinion he entertained of his son's superior abilities. It is said, that, in one of his harangues to the people, he offered up to God the following remarkable prayer: "O God! if thou knowest that I have settled the government upon " Yezid, because, according to the best of my judgment, I think him qualified for it, con- g

<sup>w</sup> ABU JAAFAR AL TABAR, et AL MAKIN, ubi sup. p. 48. GREG. ABU'L FAR. hist. dynast. p. 195. MS. Hunt. in Bibl. Bodl. Oxon. num. 495. D'HERBEL. Biblioth. orient. in art. Yezid.

" firm

- a “firm it to him; but if I have done it out of affection, confirm it not.” It seems to be insinuated by an Arab author, that the road from Medina to Mecca was about this time infested by robbers, and that great disorders were committed upon it; since, according to him, Merwân Ebn Al Hakem, the commandant of Medina, was obliged himself to conduct the Hadjî's, or pilgrims, to Mecca, the preceding year <sup>2</sup>.

THE 57th year of the Hejra scarce produced a single event that has merited the attention of any historian. Theophanes only observes, that vast swarms of locusts appeared in Syria and Mesopotamia, and consequently did incredible damage there, this year. There were likewise at this juncture in Arabia great murmurings and discontents, occasioned by the transaction of the preceding year, of which we have just given our readers a full and ample relation.

Great murmurings and discontents in Arabia.

- b However, such care was taken by the Khalif, and the officers he employed, that no open attempt was made against the government <sup>3</sup>.

THE following year, Ayesha, the daughter of Abu Becr, and Mohammed's best-beloved wife, departed this life at Medina. Her father derived from her his name of Abu Becr, or the father of the girl; she being very young when the prophet married her. She was ever treated by all the Khalifs with the utmost respect, except when she exposed herself in the expedition undertaken at her impulse against Ali. The Moslems sometimes called her the prophetess; and, when they addressed themselves to her, generally gave her the title of the mother of the faithful. She made her exit on the seventh day of the month of Ramadân. Her brother Abd'alrahmân Ebn Abu Becr, of whom we have spoken above, died a little before her.

Ayesha and Abd'alrahmân Ebn Abu Becr die;

- c Soon after the conclusion of the late treaty of peace between the Christians and the Arabs, the ratifications were exchanged, and John Pitzigaudes, the imperial minister, who had been amply rewarded by Moâwiyah, for the part he acted in that important affair, returned home to Constantinople this same year <sup>4</sup>.

The next year, being the 59th of the Hejra, died Abu Horeira, or the father of the cat, as also Abu so called by Mohammed, because of his fondness of a cat, which he always carried about with him. He so constantly went under this appellation, that neither his true name, nor his pedigree, is certainly known. He was one of the prophet's intimate companions, and had so many traditions father'd upon him, that the very number of them renders them suspected to some people; tho' others receive them all as of undoubted authority, without the least as also Abu Horeira.

- d hesitation. He is looked upon by many of the Moslems as one of the six authors of the authentic traditions. His true name, according to the common opinion, was Abd'alrahmân Ebn Sakbar; and his conversion to Islamism is said to have been effected in the seventh year of the Hejra. This year there was a great earthquake in Mesopotamia, which did considerable damage to the church of the Christians at Edeffa; but it has not been observed either by the Christian or Moslem historians, that the edifices in other parts of that country suffered in the least by any of its concussions <sup>5</sup>.

THE 60th year of the Hejra was rendered remarkable by the death of Moâwiyah Ebn Abu Sofiân, who died at Damascus about the beginning, or, as others will have it, the middle of the month of Rajeb. His last public speech, which he made when he found himself in a declining condition, was to the following effect. “I am like corn that is to be reaped, and Moâwiyah dies.

- e “have governed you till we are weary of one another. I am superior to all my successors, as my predecessors were superior to me. God desires to approach all who are desirous of approaching him. O God! I love to meet thee, do thou love to meet me!” When he perceived himself at the point of death, he ordered a captain of the guards, and another faithful servant, to impart from him the following advice to Yezid. “Consider the Arabs as the root and foundation of your empire; and therefore always treat their ambassadors with kindness and respect. The Syrians are your natural friends, and will defend you from the insults of your enemies; and therefore shew yourself a father to them: but never keep them long out of their own country; for they degenerate abroad. Oblige the people of Irâk to the utmost of your power, even tho' they should demand of you a new deputy every day: you had better abandon the dearest friend you have in the world, than have 100,000 swords drawn upon you. There are only three of the Koreish that will attempt to disturb your government; Hossein, Ebn Amer, and Abd'allah Ebn Zobeir. If the last of these appears in arms against you, oppose him; if he offers you peace, accept of it; and spare the blood of your people as much as possible.” In his Khalifat, Moslemah Ebn Mokballed Al Ansâri added a new tower to the temple, or mosque, erected by Amru Ebn Al As at Al Fostât, which afterwards went by his name. We must not forget to observe here, that Abu Jaafar Al Tabari, as well as Eutyckius, asserts, that, in the num. 495. ubi sup.

* MS. Hunt. in Bibl. Bodl. Oxon. num. 495.

ubi sup. THEOPHAN. chronograph. p. 296.

GAGN. la vie de Mahom. tom. ii. p. 45. THEOPHAN. ubi sup.

† THEOPHAN. chronograph. p. 295. MS. Hunt.

num. 495. ubi sup. ‡ ABU JAAFAR AL TABARI et AL MAKIN, ubi sup. p. 48. ISM. ABU'LFED.

ubi sup. § ISM. ABU'LFED. ubi sup. et de vit. Moham. p. 153.

50th year of the Hejra, there happened so remarkable a solar eclipse, that the stars in the day-time very clearly appeared; which will farther evince the truth of the inference we have already drawn from that assertion <sup>b</sup>.

How long he reigned, and how old he was at his death.

MOAWIYAH reigned, if we compute from Hasan's resignation, nineteen years, three months, and five days, according to Abu Jaafar Al Tabari. He presided over Syria, either as governor or Khalif, about forty years, viz. four, as lieutenant, in the Khalifat of Omar; twelve in that of Othmán, who continued him in his former post through the whole course of his reign; five in the Khalifat of Ali, during which term he supported himself by force; and nineteen after Hasan's renunciation, when he governed the Moslem empire without a competitor. Abu'lfeđa differs a little from Al Tabari in the length he assigns Moawiyah's reign. With regard to his age, authors are not perfectly agreed; some making him 70, others 73, others 75, others 78, others 80, and, lastly, others 85 years old, at the time of his death. Be that as it will, as soon as he was dead, Dehák Ebn Kâis went into the mosque, and ascended the pulpit with Moawiyah's winding-sheet in his hand; where, having made an encomium on the deceased, and satisfied the people of his death, he said the funeral service, or the prayers usual on such occasions, over him. Yezid was then at a town called Hawarin, in the territory of Hems, and did not arrive at Damascus till after his father had been interred; but, upon his arrival there, he went and prayed at his tomb. For what has been observed here, we are obliged to Abu'lfeđa; tho' Yezid himself said the funeral prayers over Moawiyah, at his interment, if we will believe Abu Jaafar Al Tabari <sup>c</sup>.

Description of his person and character.

WITH regard to his person, Moawiyah was tall, according to Al Tabari, though this is contradicted by Eutychius, extremely fat, and of a fair complexion. His eyes projected out of his head; he had a loud voice, a large breast, and a long beard, which he tinged with Al Henna and Al Catam, after the example of his predecessors. As for his disposition, he was merciful, of an exceeding quick apprehension, courageous, and thoroughly versed in all the arts of government. His good-nature got the ascendant over his resentment, and the sweetness exceeded the ferocity of his temper. He was affable, easy of access, and of a winning behaviour; tho', by his disputing the Khalifat with Ali and Hasan, he had justly incurred the displeasure of the house of Hâshem. Hasan of Basra, a man of great authority with the Sunnites, objected four things to his conduct; every one of which, he said, merited destruction. 1. He took upon himself the Khalifat by force, without either consulting the people, the persons of distinction, or the surviving COMPANIONS. 2. He rendered the Khalifat hereditary in his family, and appointed Yezid his successor, tho' he was a person of a very bad character, a drunkard, a lover of music, and one that wore silk. 3. He owned Ziyâd for his brother, tho' in opposition to one of the express decisions of Mohammed and the Korân. 4. He treated with the utmost cruelty Hejer, a man of uncommon piety, and his companions. According to Al Shâfe'i, he put Abu Rabiya in chains, because he objected to the testimony of four of the COMPANIONS, viz. Moawiyah, Amru, Al Mogheirah, and Ziyâd. It has been remarked by Al Tabari, that, when he laughed, his upper lip was inverted; and that Saturday was the first, and Friday the last, day of his reign <sup>d</sup>.

Some farther account of him.

As the Arabs in general, and the Khalif in particular, at this time, were much delighted with poetical performances, a young man once repeated to Moawiyah a copy of verses, wherein he gave a full and explicit account of his present miserable situation. He had, it seems, married a fair Arabian girl purely for love; and, out of mere fondness, had spent all his substance upon her. The governor of Cûfa casting his eyes upon her, and perceiving her to be a charming creature, had ravished her from her husband's bosom. The poor man, to whom the loss of his substance was nothing in respect to that of his wife, being pierced to the very heart, and ready to die with sorrow for this misfortune, addressed the Khalif in verse, in these calamitous circumstances. Moawiyah, being very well pleased with the verses, resolved to do him justice; and therefore sent an express to the governor, with orders instantly to resign the woman. He being a person of not the most unrefined taste, told the express, that, if the Khalif would permit him to enjoy her one year, he would be contented to have his head struck off at the end of it. But the Khalif having absolutely insisted upon her dismissal, she was brought before him. He was extremely surprized at her beauty, but much more at the politeness and elegance of her expression. Tho' he had received many embassies, and frequently conversed with the greatest men of his country, he had never before heard such a torrent of eloquence as that which flowed from the mouth of this charming Arabian. The Khalif asked her jocosely, whether she would chuse him, the governor, or her husband, for a constant companion? She, with a modesty peculiar to

<sup>b</sup> ABU JAAFAR AL TABAR. et AL MAKIN, ubi sup. p. 50. EBN AL ATHIR, MS. Hunt. num. 495. ISM. ABU'LFED. in hist. univ. GREG. ABU'L FAR. ubi sup. p. 195. EUTYCH. ubi sup. p. 360, 361. THEOPHAN. chronograph. p. 296.

<sup>c</sup> ISM. ABU'LFED. ABU JAAFAR AL TABAR. AL MAKIN, GREG. ABU'L FAR. EUTYCH. & THEOPHAN. ubi sup. <sup>d</sup> ABU JAAFAR AL TABAR. EUTYCH. & AL MAKIN, ubi sup. AL SHAFEI, &c.

- a her sex; answered in verse, that tho' a person in his exalted station could do infinitely more for her than either she expected or deserved, yet that this would by no means be a balance against eternal damnation. She begged of him; therefore, if he intended her any favour, to restore her to her dear husband. Which he not only did, but presented her likewise with a splendid equipage, as well as plenty of gold, in order to restore the shattered circumstances of her husband, who had spent a good fortune upon her. This story perfectly agrees with what we find related of this Khalif by other authors, and with the character given of him even by Khondemir, the Persian historian. For we are told by an oriental author, already cited in this work, that an Arab robber having been condemned to have one of his hands cut off, in conformity to what is enjoined by the Korân in cases of this nature, the
- b criminal immediately composed and repeated four elegant and ingenious Arab verses upon the spot; which so mollified the Khalif, that he instantly pardoned him. However, it has been remarked, that this was the first sentence pronounced amongst the Moslems that was not put in execution; none of his predecessors having taken the liberty of shewing favour to those whom the ordinary judges had condemned. And with regard to Khondemir, we are informed by that historian, that Moâwiyah used to say, "The Hâshemites are famous for their valour, and the descendents of Zobeir for their generosity; but I only desire to pass amongst the Moslems for a prince of clemency and humanity." But how laudable soever this might seem, if we will believe Ali, it was not spoken by Moâwiyah absolutely without artifice and design <sup>c</sup>.
- c His munificence was equal to his clemency; if we will believe the Moslem authors. He <sup>His munificence.</sup> made a present to Ayesha of a bracelet worth 100,000 dinârs. He presented Hasan at one time with 300,000 dinârs, and Abd'allah Ebn Zobeir with 100,000. He frequently bad those who came to pay their duty to him to take away any thing in his palace that pleased them. He gave 100,000 dinârs at once to Hosein, 100,000 to Abd'allah Ebn Jaafar, 100,000 to Merwân Ebn Al Hakem, and 4,000,000 at another time to Hasan. However, on the other hand, it must be allowed, that ambition, and an insatiable thirst after empire, almost wholly occupied his mind; as very clearly appeared from the tenor of his conduct, during the Khalifat both of Ali and Hasan, and even his own <sup>d</sup>.
- d THE following remarkable instance of his patience and clemency has been transmitted <sup>His patience and clemency.</sup> down to us by Abu'lfeda. Arwab, the daughter of Hâreth, the son of Abd'almotalleb, the son of Hâshem, a very old woman, and his aunt, of Ali's branch of the family, made him once a visit. As soon as Moâwiyah had saluted her, she began to reproach him in the following terms: "O nephew," said she, "you have been very injurious and ungrateful to your cousin, who was one of the COMPANIONS. You also called yourself by a name that was none of your own; and took possession of what you had no right to. Our family exceeded all men in sufferings for this religion, till God thought proper to take his prophet, in order to reward his labours, and advance him to a more exalted station. Then you insulted us, and we were amongst you like the children of Israel in the family of Pharaoh; tho' Ali bore the same relation to the prophet that Aaron did to Moses." Amru being
- e then present, said, "Hold your tongue, old woman, and don't talk like one out of his wits." What," replied she, "do you prate; you son of a whore! Your mother was known to be the cheapest and most notorious strumpet in all Mecca; who, when she was examined about her commerce with five of the Koreish, confessed that she had lain with them all, and declared, that he must be deemed your father whom you resembled most. As, therefore, you were most like old Al As, he was obliged to acknowledge himself your father." This unparalleled scurrility, however, did not ruffle nor discompose Moâwiyah, who only said to her, "God forgive what is past; what would you have?" She answered, "Two thousand dinârs, to purchase an estate for the poor of our family; two thousand more, to marry our poor relations; and two thousand more for myself, to sup-
- f port me in time of extremity." All which, by the Khalif's command, was paid down to her immediately. Several other instances of this kind might be produced, had we room here to insert what has been related of Moâwiyah by the oriental authors, especially those of the Sonnite, or Traditionist, persuasion <sup>e</sup>.

To what has been said of this Khalif, we must beg leave to add, that he was the first who <sup>Some customs that he introduced.</sup> introduced the Mekfowrah into the mosque. The Mekfowrah was a sort of elevated place, separated from all the rest, where the Khalif, who was the supreme pontiff in religious as well as the sovereign in civil affairs, read, or chanted, the prayers that form the liturgy or public office of the Moslems. From the same place he also made the Cotbah, which is a sort of homily or predication, to the people. This, before his time, followed the prayers; but he began with it, for the reason already assigned. He also introduced the practice of a laying post-horses upon the roads, and was the first of the Khalifs, who spoke to the people in a sitting posture. According to Theophanes, Moâwiyah reigned four-and-twenty years; from whence we may infer, that he makes his Khalifat to have commenced at the death of Othmân. It has been already observed, that Dionysius Telmarenfis calls Ali Abbâs, and relates, that Moâwiyah reigned alone, or after the death of Abbâs, or Ali, only sixteen years; tho' Ebn Erraheb and Abu'l Walid, in agreement with the other eastern writers, affirm, that he sat on the Moslem throne, without any colleague, except his son, or competitor, nineteen years and three months, and died in the 60th year of the Hejra, or of CHRIST 679. As Dionysius wrote in Syria, and the Syrians adhered to Moâwiyah, 'tis no wonder that he, in common with his countrymen, should have had the memory of Ali and his sons in such b abhorrence, as to leave their names out of the list or series of Khalifs. It may be farther observed, that he called Ali Abbâs, because the latter was the name applied to that Khalif's whole family by the Syrians; as also because Ali had a son, destroyed by Yezid, in the 60th year of the Hejra, according to Abu'l Walid, who went under that appellation <sup>a</sup>.

<sup>e</sup> MS. Hunt. in Bibl. Bodl. Oxon. num. 495. Aut. RABÍ AL AKYAR, apud D'Herbel. Bibl. orient in art. Moawiah, p. 587. ut & ipse D'HERBEL. ibid. Al KOR. MOHAM. f. v. SALE's prelim. disc. p. 140. OCKLEY, ubi sup. p. 85, 86.

<sup>f</sup> MS. Hunt. num. 495. ubi sup.

<sup>e</sup> ISM. ABU'LFED. ubi sup.

Where buried. MOAWIYAH was interred at Damascus, which he made the residence of the Khalifs; and this prerogative that city enjoyed, as long as his descendents, or the Khalifs of the house of Ommiyah, kept possession of the Moslem throne. But those of the family of Abbâs transferred the imperial seat to Anbâr, Hafsemiyah, and Baghdâd, as will be seen in the sequel of this history. The inscription upon Moâwiyah's seal was, Every work hath its reward; or, as others say, There is no strength but in God. His secretary was Abd'allah Ebn Aws; his c principal Kâdi, or judge, Fadala Ebn Abd'allah, of Medina; his chamberlain Yezid his servant, and afterwards his servant Safwân; the captain of his guards Yezid Ebn Al Horra Al Abasi, Kas Ebn Hamzah, and Dahak Ebn Kais Al Fahri. Eutychius makes Riyah, one of his servants, to have been his chamberlain. For the story of Obeid Ebn Scriba, the Nestor of the Arabs, who is said by the Moslems to have arrived at the age of 300 years, and lived in the Khalifat of Moâwiyah, we must beg leave to refer our curious readers to Al Makin, or rather Abu Jaafar Al Tabari <sup>i</sup>.

<sup>a</sup> Idem ibid. D'HERBEL. ubi sup. in art. Moawiah. GREG. ABU'L FAR. ubi sup. p. 194. DIONYS. TELMARENS. EBN ARRAHEB, & ABU'L WALID, apud Joseph. Simon. Assen. in Biblioth. orient. tom. ii. p. 103, 104. ut & ipse JOSEPH. SIMON. ASSEMAN. ibid. EBN SHOHNAH, KHONDEMIR, &C. <sup>i</sup> ABU JAFAAR AL TABAR. & AL MAKIN, ubi sup. p. 48, 49. EUTYCH. ubi sup. p. 360, 361. D'HERBEL. Biblioth. orient. pass.

S E C T. VII.

Yezid proclaimed Khalif.

YEZID, according to Abu Jaafar, was proclaimed Khalif, in consequence of his nomination to the succession, the same day his father died. His inauguration was performed on the new moon of the month of Rajeb, in the 60th year of the Hejra, coincident with the 7th day of April in the year of our LORD 680. He was born in the 26th year of the former æra, and consequently thirty-four lunar years old, when he ascended the Moslem throne. Immediately after his inauguration, he wrote to Al Walid Ebn Otba Ebn Abu Sofiân, his governor of Medina, to seize Hosein Ebn Ali, and Abd'allah Ebn Zobeir, if they refused to acknowledge his right to the Khalifat. The letter was conceived in the following terms: "In the name of the most merciful God. From Yezid, emperor of the faithful, to Al Walid Ebn Otba. Moâwiyah was one of the servants of God, who honoured him, made him Khalif, extended his dominions, and established him. He lived his appointed time, e and God took him to his mercy. He lived beloved, and died pure and innocent. Farewell. Take care not to suffer Hosein, Abd'allah Ebn Amer, and Abd'allah Ebn Zobeir, to deviate in the least from the inauguration." Upon the arrival of this letter, Al Walid consulted Merwân Ebn Al Hakem about the contents of it, which he immediately communicated to him. Merwân advised him to tender the persons therein mentioned the oath of fidelity to Yezid, before they were apprized of the Khalif's death; and, upon their refusal to take it, to order their heads to be cut off. Al Walid, therefore, according to Abu'lfeda, sent for Hosein to his house, informed him of Moâwiyah's death, and invited him to recognize the authority of the new Khalif. Hosein answered, that men of his distinction did not usually do things of that nature in private; that he did not expect to have had such a thing f proposed to him; and that he thought such a declaration as was required of him ought to be made in the most public manner. Merwân, who was present, plainly saw that the answer was evasive; nor was the governor ignorant of this; and therefore gave it as his opinion, that Al Walid either ought to oblige Hosein to be explicit on this occasion, or to strike his head off upon the spot. This Al Walid refusing to do, Hosein, after he had reproached Merwân for his advice, by the assistance of some friends and domestics he had posted at the governor's door, escaped to his own house. Merwân then censuring Al Walid for

- a for permitting Hosein to retire, the governor told him, that he was very easy in his present situation; and that he thought it would be a very criminal action to spill the blood of Hosein. After this, Al Walid sent for Abd'allah Ebn Zobeir, in order to make the same proposal to him that he had before done to Hosein. But Abd'allah deferred, under various pretences, waiting upon him for the space of twenty-four hours; at the end of which, with his family, and his brother Jaafar, he made his escape to Mecca. Al Walid sent a party of horse in pursuit of him, but without effect. In the mean time, Hosein, by the advice of his brother Mohammed Hanifyah, made secret preparations to follow him, with his family; which he at last found means to do. However, Egypt, Syria, Mesopotamia, Persia, and, in fine, all the Moslem dominions, except the cities of Mecca and Medina, and part of Irâk, declared in
- b favour of Yezid. Notwithstanding which, the people of Cûfa, receiving advice of Hosein and Abd'allah's escape to Mecca, invited the former to Cûfa, and promised to support him in any war he should undertake against Yezid. He, therefore, dispatched to them his cousin Moslem Ebn Okail, to whom, as Hosein's representative, they took the oath of allegiance. Yezid's mother, according to Abu Jaafar Al Tabari, was Kaisun Bint Bahdal, or, as Eutychius will have it, Misua Bint Yabdak, of the tribe of Calb <sup>k</sup>.

- THE new Khalif being informed by Merwân of Al Walid's indolent, not to say treacherous, conduct, dismissed him from the government of Medina, and substituted Amru Ebn Saad, then commandant of Mecca, in his room. Amru, who was a very proud man, soon after he had taken possession of his post, detached Amer Ebn Zobeir with a body of troops
- c against his brother Abd'allah, whom he mortally hated. Abd'allah engaged Amer in the field, routed him, and put him in prison, where he kept him confined till his death. This victory procured Abd'allah no small respect from the people of Medina, who seemed now greatly prejudiced in his favour. However, Hosein's superior interest amongst them rendered him incapable of aspiring, by their assistance, to the Khalifat himself. Besides, Hosein was supported by the forces of Irâk, who still retained a vast veneration for the memory of his father Ali, and considered the government of Moâwiyah as a downright usurpation. The citizens of Cûfa had actually declared for him, as has been already observed; and were at this very juncture pressing him to honour them with his presence. Moslem had, with great difficulty, traversed part of the deserts of Irâk, in order to come at them; but,
- d upon his arrival at their city, the reception they gave him made him ample amends for the hardships he had sustained. They not only came to a resolution to spend all their blood and treasure in support of Hosein's just pretensions, but determined likewise to enter immediately upon action with an army of 18,000 men. And what crowned all was, that the affairs concerted between them and Moslem were carried on with so much secrecy, that Al Nooman, Yezid's lieutenant, himself was a stranger to their deliberations. In the mean time, Hosein receiving advice of the happy situation of his affairs at Cûfa, made the proper dispositions for his departure from Mecca, in order to set out upon his journey for the former city <sup>l</sup>.

- AL NOOMAN being informed at last of the steps that had been taken in favour of Hosein, and roused out of his lethargy, made a speech to the people; wherein he exhorted them to avoid all occasion of strife and contention. He told them, that he would take up no man upon suspicion, however strong circumstances might appear against him, nor be the aggressor in any shape whatsoever, unless he should be forced to act contrary to his inclination by some gross insult offered to his person. But he swore by that God besides whom there is no other, that, if they revolted from their Imâm, he would fight as long as he could hold his sword in his hand. Upon which, one of those that stood by told him, that the present conjuncture did not so much require words as action; and that he talked like one of the weak ones. To which he replied, that "he would rather be one of the weak ones in obedience to God, than one of the strong ones in rebelling against him." This inactive
- f conduct not pleasing Yezid, he removed Al Nooman from his post, and annexed the government of Cûfa to that of Basra, in favour of Obeid'allah, the son of Ziyâd, to whom Yezid had been reconciled by the interposition of Sarkhun Ebn Moâwiyah; he having before conceived a dislike to him, on account of his father Ziyâd, who had refused to concur with those who had nominated him to the succession in his father's life-time. Al Nooman, or Al Nooman, as he is called by Abu Jaafar, was the son of Basbar, a citizen of Medina, and a man of too indolent a temper to sustain the weighty office of commandant of Cûfa at this juncture, when most of the citizens in reality were disaffected to Yezid; and therefore this was a sufficient reason for removing him from that post. But as he belonged to a city that bore an implacable hatred to the house of Ommiyah, it is not improbable that the Khalif

<sup>k</sup> ABU JAAFAR AL TABARI & AL MAKIN, ubi sup. p. 50. MS. Hunt. num. 495. ISM. ABU'LFED. ubi sup. EUTYCH. ubi sup. p. 360—363. GREG. ABU'LFAR. in hist. dynast. p. 195. <sup>l</sup> MS. Hunt. ABU'LFED. ABU JAAFAR AL TABARI, AL MAKIN, & GREG. ABU'LFAR. ubi sup.

might have had some cause to suspect his integrity; which if we admit, this must have been an additional reason for his dismissal. Be that as it will, the new Khalif, if we will believe Abu'lfeda, upon his first accession to the throne, kept all his father's officers and lieutenants in the places that had been assigned them; and had nothing more at heart than an attempt to win over those who had always opposed his interest by gentle means. In consequence of which disposition, he resolved, if the conduct of the house of Hâshem did not oblige him to deviate from the plan he had laid down, to have recourse only, for the reuniting the divided members of the Arab nation, to methods of lenity and persuasion<sup>m</sup>.

Moslem and Hani executed.

OBEID'ALLAH was received by the people of Cûfa, at his first appearance amongst them, with all possible demonstrations of joy; which was owing to a black turban he had upon his head, resembling that which Hosein usually wore. As he, therefore, entered the town in the evening, they mistook him for Hosein, of whose arrival they were in hourly expectation. But they were extremely mortified, when they discovered this stranger to be the Emir Obeid'allah; who went immediately to the apartments fitted up for him in the castle, attended only by an escorte of seventeen horse. The first object of his deliberations was the extinction of the present sedition, but too visible to him, that had been excited in the city by Moslem. In order to which, he commanded a trusty servant to disguise himself, and to personate a stranger come out of Syria to see the inauguration of Hosein; that he might gain admission into Moslem's house, by his address insinuate himself into that officer's confidence, and by this means penetrate all his councils. Which having done, he made a faithful report of what he had learned to his master. In the mean time, Moslem lodged at one Sbarik's house, to which he had removed from Hani's, where he had taken up his quarters at his first coming to town. Obeid'allah having been let into all the secrets of the adverse party by his servant, sent a messenger to Sbarik, who was one of the grand Omera's, to inform him, that he intended him a visit on a certain day, which he named. Sbarik, being apprized of this, though he was then sick, immediately came to a resolution to receive him, and to place Moslem in a corner of the room, that he might destroy him, upon a signal given. The visit was accordingly made, and Moslem had a proper place assigned him, for the purpose above-mentioned; but his heart failing him, Obeid'allah escaped, and Sbarik died three days after. As for Hani, in whose house Moslem at first had lodged, and who attended the new governor in the aforesaid visit, upon searching the registers, he was found to be an old offender, and one that had before opposed Obeid'allah; wherefore he was conducted by some of the Omera's, at the governor's command, to the castle. Upon his arrival there, Obeid'allah asked him where Moslem was, and how he came formerly to admit him into his house? Hani, after he had in vain endeavoured to deny the fact laid to his charge, answered, that Moslem forced himself into his house, and did not come thither by his invitation. Obeid'allah then commanded this prevaricator to produce him; who instantly replied, that if he was under his feet, he would not take them off from him. This so exasperated Obeid'allah, that he gave him a blow on the face with his mace, which broke his nose; upon which, Hani attempted to snatch a sword from one of the guards, but was prevented, and the governor ordered him to be closely confined in a room of the castle that had been prepared for his reception. The news of this event soon reached the ears of Moslem, who thereupon mounted his horse, assembled a body of 4000 men, and immediately invested the castle. This at first surprized Obeid'allah, though he soon recovered himself, and made a speech to the people; wherein he used a great variety of arguments to dissuade them from withdrawing their allegiance from the Khalif. This produced the desired effect; insomuch that all Moslem's followers, except about thirty, gradually deserted him. He, therefore, found himself obliged to leave the city; which, by the favour of the night, he did, and made his escape to a little cottage, belonging to an old woman, in a field at a little distance from Cûfa. However, her son, in hopes of meeting with the reward promised by the governor to the person who should give any intelligence of him, discovered to Obeid'allah the place of his retreat; who thereupon sent a detachment of eighty horse to seize him. Moslem for some time made a gallant defence, and thrice cleared the house of them; but being at last overpowered by numbers, and grievously wounded in several places, both his lips particularly being almost cut to pieces, he was seized, disarmed, and carried bound upon his own mule to Cûfa. One of the governor's men perceiving him to shed tears, told him, that it did not become a man embarked in so great an undertaking to weep. Moslem replied, that he wept not for himself, but for Hosein and his family, who were then, as he apprehended, on the road to Cûfa. After which, turning to Mohammed Ebn Al Asbat, he desired him to acquaint Hosein with his bad success, and intreat him, if upon his journey, to return to Mecca. This Mohammed not only promised to do, but likewise actually sent an express to Hosein, to hinder him from advancing to Cûfa; though

<sup>m</sup> MS. Hunt. & ABU'LFED. ubi sup. ABU JAAFAR AL TABARI & AL MAKIN, ubi sup. p. 50, 51.

- a the person employed on this occasion never came near him. When Moslem arrived at the castle, he asked for a draught of water; but one of the men there told him, he should have nothing to quench his thirst, till he drank the Hamim, or boiling liquor that the Mohammedans pretend the damned shall drink in hell. When Obeid'allah appeared, Moslem refused to salute him; saying, he should serve Yezid himself in the same manner, if he were present, unless he would promise him a pardon. The governor then upbraided him with coming to Cûfa, in order to sow the seeds of dissension amongst a people who were perfectly well satisfied with the present administration. Moslem resolutely answered, "That is absolutely false. The people of this province know very well, that your father Ziyâd inhumanly butchered their principal men, and exercised a tyranny over them more intolerable than
- b "that of the worst of the Khosrû's, or the Cæsars: whereas our intention is to govern them with justice and moderation, and appeal to the determination of the book." Obeid'allah then called him rogue, and reproached him with drinking of wine at Medina; which he denied in the strongest terms. Perceiving that he was to fall a sacrifice to the governor's resentment, he left one of his friends 700 dinârs, to take care of his body, and to hinder Hosein from approaching Cûfa. After which, he was beheaded on the top of the castle, as Hani was in the street. Both of their heads were sent for a present to Yezid, together with a letter containing an account of their crime, and the circumstances attending their execution; which happened on the 8th day of the month of Dbu'lhajja, in the 60th year of the Hejra. With regard to the collection of registers, or book of records, as it is called in
- c Scripture, abovementioned, we must beg leave to observe, that the antient Persians, to whom the province of Irâk, in which Cûfa is situated, appertained, preserved the memory of the principal events of their state every year, and even every day, in a sort of annals and journals, which formed that collection, and were recited in order of time as they happened, as may be inferred from sacred and profane authors. In these annals and journals the names of the benefactors to the public, as well as of malefactors, were inserted, both amongst the Persians and the Medes. This most clearly appears from Herodotus, Thucydides, and Josephus, as well as from several passages of Scripture. It is no wonder, therefore, that the same custom should prevail in the time of Yezid amongst some of the descendents of those antient nations. The detachment sent by Obeid'allah to seize Moslem at the old woman's
- d cottage, and conduct him to Cûfa, consisted of 1000 horse, notwithstanding what has been advanced to the contrary by an Arab author here referred to, according to Abu'l Faraj<sup>n</sup>.

THE favourable advices he had received from Moslem, together with the earnest and Hosein <sup>sets</sup> repeated solicitations of the Cûfans, who had sent him a list of 140,000 men that were ready <sup>out for</sup> Cûfa, to obey his orders, induced Hosein to think of setting out directly for Cûfa. The wisest of his friends, however, considered this as a desperate enterprize, and therefore endeavoured to dissuade him from it. Abd'allah Ebn Abbâs, in particular, told him, that as the Emir Obeid'allah's forces had the proper posts assigned them for the defence of the country, and as the Cûfans at best only had invited him to a war, in which they would probably desert him, he ought by no means to embark in so perilous an undertaking. Abd'allah Ebn Zobeir also

e endeavoured to prevail upon him to lay aside his design, though in a more faint and languid manner; he being in reality rather desirous of precipitating him into dangers, than of delivering him from them; since, in case of Hosein's death, he thought he might, with the greater ease, aspire to the Khalifat himself. But Hosein still persisting in his former resolution, Abd'allah Ebn Abbâs, who had a most sincere and cordial respect for him, represented to him, that if he was fixed in his intention of entering into a war against Yezid, he ought to stay till his friends at Cûfa had dispatched the new governor imposed upon them by the pretended Khalif, and then either join them, or retire to some place of strength in Hejâz; that, in the mean time, he should write circular letters to his friends, desiring them to assemble their forces with all possible expedition, and not suffer any part of the scheme he

f had formed to transpire: and that at least, if nothing could divert him from appearing immediately at the head of the Cûfans, he ought not to entertain any thoughts of taking his wives and children along with him, lest he should meet with the fate of Othmân, who was murdered in his family's sight. Besides, added he, your departure from Mecca at this juncture, especially if you leave him behind you, will give infinite pleasure to Abd'allah Ebn Zobeir, who wishes for your death, in order to dispute himself the Khalifat with Yezid. But Hosein still proving inflexible, Abd'allah Ebn Abbâs left him, and told Ebn Zobeir, whom he met soon after, that he had no reason to be sad, since Hosein, hurried by his destiny, was obstinately bent upon his own destruction. Nay, though the same Ebn Abbâs sat up with him afterwards a whole night, in order to prevail upon him to remain at Mecca a little

g longer, and at least till his troops were ready to enter upon action, he could make no impression upon him. Hosein, therefore, with his family, and some other attendants, set out from Mecca either on the 8th of Dbu'lbajja, the very day on which Moslem and Hani were executed at Cúfa, of which Hosein had not yet received advice, or the day before, as we learn from an anonymous oriental historian °.

<sup>n</sup> MS. Hunt. num. 495. in Bibl. Bodl. Oxon. EZR. vi. 1. ESTH. vi. 1. x. 2. HERODOT. lib. viii. c. 85. THUCYDID. lib. i. JOSEPH. antiquit. lib. xi. c. 6. GRÆG. ABU'L FAR. ubi sup. p. 195.

Obeid'allah

sends a body of troops against him.

THE Emir Obeid'allah, being apprized of Hosein's approach, detached Harro Ebn Yezid, of the tribe of Temimab, with 1000 horse, to meet him on the road, and conduct him, with all the people attending him, to Cúfa. Harro, who was far from being an enemy to Hosein, advanced at the head of his troops to Asheraf; and, when Hosein came up, imparted to him the orders he had received. Hosein at first attempted to engage Harro directly in his interest; but finding this impracticable, he said, he would die rather than suffer those orders to be put in execution; and commanded his men instantly to continue their march. But this Harro opposed; which provoked Hosein to curse him in the following terms, pretty frequently used amongst the Arabs, May your mother be childless of you! This not a little exasperated Harro; who, nevertheless, only replied, "If any other person had treated me as you have done, I should not have failed recriminating; but there is no room to speak of your mother without the highest respect." Then ordering his men to retreat, he told Hosein, that he was not commanded to fight him, but only to conduct him to Cúfa; adding, that if he thought fit either to go to Medina, or take any other road that did not lead directly to Cúfa, he should meet with no opposition from him. Nay, he ventured farther to assure him, that if he could assemble a body of troops sufficient to enable him to fall upon Obeid'allah's forces, and not suffer himself to be attacked first by that commander, he would, in his opinion, be in a fair way of carrying his point. After which, Hosein moved towards Kadesia, famous for the bloody battle fought there between the Arabs and the Persians, and was accosted at Adib by a small party of four horse; whose guide Thirmab informed him, that the noblesse of Cúfa were resolved to oppose him; and that though the rest of the Cúfans were his friends, to-morrow their swords would all be drawn against him. He also assured him, that his messenger Kais, who had been sent before to dispose the Cúfans to give him a good reception, had been thrown down headlong from the top of the castle, for cursing Obeid'allah, and his father Ziyád, when he was commanded by the former to curse Ali and Hosein. This news greatly affected Hosein; upon which, Thirmab offered to conduct him to mount Aja, a place impregnable by its situation, in the province of Najd, and even to attempt assembling a body of ten thousand men, of the tribe of Tay, to support him. But Hosein still persisting in his resolution of advancing towards Kadesia and Nineveh, Thirmab took his leave of him, and, with the four horse he was conducting, continued his rout. The next day Hosein, with Harro, who still attended him, arrived at Nineveh, a town distant from the ancient city going under the same name, which stood on the eastern bank of the Tigris. Here Harro met with an express, who brought him an order from Obeid'allah to prevent Hosein from possessing himself of any fortified town, or place of strength, before the arrival of his forces. This order came to hand on Friday the second day of the month Al Moharram, in the 61st year of the Hejra; and the next day Amer Ebn Saad, having received advice of Hosein's approach, appeared with a body of 4000 men, who had for some time pitched their tents without the walls of Cúfa. Those troops were upon the point of marching to Deylam; but as the partisans of the house of Hâshem began now to be in motion, Obeid'allah commanded Amer to lead them against Hosein. This, for some time, at the instigation of his nephew and others, Amer refused to do; but at last, being intimidated by Obeid'allah's menaces, he moved with all his forces to Kerbela, where Hosein was at that time posted. Here he was joined by Harro with 1000 horse; so that, after this junction, the Moslem troops destined to act against Hosein amounted to 5000 men. However, before the commencement of hostilities, several messages passed between Amer and Hosein; when the latter finding his affairs in a desperate situation, and that the Cúfans had deserted him, offered to return home, if Obeid'allah would permit him. Upon this, Amer wrote to the governor, and acquainted him with the overture made by Hosein; but received for answer, that no proposal from him would be listened to, till he had acknowledged Yezid to be the true and lawful emperor of the faithful. At the same time, Obeid'allah commanded Amer Ebn Saad Ebn Abi Wakkás to cut off all communication between Hosein's camp and the Euphrates, or rather those branches of it called by Abu'l Faraj the rivers of Kerbela; that by this means he might oblige him to surrender to the Khalif's forces, without any effusion of Moslem blood. In these calamitous circumstances, Hosein and Amer, at the request of the former, held a conference between the two armies; each of them being attended by an escorte of twenty horse. In this conference, Hosein desired to be permitted either to accommodate matters in person with Yezid, or to return into Arabia, or, lastly, to command some remote garison in Khorasán, where he might distinguish himself against the Turks. But Obeid'allah was dissuaded from accepting of any of these conditions by Sha-

° MS. Hunt. num. 495. in Bibl. Bodl. Oxon. MS. Laud. in Bibl. Bodl. Oxon. num. 161. ABU JAAFAR AL TAEARI & AL MAKIN, ubi sup. p. 51. GREG. ABU'L FAR. ubi sup. p. 195.

a mer Ebn Dhu'ljeysuf, who scrupled not to accuse Amer of carrying on a clandestine negotiation with Hosein; though the governor at first discovered no repugnancy to an accommodation. According to a tradition, mentioned by Mr. Ockley, though he names not the author of it, Hosein begged he might either have leave to return to the place from whence he came, or be permitted to sound the people of Irâk, in order to discover whether they had really any intention of declaring for him. Be that as it will, Obeid'allah would grant neither Hosein, nor the people attending him, any terms; offering them only this alternative, either to submit to the Khalîf, or leave the point in dispute to the decision of the sword<sup>p</sup>.

OBEID'ALLAH being at this time sufficiently apprized of the seditious disposition of the Cîsans, was resolved to bring matters to an éclaircissement, before Hosein advanced nearer Kerbela.
 b to the gates of their city. He, therefore, sent Shamer, upon whom he could intirely depend, with a body of 5000 men, to reinforce the troops under Amer; whom he ordered once more to assure Hosein, that if he and his men would submit to Yezid, no violence should be offered them; but that if they refused such submission, they should all be put to the sword. He likewise ordered Shamer to strike off Amer's head, if he discovered any reluctance to an engagement with Hosein, and to take upon himself the command of all the forces. At the same time, the governor offered his protection to Abbâs, Abd'allah, Jaafar, and Othmân, four of Ali's sons; which they refused to accept; saying, that the security of God was better than that of the son of Somyab. By which appellation, they intended to stigmatize Obeid'allah; intimating thereby, that he was the son of one of Somyab's bastards, his father Ziyâd having been the fruit of an illicit commerce between that c strumpet and Abu Sofiân. Amer having received Obeid'allah's orders by Shamer, together with a letter severely reprimanding him for not attacking Hosein sooner, drew up his army in order of battle, and advanced towards the enemy. This happening after evening-prayer, Hosein, who, with his brother Abbâs, was then in his tent, begged a truce till the following day; which was easily granted by Amer. In the mean time, Hosein's sister viewed with the utmost horror and consternation her brother's approaching fate. She was quite disconsolate, fainted away, and discovered all the symptoms of grief and despair; tho' Hosein did every thing in his power to comfort her. He endeavoured also to calm the minds of his men, who seemed then to be under the most dreadful apprehensions, by advising them to retire d to their respective habitations. This, however, they could by no means be induced to do, most of them being determined not to survive him. But notwithstanding the ferment they were in, he did not omit making the proper dispositions for his defence. He ordered all the tents, of which his camp was composed, to be fastened to one another with ropes and cords, and to be fortified at one end with a trench; so that the whole, which was finished in the night, formed a sort of barricade. Into the trench he caused to be thrown a large quantity of wood, and other combustible materials, which his men set on fire, to prevent their being surrounded; so that they could be attacked only in front. They spent the night in prayers and supplications, whilst the horse of the enemy's guard were perpetually moving round them. The next morning, the troops on both sides made such movements, e as are for the most part immediately previous to an engagement. Hosein drew up his small army, which, according to an Arab writer of good authority, consisted only of thirty-two horse and forty foot (tho' Abu Jaafar makes the whole number to have amounted to fifty horse and an hundred foot) in order of battle, and made as good a disposition of this considerable force, as the nature of the ground on which he incamped, and the short space of time, allowed him to do it in, would permit. Amer, as soon as the day appeared, having ranged his troops in battle-array, approached the barricade, in order to begin the attack; and found Hosein, who had before washed and perfumed himself, according to the Arab custom, wherein he was followed by his principal officers, prepared to receive him in a proper manner. Upon this motion of Amer, Hosein instantly mounted his horse, as did his son Ali, f laid the Korân before him, and earnestly pressed the soldiers that attended him to a performance of their duty. This drew a fresh flood of tears from his sisters and daughters, who rent the air with their lamentations; upon which, he sent his son Ali, and his brother Abbâs, to pacify and appease them, declaring, that he would die in the field of battle, rather than renounce his right in so servile a manner as was required of him to any tyrant whatsoever. Which moving scene so affected Harro, that he expressed great sorrow for having intercepted Hosein, immediately joined him with thirty horse, and came to a determination to die with him. He also made a final effort to mollify Amer, but without effect; that general alleging, that the express orders he had received from Obeid'allah would not permit him to follow pacific measures. Upon which, Harro upbraided him, as well as the g Cîsans in general, with having imposed upon Hosein, and with having deprived him and his men of the water of the Euphrates, of which Jews, Christians, and Sabians, were permitted<sup>a</sup> to drink, and in which even hogs and dogs were suffered to sport themselves. An accommodation, therefore, being impracticable, Shamer Ebn Dhu'ljezowsh began the attack, and showers of arrows were on both sides discharged. But before the action became general, Abd'allah Ebn Amer, having obtained leave of Hosein to fight them, killed Tafer and Salem, two of Amer's men, in single combat; and another of the enemy attempting to engage Hosein, his horse threw him, dragged him with his left foot in the stirrup, his right leg having been cut off by one of Hosein's men, and at last destroyed him, by dashing his head against some stones. Several other combats were fought, wherein Hosein's men, being animated by despair, were superior to their antagonists; which induced Amer to order his soldiers to desist from that kind of engagement. After this, Amru Ebn Hejâj, who commanded<sup>b</sup> the right wing, charged Hosein's troops with great fury, crying out aloud to the Cûfans, "Behave with bravery against those who separate from the religion, from the congregation, and from the Imâm." To whom Hosein, with great coolness replied, "You are the separatists; when your souls have taken their flight from your bodies, you will know which of us deserve hell-fire most." In this attack, Moslem Ebn Aufâjab, the first that fell on Hosein's side, was killed, after he had behaved with unparalleled bravery. Several other Arab officers likewise at this time lost their lives; though the Cûfans, notwithstanding the inequality of numbers, were not able to make themselves masters of the person of Hosein. The little body of cavalry that surrounded him sustained the shock with incredible firmness and intrepidity, and at last forced the enemy to retire with considerable loss<sup>c</sup>.

<sup>p</sup> MS. Laud. in Bibl. Bodl. Oxon. num. 161. GREG. ABU'L FAR. ubi sup. GOLII not. ad Alfragan. p. 234. D'HÉREL. Biblioth. orient. in art. Houffuin. ABU JAAFAR AL TABARI & AL MAKIN, ubi sup.

Hosein defeated and killed.

THE right wing thus failing in its attempt upon Hosein, Shamer, who commanded the left, fell upon the Arab cavalry with such fury, that he had well nigh broke them, and even penetrated to Hosein. However, he was at last repulsed, and obliged to send to Amer for a reinforcement of 500 archers. Upon the arrival of these succours, the Cûfans under Shamer renewed the attack upon Hosein's camp, and so galled his cavalry, or rather their horses, with their arrows, that they were obliged to dismount, and fight on foot. Amongst the rest, Harro being forced to abandon his horse, by reason of a wound he had received, defended himself with his sword for a considerable time. Shamer, finding his efforts hitherto ineffectual, resolved to destroy the barricade; and therefore commanded his men to advance, and overthrow the tents that formed it. But they met with such a warm reception from the troops which defended them, that, after a vigorous action, they were again repulsed, left several of their men dead upon the spot, and were obliged to betake themselves to a precipitate flight. Shamer then attempted to set fire to Hosein's tent, but without effect; the Arabs driving his troops before them, and forcing them to abandon the camp they had attacked, with considerable loss. The battle now grew hot in all parts; notwithstanding which, Hosein performed his devotions with great fervency, saying the noon-prayers amongst the poor remains of his shatter'd troops, to which he added that of Fear, which is never used but in cases of the last extremity. The fight having already proved almost fatal to Hosein, notwithstanding the incredible valour of the Arabs, most of his men having been killed, and amongst the rest Habib, an officer of great merit and distinction; Shamer charged the small phalanx that supported him with such fury, that he broke it, put to the sword several of the soldiers that formed it, particularly one that had killed no less than ten of his men, as also Ali, the son of Hosein, who was first wounded with a lance, and afterwards cut to pieces, with unrelenting barbarity. Most of the rest were shot by the Irâkian archers; so that Hosein, his little son Abd'allah, and a nephew of his, that was likewise a child, were almost the only persons who survived the common destruction. The last of these had his hand cut off, and was killed, when he was upon the point of embracing his uncle Hosein; and Abd'allah was struck dead with an arrow, whilst he was in his father's lap. As for Hosein himself, he first received a wound in the head, which filled his helmet with blood, and was afterwards shot in the mouth with an arrow, whilst he was quenching his thirst. However, he continued still to defend himself like a man animated by despair; insomuch that none of the Irâkians durst, for a considerable time, attempt to give him the fatal stroke. Nay, his sister Zeinab, the daughter of Fâtema, turning to Amer, asked him whether he could have the heart to see Hosein slain? Upon which, the tears ran down his beard, and he turned his face away from her. But Shamer, who was of a more fierce and brutal disposition, cursed and upbraided his men for not approaching Hosein; whereupon one of them wounded him in the hand, another in the neck, and a third thrust him through with his spear. In fine, he received thirty-four contusions, and thirty-three wounds. After his death, his head was cut off, and the Irâkians rode over his dead body so often, that they trod it into the very ground. Shamer, not satisfied with his blood, intended to have butcher'd<sup>d</sup> likewise his youngest son Ali, afterwards called Zein Alabedin, or Zein Alab'addin, i. e. the a ornament of the religious, who was then very sick, and young; but was diverted by one of his officers from putting in execution so cruel a design. All the riches and spoil taken from Hosein and his family, even the womens richest cloaths, were divided amongst the Khalif's troops; tho' the particular manner in which this was done has not been handed down to us by any of the Moslem authors. The night after the battle, Hawla carried Hosein's head to his own house; which so disgusted his wife, that she abandoned his bed, and could never afterwards be persuaded to cohabit with him. Nay, the woman that he took to supply her place that night, was terrified, as we are told by an Arab writer, by a supernatural light ascending from the spot on which Hosein's head was deposited towards heaven, and certain white birds that continually hovered over it. The next morning Hawla carried the head

<sup>a</sup> MS. Laud. num. 161. & MS. Hunt. num. 495. in Bibl. Bodl. Oxon. ABU JAAFAR AL TABARI, AL MAKIN, & GREG. ABU'L FAR. ubi sup. D'HERBEL. Biblioth. orient. ubi sup. & in art. Jizid.

b to Obeid'allah, who struck it over the mouth with his stick, and treated it with great contempt. This so offended Zeid Ebn Arkom, that he gave the governor opprobrious language, for discovering so savage a disposition; which had like to have cost him his head. Thus ended the battle of Kerbela, fought on the 10th day of the month Al Moharram, in the 61st year of the Hejra; which proved so fatal to the house of Hâshem; and so firmly established Yezid upon the Moslem throne. The Arabs, according to an eastern author, much esteemed by Mr. Ockley, had 72 men killed in the action, 17 of whom were descended from Fâtema; and the troops of Irâk 88, besides a considerable number wounded; tho' if we will believe Abu Jaafar Al Tabari, not above thirty-eight of the Khalif's men fell on the field of battle. According to the same historian, Obeid'allah ordered the head of Hosein to c be carried through the city, exposed to public view, fixed for some time, with forty others, upon one of the gates of Cûfa, and afterwards, with the women, and his son Ali, sent to Yezid at Damascus. Hosein, as some say, was about fifty-five or fifty-six, or, as others will have it, fifty-eight or fifty-nine, years old, at the time of his death. The principal officers slain on the side of the Arabs, in this unfortunate action, besides Hosein, were Habib, Abd'allah Ebn Moslem Ebn Okail, Mohammed and Awn, the sons of Abd'allah Ebn Jaafar Ebn Abu Tâleb, Ali the elder son of Hosein, Harro Ebn Yezid, and Moslem Ebn Ausâjah. Some authors relate, that Hosein was killed by Senân Ebn Anas, and others by Shamer himself. The Arab historians likewise differ in their opinion concerning the person who cut off Hosein's head; some of them ascribing this barbarous action to Hawla Ebn Yezid, and others to Nafr Zeinab, Hosein's daughter, went, after the battle, to the citadel, where Obeid'allah had a conference with her, in which he reflected, with great warmth and asperity of expression, upon the family of Hosein, which provoked Zeinab to reproach him for his cruelty in such severe terms, that he was near issuing an order for her execution. After examination, finding that Hosein's youngest son Ali was arrived at puberty, he also threatened to execute him before her face; but, being mollified by her tears, he was at last prevailed upon to spare both of them, notwithstanding the high provocation he pretended to have received. We must beg leave to inform our curious readers here, that Kerbela, or Kerbala, was the name of a district, or territory, in Babylonian, or Chaldean, Irâk, famous for the death and sepulchre of Hosein. This district, or territory, lies a little to the west of the city called Kasr Ebn Hobeirah, and e at a small distance from Cûfa. The Persians still retain the name of Kerbala in their songs and elegies, made to commemorate the fatal death of Hosein; from whom the bulk of those sectaries, as has been already observed, derive the descent, or succession, of their Imâms.

f THE first time Obeid'allah went to the great mosque in Cûfa, after the defeat of Hosein, Yezid's behaviour to the memory of Ali, and highly reflecting upon his family. He praised God therein for discovering the truth, and those who were in possession it; as also for assisting Yezid, the emperor of the faithful, and his party; and, lastly, for destroying the liar Hosein, the son of the liar Ali, and his adherents. This so incensed the friends of the house of Hâshem, many of whom were then present, who rose up from their seats with great indignation, that they

g could scarce forbear shewing their resentment in the most public and violent manner. One of them in particular, who in two battles had lost his eyes, and continued for the most part in the mosque from morning till evening, performing his devotions, cried out, whilst the governor was in the midst of his harangue, O son of Merjânah! the liar, and the son of the liar, you, your father, and those from whom you derive your commission, kill the sons of the prophets, and yet pretend to speak the words of honest men. Upon which, Obeid'allah ordered him to be instantly seized; but he was soon rescued by those of his own party, about 700 of whom were at that time in town. However, he was killed not long after, and hung upon a gibbet, erected for that purpose at a small distance from Cûfa; which barbarity rendered Obeid'allah extremely odious to the inhabitants of that place. Nor was his bloody treatment of Hosein at all relished by the Khalif; who, upon the arrival of an express dispatched from

<sup>r</sup> MS. Laud. num. 161. ISM. ABU'LFED. ubi sup. MS. Hunt. num. 495. ABU JAAFAR AL TABAR. & AL MAKIN, ubi sup. p. 51, 52. GREG. ABU'LFAR. ubi sup. p. 196, 197. D'HERBEL. in Biblioth. orient. ubi sup. & in art. Kerbela. OCKLEY'S hist. of the Sarac. vol. ii. p. 105, 211, &c.

Cúfa, to bring him advice of what had happened, and to congratulate him upon the success of his arms, is reported to have shed tears, and said, "God curse the son of Somyab," meaning Obeid'allab; "I should have been well pleased without the death of Hosein. Had he been with me, I should have pardoned him. God loved Hosein, but did not suffer him to arrive at the dignity to which he aspired." Before young Ali, and the women of Hosein's family, entered Damascus, Yezid consulted his courtiers about the disposal of them. One of these told the Khalif, that nothing could better support his interest than the extinction of the line of Hosein; to whom Yezid, not approving of what he proposed, made no manner of reply. Another of a milder disposition delivered his sentiments in the following terms: "O emperor of the faithful, treat them as would the apostle of God himself, were he to see them in this disconsolate condition." This moved his compassion; which was farther excited, when he saw the head of Hosein; insomuch that he could not forbear breaking out into this pathetic exclamation: "O Hosein, had it been in my power to have saved thee, thy life should not have been taken away!" When Hosein's wives and children were brought before him, and he saw the women appear in such mean and sordid attire, he cursed Obeid'allab again, calling him by way of contempt the son of Somyab, for suffering his troops to strip them of their most valuable effects in so shameful a manner. He afterwards entered into discourse with Ali, the son of Hosein, and his sisters Fátima and Zeinab, wherein some warmth and asperity of expression, not to say personal reflections, on both sides were used; tho', when the conversation was over, the Khalif ordered them to be conducted to the hot bath, and sent them cloaths suitable to their quality, as well as all sorts of refreshments, to comfort them after the fatigues they had sustained. He also treated the women with the utmost respect; Moáwiyah's widows keeping them company for the space of three days, at his command, and mourning with them for Hosein. He once asked Amru, Hosein's son, a child, whom he took with him, as well as his brother Ali, whenever he walked abroad, whether he would fight his son Khâled? Amru answered, "Give me one knife, and him another." Which an enemy of the house of Hâshem taking advantage of, said to Yezid, in order to incense him against the child, "One serpent naturally begets another." But this produced no alteration in the Khalif's conduct. He continued to treat with lenity, not to say tenderness, the distressed family of Hosein; and dismissed them with great politeness, after they had sufficiently refreshed themselves, and were upon the point of setting out for Medina, the place of their destination. He ordered his wives and children to take leave of them in a friendly manner; commanded Nooman Ebn Basbar to furnish them with a proper escorte, as well as a quantity of provisions sufficient to enable them to perform the journey they were to undertake; and once more assured them, in the most moving terms, that he would have saved Hosein, had it been in his power, even tho' this could not have been done without the loss of some of his own children; and that he would endeavour, by all possible means, to make the place of their residence agreeable to them. The commander of the escorte that attended them so won the hearts of Fátima and Zeinab, by his tenderness and indulgence, that they offered him all the jewels the plunderers had left them; which he modestly declined accepting, telling them, that, "had he been influenced by any worldly considerations, a less reward would have been sufficient; but that the kindness they had met with from him was shewn for them God's sake, and on account of their relation to the prophet." Upon their arrival at Medina, they were visited immediately by the whole family of Hâshem, who came to condole with them for the loss of their father, and their unhappy fate. We must not forget to inform our readers, that, according to Khondemir, Ali, surnamed Zein Alabeddin, or Zein Alab'addin, i. e. the ornament of the religious, as has been already observed, at this time conducted with the rest of the family to Medina, has all along been considered by the Persians as the fourth lawful Imâm.

Where Hosein's head and body were buried.

FROM the preceding account of Yezid's behaviour to the family of Hosein, extracted from some Arab writers of good authority, it appears highly improbable, that he should have insulted the head of that Imâm; and not, without great difficulty, have permitted it to be buried at Damascus, as we find asserted by M. D'Herbelot; in which article, as well as many others, he seems to have been misled by the Persian historians. The place in which the Khalif ordered it to be interred there was called Bab al faradis, the garden-gate; from whence it was removed first to Ascalon, or Asbkelon, in Palestine, and afterwards to Cairo or Al Kabi-rab, by the Fátemite Khalifs of Egypt. Some of those Khalifs erected a monument, or mosque, over it, which went under the name of Mashhad Hosein, the sepulchre of Hosein the martyr. These Khalifs were masters of Syria and Egypt, from before the year 400 till after the year 660 of the Hejra, and pretended that Hosein's head came not into Egypt till after the 500th year of that era. But that story has been rejected, says a reputable Arab author, by the Imâms of the learned. Those princes deduced their origin from Fátima, the

* MS. Laud. num. 161. & MS. Hunt. num. 495. in Bibl. Bodl. Oxon. KHONDEMIR, D'HERBEL. Biblioth. orient. in art. Ali Ben Hossain, p. 96, 97. GREG. ABUL FAR. ubi sup. p. 197.

- a daughter of Mohammed, and consequently looked upon themselves as descended from Ali; for which reason they assumed the name, or rather the surname, of Fâtemites, as an appellation more immediately pointing out the nobility of their extraction. With regard to the body of Hosein, it was interred in the plain of Kerbela, where he was slain; and Adado'd-dawla, surnamed also Abu Shaja', the second Soltân of the dynasty of the Buiyans, or Deylamites, raised a sumptuous monument upon the spot where it was inhumed, which is to this day visited with great devotion by the Persians. The Soltân called his magnificent edifice Kunbud Faiz, which, in the Persian language, signifies the magnificent dome; but at this time it goes among the Arabs under the denomination of Mashhad Hosein, the sepulchre of Hosein the martyr. The Khalîf Al Motawakkel, being an enemy to the house of Ali, forbade, under rigorous penalties, any of his subjects to perform the pilgrimage to Hosein's tomb. Nay, in order effectually to prevent this, he intirely razed the mosque built upon the spot, where had been deposited the remains of that Imâm; and not content with this, being resolved to efface all traces of it, he attempted to draw a canal of water over that place. But the water, say the Shiites, would never approach it, keeping its distance out of respect; from whence that water received the denomination of Hair, that is, astonished and respectful; a name which has since passed to the sepulchre itself, on account of this miracle. The Shiites call that sepulchre Mashhad Mokaddes, Moali, and Mozzeki, i. e. the holy, sublime, and pure place, or sepulchre; because Hosein, whom they regard as a martyr, suffered death there. Nor did this impious attempt of Al Motawakkel, according to some Persian traditions, go long unpunished; Ali soon after appearing to him in his sleep, and, after having reproached him with the outrages committed upon his descendants, gave him seven lashes with a whip that he had in his hand. The Khalîf telling his friends the next day what had happened, one of them assured him, that the whip Ali had in his hand was no other weapon than the famous sword Dhu'l-Fakar, which belonged at first to Monba Ebn Hejab, the Sabanite, and fell into the hands of Mohammed at the battle of Bedr, and, after the prophet's death, came into the possession of his son-in-law Ali; to which he likewise added, that this dream, or vision, portended some signal misfortune to him, by way of punishment, for the hatred he bore the family of that Imâm. Which prediction, or prognostication, continue the same traditions, was verified two days after, when Al Motawakkel was assassinated by some of his servants, that were Turks, at the instigation of his son Al Montaser, who, after his death, mounted the Moslem throne. We are told by an author extremely well acquainted with the oriental historians, that the sepulchre of Hosein stood not very far from that of his father Ali; tho', according to an Arab writer of considerable credit, one Na'im was angry with any one who would pretend to point out the place where the former of those Imâms lay interred<sup>1</sup>.

THE death of Hosein did not remain long unrevenged; several persons appearing in this Hosein's death and the following reigns, who demanded the blood of Hosein; that is, in the language of afterwards the Moslems, insisted upon vengeance being taken of the murderers of that Imâm. Al Mokhtar, one of the chiefs of that faction, in particular, boasted that he had destroyed near 50,000 of the enemies of the house of Ali, without reckoning those who were slain in the battles which he fought. The two titles generally given by the Persians to Hosein are Shahid, the martyr, and Seid, the lord. By the words Al Seidân, the two lords, without any addition, they always understand the two eldest sons of Ali, Hasan and Hosein. According to Ebn Shohnah, the latter of those Imâms made before God every twenty-four hours a thousand adorations, or prostrations; and, at the age of fifty-five years, had performed 25 pilgrimages to Mecca on foot; whereas one of them would have been sufficient to have procured salvation for a pious Moslem. We are told by Abu'l Faraj, that there fell no less than three of his own sons, and seven of those of Ali, with Hosein, when he was killed in the battle fought on the plain of Kerbela<sup>2</sup>.

- f YEZDI, in a treatise concerning divine love, relates, that Hosein having one day asked his father Ali if he loved him, and received for answer, that he loved him tenderly; he then demanded of his father if he loved God? to which he also answered in the affirmative. Upon which, Hosein said to him, "Two loves can never meet in the same heart." At these words, Ali was so moved, that he could not forbear shedding tears; when Hosein, touched with the impression his words had made, in order to comfort his father, again asked him, "Whether he should consider the sin of infidelity, or his death, as the greater evil?" Ali replied, "I would rather deliver you up to death than abandon my faith."

<sup>1</sup> D'HERBEL. Biblioth. orient. in art. Houffain, p. 462. & in art. Motawakkel, p. 640, 641. ISM. ABU'LFED. in hist. univ. MS. Huntingt. num. 495. ubi sup. ISM. ABU'LFED. de vit. Mahom. c. lxx. p. 153. AL JANNAB. GAGN. la vie de Mahom. tom. ii. c. viii. p. 355. ABU JAAFAR AL TABAR. & AL MAKIN, in hist. Sarac. lib. ii. c. xi. p. 151, 152, 153. GREG ABU'L FAR. in hist. dynast. p. 261, 262. OCKLEY, ubi sup. p. 221, 222, 223. See also SALE's map of Arabia, prefixed to his preliminary discourse. <sup>2</sup> D'HERBEL. Biblioth. orient. in art. Houffain, p. 463. EBN SHOHNAH, GREG. ABU'L FAR. ubi sup. p. 196.

“ By this mark then,” said Hosein, “ it is apparent that the love you have for me is only a natural tenderness; and that you bear towards God a true love.” Many other sayings, attributed to Hosein, have been preserved by the Persians, who hold his memory in the highest veneration, and consider him as the great progenitor of their Imâms. Hence it comes to pass, that the day of his death, the 10th of the month Al Moharram, in the year of the Hejra 61, is so celebrated amongst them, that they have all along, from that very year to this day, called it Yaum Hosein, Rûz Hosein, the day of Hosein. Nor can it be doubted, but the anniversary weeping and extravagant lamentation on this day, still kept up by the Persians, principally contribute to the subsistence of the aversion bore by that nation to the other Moslems, who entertain different sentiments of this great Imâm. The superstitious observance of this day, and the many ridiculous fictions framed by the Shiites concerning Hosein, have been sufficiently exposed by an Arab author, cited often in this work; to whom, for farther satisfaction on this head, we must beg leave to refer our curious and inquisitive readers <sup>w</sup>.

The Moslems
make themselves masters of the kingdom of Khowarazm.

THE same year, Yezid appointed Salem Ebn Ziyâd to preside over Sejstân and Khoraśân, when he came ambassador to him. Salem was then but twenty-four years of age, tho' he was in all respects qualified for the honourable post assigned him. Soon after he had entered upon his government, he assembled a body of troops, in order to make an irruption into the Turkish territories. He took his wife along with him in this expedition, who was brought to bed of a son in the Sogd of Samarkand, or the circumjacent villages and plains in the neighbourhood of that city. This child from the place of his nativity, was surnamed Al Sogdi, or the Sogdian. Salem's wife, at this juncture, borrowed some jewels of the prince of Sogd's lady, which she carried off with her, upon the return of the Arabs into their own dominions. In the mean time, Salem sent a strong detachment, under the command of Mohalleb, to Khovarazm, the principal city of the Turks, or Tartars, in those parts, which exacted an immense sum of the inhabitants, amounting to 50,000,000 pieces of money; part of which he reserved for his own use, and sent the rest to Yezid. Then he advanced to Samarkand, forced the citizens to pay him likewise a vast sum of money, and afterwards retired with little loss into the provinces he governed. The city of Khovarazm, in the time of the Khalif Yezid, was the capital of the kingdom of the same name, the Chorasnia of Ptolemy and Herodotus, and the same with that afterwards called Kharizme, Korkang, Orkang, and at present Urgens. It was situate in a western direction from the Jihûn, the Oxus of the antients; or, as the situation of Urgens has been more accurately determined by the modern geographers, in a great plain to the north of the river Amû, in lat. 39° 50', twenty-five German leagues from the eastern shores of the Caspian sea. The tract called Sogd, or the Sogd of Samarkand, went under the name of Sogdiana in the days of Ptolemy and Ammianus Marcellinus, and of Sugdias in those of Dionysius Afer. The natives were denominated Sogdiani and Sogdii, in the Roman times, as appears from Ptolemy and Strabo. The Moslems, under the conduct of Mohalleb, did not only acquire an immense quantity of plunder, in this expedition, but likewise made themselves masters of the kingdom of Khovarazm *.

Abd'allah Ebn Zobeir proclaimed Khalif
at Medina.

ABD'ALLAH EBN ZOBEIR, after the death of Hosein, finding himself at the head of the partisans of the house of Hâshem, who was greatly oppressed by Yezid, began to entertain thoughts in earnest of aspiring to the Khalifat. As he had, therefore, never recognized Yezid's authority, he now declared publicly against him, and deposed him in a formal manner at Medina; being supported by the inhabitants of that city, as well as those of Mecca; who, soon after the arrival of Hosein's family at Medina, proclaimed him Khalif. After his inauguration, in order to render himself more popular amongst them, he aggravated all the circumstances of Hosein's death to the last degree, and represented the Cûfans, who had first invited Hosein to their city, and afterwards deserted him, as the most faithless and perfidious villains upon earth, in his speeches to the people; which produced the desired effect. For, the citizens, who had always been well affected to Hosein, heard these discourses with delight; especially as Abd'allah took care in them, to give the highest character of that Imâm; to expatiate upon his heroical conduct, in preferring to an ignominious life an honourable death; to magnify his merits, and remind them of his supereminent sanctity; and, in fine, to exhibit to their view every thing that might excite in them

<sup>w</sup> YESIDI, in refalat si biyâni'l mehabbat. D'HERBEL. ubi sup. MS. Huntingt. in Bibl. Bodl. Oxon. num. 495. ubi sup. OCKLEY, ubi sup. p. 226—231. * MS. Laud. num. 161. in Bibl. Bodl. Oxon. ubi sup. GOLII. not. ad Alfragan. p. 120, 121, et alibi. PTOL. geogr. lib. vi. c. xii. p. 160. edit. Bert. HERODOT. lib. iii. c. xciii. p. 200. Lond. 1679. STRAB. lib. xi. ARRIAN. lib. iv. c. 15. CURT. lib. vii. c. iv. et lib. viii. c. 1. DIONYS. perieg. v. 746, 747. ATHEN. deipnosoph. lib. ii. sub. fin. AMMIAN. MARCELLIN. lib. xxiii. c. 26. PLIN. lib. vi. c. 16. CHRISTOPH. CELLAR. geogr. antiq. lib. iii. c. xxi. p. 832—835. Lipsiæ, 1706. An account of the present state of the NORTHERN ASIA, par. i. c. ii. p. 420, 438, 440. Lond. 1729. Vide etiam ISM. ABU'LFED. in tab. ULUGH BEIGH, in tab. &c.

- a a desire of revenging his death, and inspire them with an abhorrence of that government, which had been the cause it. They, therefore, flocked to him in such numbers, that he soon found himself at the head of a considerable force. Yezid, being informed of his progress, swore he would have him in chains, and accordingly sent a silver collar for him to Merwân, then governor of Medina, with orders to put it about his neck, and send him to Damascus, if he did not immediately desist from his attempt. But Abd'allah, having secured the affections of the people, ridiculed both the Khalîf and his deputy, as well as the collar that had been prepared for him. As Yezid was a man of a very dissolute life, spending his time wholly in drinking wine, and with his dogs, and had not the least regard for religion, he was perfectly abhorred by the Arabs; and consequently the menaces he uttered against
- b Abd'allah did not in the least tend to the diminution of his authority. Besides, it was very well known in Arabia, that when his father Moâwiyah had reprimanded him for his abandoned course of life, and advised him to conform his actions more to the precepts of the Korân, he had slighted his wholesome reproofs, and treated with contempt his salutary admonitions; which made the Arabs to consider him as a wretch altogether incorrigible. About this time, Amru Ebn Sa'id, governor of Mecca, having been assured by Abd'allah Ebn Amru in Egypt, a person who had studied the prophet Daniel, and was celebrated amongst all the Moslems for his wisdom and knowledge of future events, whom he had consulted on this occasion, that, in his opinion, Abd'allah Ebn Zobeir would live and die a king; this prejudiced farther in his favour the bulk of the Arab nation. Nay, Amru Ebn Sa'id himself, tho'
- c he secretly hated him, thought it policy, as affairs then stood, to keep up a good understanding with him. This induced some of Yezid's courtiers, who probably before were no friends to Amru, to suggest to the Khalîf, that, had the commandant of Mecca been heartily in his master's interest, he might have seized Abd'allah Ebn Zobeir, and sent him to Damascus. Upon which suggestion, Yezid dismissed Amru from his post, and substituted Walid Ebn Otbah in his room. These commotions happened in the 61st year of the Hejra, about the same time that Salem Ebn Ziyâd was employed in the expedition to Samarkhand, or at least a little before the commencement of that expedition. According to Abu Jaafar Al Tabari, Salem first advanced to Nisabor, or Naisabour, the capital of Khorasân, which he reduced; and from thence penetrated to Khowarazm, which likewise surrendered to
- d him. The same author also relates, that he detached Mohalleb Ebn Abu Saфра with a body of troops against Khatûn, queen of Bukhâra, or Bokhâra, who had been joined by the king of Sa'id with an army of 120,000 men. Mohalleb, continues he, notwithstanding the prodigious inequality of numbers, defeated Khatûn, and the king of Sa'id, and dispersed their numerous forces. The king of Sa'id, on whom Khatûn had promised to bestow herself in marriage, was killed in the action, together with a considerable part of his troops; after which Bukhâra, or Bokhâra, a very famous and antient city of Mawara'lnabr, Transoxiâna, or, as it is now called, Great Bukhâria, submitted to the victors, and was, with the territory belonging to it, annexed to the Moslem empire. The city of Bukhâra, the capital of Great Bukharia, or rather of the province of Bukharia, properly so called, and situated in
- e lat. 39° 30', is at present the residence of the Khân of Great Bukhâria, of a vast extent, and fortified with a strong rampart fenced with earth. It stands about seven days journey to the south of Samarkand, upon a little river, that is said to fall into the Jihûn, the Amu, or the Oxus, about the 92° of longitude. This river is called by the Arabs Sogd, or Al Soghd, and, as some writers assert, has its source in the cold and mountainous part of Fargana. Its water is said to be very bad, and to breed worms in the legs of those who drink it. One of the three parts of Bukhâra is formed by the Khân's castle, and the buildings depending upon it; another by the places destined for the Mursas, or officers of the court, and others belonging to the retinue of the Khân; and the third, which is larger than the others, for the burghers, merchants, and other inhabitants. The mosques, baths, and such-like public edifices, are built of brick, and of a fine structure; but the other buildings consist only
- f of earth. The situation of this place is very convenient for trade, especially that between Grand Tartary, Persia, and the Indies; and the inhabitants actually supply the dominions of the Great Mogul, and part of Persia, with all sorts of dried fruits of a most exquisite flavour. It has produced a very considerable number of learned men, and some of the brightest genius's of the east; amongst whom we may reckon the famous Ebn Sina, or Avicenna, so well known by his writings even in our part of the world. Some authors place it above a day's journey from the Oxus. It was surrounded with delicious gardens, stately towers, magnificent palaces, or rather splendid country seats, pleasant villages, and fine verdant fields; all which were environed by a wall of twelve parasangs in extent, in the days of Abu'lfeda. We are told by Tâkût, that the Arabs passed the Jihûn, the Amu, or the Oxus, overthrew the Bukharian forces assembled by Khatûn and possessed themselves of Bukhâra, in the Khalifat of Moâwiyah, about the 55th year of the Hejra. But the best and most antient

antient Arab historians fix this expedition, as has been already observed, with greater accuracy and precision, in the 61st year of that æra <sup>y</sup>.

Great commotions at Medina.

WALID EBN OTBAH had no sooner entered upon the government of Mecca than he began to exert his authority, by imprisoning 300 of his predecessor Amru's dependents. However Amru found means soon to release them; which having done, he undertook a journey to Damascus, was introduced to the Khalif there, and met with a gracious reception from him. But notwithstanding this, Yezid rebuked him for being remiss in the execution of his commands, and for not being active enough in extinguishing the rebellion of Abd'allah and his adherents. Amru, being a man of great address and penetration, easily justified his conduct, and that so much to the Khalif's satisfaction, that he told him he was an honest man than those who had taken such pains to misrepresent him; and that he should, for the future, repose an intire confidence in him. About this time, one Nadjab, a powerful Arab of Yamâma, appeared at the head of a body of troops he had assembled against Yezid, and discovered a strong disposition to take the oath of allegiance to Abd'allah Ebn Zobeir. In the mean time, the new governor Walid made use of all his skill to circumvent Abd'allah; but without effect, that general being always upon his guard. This conduct, however, giving great disgust, as well as terrible apprehensions, to Abd'allah, he sent a letter to Yezid, informing him therein, that Walid was totally unfit for the post he had honoured him with; and that if he would send to Medina a person of a more tractable disposition, all differences between them might easily be composed. Yezid, desirous of peace upon any terms, indiscreetly dismissed Walid, a man of an unshaken fidelity to him, at the instigation of his mortal enemy, and sent Othmân Ebn Mohammed Ebn Abu Sofiân, a man by no means qualified for so important a trust, to take upon him the government of Medina in his room. Soon after this event some ambassadors, or rather deputies, were sent from that city to Damascus, where they waited upon Yezid, who received them kindly, and made them considerable presents; but his conversation gave them such offence, that upon their return to Medina, they inflamed the people there greatly against him. They represented him as a man wholly addicted to wine, singing, girls, and dogs, and void of all religion; for which reason they publicly renounced their allegiance to him, and were joined herein by many of their fellow-citizens, who came to a resolution to depose him in a formal manner. Al Mondar, one of the ambassadors, instead of returning home, went to Basra, where he was courteously entertained by Obeid'allah, who had formerly been acquainted with him. Yezid being apprized of this, and of the seditious proceedings of the ambassadors at Medina, wrote to Obeid'allah to put him under arrest till farther orders. But Obeid'allah, considering a compliance with the Khalif's commands in this point as a violation of the laws of hospitality, enabled Al Mondar to make his escape; who, upon his arrival at Medina, confirmed what the other deputies had related of Yezid; to which he likewise added, that his almost total neglect of prayers had rendered him infamous in the sight of all who had any regard for the Moslem faith; and that he would not be bribed by the hundred dinârs given him by the Khalif for that purpose to conceal the truth. This coming to Yezid's ears, he threatened Al Mondar with his resentment, and dispatched Al Nooman Ebn Bassîr to Medina, to bring the people there back to a sense of their duty. This he endeavoured to do, by pointing out to them the effusion of Moslem blood, that must be the natural consequence of their persisting in such a rebellion; but without effect. The troubles mentioned here commenced in the 62d year of the Hejra, or of CHRIST 681; in which also died Moseilama Ebn Mekkalled, of Medina, the governor of Egypt. He was succeeded in that post by Sa'id Ebn Yezid Al Azdi, who continued in it till the death of Yezid. The tribe of Azd, to which Sa'id belonged, which was very famous amongst the Arabs, produced several illustrious men, who assumed the name of Al Azdi, or the Azdite; amongst whom were Abu Becr Mohammed Ebn Wâsa and Abu Ishâk Ismael, two celebrated Moslem doctors. The first of these, who died in the 127th year of the Hejra, was one of the most learned of the Tabein, or Tabeites; that is to say, the followers, or adherents, who were the successors of the COMPANIONS; and the latter was a native of Basra, who wrote a piece much esteemed by those of his religion, intituled, Abkam Al Korân, i. e. the laws and statutes of the Korân. He departed this life, in what place is uncertain, about the 282d year of the Hejra <sup>z</sup>.

The inhabitants of Me-

THE people of Medina having renounced all allegiance to Yezid, and being highly incensed against him, appointed Abd'allah Ebn Motî to preside over the Koreish, and Abd'allah Ebn

<sup>y</sup> MS. Laud. num. 161. ubi sup. ABU JAAFAR AL TABAR. et AL MAKIN, ubi sup. p. 52, 53. GOLLIE not. ad Alfragan. p. 177, 178, 179, 183, 189. SAID EBN ALI AL JURJANI, in sua climat. descript. ISM. ABU'LFED. in geograph. YAKUT. See an account of the present state of the NORTHERN ASIA, par. i. c. iii. p. 465. 466. <sup>z</sup> MS. Laud. num. 161. & MS. Hunt. num. 495. in Bibl. Bodl. Oxon. ubi sup. ABU JAAFAR AL TABAR. et AL MAKIN, ubi sup. p. 53. D'HERBEL. Biblioth. orient. p. 154. GAGN. la vie de Mahom. tom. ii. c. v. p. 340.

- a Hantelab over the Anfars. The latter of these was a person of great distinction, and adorned with many excellent endowments. He was one of the ambassadors sent lately to Damascus, and took his eight sons with him. Yezid having been before apprized, that he was very religious and devout, and for that reason extremely popular amongst his fellow-citizens, took care to caress him more than any of the other deputies that attended him. He made him a present of 100,000 dinârs, and every one of his sons 10,000, besides a proper number of vests suitable to the quality of the persons for whom they were designed. In the beginning of the 63d year of the Hejra, the Arabs of Medina put their menaces against Yezid in execution. After they had assembled about the pulpit in the mosque there, one of them said, I lay aside Yezid as I do this turban; and then threw his turban upon the ground.
- b Another said, I put away Yezid as I do this shoe; casting away the shoe at the same time from him. These examples being followed by others, there was a large heap of shoes and turbans almost instantly formed upon the spot. Then they dismissed Othmân, Yezid's lieutenant, and banished from Medina the house of Ommiyab, together with all their friends and dependents. These, to the number of about a thousand, took refuge in Merwân Ebn Al Hakem's house, where they were so closely besieged by the Hâshemite faction, that they found themselves obliged to send to Yezid for immediate assistance; intimating in the letter they wrote to him, that, unless they received speedy relief, they must all inevitably perish. Yezid wondered that so considerable a number of men should suffer themselves to be confined, without making the least resistance; and asked Amru Ebn Sa'id, the former governor of Mecca, whom he had lately recalled from thence, whether he would march with a body of troops to Medina, in order to chastize the rebels there? But Amru declining the command of the forces offered him, the Khalîf put Meslem Ebn Okba, tho' very antient and infirm, at the head of the troops that were to undertake the intended expedition. However, the conduct of the friends of the house of Ommiyab, who had suffered themselves to be cooped up in so ignominious a manner, irritated Meslem to such a degree, that he pronounced them both cowards and traitors to their prince, and declared that they ought not to be delivered before they had at least made one effort to extricate themselves out of the difficulties in which their pusillanimity had chiefly contributed to involve them. But Yezid's command being peremptory, he was obliged to submit. The Khalîf ordered him to spare Ali, the son of Hosein, and his family, as they had had no hand at all in the present commotions. He also ordered him to summon the city of Medina, upon his arrival before it, three days successively; and if, after such summons, the citizens refused to surrender the town, to take it by storm, and give it up to the soldiers to be plundered for three whole days. The inhabitants of Medina, being apprized of the impending storm, permitted all the members of the house of Ommiyab, together with their friends and adherents, to retire quietly out of the city; tho', before their departure, they extorted from them a promise never to appear in arms, or commit any hostilities, against the dominant faction<sup>a</sup>.

- MESLEM EBN OKBA AL MARSI, having received his instructions from the Khalîf, begun his march for Medina with 5000 foot and 12,000 horse; and, upon his arrival before the town, the citizens having refused to surrender, made the necessary preparations for a general assault. He proposed to attack the place on the east side, that the troops which defended it, and had surrounded it with a ditch for their security, might have the sun in their faces; and this proved of signal service to him. However, the garison, for a considerable time, made a vigorous defence; insomuch that Meslem advanced very slowly in the siege. But at last most of the Anfars and the principal officers being killed, the Arabs within the town offered to capitulate. Meslem refused to grant them any terms, and insisted upon their surrendering at discretion. But this last summons not being complied with, the Moslem general, after a faint opposition, entered the place; sent Ali, whom he treated with great respect, in pursuance of the orders he had received, home upon his own camel; put all the men he met with to the sword; and, tho' the prophet was buried there, permitted the Syrian forces to get a thousand women with child, and to pillage the city for three days together, without intermission. Those that escaped the sword, he obliged to own themselves slaves and vassals to Yezid; for which extreme severity the Arabs surnamed him Al Musrif, i. e. extravagant, exorbitant; because his orders did not extend to authorize the enormities he had committed. Medina was taken in the night, towards the close of the month Dul'hejja, in the year of the Hejra 63, or of our LORD 682. The Muslims considered Ebn Okba ever after as an impious person, for his barbarity to the citizens of Medina, especially as the prophet himself had denounced a sort of curse against him, which was couched in the following terms:
 "If any man shall hereafter sack or plunder my city, the wrath of God shall most certainly remain upon him<sup>b</sup>."

<sup>a</sup> MS. Laud. num. 161. et MS. Huntingt. num. 495. ubi sup. ABU JAAFAR AL TABAR. et AL MAKIN, ubi sup. p. 53, 54. D'HERBEL. Biblioth. orient. in art. Yezid, p. 486. <sup>b</sup> MS. Laud. num. 161. et MS. Huntingt. num. 495. ubi sup. ISM. ABU'LFED. in hist. univ. ABU JAAFAR AL TABAR. AL MAKIN, et D'HERBEL. ubi sup.

Yezid dies.

AFTER the reduction of Medina, Meslem marched with his army towards Mecca, in a order to chastize the insolence of Abd'allah Ebn Zobeir, who then resided in that place; but he died on his march, in the month of Al Moharram, the following year. Upon his death, Hosein Ebn Thamiir Al Selwi took upon him the command of the army, and advanced to Mecca, which he besieged for the space of forty days; during which term, he battered the town, by the assistance of his military engines, with so much fury, that he beat down a great part of the famous temple there, and burnt the rest. Nor had the city itself escaped the same fate, had not the news of Yezid's death recalled Hosein into Syria, and forced him to abandon the siege <sup>c</sup>.

The Syrian forces return home.

ABD'ALLAH EBN ZOBEIR had before been informed of the Khalif's decease, and even apprized the Syrian troops of it from the walls; asking them, at the same time, for whom they fought, as Yezid was most certainly dead? However, they would not believe him; but continued the siege with great vigour, till they received farther information. As soon as this news was confirmed, Hosein told Abd'allah, that, as a farther effusion of Moslem blood was altogether unnecessary, he would take the oath of allegiance to him; and assured him, that all the forces under his command, amongst which were all the principal men of Syria, should be at his devotion. But Abd'allah, at this juncture, durst not trust him; and therefore refused the overture made him; tho' afterwards, when too late, he repented of this conduct. During the conference between them, Hosein turned his horse aside, in order to avoid killing some of the temple pigeons, that were pecking something on the ground at a small distance from him; which being observed by Abd'allah, he could not forbear asking him, "How he could scruple destroying any of those birds, and yet not be afraid of spilling the blood of so many Moslems?" Hosein replied, that "he would never for the future fight against him." After which, he desired leave to go in procession round the Caaba; which was immediately granted. Some pretend, that the temple was not set on fire by the engines employed by the Syrian army in the siege; but by a little fire accidentally wafted by the wind from the top of Hosein's spear, the sparks of which were communicated from thence to the hangings and wood-work of that edifice. We must not forget to remark, that the house of Ommiyah attended Hosein into Syria; and that Yezid, before his decease, having received advice of the death of Meslem, confirmed Hosein Ebn Thamiir Al Selwi in the command of the Moslem forces before Mecca. The engines made use of by Hosein in the siege of that place were a species of the catapult, or catapulta, a military machine generally employed on such occasions by the antients, as we learn from Abu Jaafar Al Tabari <sup>d</sup>.

Description of Yezid's person, and his character.

YEZID died at Hawwarin, in the territory of Hems, in the beginning of the former Rabi, and the 64th year of the Hejra, or of CHRIST 684. He died in the 39th year of his age, after he had reigned about three years and six or eight months. As to his person, he was either of a ruddy, according to Abu'lfeda, or, as Abu Jaafar will have it, of a swarthy complexion. He was a tall thin man, had a handsome beard tinged with Al Henna, curled hair, black eyes, leprous fingers, and a face pitted with the small-pox. His under-lip was inverted, when he laughed. He left behind him several children of both sexes. His son Khaled is reported to have been skilled in the art of alchemy, and his son Abd'allah to have been the most exact archer of all the Arabs of his time. His mother's name was Meisun, the daughter of Yahdak, of the tribe of Calb. She had an excellent genius for poetry; and, at Moawiyah's command, took her son Yezid with her into the desert amongst her own relations there, in order to inspire him with poetic sentiments. Nor was this education altogether thrown away upon him, as he discovered himself capable of drawing up a tolerable good copy of Arabic verses, on several occasions. Yezid was the first Khalif that drank wine publicly, and was waited upon by eunuchs; which gave great offence to the Mohammedans. He was extremely fond of dogs; which likewise not a little disgusted vast numbers of his subjects, as the more scrupulous Moslems have an aversion to those animals. But he was rendered the most disagreeable to the Arabs by his avarice and impiety. This occasioned a certain author to observe, that the Moslem empire could only flourish either under a pious prince, such as were the four first Khalifs, or a liberal one, such as was Moawiyah; and consequently that, under such an impious and avaritious prince as Yezid, every thing must be lost. The ravages committed at Medina, or the city of the prophet, by this Khalif's order, are considered by the Mohammedan doctors as the highest instance of his impiety, and as the principal cause of his being cut off in the flower of his age. In support of which notion, they produce this saying of Mohammed, Whoever injureth Medina shall melt away, even as salt melteth away in the water. The Persian writers have the memory of Yezid in such abhor-

<sup>c</sup> MS. Laud. num. 161. ubi sup. KHONDEMIR, ABU JAAFAR AL TABAR. et AL MAKIN, D'HERBEL. ubi sup. EUTYCH. patriarch Alexandrin. annal. tom. ii. p. 362, 363. <sup>d</sup> MS. Laud. num. 161. ABU JAAFAR AL TABARI, AL MAKIN, et D'HERBEL. ubi sup. OCKLEY, ubi sup. p. 245, 246, 247.

a rence, that they always mention him with abomination, and generally annex to his name the following malediction, The curse of God be upon him. Which they do not so much on account of his vices, as because of the death of Hosein, whom, with all his family, he attempted first to destroy by poison, and afterwards caused to be killed on the plain of Kerbela. His principal secretary of state was Abd'allah Ebn Aws, and, after him, Rumi Ebn Omar Al Adri; his Kâdi, or judge, Ebn Idris Al Hokwâni; his chamberlain, Kbâled his servant, or, as others say, Safwân; and the captain of his guards, Hamid Ebn Kharbat Ebn Yabdak, of the tribe of Calb, and afterwards Amer Ebn Abd'allah Al Hamadani. The first day of his Khalifat was Saturday, and the last Monday. He was looked upon as so irreligious a prince, that some of the Moslems, and particularly the Persians, called, in after-b ages, all those persons void of religion Yezid and Yzit. The Persian poet Jami being one of these, a man, named Mezid, was resolved to insult him on that account; and, therefore, one day, as soon as he entered the room where an assembly was met at Jami's house, he cried out with a loud voice, The curse of God fall upon Yezid! Jami perceiving that these words were pointed at him, instantly replied, May that curse fall upon Yezid and Mezid! The smartness of which repartee consists in the words, upon Mezid, which were not only applicable to the aggressor, but likewise denoted MORE AND MORE <sup>c</sup>.

In the Khalifat of Yezid, the Moslems made an absolute conquest of Khorasân and Kho- Conquests made warazm, and put the territories of the prince of Samarkand under contribution. The motto, by the Moslems or inscription, of his seal was, GOD IS OUR LORD. He was buried at Damascus, in the in the Khali- c sepulchre of the little gate; and his son Moâwiyah, whom he nominated, when at the point of death, emperor of the faithful, said the prayers usual on such occasions over him. Theo- phanes barely mentions the death of Yezid, whom he calls Izid, without taking any particular notice of the cause, circumstances, or effects of it; and Dionysius Telmarenfis only tells us, that Yezid died in the year of Seleucus 9, 2, or of CHRIST 681, and was succeeded by Mer- wân. There is an author named Al Fadhl Al Berid, who has written the history of this Khalif, under the title of Akbâr Yezid <sup>f</sup>.

<sup>c</sup> ISM. ABU'LFED. ubi sup. KHONDEMIR, ABU JAAFAR AL TABAR. AL MAKIN, EUTYCH. D'HERBEL. ubi sup. MOHAMMED EBN KHASSEM, EBN SHOHNAH, EBN AMID, AUT. RABI AL AKYAR, MS. Huntingt. num. 495. & MS. Laud, num 161 in Bibl. Bodl. Oxon. ubi sup. <sup>f</sup> ALU JAAFAR AL TABARI, AL MAKIN, D'HERBEL. & GREG. ABU'L FAR. ubi sup. THEOPHAN. chronograph. p. 300. DIONYS. TELMARENS. apud Joi. Simon. Asseman. ubi sup. p. 104.

S E C T. VIII.

d MOA'WIYAH II. the son of Yezid, was proclaimed Khalif at Damascus the very day on Moâwiyah II.
which his father died. His mother was the daughter of Hâshem, or, as others say, succeeds his fa- of Kbâled Ebn Aïu Hâshem Ebn Otba Ebn Rabîa Ebn Abd Shams. The Arab writers represent ther Yezid.
this young prince as of a religious disposition, but of a very weak constitution; and tell us, that he had not completed the twenty-first year of his age, when he mounted the Moslem throne. He was of the sect of the Kadarians, having been instructed in their principles by his favourite master Omar Al Makfûs, whom he consulted, in order to know of him whether he should accept of the Khalifat, or not. Omar told him, that if he found himself equal to the duties of that arduous post, he ought to accept of the high dignity offered him; if not, that he ought to decline it. Some of the eastern writers make the Kadarians to have e been originally a branch of the Motazalites, or the followers of Wâfel Ebn Atâ, who, with their master, were expelled the school of Hasan of Basra, whose scholar he was, and thenceforth called Motazalites, or Separatists; tho' others look upon Kadarians as really a more antient name than that of Motazalites; Mabad Al Jobni, and his adherents, who disputed the doctrine of predestination before Wâfel quitted his master, having gone by that appellation. For which reason, some use the denomination of Kadarians as more extensive than the other, and comprehend all the Motazalites under it. This sect deny absolute predestination, saying, that evil and injustice ought not to be attributed to God, but to man, who is a free agent, and may therefore be rewarded or punished for his actions; which God has granted him power either to do or to let alone. And hence it is said they are called Kadarians, f because they deny Al Kadr, or God's absolute decree; tho' others, thinking it not so proper to affix a name to a sect from a doctrine which they combat, will have it come from Kadr, or Kadrat, i. e. power, because they assert man's power to act freely. Those, however, who give the name Kadarians to the Motazalites are their enemies; for they disclaim it, and give it to their antagonists the Jabarians, who likewise refuse it, as an infamous appellation, because Mohammed is said to have declared the Kadarians to be the Magians of his followers. But what the opinion of the Kadarians in Mohammed's time was, is very uncertain. The Motazalites say the name belongs to those who assert predestination, and make God the author of
of

of good and evil, viz. the Jabarians; but all the other Mohammedan sects agree to fix it upon a the Motazalites, who, they say, are like the Magians, in establishing two principles, light, or God, the author of good, and darkness, or the devil, the author of evil. But this cannot be said of the Motazalites, who generally ascribe men's good deeds to God, but their evil deeds to themselves; meaning thereby, that man has a free liberty and power to do either good or evil, and is master of his actions. For which reason it is, that the other Mohammedans call them Magians, because they assert another author of actions besides God. And, indeed, it is a difficult matter to say what Mohammed's own opinion was in this matter. For, on the one side, the Korân itself is pretty plain for absolute predestination, and many sayings of Mohammed are recorded to that purpose. On the other, it is urged in behalf of the Motazalites, that Mohammed declaring, that the Kadarians and Morgians had been cursed by b the tongues of seventy prophets, and being asked who the Kadarians were, answered, Those who asserted, that God predestinated them to be guilty of rebellion, and yet punishes them for it. Al Hasan is also said to have declared, that God sent Mohammed to the Arabs, while they were Kadarians, or Jabarians, and laid their sins upon God; and, in confirmation of this point, a passage is produced out of the Korân. Both parties, therefore, have recourse to the testimony of Mohammed in support of their respective, tho' contrary, opinions; and consequently make him to contradict himself at least in some of his decisions. Ebn Arwn, one of the most celebrated Moslem doctors, would not salute a Kadarian, if he met him; saying, that the sect to which he belonged ought to be considered as the Magians of the Mohammedans; and Shaabi, another of those doctors, makes the Kadarians to have agreed c in all points with the Motazalites. Abu Zakaria Yahya Ebn Abu'lkhair, a doctor following the sentiments of the famous Al Shâfêi, has written a treatise against the tenets of the Kadarians, intituled, Enteffâr fil redd ala al Kadaria al ashrâr. Omar Al Maksûs seems to have been one of the principal members of this sect, in the days of Yezid, who probably favoured it, as he intrusted him with the education of his son. Al Maksûs told this young prince, that, unless he found himself capable of administering justice exactly to the Moslems, he ought by no means to take upon himself the title of emperor of the faithful <sup>e</sup>.

Moâwiyah
abdicates the government.

ABOUT six weeks after his inauguration, Moâwiyah finding himself too weak to sustain the weight of the government, took a resolution to lay it down. In order to which, he assembled the grandees of his court, and told them, that when he first entertained thoughts d of relinquishing the high station to which his father's nomination had advanced him, he intended to have chosen a successor in the same manner as did Abu Becr; but that this he found impossible, as a man of Omar's merit and abilities was not to be met with. Then he informed them, that, not being able to execute his first plan, he proposed to follow the example of Omar, and name six persons, upon one of which the choice by lot should fall; but that he likewise found this impracticable, as he could not be furnished with six men duly qualified for the discharge of the duties of so important a post. Wherefore, continued he, I am resolved to leave the election of a new Khalif intirely to your management. Upon which, they immediately expressed their readiness to chuse the person that should be the most agreeable to him; but he declined naming any one, saying, "As I have not enjoyed the e " advantages of the Khalifat, it is unreasonable that I should charge myself with the most " odious part of it; and therefore I hope you will permit me to discharge my conscience " towards you, and judge for yourselves who is the most capable amongst you of filling my " place." After which, he made his abdication in form; and the noblesse proceeding to an election, the choice fell upon Merwân Ebn Al Hakem, who was the fourth Khalif of Syria. However, Abd'allah Ebn Zobeir had been advanced to the Khalifat, in Arabia, after the death of Yezid. He presided over Hejâz, Yaman, Irâk, Khorasân, Egypt, and all Syria, except that part called Ordon, or Al Oroddan, which adhered to Yezid. We are told by Abu'l Faraj, that Moâwiyah's speech, immediately preceding his abdication, was to the following effect: "My grandfather Moâwiyah deprived a man more worthy than himself f " of the Khalifat. Nor did my father merit that sublime dignity, though he obtained it. " For my own part, I am determined not to have an account to give of so weighty a " charge as is the government of [the Moslems, when I appear in the presence of God; " and therefore invest the person that shall please you best with the authority of Khalif." Which speech, as well as what was immediately consequent thereupon, ought to be considered as the effect of those religious impressions that his preceptor Al Maksûs had made upon him <sup>h</sup>.

<sup>e</sup> ALU JAAFAR AL TABAR. apud Al Makin, in hist. Saracen. lib. i. c. ix. p. 55. ut & ipse AL MAKIN, ibid. GREG. ABU'L FAR. ubi sup. p. 197. EUTYCH. ubi sup. p. 362, 363. D'HERBEL. Biblioth. orient. in art. Moawiah Ben Jezid, p. 587, et alib. MOHAM. AL FIRAUZABADI, in Kâim. AL SHAHRESTAN. ANT. SHARH AL MAWAKEF, EBN AL ATHIR, AL MOTAREZZI, in lib. Magreb. AL BOKHAR. EBN KHALECAN, AL KOR. MOHAM. f. vii. & alib. Poc. not. in spec. hist. Arab. p. 231—238. See also SALE's transl. of the Kor. p. 119. <sup>h</sup> GREG. ABU'L FAR. ubi sup. D'HERBEL. Biblioth. orient. in art. Moawiah. Ebn Jezid. ALU JAAFAR AL TABAR. & AL MAKIN, ubi sup. EUTYCH. ubi sup.

a MOAWIYAH had no sooner abdicated the government than he shut himself up in a chamber, from whence he stirred not till he died. Some say, that he was poisoned, and others that he was carried off by the plague not long after his abdication. The interval between his death and that event he spent wholly in religious exercises, and in performing his devotions. He was surnamed, by way of ridicule, Abu Leilab, i. e. the father of the night; because his natural weakness and bad state of health would not permit him to appear much abroad in the day-time. Authors differ as to the precise account of the short time he reigned; some fixing this at twenty days, others at forty-five, others at forty, and others extending it to four months. Nor do they exactly agree in the length of the interval between his renunciation and his death; some making this to consist of only forty days, and others
b of three months. He was buried at Damascus, close by his father; and, according to some, Walid Ebn Otha performed the funeral service over him. It has been also said, that Merwân Ebn Al Hakem, his successor, put up prayers for him. The house of Ommiyah was so exasperated at his abdication, that, if we will believe Abu'l Faraj, the members of it buried his master Al Makfûs, whom they supposed to have been the author of it, alive. The inscription on his seal was, THE WORLD IS A CHEAT. He left no issue behind him. The first day of his reign was Tuesday, and the last Thursday. From the short duration of his Khalifat, taken notice of by the Arab writers, it appears, that he departed this life in the 64th year of the Hejra, or of CHRIST 684<sup>i</sup>.

BEFORE we proceed directly in our history, we must here beg leave, by way of digression, to give a short account of some commotions that happened in Irâk immediately after the death of Yezid. Obeid'allah Ebn Ziyâd the governor of Basra, being apprized of that event, represented, in a set speech, to the Basrans, that, "he himself was their countryman, as " being a native of Basra; that, since he had taken the government upon him, he had " destroyed 140,000 of their enemies; that there was no person surviving that destruction " from whom they had any reason to apprehend the least opposition; that the territories of " Basra formed the most considerable province of the empire, both with regard to their " extent, and the number and valour of their inhabitants; that, till the commotions in " Syria were appeased, they ought to appoint a person to preside over them, who was duly " qualified to be the protector of their state; and that, after this, if the Moslems elected a d " Khalif disagreeable to them, they might, under the conduct of the person they had chosen,
" assert their independency." The Basrans, clearly perceiving his intention in this speech, offered him the government of their country; which he at first affected to refuse, but afterwards accepted, at the repeated solicitation of his friends. However, as soon as it was known that the Cûfans would not acknowledge him, but even threw dust, or gravel, upon his deputy, the Basrans immediately deserted him, and even expelled him their city. Nor could he prevail either upon the Najâri, a tribe of the Ansfârs, or even his own relations, tho' he had divided a great part of the 16,000,000 pieces of money, found in the treasury of Basra, amongst them, and kept the remainder himself, to espouse his quarrel. So odious had he rendered himself to all ranks and degrees of men by the enormous cruelties he had
e committed! Nor could his brother Abd'allah, who kept him disguised in women's cloaths at Masûd's house, lest any violence should have been offered his person, protect him from the rage and fury of the Basrans, tho' he distributed 200,000 pieces of money amongst them; and though Masûd exerted himself, to the utmost extent of his abilities, in his favour. He was, therefore, at last constrained to abandon the city, attended by an escorte of 100 men, that had been assigned him by Masûd; and, immediately after his departure, the mob plundered his house, and pursued him. Being much fatigued by riding upon a camel in the night, he exchanged that beast for an ass; and, with great difficulty, made his escape into Syria. Soon after his arrival at Damascus, Hosein Ebn Thamir Al Selwi returned thither, with the troops that had formed the siege of Mecca, and gave a faithful account to Merwân
f of the situation of affairs on that side. He likewise informed him of his offer to take the oath of allegiance to Abd'allah Ebn Zobeir, who refused to accept of it, or at least to undertake a journey to Damascus, in order to be invested there with the supreme authority. He therefore advised Merwân, and the house of Ommiyah, to take care of themselves in time, and fix their interest upon a solid basis, by the election of a new Imâm, before the torrent of faction was too rapid to be stemmed. Merwân, after hearing Hosein's discourse, proposed to make his submission to Abd'allah Ebn Zobeir; but was diverted from his resolution by Obeid'allah Ebn Ziyâd, who told him, that, in the present conjuncture, no superior ought to be acknowledged by him who was at the head of the Koreish. The people of Damascus had constituted Dabâk Ebn Kais Al Amri their protector, till the Moslems should concur in the g election of an Imâm. Dabâk favoured Abd'allah, and declared his intention of supporting him. The Bafrans were altogether in tumult and confusion, and could not fix upon a governor, during the interregnum, after their ejection of Obeid'allah. This induced them at last to write to Abd'allah, to take the government upon him. He complied with their request; but could not be prevailed upon to stir from Mecca, at that time the place of his residence. Nor could Merwân be persuaded to permit any of the Syrians to perform the pilgrimage thither, lest they should join Abd'allah, and thereby contribute to his exclusion from the Moslem throne <sup>k</sup>.

<sup>i</sup> ISM. ABU'LFED. in hist. univ. D'HERBEL. ABU JAAFAR AL TABAR. AL MAKIN, EUTYCH. & GREG. ABU'L FAR. ubi sup.

<sup>k</sup> MS. Laud. num. 161. in Bibl. Bodl. Oxon. ABU JAAFAR AL TABAR. apud Al Makin, ubi sup. p. 55. ut & ipse AL MAKIN, ibid. GREG. ABU'L FAR. ubi sup. EUTYCH. ubi sup.

S E C T. IX.

Abd'allah
Ebn Zobeir advanced to the Khalifat.

IT has been already observed, that all the provinces of the Moslem empire, except part of Syria, unanimously concurred, soon after the death of Yezid, to advance Abd'allah Ebn Zobeir to the Khalifat; to which we shall now beg leave to add, that, after the last invitation he had received from Irâk, he caused himself to be inaugurated at Mecca. The people of Mecca had first declared in his favour, and were immediately followed by the citizens of Medina. Nay, Merwân himself, a member of the house of Ommiyah, who was then at the latter of those places, was upon the point of recognizing his authority; which he had likewise afterwards done at Damascus, had he not been dissuaded from it by Obeid'allah Ebn Ziyâd, as we have just informed our readers. However, Abd'allah might easily have fixed himself in the Khalifat, and have settled his interest upon a lasting foundation, had he not too rashly formed a design either to banish or exterminate the house of Ommiyah; and, in consequence of this scheme, sent orders to his lieutenant at Medina to cut off, or, as others say, eject every member of that house. This alienated vast numbers of the Moslems, and particularly all the friends and dependents of the family threatened either with banishment, or excision, from him, as will hereafter more fully appear. The resolution taken by Abd'allah at this juncture was certainly a most impolitic step; and, notwithstanding the bravery and religious disposition he was famed for, undoubtedly indicated a want of capacity, as well as generosity and humanity, in him. He was surnamed, according to some, Abu Becr, or, as others will have it, Abu Habib. His mother was Asma, the daughter of the first Khalif Abu Becr. He was inaugurated at Mecca on the ninth day of the month of Rajeb, after there had been an interregnum during the former and latter Jomâda, and the eight first days of Rajeb. He appointed his brother Masab, or Mas'ab, Ebn Zobeir governor of Basra, Abd'allah Ebn Moti that of Cûfa, his brother Obeidah Ebn Zobeir that of Medina, and sent Abd'alrahmân Ebn Okba Ebn Jahram in the same capacity to Egypt. Some authors inform us, that his mother's name was Asima; and that she was not the daughter, but the grand-daughter, of Abu Becr; but as the Arab writers of best repute make her not to be much above thirty years younger than that Khalif, they seem, notwithstanding the authority of M. D'Herbelot, to discountenance the latter assertion <sup>l</sup>.

The house of Ommiyah pre-claim Merwân Khalif at Damascus.

THE members of the house of Ommiyah finding themselves in such imminent danger, tho' before well enough affected to Abd'allah Ebn Zobeir, resolved to stand upon their own defence, and consequently to oppose him to the utmost of their power. In order, therefore, to defeat all his machinations, they proclaimed Merwân Ebn Al Hakem, who was at the head of them, after the death of Moâwiyah II. Khalif at Damascus; to which place they had made their escape, after they found it necessary, for their own safety, to take their leave of Medina. Syria, therefore, or rather the whole Moslem empire, was at this time divided into two potent factions; one of which, under the conduct of Hassan Ebn Malec, declared for Merwân, and the other, under that of Debâk Ebn Kais, for Abd'allah. The latter was a person of great distinction, and had been constituted by Moâwiyah I. commandant at Cûfa, in the 54th year of the Hejra. His adherents, from his father Kais's name, were denominated Kaisians. Several conferences were held between the leaders of these factions, and all possible methods made use of to dispose both parties to an accommodation; but without effect. The forces on both sides, therefore, commanded by Merwân and Debâk, found themselves at last obliged to come to a general action, which ended in the defeat of the Kaisians. As soon as they began to break, Merwân sounded a retreat, and would not suffer his men to pursue them. The battle was fought at Marj Rakt, a place in the plain of Damascus, at a small distance from that city. Debâk himself was killed upon the spot, together with a great number of his horse, and about eighty of the Syrian nobility. When

<sup>l</sup> ISM. ABUL'FED. in hist. univ. MS. Laud. num. 161. ABU JAAFAR AL TABARI, AL MAKIN. & GREG. ABU'L FAR. ubi sup. D'HERBEL. Biblioth orient. in art. Abd'allah Ebn Zobeir, p. 7. OCKLEY's hist of the Sarac. vol. i. p. 120. & vol. ii. p. 343.

- a Dekák's head was brought to Merwân, at the sight of it he expressed great concern, and said, "This is a very preposterous thing, that I, who am an old man, and whose bones are so wasted, that I am reduced almost to nothing, should bring armies together, in order to cut one another to pieces." After this victory, the citizens of Damascus submitted to Merwân, who lived in the house where Moâwiyah used to reside. He also married Yezid's widow, having before declared that Khalîf's son Kháled, then a minor, his successor. However, Abd'allah Ebn Zobeir kept his ground still in Arabia, tho' the inhabitants of Damascus had renewed their oath of fidelity to Merwân, after the battle of Marj Raht, in the month of Dbu'lkaada. Soon after which event, the people of Hems, receiving advice of the death and defeat of Debák, revolted from Abd'allah Ebn Zobeir, whose interest they had espoused; upon which, Nooman Ebn Bakhîr, Abd'allah's governor there, betook himself, together with his wife and family, to flight. But the citizens pursued him, cut off his head, and brought it with them, as well as his wife and children, in triumph to Hems. In the beginning, therefore, of the 65th year of the Hejra, Merwân was in possession of the Khalîfat of Syria, as Abd'allah was of that of Hejâz, Taman, Egypt, and Irâk <sup>m</sup>.

<sup>m</sup> MS. Laud. num. 161. ABU JAAFAR AL TABAR. AL MAKIN & GREG. ABU'L FAR. ubi sup. EUTYCH. patriarch. Alexandrin. annal. p. 364, 365.

S E C T. X.

- c MERWAN, soon after his accession, advanced at the head of a considerable army towards Merwân <sup>con-</sup> the frontiers of Egypt, Abd'alrahmân Ebn Okba Ebn Jabram, Abd'allah's lieutenant <sup>quers Egypt:</sup> there, being informed before of his design, had made the necessary dispositions for giving him a proper reception, in case he should attempt to make an impression upon that country. He sent before him Amru Ebn Sa'id, with a body of troops, to facilitate the passage of his forces, as well as the conquest of Egypt. Abd'alrahmân being worsted in several brisk actions that happened between him and the Syrians, at last, for a sum of money, surrendered the whole country to Merwân, and retired with the Arabs under his command into Hejâz. The Syrian troops then immediately possessed themselves of Egypt, and obliged the inhabitants of that region to take the oath of allegiance to Merwân. Things being in this happy situation;
- d the Syrian Khalîf appointed his son Abd'alaziz to preside over Egypt, and, with the greatest part of his forces, returned to Damascus. Whilst he was upon his march for that city, he was informed, that Abd'allah had sent his brother Mus'ab against him with a powerful army. Upon the arrival of this disagreeable news, Merwân detached Amru Ebn Sa'id, with a body of his troops, to give the enemy battle, without loss of time. Amru soon came up with Mus'ab, brought him to a general action, and intirely defeated him. In fine, Mus'ab was forced to betake himself to a shameful flight, a great part of his men were cut to pieces upon the spot, and the remainder of them so dispersed, that they found it impossible to rally. After which, Merwân's troops, having sustained a very inconsiderable loss, entered Damascus in a triumphant manner <sup>n</sup>.
- e THIS year the people of Khorasân chose Salem Ebn Ziyâd, who had before been governor <sup>Salem elected</sup> of that province, for their protector, till the Moslems could concur in their election of an <sup>protector of</sup> Imâm, Salem continued in this post about two months; and, during that short term, rendered himself extremely popular amongst those who had put themselves under his protection. He had likewise discharged the duties of his function, when governor, so much to their satisfaction, that, within the space of a few years, they named above 20,000 children, born amongst them, Salem, out of their great regard and affection for him. The natives of Khorasân, therefore, enjoyed perfect tranquillity at this time, when tumults and seditions, not to say open war, disturbed the repose of many other parts of the Moslem dominions <sup>o</sup>.
- f IN the 65th year of the Hejra, the followers of Ali, and their dependents, at Cûfa, like- <sup>An insurrec-</sup> wise put themselves in motion. They proposed to assemble in a body at Nokbailah, and <sup>on of the fol-</sup> march from thence into Syria the following year, in order to revenge the death of Hossein. <sup>lowers of Ali</sup> As the Cûfans now reflected upon their base and perfidious conduct to that Imâm with the <sup>against both</sup> utmost detestation, they thought themselves obliged, both in point of honour and duty, to take vengeance of his murderers, as the best atonement they could make for so enormous a crime. For this purpose, they sent circular letters to their friends, inviting them to contribute all in their power to the execution of so laudable a design. The five principal persons, to whom the management of the whole affair was committed, Solimân Ebn Sorâd, who was one of the COMPANIONS, Mosabbib Ebn Nabbah, one of Ali's most intimate friends, Abd'allah Ebn Sa'id, Abd'allah Ebn Wâli, and Refaa Ebn Shaddâd, met together at Soliman's house, attended by a vast number of their adherents, in order to concert the proper measures that were to be pursued on this occasion. To the Shiites, or sectaries of Ali, now assembled, Masabbib made an elegant speech; wherein he fully set forth the heinousness of the crime the Cúfans had been guilty of, in deserting Hosein, the grandson of the prophet, and his family, after they had invited him to their city, and so solemnly engaged to support him; adding, that they could no otherwise, in any degree, atone for that crime, than by bringing his murderers to condign punishment; which might easily be effected, if they could pitch upon a proper general to lead them against the perpetrators and abettors of that execrable fact. Rasfaa then proposed to the assembly, for a general, Solimán Ebn Sorád, the chief of their sect, or rather political party; a man revered by all for his years, dignity, piety, and experience; who was unanimously elected, and, after having made a speech suitable to the occasion, accepted of the command. Abd'allah Ebn Wáli, by the unanimous suffrages of all the Moslems present, was then appointed treasurer, and a considerable sum of money deposited in his hands. After which, Solimán dispatched circular letters to Saad Ebn Hodaisa, and others, to excite them to act with vigour, and forward as much as possible the execution of the plan of operations that had been formed; and, in a short time, received from them such satisfactory answers, as greatly animated both him and his friends. It may not be improper here to observe, that this affair had been in agitation ever since the death of Yezid; so that the followers of Ali had amassed vast quantities of provisions, erected large magazines, and, in short, taken all the necessary precautions to render this enterprize successful. It has been remarked by Abu'l Faraj, that Solimán was an Arab of the tribe of Khozâa; and that Merwân Ebn Al Hakem, whose mother, Amena Bint Alkama, was of the house of Safwân, was the first of the Khalifs who made his way to the Moslem throne by the assistance of the sword <sup>p</sup>.

<sup>n</sup> MS. Laud. num. 161. ubi sup. ABU JAAFAR AL TABARI & AL MAKIN, ubi sup. p. 56, 57.
Laud. num. 161. ubi sup. OCKLEY's hist. of the Sarac. vol. ii. p. 265.

<sup>o</sup> MS.

They assemble a body of 4000
men;

ABOUT six months after the death of Yezid, in the month of Ramadân, Al Mokhtar Ebn Abu Obeidah came to Cúfa, and brought along with him Ibrahim Ebn Mohammed Ebn Telba, in order to collect the tribute of that city for Abd'allah Ebn Zobeir, who had been elected Khalif by the Arabs. This man, pretending to act under the direction of Mohammed Ebn Hanifiyah, one of Ali's sons, was at first not a little caressed by the followers of that Imâm. But Al Mokhtar having afterwards depreciated the merits and capacity of Solimán Ebn Sorád Al Khozâi, and Ibrahim having declared in very warm terms against the sentiments contained in a speech of Abd'allah Ebn Yezid, then governor of Cúfa, which seemed to favour the sectaries, or male-contents, they were both for some time treated with less respect by the Shiites, as well as by Abd'allah Ebn Yezid. Nay, Ibrahim, by his conduct, so incensed them, that Masabbib threatened him with an assassination; tho' afterwards finding means to pacify the governor, both he and Al Mokhtar recovered their former esteem; and Solimán, at the head of the Shiites, soon after appeared in arms. The troops he assembled on this occasion, according to Abu'l Faraj, amounted to about 4000 men <sup>q</sup>.

which increases to one of 16,000.

AT this time, the Motazalites, or Separatists, who had assisted Abd'allah Ebn Zobeir in the defence of Mecca, abandoned him, and retired to Basra. Obeid'allah Ebn Ziyád, the governor of that city, who was always their most implacable enemy, had formerly done his utmost to extirpate them; so that they found themselves obliged, in order to avoid the fate he intended them, to fly to Mecca, and put themselves there under the protection of Abd'allah Ebn Zobeir. As he then stood in great need of their assistance, he gave them a favourable reception, without making any inquiry into the principles they maintained; as they, on their side, being then in very distressed circumstances, did not think it proper, or expedient, to ask him any questions either about his religious or political sentiments. However, some time after, before they engaged themselves thoroughly in his service, they recollected, that both he and his father Zobcir had persecuted them on account of Othmán's death; and therefore resolved to take an occasion from hence to discover his present disposition towards them. Coming to him accordingly in a body, they desired to know his opinion of that event; but having at that time very few of his friends about him, and clearly perceiving their view in proposing such a question to him, he told them, that, if they would return in the evening, he would give them a satisfactory answer. In the mean time, he posted a proper party of the guards in double ranks about his house; which hinder'd the Motazalites, when they returned, from proceeding to acts of violence. However, one of the most eloquent of them made a speech, wherein he enumerated the dispensations of providence towards them, as well as all the Khalifs that had presided over the Moslems since the death of Mohammed, reflected severely upon Othmán's administration, and, in fine, endeavoured to justify the murder of that Imâm. Abd'allah replied, that, with regard to

<sup>p</sup> MS. Laud. num. 161. ubi sup. ABU JAAFAR AL TABAR. & AL MAKIN, ubi sup. p. 57. GREG. ABU'L FAR. ubi sup. p. 198. GOLII not. ad Alfragan. p. 118. D'HERBEL. Biblioth. orient. in art. Khouz, p. 1002.

<sup>q</sup> MS. Laud. num. 161. ubi sup. ABU JAAFAR AL TABAR. AL MAKIN, & GREG. ABU'L FAR. ubi sup.

- a Mohammed, on whom too great encomiums could not be passed, as well as Abu Becr and Omar, he perfectly agreed with him in what he had advanced; but that, as no man living was better acquainted with Othmán than himself, he must beg leave to declare, that he believed that Khalíf to have been wrongfully murdered; that he never wrote the letter laid to his charge; and that he should always support Othmán's friends, and oppose his enemies, to the utmost of his power. To this they answered, God is clear of thee, thou enemy of God! Which he instantly echoed again, and they immediately took their leave of Mecca. Some of them went to Yamáma, and others to Basra. The latter animated one another to some bold attempt in favour of religion; and, having been joined by several stragglers upon the road, before they reached Basra, formed a body of 300 men. They enter'd the town,
- b when every thing was in confusion, on account of Obeid'allah's precipitate retreat, or rather flight, into Syria; which gave them an opportunity of opening the public prisons, and constraining the malefactors they took from thence to be incorporated amongst them. However, both the Motazalites and their companions, after the commotion was appeased, were soon dispersed, and obliged to abandon Basra. As for the forces assembled by Solimán, if we will believe Abu Jaafar Al Tabari, they soon increased from 4000 to 16000 men. But before we can oblige our readers with the particulars of this expedition, and the fate he met with in the conclusion of it, in a satisfactory manner, it will be proper to premise a short and concise account of the famous Mokhtar, or Al Mokhtar, as he is called by the Arab historians, the scourge of the enemies of the house of Ali, who makes so considerable a figure
- c in that part of the Arab history we are now upon.

THE followers of Ali had not entertained the most favourable sentiments of Al Mokhtar An account of Ebn Abu Obeidah, since the time he was supposed to have been too remiss in the service of Al Mokhtar, Hasan. But he recovered his esteem with that party, when he not only entertained in his house Moslem, who had been sent to Cúfa by Hosein, to take the suffrages of the Cúfans, in a very hospitable manner, but likewise made use of all his interest privately to serve him; tho' he still thought fit to appear amongst Obeid'allah's friends, in order to prevent suspicion. But Obeid'allah, having secret intelligence of his conduct, upbraided him with it, and gave him such a blow with his stick upon the face, that he beat out one of his eyes. Not content with this, he sent him immediately to prison, and detained him there till the death of d Hosein; when, finding means to make a proper application to Yezid, he was set at liberty by the express command of the Khalíf. Obeid'allah, as his interest required, was very desirous of continuing his detention, but durst not disobey the Khalíf; and therefore released him, but ordered him to quit the territories of Cúfa within the space of three days. Al Mokhtar then made the best of his way to Hejáz, where meeting with one of his friends, who asked him how he came to lose his eye, he said, "The son of a whore has beat it out; but God

e "kill me if I do not some time or other cut him to pieces." Al Mokhtar afterwards being told by the Arab with whom he was conversing, that Abd'allah Ebn Zobeir had made Mecca his residence, he delivered himself in the following terms: "His affairs will never be in a f "flourishing situation, till you see Al Mokhtar at the head of his forces, with orders to g "revenge the death of Hosein. I will then destroy as many, by way of vengeance for the "murder of that Imám, as there perished on account of the blood of John the son of "Zacharias, on whom be peace." For the illustration of which passage, it must be observed, that the Moslems hold in a very high veneration the memory of St. John the Baptist, on account of the honourable mention made of him in the third chapter of the Korán. Nor does the commentary on this passage, drawn up by Hesein Wacz, a French version of which has been published, give a less advantageous character of that saint. As a farther proof of his sanctity, and the iniquity of his murderers, the Mohammedans have also a tradition, which contains an account of the vengeance taken upon the Jews for the perpetration of that horrid fact, and is to the following effect: "The general either of Bakhtnafr,

"Nebuchadnezzar, or Gudarz, Antiochus Epiphanes, in an expedition against Jerusalem,

"entering the temple, saw blood bubbling upon the great altar there; and asking the reason of it, the Jews told him it was the blood of a sacrifice which had not been accepted

"of God: to which he replied, that they had not told him the truth, and ordered a thousand of them to be slain on the altar; but the blood not ceasing, he told them, that, if "they would not confess the truth, he would not spare one of them; whereupon they

"acknowledged it was the blood of John: and the general said, Thus hath your LORD

"taken vengeance on you; and then cried out, O John! my LORD and thy LORD knoweth

"what hath befallen thy people for thy sake; wherefore let thy blood stop, by God's permission,

"lest I leave not one of them alive: upon which the blood immediately stopped." To this

g tradition Mokhtar apparently alluded, in his discourse with the Arab of Hejáz; after his departure from whom he went to Mecca, in order to offer his service to Abd'allah Ibn Zuhayr,<sup>a</sup> and arrived there soon after his inauguration. But not meeting with proper encouragement there, he retired to Táyef; and, in about a year's time, returned to Mecca. Soon after his arrival there, Abd'allah, by the assistance of Abbás Ebn Sakel, engaged him in his service. However, Mokhtar could not be prevailed upon to take the oath of allegiance to Abd'allah, before the latter had promised to make use of him in all his most weighty affairs, and grant him free access to him on all occasions, even before any other person. After this, he behaved with great bravery during the siege of Mecca, which was raised upon the news of Yezid's death; and continued above five months with Abd'allah after that event. But not being advanced to any considerable post, and being informed that the sectaries at Cúfa only wanted a proper general, in order to carry all before them, he immediately set out for that city. Every mosque on the road he visited, performed his devotions in them all, and harangued the people he found therein, assuring them of victory, and a speedy deliverance from all the grievances they laboured under. He had no sooner entered Cúfa, than he convoked the leaders of the sectaries there; telling them, that he came from Mokammed Ebn Hanifyah, the mine of excellency, the Imám that directed the right way, and representing to them the incapacity of Solimán for the undertaking in which he was soon to embark. These two points he repeated to them so often, that at last he made an impression upon the minds of many of the Shiites in his favour; though the superior interest, age, and authority, of Solimán rendered it impossible for him to wrest the command out of his hands. However, he comforted himself with the hopes of being vested with the supreme authority,<sup>c</sup> and consequently with the command of all the Shiite forces, in case Solimán should miscarry in the projected expedition. Nevertheless, for some time, his interest declined to such a degree, that, upon suspicion of his having formed a design of seizing upon the province, he was surprized by a detachment of Solimán's troops, conducted to prison, and for a certain term kept there closely confined. We must not forget to remark, that Theophanes calls the person, of whom we have here been giving our readers an account, Mouchar, or Muchar, and Mouktar, not Mokhtar, as has been asserted by Mr. Ockley. He also tells us, that this Muchar, tho' an impostor, pretended to act the prophet, made himself master of Persia, and occasioned amongst the Arabs many commotions. From whence, in conjunction with many more instances of the like kind that occur, some of which have already been taken<sup>d</sup> notice of in this work, we may infer, that a most confused, indistinct, and imperfect relation of the Arab affairs has been handed down to us by the later Greek and Latin historians<sup>e</sup>.

<sup>r</sup> MS. Laud. num. 161. ubi sup. ISM. ABU'LFED. hist. univ. ABU JAAFAR AL TABAR. AL MAKIN, & GREG. ABU'L FAR. ubi sup.

Solimán begins his march into Syria.

ALL Al Mokhtar's efforts to deprive Solimán of his post proving ineffectual, that general began his march at the head of the Shiite forces, who had assumed the name of penitents, because of the penitence, or repentance and sorrow, they now expressed for abandoning Hosein, for the place of their destination. He first advanced to Nokhailab, a town at no very great distance from Cúfa, being the place appointed for the general rendezvous, in the new moon of the latter Rabí. When he arrived there, he took a view of the camp; and being not a little surprized at the small number of men that formed it, he instantly dispatched two of his horse to Cúfa, with orders to cry out in the streets, and in the great mosque, VENGEANCE FOR HOSEIN! This so alarmed the citizens, that they assembled in vast numbers, and several of them repaired the next morning to the camp at Nokhailab. Amongst these there was one who had married an Arabian lady, the most celebrated beauty of her age, on whom he doated to excess; and another, who was a person of distinction, that had a daughter and many relations; both of whom abandoned every thing that was dear and valuable to them, with uncommon alacrity, on this occasion; the former saying at his departure, O GOD! I commend to thee my family and my child. O GOD! preserve me in them! and the latter, by way of answer to his daughter, when she asked him how he could abandon her, Child, thy father flies from his sin to his God. Upon the arrival of these volunteers, Solimán took a review of the troops under his command, and found them to amount to above 4000 effective men; though the Cúfans had promised to supply him with at least four times that number. Two thousand of those who had engaged to attend Solimán, had been drawn off by Mokhtar, who, tho' a pretended friend to the cause he espoused, entertained very indifferent sentiments of the military capacity of that general; and the other 10,000 chose rather to violate their oaths, and abandon the engagements they had entered into, than to run the risk of being cut to pieces by a superior enemy. However, Solimán did not neglect to animate his men, by assuring them, that they were to fight for another world, and not for this; and that therefore, whatever should be the fate of the present

<sup>a</sup> MS. Laud. num. 161. & ISM. ABU'LFED. ubi sup. Al KOR. MOHAM. f. iii. v. 33. HOSEIN WA'EZ, in comment. ad Al KOR. Moham. ibid. YAHYA, JALLALO'DDIN, AL BEIDAWI, &c. D'HERBEL. Biblioth. orient. in art. Jabla Ben Zataria, p. 471, 472. ABU JAAFAR AL TABAR. & AL MAKIN, ubi sup. p. 57. THEOPH. chronograph. p. 300, 303, 304. OCKLEY'S hist. of the Sarac. vol. ii. p. 278—288.

- a expedition, they might depend upon a future state of eternal and uninterrupted felicity. A council of war being held, two plans of operations were proposed to the general; according to the first of which, the troops were to return to Cúfa, and put to the sword all those who had deserted Hosein in that city; but the latter required them immediately to march into Syria, and take vengeance of Obeid'allah there, who had been the principal cause, if not the absolute author, of the destruction of that Imâm. This, for several weighty reasons and considerations, meeting with Solimán's approbation, he made the necessary dispositions for putting it in immediate execution; tho' Ibrahim Ebn Mohammed Ebn Telba, Abd'allah Ebn Zobeir's collector of the tribute at Cúfa, and Abd'allah Ebn Yezid, the governor of that city, who were both in the interest of the house of Hâshem, did their utmost to prevail upon him
- b to suspend his march. They represented to Solimán, that they should soon be able to assist him both with money and troops; and that as Obeid'allah, by reason of his enormous cruelty, was mortally hated in that province, it would be better to wait for him there, where the people would most certainly declare against him, and where he would soon arrive, than to attack a powerful enemy in his own country with so inconsiderable a force. But Solimán proving deaf to so salutary an admonition, Ibrahim endeavoured to persuade him to remain in his camp at least till he could furnish him with the tribute of the provinces; which would not fail of animating his men, and enabling him to push on with greater vigour the military operations. But Solimán still continuing refractory, the conferences broke off without success; and the Shiite army decamped from Nokbailah, in order to pursue their march into
- c Syria without delay<sup>1</sup>.

THE first place to which Solimán advanced, after his departure from Nokbailah, was Eksâs And advanced upon the Euphrates; where, upon a general muster, he found that by desertion he had lost 1000 men. Nor was he joined there by the Separatists of Basra and Al Madâyen, tho' they had promised him a reinforcement; which proved a great discouragement to his troops, especially as they had received certain advice, that Obeid'allah was upon his march against them. However, Solimán put a good face upon the matter, saying to his men, "The LORD doth not approve of their going out, and therefore he hath withdrawn them for our advantage; wherefore praise ye the LORD." Solimán having resumed his march, and continued it all night, he arrived the next morning at Mashhad Hosein, or the sepulchre of the d martyr Hosein, where the army staid a day and a night, in order to pray for Hosein, to beg his pardon for deserting him, and to perform upon that holy, pure, and sublime spot their devotions. When they first approached the tomb, they all cried out with one voice, and shed tears in the most copious manner, wishing that they had all died with him; insomuch that a more melancholy and moving scene never appeared. Nay, their grief was so intense on this occasion, their repentance for abandoning Hosein so sincere, and so fervent their devotion, that, when Solimán commanded them to march, not a man of them would stir till he had first stood upon Hosein's tomb, and asked his pardon for what had happened. Which conduct seemed so extraordinary even to the more rational Mohammedans themselves, that one of them then present swore that he never saw such crouding about the black stone

e in the temple of Mecca itself. In order to set which remark in a clear light, we must beg leave to remind our readers, that the black stone here mentioned is a stone set in silver, and fixed in the south-east corner of the Caaba, being that which looks towards Basra, about two inches and one-third, or, which is the same thing, seven spans from the ground, held in the utmost veneration by the Mohammedans, and kissed by all who perform the pilgrimage to Mecca; being called by some of them the right hand of God on earth. But for a farther account of this stone, as well as of every thing else relating to the temple of Mecca, we must refer our readers to a preceding part of this work<sup>2</sup>.

- f FROM Mashhad Hosein the Shiite army marched to Hesâsab, and from thence to Al Ambâr, He and his or Ambâr, a city of Irâk, near the confluence of the Tigris and the Euphrates, in the territory of Baghdâd, and the imperial seat of Al Saffab, the first Khalif of the house of Abbâs. troops are cut to pieces by Obeid'allah. From Ambâr Solimán advanced to Sodûd; and from thence to Kayyârah, where he ordered his troops to pitch their tents. They had not been long here before Solimán received a friendly letter from Abd'allah Ebn Yezid, the governor of Cúfa; wherein he pressed him to return home, and represented to him, in the strongest terms, the folly and temerity of engaging so powerful an army as would be sent against him with a handful of men. Abd'allah concluded his letter with these remarkable words: "Do not set at nought my advice, nor contradict my command. Come as soon as my letter is read to you. God turn your faces towards his obedience, and your backs to a rebellion against him." But Solimán imagining that Abd'allah recalled them only in order to support Abd'allah Ebn Zobeir, persisted in his intention of penetrating into Syria; telling his troops, that they would never be
- g

<sup>1</sup> MS. Laud. num. 167. & ISM. ABU'LFED. ubi sup. Houssain & Metavakkel. AL ZAMAKHSHAR. AHMED EBN YUSEF, Poc. not. in spec. hist. Arab. p. 117, &c. Mod Hist. vol. i. p. 59.

<sup>2</sup> Idem ibid. D'HERBEL. Bibl. orient. in art.

nearer the two Hoseins, meaning Hosein and his brother Hasan, to whom the Shiites gave that name, than they were at present; and that if they, at this juncture, should meet with death, they would die in a state of repentance, and consequently obtain a remission of their sins. From Kayyârah the Shiite general moved to Hait, or Haditza, another town of Irâk, situated on the opposite bank of the Euphrates, from whence he wrote an answer to Abd'allah Ebn Yezid; wherein he thanked him for his kind letter, but said that he could not accept of his invitation. To which he added, that his men considered themselves as true penitents, and therefore resolved to continue their march, and leave to God the success of the expedition. From Haditza Solimân advanced to Karkisia, a city of Mesopotamia, the Cercusium of the later Greek and Roman writers, whose walls were surrounded by the Chabora, or Abora, and the Euphrates; and from thence to Ainwerda, or Ainwerdab, where the Separatists gave out, that their design was to depose both the Khalîfs, and fix upon the Moslem throne one of the family of the prophet. But here a stop was put to their career, they meeting with the just reward of their temerity and presumption. For, Obeid'allah Ebn Ziyâd came up with them at Ainwerda, or Ras Ain, as we find it called by Abu'l Faraj, with a body of 20,000 horse; in a short time brought them to a general action; and, after a sharp dispute, cut them all to pieces upon the spot *.

Merwân dies. Soon after this decisive action, the governor of Cûsa released Al Mokhtar, whom he had before ordered to be confined, at the request of Abd'allah Ebn Omar, who had married Al Mokhtar's sister. This happened a little before the death of Merwân, who departed this life in the month of Ramadân. It must here be remember'd, that, after Moâwiyah's decease, Merwân was elected Khalîf, on condition that Khâled, the son of Yezid, should mount the Moslem throne after him, and his own children be excluded from the succession; Khâled at that time refusing to take the government upon him, on account of his tender age. To shew the purity and sincerity of his intentions in this affair, Merwân married Yezid's widow, who was Khâled's mother, and declared that he would never be guilty of an infraction of the treaty concluded with Khâled, in the minutest particular. However, afterwards altering his mind, he caused his eldest son Abd'almâlec to be proclaimed his lawful successor; which so disgusted Khâled, who always hated him, that he one day reviled him for it, before a great number of the nobility, in a very reproachful manner. This so incensed Merwân, that he called him bastard; which his mother being informed of by the child, she vowed to be revenged of him for so grievous an affront. In consequence of which resolution, she soon after poisoned him, as we find asserted by some of the Arab historians, or, as others will have it, smothered him, by laying a pillow on his face, when he was asleep, and sitting upon it till he was dead. However, Abu Jaafar Al Tabari seems to intimate, that Merwân died of the plague; and not a word is said of his wife's being even in any manner accessory to his death by Abu'l Faraj. Some authors make him to have been sixty-three, and others, with more probability, seventy-one years of age, at the time of his death. His wife, say those who believe that she destroyed him, gave out that he died suddenly. He reigned 298 days, or, as others affirm, eleven months, if we compute from the renewal of his inauguration. We find it intimated by Theophanes, that the Arabs elected Abd'allah Ebn Zobeir Khalîf at Yathreb, or Medina, which he denominates Æthrib, and the Syrians Merwân, called by him Maruan, at Damascus; where, according to this writer, he reigned about nine months. Dionysius Telmarenis makes Yezid, Merwân, and Abd'almâlec, to have reigned in continual succession, and consequently takes no notice of Abd'allah Ebn Zobeir and Moâwiyah II. It is no wonder, therefore, that he should have kept Merwân a year upon the Moslem throne. For this may be easily accounted for, if we suppose his Khalîfat to have commenced at the death of Yezid. It ought to be remarked here, that M. D'Herbelot is guilty of a mistake, when he affirms, that Merwân's authority was recognized by all the provinces of the Moslem empire, after the defeat of Dabâk Ebn Kais; and that he left his son Abd'almâlec, after his death, in full possession of the sovereignty of all those provinces. For, that Abd'allah Ebn Zobeir was invested with the supreme authority in Arabia, when Abd'almâlec ascended the Syrian throne, and not intirely reduced till the 73d year of the Hejra, is attested by the best Arabic writers, and even by M. D'Herbelot himself; and will, as we fully persuade ourselves, in the sequel of this history, most clearly appear *.

And is buried at Damascus. As to his person, Merwân was tall and of a thin habit of body. He had blue or grey eyes, and red or yellowish hair. He was surnamed Ebn Tarîd, or the son of the expelled;

* MS. Laud. num. 161. ubi sup. GOLII not. ad Alfragan. p. 124, 234, 256. ABU JAAFAR AL TABARI & AL MAKIN, ubi sup. p. 95. ZOSIM. lib. iii. c. 12, 13. EUTROP. lib. ix. c. 2. SEXT. RUF. c. xxii. PROCOP. Persic. lib. ii. c. 5. AMMIAN. MARCELLIN. lib. xxiii. c. 11. ABU JAAFAR AL TABARI & AL MAKIN, ubi sup. p. 57. GREG. ABU'L FAR. ubi sup. p. 198.

* ABU JAAFAR AL TABARI & AL MAKIN, ubi sup. MS. Laud. num. 161. & GREG. ABU'L FAR. ubi sup. THEOPHAN. chronograph. p. 300. DIONYS. TELMARENS. apud Joseph. Simon. Asseman. in Biblioth. orient. Clementino-Vatican. tom. ii. p. 104. ut & ipse JOS. SIMON. ASSEMAN. ibid. D'HERBEL. Biblioth. orient. in art. Marwan, p. 558. & in art. Abd'allah Ebn Zobeir, p. 7.

- a his father Al Hakem having been banished by Mohammed to Al Táyef, or Waj, for divulging a secret that had been imparted to him. He continued in exile during the reigns of Abu Becr and Omar, but was recalled by Othmán; to whom this was afterwards objected as one of his greatest crimes. His secretary was Sofíán Ebn Abrád, or, according to others, Abd'al-lab Ebn Aws; his Kádi, or judge, Ebn Idris Al Holwáni; the captain of his guards, Tahya Ebn Kais; his chamberlain, Abu Sabl, his servant, who was a black, or negro, and his mother's freed-man. Eutychius fixes the duration of his Khalifat precisely at nine months, and Abu'l Faraj at seven and a few days; in which he differs from all other authors. He died, and was buried, at Damascus, and his son Abd'almálec performed the funeral-service over him. He expired, as has been already observed, in the month of Ramadán, or, as b Eutychius will have it, in the former Rabí, and the 65th year of the Hejra, corresponding with the year of our LORD 685<sup>y</sup>.

<sup>y</sup> ABU JAAFAR AL TABARI & AL MAKIN, ubi sup. EUTYCH. ubi sup. p. 364, 365. GREG. ABU'L FAR. ubi sup p. 198.

S E C T. XI.

- c ABD'ALMALEC, the son of Merwán, who succeeded him, was surnamed Abu'l-Walid, Abd'almálec or, as others affirm, Abu Merwán, and, according to Abu'lfeda, was inaugurated on the 3d day of the month of Ramadán, being the very day on which his father died. His mother was Ayesha, the daughter of Alúm Ebn Arab Ebn Abu'l As, or, according to others, of Moáwiyah Ebn Mogheirah Ebn Abu'l As Ebn Ommeya Ebn Abd Shems. Some authors relate, that, at the time of his inauguration, he had the Mosháf, or the Korán, in his lap; which folding up, he said, probably to the person taking the oath of allegiance to him, "Let this divide, or determine, between me and thee." But this circumstance is related by Abu'lfeda in a different manner. He informs us, that when the news of his father's death was brought to Abd'almálec, the messengers found him with the Korán in the aforesaid position; d and that hereupon folding it up, he said, "I must take my leave of thee now." But this relation, though followed by Mr. Ockley, ought to be considered, on many accounts, as much more improbable than the other<sup>z</sup>.

- ABD'ALLAH EBN SOBEIR, who had been elected Khalíf by the Arabs, still holding his residence at Mecca, Abd'almálec would not permit his subjects to visit the temple there; and, for that reason, ordered the temple at Jerusalem to be so enlarged as to take the stone, or rather the steps, on which Omar had formerly prayed, and on which the Moslems had before erected a mosque; into the body of the church. The whole being, therefore, thus in a manner converted into a mosque, the Syrians performed their pilgrimage thither, as the Arabs under Abd'allah's jurisdiction did still to the Caaba. Not content with this Abd'almálec desired the Christians of Damascus to deliver into his hands one of their churches adjoining to the cathedral there. Upon which, they shewed him the instrument drawn up and signed by Kháled Ebn Al Walíd, when the city was taken in the Khalifat of Omar; by which the possession of that and the other Christian churches was for ever secured to them. Abd'almálec then offered them a large sum of money, and gave them leave to build another church in lieu of it, in what part of the town they pleased. But not being hereby induced to part with it, he left it in their possession; not judging it proper or expedient at this juncture, when he had a powerful enemy to contend with, to take it from them by force<sup>a</sup>.

- THE following year, Al Mokhtar, who had found means, during his imprisonment, to keep up a correspondence with the sectaries, being informed of Solimán's fate, which, from the moment of that general's departure, he had expected, began to put himself in motion. As Abd'allah Ebn Zobeir still supported himself in Arabia against the new Syrian Khalíf, he thought this a proper time to put his design in execution; and therefore having received a commission from Al Mobdi, the son of Mohammed, the son of Ali, the great Imám, or head of the sect in a lineal succession, constituting him general of all his forces, he took the command of the Shiite army upon him. This was for some time opposed by Ibrahim Ebn Ashtar, a man of considerable interest amongst the sectaries; but, upon Al Mokhtar's producing his commission, he acquiesced in the measures that had been taken, and Al Mokhtar was universally acknowledged generalissimo of the forces assembled to demand the blood of Hossein, or, in other words, to take vengeance of the murderers of that Imám. Nay, according to Abu'lfeda, he was formally inaugurated Khalíf upon the following terms; that he should govern according to the contents of the Book of God, and the traditions of his apostle, and destroy all the murderers of Hosein. In consequence of which agreement, he a killed Shamer, Kawla, who carried Hosein's head to Obeid'allah, and Amer, who commanded the army that defeated the troops of that Imâm. The head of Amer, together with that of his son, he sent to Mohammed Ebn Hanifyah; and put Adi Ebn Hathem, whom he had taken prisoner, into the hands of the Shiites, who stripped him and shot him with arrows, in the same manner as he had served the son of Ali. We must not forget to observe, that, according to Ebn Faljal Al Andalusi, an Arab author of Spain; one Masarjowyah, a Jewish physician of Basra, flourished in the Khalifat of Merwân. He translated the medical pandects of Aaron the presbyter into the Arabic tongue. A remarkable story has been told of him by one Ayub Ebn Al Hakem; for the particulars of which we must beg leave to refer our curious readers to Abu'l Faraj <sup>b</sup>.

<sup>z</sup> AL MAKIN, in hist. Saracen. lib. i. c. 12. p. 58. GREG. ABU'L FAR. ubi sup. p. 198, 199. ISM. ABU'L FED. hist. univ. EUTYCH. ubi sup. p. 364, 365. OCKLEY'S hist. of the Sarac. vol. ii. p. 299. <sup>a</sup> ISM. ABU'LFED. & AL MAKIN, ubi sup. EUTYCH. ubi sup.

A pacification concluded between Abd'allah Ebn Zobeir and the followers of Ali.

AL MOKTAR EBN ABU OBEIDAH AL THAKIFI having received advice, that Abd'almâlec had sent an army to reduce Abd'allah Ebn Zobeir, and that a body of the Khalif's troops were posted upon the frontiers of Irâk, which he apprehended might attack him on that side, whilst Mus'ab Ebn Zobeir, Abd'allah's brother, advanced against him with a strong detachment from Basra; he wrote a deceitful letter to Abd'allah, wherein he offered to march to his assistance, at the head of all his forces. Abd'allah, in answer to that letter, assured him, that, as soon as he had satisfied him of the sincerity of his allegiance, by receiving the suffrages of his men for him, he should look upon him as his friend, and not send any forces into his country. To which he added, that, for the present, he could not give him a more convincing proof of the sincerity of his intentions, than by sending a body c of troops, with all possible expedition, to watch the motions of the Khalif Abd'almâlec's army, that was then posted at Dilkôra. As soon as this answer came to hand, Al Mokhtar dispatched Serjabil Ebn Wars, one of his officers, with a body of 3000 men, consisting chiefly of slaves, there being but 700 Arabs amongst them, to Medina; commanding him, upon his arrival there, to write to him from thence for farther orders. His design herein was to send an Emir immediately to Medina to command those troops, whilst Serjabil, at the head of another body of the Shiite forces, should form the siege of Mecca, at that time the residence of Abd'allah Ebn Zobeir. But Abd'allah, not having received from Al Mokhtar the security he required, was resolved to be upon his guard; and therefore sent Abbâs Ebn Sabel to Medina, with a detachment of 2000 men; ordering him to treat Al Mokhtar's troops d as friends, if he found them really in his interest; but, if otherwise, to use his utmost endeavours to destroy them. Abbâs, upon his arrival at Medina, not being able to persuade Serjabil to march with him to Dilkôra, very justly entertained a suspicion of him. However, he dissembled this, till he found an opportunity of distributing a few sheep amongst Al Mokhtar's troops, reduced almost to the last extremity for want of provisions; which excited them to disperse themselves over the adjacent territory, in order to supply the camp with what necessaries they could collect. This being observed by Abbâs, he advanced at the head of his troops, to the enemy's tents, soon made himself master of them, killed Serjabil himself, with seventy of his men, and spared all the rest, who accepted of the quarter offered them, except about 300, who were afterwards put to the sword. Al Mokhtar e fearing this disaster might intimidate Mohammed Ebn Hanifyah, at the same time that he acquainted him with it, offered to support him with a powerful army. But Mohammed refused such assistance; telling him in the answer he wrote, that his intention was to have recourse only to pacific measures; and before the messenger, which he sent to Al Mokhtar, departed, he said, "Desire him to fear God, and abstain from all effusion of blood." But though Mohammed Ebn Hanifyah, and all the rest of Ali's family, behaved at Mecca in a very inoffensive manner, and were so far from exciting any commotions there, that they did their utmost to preserve the public tranquillity and repose; yet Abd'allah Ebn Zobeir not thinking himself safe as long as they refused a recognition of his authority, imprisoned them, together with seventeen of the principal Cûfans, set a guard over them, and threatened to f put them to death, and reduce their bodies afterwards to ashes, if, within a limited time, they did not take the oath of allegiance to him. Al Mokhtar, being informed of the distressed situation they were in, sent a body of 750 horse, under the command of Abu Abd'allah Al Jodali, to Mecca, to release them. Al Jodali not only executed his orders with great bravery, but likewise took Abd'allah himself prisoner, and would have cut him to pieces on the spot, had not Mohammed prevented such an act of violence, and composed all differences to the mutual satisfaction of both parties, by his timely interposition. Abu Abd'allah Al Jodali, or rather Mohammed himself, distributed a sum of money he brought with him amongst 4000 of Ali's friends, in order to make them some amends for the losses they had sustained. When Mohammed Ebn Hanifyah was delivered from the prison near the well g Zemzem, in which he had been confined, the time allowed him to make his submission to

<sup>b</sup> ISL. ABU'LFED. ubi sup. MS. Laud. in Bibl. Bodl. Oxon. num. 161. AL MAKIN & GREG. AB'UL FAR. ubi sup.

Abd'allah was within two days of being expired; and a sufficient quantity of wood, and other combustible materials, was prepared for burning both him and his companions, if they had not been set at liberty by the Shiite horse. One of the persons confined with Mohammed Ebn Hanifyah was Abd'allah Ebn Ayad, a man highly esteemed by the followers of Ali. Notwithstanding the late pacification, Mohammed Ebn Hanifyah, after a distribution of Al Mokhtar Ebn Abu Obeidah's money amongst those that attended him had been made, for his farther security, took post on a mountain near Mecca with a body of 4000 men<sup>c</sup>.

THE Cûfans having received advice, that Merwân, before his death, had sent Obeid'allah Obeid'allah Ebn Ziyad defeated and killed. with a powerful army towards their city, and even given him a permission to plunder it for three days together, appointed Yezid Ebn Ares, a man of undaunted courage, to command the forces they raised to oppose him. But Merwân dying before Obeid'allah could execute his orders, an end was put, at least for the present, to the intended expedition. However, the Cûfans remembering this, and Al Mokhtar now being at leisure to chastize that general for suggesting such an enterprize to Merwân, as well as for the murder of Hosein, which still was the pretext for all the hostile proceedings of the sectaries; they assembled a body of troops, in their turn, to act offensively against Obeid'allah, and even the Syrian Khatif himself, if he should think fit to support him. There was one thing very remarkable in the preparations made for this expedition. Al Mokhtar caused a portable throne to be made, in which he pretended there was something mysterious; telling the people, that "it would be of the same use to them that the ark was to the children of Israel." Wherefore he ordered it to be carried on a mule with the forces that were to march against Obeid'allah, and a prayer to be said before it, conceived in the following terms: "O God! grant that we may live long in thy obedience; help us, and do not forget us, but protect us." To which the people answered, Amen, Amen. By this stratagem, than which nothing could have been devised more proper to animate a body of ignorant hot-headed enthusiasts, the Cûfan troops were inspired with such fortitude and resolution, that Ibrahim Ebn Ashtar, Al Mokhtar's general, found it no difficult matter to lead them against the enemy. In fine, being determined to act offensively, he attacked Obeid'allah's camp; and, after a sharp engagement, forced it, put that general and many of his men to the sword, and drove a greater number of them into a neighbouring river, where they all immediately perished. Ibrahim cut off Obeid'allah's head, which, with some others, he sent to Al Mokhtar, and afterwards reduced his body to ashes. This victory the Cûfans ascribed intirely to the ark, or throne, and consequently almost idolized it for a long time after. We are told by some Arab authors, that the army commanded by Obeid'allah Ebn Ziyad consisted of 70,000 men, of whom 10,300 were killed in the action; and that the loss sustained by Ibrahim scarce amounted to 370 men. Be that as it will, the victory was complete; insomuch that Nisibin, or Nisibis, Sinjar, and Dara, or Daras, without the least opposition, surrendered to the victors. This great success rendered the sectaries so formidable, that they began to entertain thoughts in earnest of fixing either Mohammed Ebn Hanifyah, or some other of Ali's family, upon the Moslem throne<sup>d</sup>.

THE same year the late battle was fought, that is, the 67th year of the Hejra, Abd'allah Al Mokhtar Ebn Zobeir sent his brother Mus'ab to govern Basra. Al Mokhtar was then absolute master of Cûfa, where he put all to the sword who would not join him, in order to revenge the murder of Hosein. Upon Mus'ab's arrival at Basra, he went into the mosque there, ascended the pulpit, and made a speech to the people. His predecessor Al Hâreth sat one step below him. In his speech, amongst other things, he reflected upon Abd'almâlec, and that part of the Moslem empire which submitted to him, and extolled the conduct of the Arabs who obeyed the orders of his brother Abd'allah. Then he told the Basrans, that as they usually gave names, or rather surnames, to their Emirs, he would take the liberty to assume that of Hejâz. Soon after which, one Shebet came to Basra, upon a crop-eared bob-tailed mule, from Cûfa, with his cloaths rent, crying out, Ya gautha, Ya gautha, Help! Help! He was attended by many of the principal Cûfans, who complained bitterly of Al Mokhtar's cruel and tyrannical administration; and begged Mus'ab to march with an army against him. This petition Mus'ab very readily complied with, and wrote immediately to Al Moballeb, his lieutenant in Persia, to come and join him with the Persian forces; which at last, though with some reluctance, he did. After this junction, Mus'ab and Al Moballeb advanced at the head of their troops into the territory of Cûfa, forced Al Mokhtar to a general action, overthrew him with great slaughter, and obliged him to shut himself up in the castle of Cûfa. Thither Mus'ab pursued him, and laid siege to the place. Al Mokhtar for some time made a brave defence; but being at last killed, his men surrendered at discretion. They amounted to about 7000 in all, and were, on account of the outrages they had committed, every one of them put by Mus'ab to the sword<sup>a</sup>.

<sup>c</sup> MS. Laud. num. 161. ubi sup. ISM. ABU'LFED. et AL MAKIN, ubi sup. D'HERBFL. Biblioth. orient. in art. Mokhtar Ebn Abou Obeidah, p. 619. <sup>d</sup> ISM. ABU'LFED. et MS. Laud. num. 161. in Bibl. Bodl. Oxon. ubi sup. ABU JAAFAR AL TABAR. & AL MAKIN, ubi sup. p. 59, 60.

A farther account of the great captain Al Mokhtar.

THIS blow, which for the present at least put an end to all their towering projects, was given the Motazalites in the month of Ramadân, and the 67th year of the Hejra. The immediate consequence of which was the submission of Cûfa, and its district, to Mus'ab; after which Ibrahim Ebn Ashtar took the oath of fidelity to Abd'allah Ebn Zobeir. This he did at the invitation of Mus'ab, who, being now master of Irâk, had him absolutely in his power. After this important conquest, Mus'ab appointed Mohalleb Ebn Abu Safra to preside over Mawfel upon the Tigris, together with the provinces of Armenia, Mesopotamia, and Aderbijan. As for Al Mokhtar, he was killed in the sixty-seventh year of his age, after he had worsted, in several engagements, the generals of Yezid, Merwân, and Abd'almâlec, and made himself master of the Babylonian Irâk, of which Cûfa was the capital. He never pardoned any one who had declared himself an enemy to the house of Hâshem, or who had been in any manner concerned in the murder of Hosein. He was surnamed Al Thakîfi, as being originally of the tribe of Thakîf, and boasted that he had destroyed 50,000 of the adherents of the house of Ommiyah, exclusive of those that were slain in the battles which he fought. He left several children behind him, some of whom so signalized themselves by their glorious actions, that a book was afterwards written by an oriental author, intitled, Anwar alathâr fi fadhl banu Al Mokhtar; which contained an accurate account of all the illustrious achievements of Al Mokhtar and his descendents. We must beg leave here to observe, that M. D'Herbelot is guilty of a great mistake, when he tells us, that Al Mokhtar was found under an elephant's feet at the battle, or in the war, of Kbaiber, and that this war happened in the Khalifat of Omar. For the expedition against Kbaibar was undertaken by the prophet himself, in the seventh year of the Hejra; and consequently our hero Al Mokhtar could not then have been above seven years of age<sup>b</sup>.

The Azarakites overthrown by Omar Ebn Abd'allah Al Temimi.

THE next year, the Azarakites, so denominated from Nasî Ebn Al Azarak, the author of their sect, assembled a considerable force in Persia, and made an irruption into Irâk. They advanced almost to the gates of Cûfa, and penetrated to Al Madâyen. As they acknowledged no established government, either temporal or spiritual, and were sworn enemies to the house of Ommiyah, they committed terrible ravages in the province of Abwâz, and in every other part of the Moslem territories through which they moved. They carried their excesses so far as to murder all the people they met with, to rip open women with child, and to exercise every species of cruelty upon the Moslems of all denominations, without distinction of sex or age. One of them being desirous of sparing a lady of transcendent piety, as well as beauty, another said to him, "What! thou enemy of God, thou art captivated with her beauty, and hast denied the faith!" and instantly killed her. The governor of Mawfel and Mesopotamia, being informed of these unparalleled outrages, marched against them with a body of select troops, came up with them at a place called Sawlâk, and carried on a brisk war against them, for the space of eight months, without intermission; during which interval many sharp engagements happened. In some part of this term, their leader Nasî Ebn Al Azarak died, and was succeeded by Katri Ebn Al Fojât; under whose conduct they continued their depredations. Mus'ab being not pleased with his lieutenant Mahleb, or Al Mohalleb, Abusafra's management of the war, recalled him, and substituted in his room Omar Ebn Abd'allah Al Temimi, who gave the Azarakites a great overthrow at Naisabûr in Khorasân, put many of them to the sword, and pursued the rest as far as Ispahân and the province of Kermân. Here having received a reinforcement, they returned into the province of Abwâz, and did incredible damage to the country through which they passed. But Omar advancing a second time against them, they retired at his approach to Al Madâyen, and plundered the district belonging to that city in a dreadful manner. However, Omar pursuing them hither also, they fled first into Kermân, and afterwards into Khorasân, where they gradually dispersed themselves. This year there was a grievous famine in Syria, which hindered all military operations. Abd'almâlec, however, incamped near Botnân, near the district of Kinnisrîn, tho' he was not a little incommoded by the heavy rains that fell there; and, in the spring returned to Damascus, where he soon finished his preparations for the ensuing campaign<sup>c</sup>.

Abd'almâlec reduces Amru.

IN the 69th year of the Hejra, Abd'almâlec left Damascus, in order to march against Mus'ab Ebn Zobeir, who was grown very formidable since the defeat of the Azarakites, and appointed Amru Ebn Sa'id governor of that city. But Amru seizing upon it for himself, the Khalîf was obliged to return thither, and lay aside for the present the intended expedition. Upon

<sup>a</sup> MS. Laud. num. 161. ubi sup. AL MAKIN, ubi sup. p. 160. D'HERBEL. Biblioth. orient. in art. Mokhtar Ben Abou Obeidah, p. 619

<sup>b</sup> AL MAKIN et D'HERBEL. ubi sup. ISM. ABU'LFED. de vit. Moham. c. xlv. p. 87—92. MOHAM. AL FIRAUZABAD. AL WAKED. AL BOKHAR. AL JANNAB. EBN. ISHAK, Aut. lib. MO'ALEM AL TANZIL, &c.

<sup>c</sup> MS. Laud. num. 161. et AL MAKIN, ubi sup. D'HERBEL. Biblioth. orient. in art. Azarcab, p. 154. GOLII not. ad Alfragan. p. 188—190.

- a Abd'almâlec's arrival at Damascus, several skirmishes happened between detachments of his troops and some of Amru's men; but, by the intervention of the women, a treaty was at last concluded between the contending parties, and the public tranquillity intirely restored. However, the Khalif not forgetting his competitor's attempt, three or four days after sent for him, ordered him to be disarmed of his sword, and fetter'd, and beat out two of his fore-teeth. Then he went to the evening prayers, and left the execution of Amru to his brother Abd'alaziz; who being so nearly related to him, and commiserating his unhappy situation, threw away his sword, and resolved not to be the instrument of his death. The Khalif returning from the performance of his devotions, to his great surprize, found Amru alive; whereupon he ordered him to be laid upon his back, and immediately killed him.
- b This action, however, so affected Abd'almâlec, that he was seized with a tremor, which, for some time after, quite disabled him; insomuch that his servants were obliged to take him up, and lay him upon his couch. The people observing, that Amru did not attend the Khalif to prayers, acquainted his brother Yabya with the affair; who instantly armed 1000 of Amru's slaves, and attacked Abd'almâlec's palace. After a warm dispute, they forced open the gates, killed several of the guards, and were upon the point of entering the palace, when the people within threw Amru's head amongst them. This so cooled their ardour, that they desisted from the attempt; and some money having been soon after distributed amongst them by Abd'alaziz, they retired to their respective habitations. But so great was Abd'almâlec's avarice, that, as we are told by an Arab author of good repute, when the commotion was appeased, he recalled the money bestowed upon them, and ordered it all to be again deposited in the public treasury. As for Yabya, who was the ringleader in the late riot, he was sentenced to die; but Abd'alaziz prevailed upon the Khalif to convert that punishment, on account of his being a member of the Ommiyan family, into a month's imprisonment, and then to banish him to Mus'ab Ebn Zobeir. The quarrel between Amru and Abd'almâlec, which proved so fatal to the former, is said to have been occasioned by an emulation excited between them by an old woman, whom they frequently visited, in their infancy, and which continued to subsist till the very day of Amru's tragical death. Merwân being sufficiently apprized of this, and fearing it might produce fatal effects after his death, obliged the Syrians to take the oath of fidelity to Abd'almâlec as his successor, in his life-time, and to swear likewise to elevate to the Moslem throne, if that Khalif died without issue, his younger son Abd'alaziz.
- c We find it intimated by one of the Arab historians, that Abd'almâlec could not make himself master of Damascus, after it had been seized by Amru, or, as he calls him, Omar Ebn Saad Ebn Abi Wakkâs, without laying a formal siege to that city <sup>h</sup>.

- In the 70th year of the Hejra, the Greeks made an incursion into Syria. Abd'almâlec The Khalif having then occasion for all his forces, in order to reduce to his obedience Abd'allah Ebn Zobeir, in Arabia, and Mus'ab, his brother, in Irâk, was not able to march against them; concludes a treaty with the Greek emperor. and therefore agreed to pay the Greek emperor 1000 dinârs every week for a certain term, to induce that prince to withdraw his troops out of the Moslem territories. This year Mus'ab went to Mecca, with all the wealth, cattle, and rich furniture, he had amassed; which he distributed amongst the Arabs. Abd'allah Ebn Zobeir himself also performed the pilgrimage to Mecca about the same time. We must beg leave to observe, that according to Theophanes and Cedrenus, Abd'almâlec concluded a treaty with the emperor, in the third or fourth year of his reign, by which he engaged himself to pay that prince annually 365,000 pieces of money, or dinârs, and to send him every year 365 slaves, as well as the same number of horses, of a generous breed; and the Christian potentate, on his part, promised to repress the course of the Maronites, who committed great disorders in the Khalif's dominions. About two years before this event, a pestilence, of a very malignant kind, made dreadful havock in Syria. In the aforesaid treaty, it was also stipulated, that the revenues of Cyprus, Armenia, and Iberia, should be equally divided between the contracting powers. Theophanes adds, f that, in the same year, Abd'almâlec sent Ziyad the brother of Mauia, Obeid'allah the son of Ziyâd, the brother of Moâwiyah I. he must mean, against the tyrant and impostor Mouchar, or Mouktar, into Persia, and that Ziyad, or rather Obeid'allah Ebn Ziyâd, was slain by Mouchar. He likewise farther relates, that as soon as the news of this blow reached the Khalif, he set out for Mesopotamia; but was obliged to return to Damascus by the rebellion of Sa'id, that is, Amru Ebn Sa'id, whom he left behind him there. Which rebellion, however, according to him, Abd'almâlec soon extinguished; and, in violation of his promise, put Sa'id to death. All which particulars, huddled together in so abrupt a manner, tho' in some points agreeing with the Arab historians, may be considered as an additional proof of the confused and indistinct accounts this chronographer has handed down to us of the g Moslem affairs <sup>i</sup>.

<sup>h</sup> MS. Laud. num. 161. ubi sup. AL MAKIN, ubi sup. p. 60, 61. <sup>i</sup> MS. Laud. num. 161. ubi sup. THEOPHAN. chronograph. p. 300, 301, 302, 303. GEORG. CEDREN. historiar. compend. p. 440. OCKLEY, ubi sup. p. 323.

Abd'almâ'ec
invades Irâk.

AED'ALMALÊC, being resolved to undertake an expedition into Irâk against Mus'ab Ebn Zobeir, put to death the principal accomplices of Amru Ebn Sa'id, and dispatched Khâled Ebn Asid privately to Basra, to form a party for him there. Mus'ab having received intelligence of Ebn Asid's arrival, attempted to surprize him; but without effect: which he imputed to the care the Basrans had taken to conceal him; and therefore reproached the chief of them in very sharp terms for their conduct on this occasion. Some of them he upbraided with their mean extraction, others with infamous actions committed either by them or their relations; and, in fine, all of them with something that incensed them greatly against him. In the mean time, Abd'almâlec had sent letters to the leading men full of large promises; and, amongst the rest, one to Ibrahim Ebn Al Ashtar, who delivered it to Mus'ab sealed up as it came. That letter contained a promise to Ibrahim of the lieutenancy of Irâk, if he would declare in favour of the Khalîf. Ibrahim then assured Mus'ab, that he should persist in his fidelity to him; and advised him, as Abd'almâlec had undoubtedly written to the other principal persons in Basra, whom he thought he could confide in, to the same effect, to behead all those whom he had reason to suspect were in that prince's interest. But Mus'ab not approving of this expedient, as he imagined it would create in the people of Irâk an aversion to him; Ibrahim pressed him to put them under arrest, till his fate was determined: so that, if he should be defeated by Abd'almâlec, their heads might be cut off, upon the first arrival of the bad news at Basra; but, if he obtained the victory, he might make a compliment of them to their tribes. As for Abd'almâlec, his subjects did their utmost to prevail upon him to reduce Irâk by his generals, and not expose his person to the hazards of war; fearing lest their affairs should be embroiled, if any disaster should happen to him, as their government was not yet settled upon a solid foundation. But the Syrian Khalîf believing himself perfectly qualified to command his troops in this expedition, both by his abilities in war, and his personal courage, and that he was a better match for Mus'ab than any of his generals, would not be persuaded to stay at home, whilst his forces were in the field. Having, therefore, finished his military preparations, he began his march for Irâk, and at last arrived at Masken, where Mus'ab had drawn up his army in order of battle. Masken, which we find called Sakan by Abu'l Faraj, is a small town in the deserts either of Al Shâm or Al Fazira, between Tadmor and the town of Tayba, near the Euphrates, upon the frontiers of Mesopotamia. It derived its name from a fountain or spring of hot water, in Arabic denominated Sukbn, surrounded with palm-trees, at a small distance from it. This place is the Sukana of the maps, and the Sakhna, or Sukbna, of the oriental geographers<sup>k</sup>.

The battle of Masken.

AFTER several movements, the two armies came in sight of each other, and made the necessary dispositions for an engagement. The troops of Irâk, according to custom, were resolved to desert Mus'ab, and not expose their country, on his account, to the ravages of a Syrian army. Ibrahim Ebn Al Ashtar began the battle, by charging Mohammed Ebn Harûn with such fury, that he forced him to retire; tho', being sustained by a fresh body of troops, headed by the Khalîf himself, he soon returned to the charge, repulsed Ibrahim in his turn, and killed him upon the spot. Mus'ab's general of the horse, either intimidated by the death and defeat of Ibrahim, or through treachery, soon after this, betook himself to flight; and many of the other Irâkian officers, who did not abandon their posts, refused to fight. Neither Omar Ebn Abd'allah, nor Al Moballeb, nor Ibâd Ebn Hossam, appeared in this engagement; of which Abd'almâlec being informed, he took occasion from thence to presage a certain victory to his troops. Mus'ab, being pressed on all sides, endeavoured to prevail upon his son Isa to make his escape to Mecca, and acquaint his uncle Abd'allah with the perfidy of the people of Irâk; but he could not by any means be induced to desert his father at that perilous conjuncture; declaring he would not survive him. On the contrary, he advised him to retreat first to Basra, and afterwards to Mecca, himself; but Mus'ab would not hear of such infamous conduct. Nay, he would not accept of quarter, when tendered him by the Khalîf, but persisted in his resolution of dying upon the field of battle. His son, therefore, who was determined not to forsake him, and he rushing into the midst of the enemy, fought like men animated by despair, destroyed several of the Syrians, and were at last both laid dead upon the spot. Mus'ab was first grievously wounded with arrows, then stabbed in several places, and had finally his head cut off by a man who carried it immediately to the Khalîf. Abd'almâlec offered the bearer 1000 dinârs; which he would not take; saying, that as he had slain Mus'ab purely to gratify his own private resentment, he had no manner of title to it. We are told by Abu'lfeda, that Abd'almâlec and Mus'ab, in the Khalîfat of Merwân, had contracted an intimate friendship; but that the latter afterwards marrying Sekina, the daughter of Hosein, and Ayesha, the daughter of Telha, became allied

<sup>k</sup> MS. Laud num. 161. ubi sup. GREG. ABU'L FAR. in hist. dynast. p. 199. ALBERT. SCHULT. ind. geographic. in vit. Salad. in voc. Sachna.

- a to two families that bore an implacable hatred to the house of Ommiyah. Theophanes relates; that about this time, whilst the Arabs were engaged in a civil war, the imperial forces, under the conduct of Leontius, drove them out of Armenia, Iberia, Media, and Bulgacia; with great slaughter, and re-annexed those provinces to the empire. He also informs us; that Abd'almâlec, whom he calls Abimelec, after Mus'ab had cut off Mouk'ar, killed and defeated that conqueror, and reduced Persia, or rather Irâk, under his dominion; which agrees tolerably well with what we find advanced in this point by the Arab historians. For, according to them, after the battle of Masken, Cûfa opened its gates to the Syrian Khalîf, and both the Persian and Babylonian Irâk submitted to him. The people of those provinces came in crowds; and, among the rest, Yahya, the brother of Amru, whom he had killed,
- b to take the oath of allegiance to him. After the conclusion of that ceremony, he ordered vast sums of money to be distributed amongst them, and gave a splendid entertainment to his new subjects, to which even the meanest of them were admitted. Neither the Arab nor the Greek writers have preserved many particulars of the battle of Masken, nor transmitted down to us on account of the number of Moslems killed and wounded on either side in that memorable action<sup>1</sup>.

- DURING the banquet prepared for the Cûfans, Abd'almâlec took great notice of Amru Ebn The Khalif Al Hâreth, an ancient Makhzumite, whom he placed by him on his Sofa. Amongst other takes great notice of an old Makhzumite. questions, he asked him what sort of food pleased him best? To which the old Makhzumite answered, "An ass's head season'd high and well roasted." "That is but an ordinary
- c "dish," replied the Khalîf; "what say you to a leg or a shoulder of a sucking lamb, well roasted and covered with butter and milk?" From whence we may infer, that the Arabs, in the Khalîfat of Abd'almâlec Ebn Merwân, had at least some dishes similar to those made use of by their progenitors in Abraham's time. For, that Abraham entertained his divine guests with butter, milk, and a calf which he had dressed, is attested by the author of the Pentateuch; and that he was at no great distance from the borders of Arabia, when he gave that entertainment, we are certainly informed by the same sacred historian. When the supper was over, the Makhzumite diverted the Khalîf with a particular account of the antiquities of the castle; after which, Mus'ab's head, that had been just brought in, was exhibited to his view. One of the company seeing it, said to Abd'almâlec, "I saw Hosein's
- d "head in this same castle presented to Obeid'allah, Obeid'allah's to Al Mokhtar, Al Mokhtar's to Mus'ab, and now at last Mus'ab's to yourself." This observation greatly affected the Khalîf, who, in order to avert the ill omen, commanded the castle to be immediately demolished. Abd'allah Ebn Zobeir, having received the melancholy news of his brother's death, assembled the people in the mosque at Mecca, and made a speech to them from the pulpit suitable to the occasion. He also did his utmost to put his capital in a posture of defence, and render it capable of sustaining a siege; expecting a speedy visit from his formidable competitor, who now gave law to Irâk, Syria, and Egypt, without controul<sup>m</sup>.

- THE Separatists, or Azarakites, in the neighbourhood of Mawfel, received advice of the The Motazalites apprize Al Mohalleb of the defeat at Masken. defeat at Masken, and of Mus'ab's death, which happened in the 71st year of the Hejra, before Al Mohalleb, the governor of that city, and its dependencies, with whom they were then at war, was apprized of those fatal events. Whereupon some of them asked certain of his men what they thought of Mus'ab? They replied, "He is a lawful Imâm." "He is then," said the sectaries, "your friend both in this world and that which is to come; and you are his friends both alive and dead." To which the others answered in the affirmative. "And what," demanded the Separatists, "is your opinion of Abd'almâlec, the son of Merwân?" "He is," said they, "the son of the accursed; we acknowledge him not, but hold it more lawful for us to shed his blood than yours?" "And you are," continued the Separatists, "his enemies both alive and dead?" "Yes," replied the others. "Very well,"
- f said the Azarakites, "Abd'almâlec has killed Mus'ab, your Imâm; and you will make him your Imâm to-morrow, tho' you wash your hands of him to-day, and curse his father." To which the others answered, "You lie, you enemies of God." However, being certainly informed the next day of what had happened, they changed their note, and took the oath of allegiance to Abd'almâlec without hesitation. For which being reproached by the Azarakites in very severe terms, they defended themselves, by saying, "We were pleased with the other as long as he presided over us; and now we approve of this, as we did before of him." "You are," replied the Azarakites, "brethren of the devils, companions of the wicked, and slaves to the present world." With regard to Mus'ab, he was, if we will believe an Arab author of good note, an officer of distinguished bravery, great generosity, and of a very comely agreeable person. Tho' he had a son that fell with him in the battle of Masken, as has been already observed, he was not above six and-thirty years of age when he met with his untimely fate <sup>a</sup>.

<sup>1</sup> MS. Laud. num. 161. ubi sup. ISM. ABU'LFED. in hist. univer. GREG ABU'L-FAR. ubi sup. THEOPHAN. ubi sup. p. 303, 304. AL MAKIN, ubi sup. 61. <sup>m</sup> MS. Laud. num. 161. ubi sup. GEN. xviii. 8. xiii. 18. xxiii. 19. CHRIST. CELLAR. geogr. antiq. lib. iii. c. 13 13. MS. Huntingt. n. 495. in Bibl. Bodl. Oxon. D'HERBEL. Bibl. orient. in art. Abd'almâlec, p. 8. OCKLEY'S hist. of the Sarac. vol. ii. p. 330, 331.

The Azarakites, or Separatists, defeated Abd'alaziz.

Soon after Abd'almâlec's arrival at Damascus, he conferred upon his brother, Bashar Ebn Merwân, the government of Cûfa, and upon Khâled Ebn Abd'allah that of Basra. The latter of these had no sooner taken possession of his post, than he appointed Al Moballeb supervisor of the tribute of Basra; which was a very indiscrete and impolitic step, as Al Moballeb was one of the most consummate generals of his age. To this imprudent measure was probably owing the disaster that immediately followed. The Azarakites, being apprized of Al Moballeb's dismissal from the command of the army destined to act against them, and that he was succeeded by Abd'alaziz in that important post, advanced against the latter with great alacrity, intirely defeated him, and took his wife prisoner. A debate arising amongst the victors about the value of that lady, which some fixed at 100,000 dinârs, one of them, in order to put an end to it, immediately struck off her head. Khâled, after the blow he had received, wrote a letter to the Khalîf, acquainting him with the loss the army had sustained, and desiring to know what step he was next to take. Abd'almâlec, in the answer he sent him, condemned Khâled's conduct, ordered him to remove Abd'alaziz from the command of the forces assigned him, to substitute Al Moballeb, whom he called the son and the grandson of war, in his room, to advance into the province of Abwâz with all the troops he could assemble, and, in fine, to do nothing without the privity and advice of Al Moballeb. This answer by no means pleased Khâled, tho' the Khalîf also promised him in it a speedy reinforcement; and, in consequence of that promise, sent a body of 5000 Cûfans, under the command of his brother Bashar, soon after to join him. Bashar, before his arrival, dispatched a courier to Al Moballeb, to give him notice of his approach; the good of the Khalîf's service at that time rendering it necessary to treat a person of that general's merit with great marks of distinction <sup>b</sup>.

The Azarakites are overthrown by Khâled and Al Moballeb.

THE Khalîf's generals receiving advice, that the Azarakites, or Separatists, were in motion, advanced at the head of the army as far as Abwâz, the metropolis of the province of the same name, and pitched their tents in the neighbourhood of that city. Soon after their arrival here, Al Moballeb advised Khâled to seize some ships that then appeared in the river on which Abwâz was situated; but they were burnt, before that design could be put in execution, by a party of the enemy's horse. Al Moballeb taking upon him one day to view all the posts of the camp, observed that an officer had not taken the precaution to intrench himself; who being asked by that general the reason of this, replied, that he valued the Azarakites no more than a camel's fart: but Al Moballeb told him, that he ought not to despise them, since they were the lions of the Arabs. In consequence of this notion, that commander ordered a line to be drawn round the camp; and the troops remained in their intrenchments about twenty days. After the expiration of which term, Khâled and Al Moballeb fell upon the enemy with such fury, that, after a most sharp and bloody engagement, they overthrew them, and took possession of their camp. Upon which, Khâled detached David, one of his officers, to pursue the fugitives with a body of horse, and dispatched an express to the Khalîf with a particular account of the victory they had gained. Abd'almâlec hereupon sent an order to Bashar to reinforce David's detachment with another body of 4000 horse, that he might be thereby enabled to push the Azarakites to the very centre of Persia. This was accordingly done, and those detachments of cavalry, after a long and fatiguing pursuit, in which most of their horses perished, returned in a very shattered condition to Abwâz. That city, denominated likewise by some of the eastern writers Ebwâz, seems to have been called in early times by the Persians the city of Hormuz, or Hormuzd, which answered to the Diospolis of the Greeks; Hormuz, Hormuzd, or Ormuzd, denoting Jupiter amongst the Persians, as we learn from Plutarch. The name of Abwâz is sometimes applied to the whole region of Khûzestân, or Khûzistân, of which the province of Abwâz is the best and most considerable part. The old metropolis of this province at present lies in ruins; so that very few traces, or remains, of that antient city are now to be seen <sup>c</sup>.

Abd'al'mâlec's forces invest Mecca.

ABD'ALMALEC having thus defeated and dispersed the Azarakites, in the 72d year of the Hejra, had no enemy left to contend with but Abd'allah Ebn Zobeir, who still was considered as Khalîf by the Arabs, and held his residence at Mecca. He, therefore, made great preparations for an invasion of Hejâz, and appointed Al Hejâj Ebn Yusef Al Thakîfi, one of the most warlike and eloquent captains of the age, to command the troops to be employed in this expedition. Al Hejâj having imagined in a dream that he had overcome Abd'allah Ebn

<sup>a</sup> MS. Laud. num. 161. ubi sup. AL MAKIN, ubi sup. p. 61.

<sup>b</sup> MS. Laud. num. 161. & AL MAKIN,

ubi sup. <sup>c</sup> MS. Laud. num. 161. ubi sup. GOLII not. ad Alfragan. p. 39, 118. PLUT. de Iud. et Osirid. See SALE's map of Arabia, prefixed to his prelim. disc.

- a Zobeir, taken him prisoner, and flayed him, the Syrian Khalif considered this as a good omen; and therefore resolved to commit the management of the war to be carried on against the Khalif of Mecca to his care. Before he put his army in march for Mecca, he offered his protection to all the Arabs there that would accept of it, and take an oath of fidelity to him. Abd'allah being informed of Al Hejaj's approach, sent out several parties of horse to reconnoitre the enemy, and give him intelligence of their motions. Betwixt these and some of Al Hejaj's advanced guards several skirmishes happened, in which Abd'allah's men had generally the worst. This encouraged Al Hejaj to send to his master for a farther reinforcement, his army, consisting of only 2000 men, not being strong enough to form the siege of Mecca; assuring him, that Abd'allah's fierceness was very much abated, and that his men deserted him daily. Upon which, Abd'almalec ordered Tharik Ebn Amer to march to his assistance with a body of 5000 men. In the mean time, Al Hejaj advanced to Al Tayef, a town about 60 miles east of Mecca, in the month of Shaaban, and was joined by Tharik with the forces under his command the new moon of the following Dhul'hajja; after which junction, he continued his route to Mecca, and immediately invested that place. We find it intimated by Abu'l Faraj, that Theodocus and Theodunus, two very eminent physicians, were great favourites of this Al Hejaj; that Theodunus composed a large physical treatise, for the instruction of his son; and that some of Theodocus's scholars and followers flourished till the Khalifs of the house of Al Abbās mounted the Moslem throne<sup>a</sup>.

- c IN the 73d year of the Hejra, Abd'allah offered the whole public revenues of Khorasān Abd'almalec for seven years to Abd'almalec Ebn Hāzim, if he would make his submission to him; which so incensed that commander, that he forced the Khalif's messenger to eat the letter he brought, and would have cut him to pieces upon the spot, had he not foreseen that such an action would have created a disturbance between two of the Arab tribes. Abd'almalec, therefore, in order to chastize him for his insolence, as well as his refusal to recognize his authority, sent one of his generals with a body of troops against him; who first defeated and dispersed his forces, and afterwards put him to death. Others say, that Abd'almalec made no overtures to Abd'allah Ebn Hāzim, till after the reduction of Hejaz; and that he sent Abd'allah Ebn Zobeir's head to Ebn Hāzim, imagining that the sight of this would have intimidated him into a submission. But, according to them, it produced a quite contrary effect. That general, continue they, swore, as soon as he saw it, that he would never obey Abd'almalec's orders as long as he lived, washed the head in a basin, embalmed it, wrapped it up in linen, prayed over it, and then sent it to Abd'allah Ebn Zobeir's relations at Mecca. They also relate, that he obliged the messenger to eat the letter he brought, and told him, that if he had not been a messenger, he would instantly have ordered his head to have been struck off. But this relation, however it may be countenanced by Mr. Ockley, we are by no means disposed to admit; since the Arab authors in a manner unanimously agree, that Abd'almalec had subdued all his other competitors before Abd'allah Ebn Zobeir was destroyed<sup>b</sup>. Mecca taken

- d NOTWITHSTANDING the reinforcement Al Hejaj had received, for some time he had by Al Hejaj. made very little progress in the siege of Mecca. Whilst he battered the temple there with his military engines, it thundered and lightened so dreadfully, that the Syrians were struck with terror, and refused to play them any longer upon that edifice. Upon which, Al Hejaj stuck the corner of his vest into his girdle, and putting one of the stones that was to be discharged out of his catapults into it, flung it upon the town; and this occasioned the recommencement of the operations. The next morning, the Syrians were annoyed by several successive storms, that killed twelve of their men, and quite dispirited them. Al Hejaj seeing them in such a consternation, said, "O Syrians! let not this terrify you. I am a son of Tebama. e "This, therefore, is the storm of Tebama. Victory is at hand. Rejoice at the news of it, "especially since the rebels suffer as much as you." The day following, some of Abd'allah's men were killed by another storm, that was extremely violent, which gave Al Hejaj a farther opportunity of animating his troops. At last Abd'allah, having been deserted by most of his friends, 10,000 of the inhabitants of Mecca, and even his two sons Hamza and Kho-beib, desired to know his mother's sentiments as to the course he was to take. He represented to her, that he was almost intirely abandoned by his subjects and relations; that the few who persisted in their fidelity to him could scarce enable him to defend the city any longer; and that the Syrian Khalif would grant him any terms he should think fit to demand. She, f being a woman of inflexible resolution, and not able to bear the thoughts of seeing her son reduced to the condition of a private person, having herself been the grand-daughter, or rather, as has been already observed, the daughter, of Abu Becr, the first Khalif, advised him by no means to survive the sovereignty, of which he was upon the point of being deprived. This perfectly agreeing with his own sentiments, he resolved to die in the defence of the place; so that, to the great surprize of the besiegers, he maintained himself there ten days longer, tho' destitute of arms, troops, and fortifications. At last, having taken a final leave of his mother, and being animated by despair, he made a sally upon the enemy, destroyed a great number of them with his own hands, and was at length himself killed, fighting valiantly, upon the spot. We are told, that his mother obliged him to put off a coat of mail he had on when he made her his last visit, and which he wore that he might be the better able to defend her; pressing him, after the conference was over, to rush into the midst of the enemy, and die a martyr for the cause of truth. It is also said, that when he told her he was not so much afraid of dying, as of being exposed after death, she courageously replied, When a sheep is once killed, it is not sensible of the pain of excoriation; and that, in order to inspire him with a greater degree of fortitude in the article of death, she gave him a draught into which a pound of musk had been infused. The enemy not daring to approach him, pelted him with stones, and wounded him in several places, before they gave him the fatal stroke. When he felt the blood run down his face and beard, he repeated an Arabic verse, importing, that the blood of our wounds does not fall down upon our heels, but upon our feet. By which he implied, that he did not turn his back upon his enemies, however terrible they might appear. After his death, Al Hejâj ordered his head to be cut off, and his body to be affixed to a cross in the city. Which body, being perfumed with the musk Abd'allah had drank, emitted a grateful odour for several days; and was afterwards interred in the burying place of the Jews at Medina. As to the duration of the siege of Mecca, authors are not perfectly agreed; some make it amount to seven months and a few days, and others to eight months and seventeen nights. According to the writers followed by Al Makin, Abd'allah's mother survived him only five days. The reduction of Mecca put Abd'almâlec in possession of the peninsula of the Arabs, and consequently rendered him sole and absolute master of the Moslem empire<sup>a</sup>.

<sup>a</sup> MS. Laud. num. 161, et AL MAKIN, ubi sup. GREG. ABU'L-FAR. ubi sup. p. 200. EUTYCH. patriarch. Alexandrin. annal. tom. ii. p. 366, 367. D'HERBEL. Biblioth. orient. in art. Hegiage Ben Josef Al Thakefi, p. 442.

<sup>b</sup> MS. Laud. num. 161. ubi sup. OCKLEY, ubi sup. p. 341, 342. ISM. ABU'LFED. GREG. ABU'L-FAR. et EUTYCH. ubi supra.

Abd'allah
Ebn Zobeir's
character.

ABD'ALLAH EBN ZOBEIR presided over the Arabs nine years and twenty-two days, having been inaugurated immediately after the death of Yezid. He was a man of extraordinary courage, as was allowed even by Abd'almâlec and Tbarik themselves, and as sufficiently appeared from the whole tenor of his conduct, but more particularly from his noble defence of Mecca, tho' the place was in a manner void both of troops and fortifications. He has been represented likewise by some of the eastern writers as a person of exemplary piety, and so fixed and unmoved when employed in the performance of his devotion, that nothing could divert his attention from the object of them; of which they supply us with the following remarkable instance. When he was once at prayer, a pigeon lighted upon his head, and sat there a considerable time, without his being in the least sensible of it. And yet notwithstanding these amiable qualities, he is said to have been covetous to such a degree, that his avarice became a proverb amongst the Arabs. Abu'lfeda relates, that he wore a suit of cloaths forty years without ever putting them off his back; which is absolutely incredible. He was about seventy-two years of age at the time of his death, and of a family not very acute, according to some of the Moslem historians. His secretary's name was Deyl Ebn Omar, and his chamberlain's Salem. In the beginning of the siege of Mecca, he resided for the most part in the Caaba; but after Al Hejâj had beat down one part of that place by the stones he discharged upon it, and set fire to the other by some burning balls of pitch, which, by the assistance of his engines, he found means to communicate to it, he found himself obliged to retire to his own house. In fine, Abd'allah was killed, and Mecca taken, on the 18th day of the former Jomâda, in the 73d year of the Hejra, or of CHRIST 692. About this time, Abd'almâlec ordered the poll-tax, or capitation, called Taadil, to be levied upon the Christians of Syria. The same year, Mohammed Ebn Merwân gained a victory over the Greeks, which was attended with the surrender of Affasyah; and Othmân Ebn Walid made an irruption into Armenia with a body of 4000 Arabs, and defeated likewise an army of the same nation that amounted to 60,000 men. The Greek writers only in general observe, that all civil wars ceasing at this time amongst the Moslems, they became reunited under one prince; and that Abd'almâlec being now firmly seated upon his throne, discovered an inclination to keep up a good understanding with all the neighbouring powers<sup>b</sup>.

Several sharp engagements in Armenia.

AFTER the late victory, Mohammed Ebn Merwân, who was then governor of Armenia, Mesopotamia, and Aderbijan, sustained a very great loss in the first of those countries, by the defeat and total destruction of an army of 100,000 men, sent against the Hararians, Kha-

<sup>a</sup> MS. Laud. num. 161. ubi sup. AL MAKIN, ubi sup. p. 61, 62. EUTYCH. ubi sup. p. 366—369. GREG. ABU'L-FAR. ubi sup. p. 199. D'HERBEL. Biblioth. orient. in art. Abd'allah Ebn Zobeir, p. 7. <sup>b</sup> MS. Laud. num. 161. ubi sup. ISM. ABU'LFED. hist. univer. vol. i. MS. Poc. num. 303. in Bibl. Bodl. Oxon. AL MAKIN, ubi sup. p. 62. DIONYS. TELMARENS. apud Jos. Simon. Asseman. in Biblioth. oriental. Clementino Vatican. tom. ii. p. 104. ut et ipse JOS. SIMON. ASSEMAN. ibid. THEOPHAN. chronograph. p. 304. GEO. CEDREN. historiæ compend. p. 441.

a varians, or rather Khazarians, there. Upon which Mohammed, at the head of another army of 40,000 men, who were all chosen troops, penetrated into the very heart of Armenia, defeated and dispersed a large body of the Khazarians, drove them into their temples, and reduced them to ashes there. Moslem Ebn Abd'almâlec Ebn Merwân also, with another body of the Moslem forces, attacked an army of 80,000 Khazarians, at the Iron, or Caspian, Gates, and destroyed a great number of them. The rest were obliged by the victors to embrace the Mohammedan faith. Several other actions happened about the same time in that country, of which no clear and distinct account has been handed down to us either by the Moslem or Christian historians <sup>u</sup>.

b In the 74th year of the Hejra, Al Hejâj demolished the temple of Mecca, after it had <sup>Hejâj's</sup> been repaired by Abd'allah Ebn Zobeir, rebuilt it, and restored it to the form it was in before <sup>cruelty.</sup> Mohammed's time, wherein it still remains. Having been appointed the governor of Medina, he exercised unheard-of cruelties upon the inhabitants of that city. He frequently quarrelled with them without any manner of provocation, and punished them where there was not the least appearance of any crime. It has been observed by some Arab writers, that there happened a very remarkable solar eclipse this year, on Monday, towards the close of the former Jomâda; in one part of the duration of which the stars very clearly appeared <sup>v</sup>.

c THE following year, Abd'almâlec made Al Hejâj his lieutenant of Irâk; of which post <sup>Hejâj appoint-</sup> that general took possession at Cûfa, escorted by a body of 12,000 horse. The Khalîf like- <sup>ed governor of</sup> wise constituted him governor of Khorasân and Sijistân, after the death of his brother Bashar. <sup>Irâk, Khorasân, and Si-</sup> Al Hejâj entered Cûfa, muffled up in his turban, and was soon surrounded by crowds of <sup>jistân.</sup> people, who pressed forwards to see him. He told them their curiosity should soon be gratified, as he would immediately discover himself to them. Then going directly to the mosque, he ascended the membar, or pulpit, where he treated them after a very coarse manner; swearing that he would make the wicked bear his own burden, and fit him with his own shoe. One day, after a short pause, in the pulpit, he said, O people of Irâk, methinks I see the heads of men ripe and ready to be gathered, and turbans and beards sprinkled with blood. The day after his arrival at Cûfa, he upbraided, in very sharp terms, the inhabitants of that city; swearing to them from the pulpit, that his punishments, in rigour and severity, d should exceed those of the most cruel of his predecessors, and be a pattern for his successors to the remotest periods of time. Those who had any hand in the murder of Othmân were the principal objects of his fury and resentment, both at Cûfa and Basra; to the latter of which places he went after a short stay at the other, and made the citizens there a speech conceived in much the same terms as that above-mentioned. And to give the Basrans a taste of his discipline, he caused one of them, who had been informed against as a rebel, to be beheaded upon the spot. In fine, his conduct so exasperated the people of Irâk, that they made an insurrection against him; but having defeated them in a pitched battle, and sent eighteen of their heads to Al Moballeb, he returned to Basra. Soon after which, he sent a body of troops, under the command of Al Moballeb, called by Al Makin Al Moballeb Ebn e Abusafra, and Abd'alrahmân Ebn Al Mebnef, against the Azarakites, who began again to be in motions. Those generals at first obtained several advantages over the rebels: but Abd'alrahmân, refusing to listen to the advice of Al Moballeb, and neglecting to intrench himself, was at last surprized, and cut to pieces, with all the troops he commanded; which proved a very considerable loss. What part of the Moslem territories was the theatre of this war, we are not told by the Arab writers; but, from several circumstances recorded by those writers, either the province of Abwâz, or some neighbouring district, seems to have been the scene of these commotions. The Azarakites, at this time, were probably posted f at no great distance from Basra, as the revolt, that happened there at this juncture, proved no small encouragement to those rebels, and animated them to attack the forces sent against them by Al Hejâj. However, they reaped no great advantage from that event; Al Moballeb soon afterwards putting them to flight, and driving them before him, as it should seem, into some of the remoter parts of Persia. We have already given our readers a description of the province and city of Abwâz, and shall therefore take no farther notice of it here <sup>x</sup>.

In the 76th year of the Hejra, Saleb Ebn Marj, a hot-headed sectary, and Shebib Ebn <sup>Saleb and</sup> Zeid, a Khârejite, took up arms against the Khalîf. They had both been on pilgrimage at Mecca the preceding year, when Abd'almâlec was there, and formed a conspiracy against <sup>Shebib rebel</sup> him. The Khalîf, being apprized of this, ordered Al Hejâj to seize them; but they eluded <sup>against the</sup> all his vigilance, and found means to make their escape. Saleb remained very secure a <sup>Khalîf.</sup>

<sup>u</sup> AL MAKIN, ubi sup. p. 62. D'HERBEL. p. 429, 1002, 1003.

<sup>v</sup> ISM. ABU'LFED. ubi sup.

AL JANNAB. AL MAKIN, ubi sup. p. 63. GREG. ABU'L FAR. ubi sup. EUTYCH. ubi sup. p. 368, 369.

<sup>x</sup> MS. Laud. num. 161. ubi sup. GREG. ABU'L FAR. ubi sup. AL MAKIN, ubi sup. p. 63. D'HERBEL. Biblioth. orient. in art. Hegiræ, p. 442, 443. GOLL not. ad Alfragan. p. 118.

month at Cúfa, and concerted the most proper measures with his friends there, to carry his design into execution. That branch of the Khârejites, that followed him, went under the name of Safrians, and appeared now for the first time in arms. He was a man much given to devotion, and had many followers in Mawfel and Mesopotamia, to whom he frequently read and expounded the Korân. He once delivered a discourse, which so pleased all his hearers, that they begged he would favour them with a copy of it. He granted their request; and by this means that discourse has been preserved to the present age; but as it is little better than enthusiastic cant, or rather a collection of crude exhortatory observations, adapted to the taste of those hot-headed illiterate enthusiasts, to whom it was directed, and intirely calculated to excite them to a rebellion; as it throws not the least light upon that part of the Arab history, in which we are now engaged, and consequently contains nothing that can render it in any degree either instructive or entertaining; an omission of it here will by no means prove unacceptable to our sagacious and intelligent readers<sup>y</sup>.

And are driven to Mawfel.

WHILST Saleb was haranguing his followers, in order to inspire them with sentiments of abhorrence both of the Khalîf and Al Hejâj, he received a letter from Shebib; wherein that incendiary reproved him for being so tardy in his motions. Saleb, in his answer, by way of recrimination, told him, that, had he himself not been so dilatory, hostilities would have commenced before that time against the wicked Imâm; that his delay had raised in them a suspicion of him; and that they waited only for his arrival, in order to enter upon action. This rousing Shebib, he immediately joined Saleb at Dara'ljazira, that is, Dara, or Daras, in Mesopotamia, of which Mohammed Ebn Merwân was at that time governor, with a small body of infantry, and saluted him emperor of the faithful there. After this junction, they seized some of Mohammed's horses in a neighbouring village, upon which they mounted their foot. The governor soon received intelligence of their motions; but despising their number, the whole force commanded by these enthusiasts not exceeding 120 men, he only ordered Adi to march against them with a detachment of 500 men. But Adi informing him, that this force was insufficient to reduce them, he reinforced him with 500 more; upon which, he advanced to Daras, near which place the Safrians, or Khârejites, had posted themselves. Adi, having no mind to fight, notwithstanding his vast superiority in point of numbers, gave Saleb to understand, that if he would quit Mesopotamia, and invade some other province, he would not oppose him; but this Saleb refused to do, except Adi would declare himself to be of the same religious and political sentiments with the Safrians, who acknowledged him for their chief. This proposal not being relished by Adi, nothing could then be concluded upon. Adi, soon after this first effort to prevail upon Saleb to depart out of Mesopotamia by amicable means proved ineffectual, not being sufficiently upon his guard, was surprized by the enemy; who attacked him whilst he was saying the noon-prayers, put him to the rout, and made themselves masters of his camp. Mohammed, receiving advice of this defeat, ordered Khâled Ebn Al Jora and Al Hâreth, each at the head of 1500 men, to advance against the Separatists; who coming up with them near Amed, or Amida, a fierce conflict ensued. The rebels behaved with great bravery on this occasion, and repulsed in such a manner the Khalîf's horse, that they were obliged to dismount, and fight on foot: after which, they warmly attacked the enemy. However, the Safrians defended themselves with unparalleled intrepidity, till the approach of the night put an end to the action; tho' finding themselves not able to cope with the Khalîf's forces, they soon after decamped, and retired with great precipitation to Mawfel. From thence they continued their route to Dascara, where they pitched their tents. We must not forget to observe, that, tho' the dispute near Amida was on both sides so obstinate, neither the Khalîf's troops, nor the Safrians, sustained any considerable loss; the former not having had many above 70, and the latter only 30 men killed in the action<sup>z</sup>.

Shebib defeats
the Khalîf's forces, and takes Cúfa.

AL HEJAJ having been informed, that the Safrians, under the command of Saleb and Shebib, had taken post at Dascara, sent Al Hâreth Al Hamadâni to drive them from thence with a body of 5000 men. Whilst Al Hâreth was upon his march, he received advice, that Saleb had abandoned Dascara, and seemed to be moving towards Jalouta and Katikin; upon which, he pursued him with great expedition, endeavouring, by forced marches, to come up with him. At last, the two armies faced each other at Modbaj, a little town or village upon the Tigris, between Mawfel and Jukhi, and, after some previous motions, engaged. Saleb's forces were composed only of three companies, consisting of thirty men each which, not being able to make head against Al Hâreth's troops, were soon thrown into confusion, and Saleb himself killed upon the spot. Shebib was also beaten off his horse, obliged for some time to fight on foot, and at last made his retreat in excellent a order to a neighbouring castle. From thence, tho' surrounded by Al Hâreth's numerous forces, with his little army, or rather troop, he made a sally upon the enemy, penetrated about midnight to the very centre of their camp, cut many of them to pieces, wounded the general himself, who was with great difficulty carried off, and dispersed the most considerable part of the army he commanded. By this victory, Shebib animated his friends, and became terrible even to Hejâj himself, whom he worsted in several actions consequential to it. Nay, taking advantage of that general's absence, when at Basra, without any considerable opposition, he made himself master of Cûfa. About this time, Al Moballeb Ebn Abusafra, whom Al Hejâj had continued his lieutenant of Khorasân, departed this life. He was a person of an extraordinary character, both for his surprizing abilities, and his uncommon generosity of temper. When he was at the point of death, he gave his sons a bundle of arrows to break; which none of them being able to do, he asked them whether they could break those arrows singly? To which they answered in the affirmative. "Then," said he, "suppose yourselves to be like that bundle of arrows here exhibited to your view, and not to be represented by the disunited arrows;" intimating hereby, that as their union would render them invincible, so, the moment discord entered among them, they would begin to advance towards destruction <sup>a</sup>.

<sup>y</sup> MS. Laud. num. 161. ISM. ABU'LFED. & AL MAKIN, ubi sup. D'HERBEL. Biblioth. orient. in art. Shebib Ben Zeid, p. 780.

<sup>z</sup> Ibidem ibid. GOLII not. ad Alfragan. p. 252, 235, 241, & alib. passim. OCKLEY, ubi sup. p. 352—362.

b AL HEJAJ, determined not to bear any longer the insults of Shebib, wrote to the Khalîf for a reinforcement; who sent him a strong detachment of the Syrian forces, to enable him to extirpate the Safrians under the command of that enthusiast. After he had been joined by these succours, he advanced against Shebib, whose army did not consist of above 4000 horse, or, as others say, 600, gave him battle in the plains of Cûfa, and intirely defeated him. Shebib's wife Gazâla, who had attended him in his first march to Cûfa, his brother, and a considerable number of his men, were killed in the action; and the rest pursued some parasangs by a body of the Syrian troops, who put to the sword only thirty of the Safrians, tho' they lost themselves above 100 men. This disaster obliged Shebib to abandon Cûfa, in order to provide for his own safety. Having therefore passed the Tigris, he advanced to Fukhi; from whence, repassing the same river at the place where Wâset was afterwards built, he retired with great precipitation to Abwâz, and from thence into Kermân, where he halted, and refreshed his men. In the mean time, Al Hejâj ordered Gazâla's head to be washed, and interred; and detached Sofiân Ebn Al Abrad, whom Abd'almâlec had sent to his assistance out of Syria, with a body of troops to march against Shebib, who had advanced a second time to Abwâz. Sofiân came up with the enemy at a bridge called Dojail Al Abwâz, where a sharp dispute ensued; in which, notwithstanding the inequality of numbers, Shebib several times repulsed the Khalîf's forces, but was at last himself put to flight. His horse, leaping upon a mare before him, loosened the stones of the bridge, whilst he was passing it, and forced his foot upon the edge of a boat: which threw him into the river, or arm of the sea, as we find intimated by Al Makîn, that a little farther discharges itself into the bay of Basra. Notwithstanding which, M. D'Herbelot, who seems to have followed chiefly the Persian historians, says, that Shebib was drowned in the Sarsar, a river of Syria. The first time he emerged, he said, When God decrees a thing, it is done; and the second, This is the decree of the ALMIGHTY, the ALLWISE God: upon which, the Safrians, being struck with terror, immediately cried out, The emperor of the faithful is drowned. His body being drawn up with a net, the head was cut off, and sent to Al Hejâj, who was not a little pleased at the sight of it. When the body was opened, the heart was taken out of it, and found to be prodigiously firm and hard, like a stone. His mother is said to have been a Christian, carried off as a prisoner, and consequently a slave, by Yezid Ebn Naim, after a victory obtained by the Moslems over the Greeks, in the Khalifat of Othmân, and the 25th year of the Hejra. Proving with child of Shebib by her master, she grew extremely fond of him; and, in order to please him, embraced Mohammedism. Shebib was born on the tenth of Dhu'lhajja, the day on which the victims at Mecca are killed. Before his birth, his mother is reported to have seen in a dream a flame proceeding from her; that diffused itself over the face of the heavens, and extended to every quarter; after which, a coal dropt into a large water, and was quenched. From whence, continues our author, she inferred, that her son was to be a man of blood, elevated to an exalted station, and at last to perish in the water. Hence it came to pass, that being once informed of his having been killed, she gave no credit to the rumour; but that being told he was drowned, she immediately believed it, saying it was impossible for him to come to any other end. After Shebib's death, the Azarakites, or Safrians, quarrelled amongst themselves; the greatest part of them deserting their leader, Katri Ebn Fojât. This gave the Khalîf's troops an opportunity of attacking them to great advantage, putting 4000 of them to the sword, and driving the rest, with Katri, into Taberistân. Upon their arrival here, they were kindly received by

<sup>a</sup> MS. Laud. num. 161. & ISM, ABU'LFED. ubi sup. OCKLEY, ubi sup. p. 364.

Asbid, the king of Taberistân, who assigned them a part of his territories for their habitations. They had not been long settled here, before they insisted upon Asbid's either embracing Islamism, or paying them an annual tribute; which he refusing to do, they drove him to Ray, or Raya, a populous city of Al Jebâl, in the Persian Irâk, where he implored the Khalîf's protection. He afterwards conducted a body of the Moslem troops into Taberistân, where they fell upon the rebels with such fury, that they killed Katri Ebn Fojât himself upon the spot, cut a great number of his men in pieces, and took all the rest of them prisoners. All which operations an Arab author, followed by Mr. Ockley, places in the 77th year of the Hejra; as do also Kbondemir and another Persian writer; tho' the historians epitomized by Al Makîn assert them to have happened in the preceding year. And this seems to us the most probable opinion, as those historians affirm, that Al Moballeb Ebn Abusafra, who died in the 76th year of the aforesaid æra, commanded the Moslem forces in the last expedition. We must not forget to observe, that Taberistân, the scene of this expedition, is a mountainous tract, full of woods, limited in part by the region called Deylam, and the districts of Ghilân and Cazbîn, said by Golius pretty nearly to answer to the Hyrcania of the antients. But, for a more particular account of that remote country, we must beg leave to refer our curious readers to the copious description of it extracted by the last-mentioned author out of the oriental geographers <sup>b</sup>.

The Arabs
begin to coin money.

THE same year, that is, the 76th of the Hejra, in the Khalîfat of Abd'almâlec, according to Al Makîn, or rather the authors he followed, dinârs and dirhems were first struck with Arabic inscriptions upon them. Before this time, the dinârs, or gold coins, had Greek, and the dirhems, or silver ones, Persic characters upon them. The first erection of a mint amongst the Arabs was occasioned by the following accident. Abd'almâlec frequently prefixed to the letters he wrote to the Greek emperor this short passage of the Korân, Say, God is one, or Say, there is one God; and then inserted the name of the prophet with the date of the letter, according to the Hejra, or the æra then in use amongst the Arabs. This giving the emperor great offence, he desired the Khalîf to alter that manner of writing; threatening otherwise to send some coins that should mention their prophet in terms not very agreeable to him. This incensed Abd'almâlec, who thereupon said, A curse be upon their coins! and, from that time, proposed setting up a mint in his own dominions. The first Arabic money seems to have been some dirhems stamped by Al Hejâj, with this inscription, Say, there is one God, or, according to Al Makîn, Allah Samad, God is eternal; which not a little displeased the Moslems, as they imagined that the sacred name of God would be thereby exposed to the touch of unclean persons of both sexes. Somyor, a Jew, regulated their coinage, which was very rude at first, but received afterwards several improvements in the times of Omar Ebn Habira, the governor of Irâk, Khâled Al Karsbi, Yusef Ebn Omar, the Khalîfs Harûn Al Rashîd, his son Al Mamûn, and Al Wât bek. In the days of Khâled Al Karsbi, there were three sorts of dirhems, a species of silver coin amongst the Arabs that we have already given our readers some account of in the life of Mohammed; the weight of every one of which has been handed down to us by Al Makîn. The metal at first was not very good, but received afterwards farther degrees of perfection in the aforesaid reigns. All the earliest coins struck by the Khalîfs seem to have had only legends and inscriptions upon them; however, those of a later date were sometimes adorned with the heads of the princes who struck them, or the figures of animals. Of the first sort we have one preserved in the Bodleian library at Oxford, which is perhaps the oldest Arabic coin extant; it having been struck at Wâset upon the Tigris, in the Khalîfat of Al Walîd Ebn Abd'almâlec, and the 88th year of the Hejra, or of CHRIST 707. The inscription on one side of this coin, as it has been translated by the reverend and learned Dr. Hunt, professor of the Hebrew and Arabic languages in the university of Oxford, is, There is only one God, who has no companion; and round it the following words, In the name of God, this dirhêm was struck at Wâset in the year of the Hejra 88. On the reverse is a passage taken out of the 112th sûra of the Korân, to the following effect: God is one, eternal, neither begetting, nor begotten, nor is there any being like him; and, round it, another taken from the sixty-first sûra of the same book, couched in the following terms, MOHAMMED is the apostle of God, who sent him with a direction and the religion of truth, that he might render this religion more conspicuous than any other; tho' it be opposed by the ASSOCIATORS. The character here is the Cûfic, of which enough has been said in our antient history of the Arabs, and the coin is so well preserved, that it may seem to some not to be genuine. It consists of pretty good silver, and weighs one penny-weight and twenty grains. Another of these dirhems is to be seen in the very valuable collection of antient coins, bequeathed by the late archbishop Wake to Christ-

<sup>b</sup> MS. Laud. num. 161, ubi sup. EBN AL ATHIR, AL MAKIN, ubi sup. p. 63, 64. D'HERBEL. Eibloth. orient. in art. Schebib Ben Zeid, p. 780. KHONDEMIR & AUT. NICHARIATAN. GOLII not. ad Alfragan. p. 193—197.

- a Church college in Oxford; and another in the small cabinet of the writer of this history; of both which our readers will meet with an explication in a proper place. Notwithstanding what has been advanced to the contrary by Al Makin, we are told by Theophanes and Cedrenus, who, in this point, seem to deserve some regard, that Abd'almâlec had begun to coin money of a new form, such as had never before been seen, in the sixth year of the emperor Justinian II's reign, coincident with the year of CHRIST 690, or 691; and that then the emperor refused to receive the tribute sent him by the Khalîf, because it consisted intirely of the new Arabic money. Which if we admit, it must be allowed, that Abd'almâlec began to strike dinârs and dirbêms at least five or six years earlier than the time that has been fixed for the commencement of coinage amongst the Moslems by the Arab historians.
- b To what has been here observed, Theophanes seems to add, that the emperor made the Khalîf's offer of his tribute in Arabic money one of his pretexts for coming to a rupture with that prince. Be that as it will, Abd'almâlec, if we will believe this writer, understanding that Justinian was determined to break the treaty lately concluded with the Arabs, raised a powerful army, and gave the command of it to one of his generals, named Mohammed; who, causing the articles of the late treaty to be carried before his men on the point of a spear, met the emperor in the neighbourhood of Sebastopolis, and engaged his army with unparalleled bravery. But notwithstanding this, Mohammed was obliged to give ground, and even retire to his camp; where he must have perished with hunger, or submitted to the emperor, had he not in the mean time gained over 20,000 Sclavi, with their commander,
- c in the emperor's service; whose unexpected desertion caused such a consternation in the Greek army, that they immediately betook themselves to a precipitate flight, being pursued with great slaughter by the Arabs. After which, Mohammed harrassed the imperial provinces in a most cruel manner, and made himself absolute master of Armenia; which, however, returned again to the emperor in a very short time. The same author also relates, that Mohammed bribed the general of the Sclavi to desert the emperor, by sending him, in the heat of the action, a quiver full of dinârs, and promising him a much larger sum. Some commotions likewise, according to him, happened about this time on the side of Khorasân, in which a great number of the Arabs lost their lives<sup>c</sup>.

- d In the 77th year of the Hejra, answering to the 696th of the Christian æra, one of Abd'al- Lazica and mâlec's commanders, called by Theophanes and Cedrenus Alid, made an incursion into the Barnucium imperial territories, plundered them in a dreadful manner, and then retired with the betrayed to Christian prisoners he had taken into the Khalîf's dominions. About the same time, Sergius, the Arabs, a patrician, who commanded the Greek troops in Lazica and Barnucium, rebelled against the new emperor Leontius, and delivered up both of those places to the Moslems. Besides which, nothing remarkable, as far as can be collected either from the Greek or Arab historians, happened this year<sup>d</sup>.

- e THE following year, that is, the 78th of the Hejra, or of CHRIST 697, the Moslems The Arabs invaded Africa with a very considerable force, made themselves masters of Carthage, and reduce Africa overran the whole country that, in the earlier ages, properly appertained to that city. But Propria.
they were soon driven out by John the patrician, a man of great valour and experience in war, whom the emperor had sent against them. The Arabs, to repair the great losses they had sustained, equipped another fleet, and returning to Africa, obliged John to fly to the sea-coast, where he embarked with the troops under his command for Constantinople. Thus was Africa, or rather Africa Propria, in a manner without opposition, abandoned once more to the Moslems<sup>e</sup>.

- f IN the 79th year of the Hejra, or of CHRIST 698, Apfimar, or Tiberius, who had been Abd'alrah- raised to the empire, sent his brother Heraclius into Cappadocia, to watch the motions of mân rebels the Arabs. This year, according to Theophanes and Cedrenus, one Abd'alrahmân, an Arab against the governor, or commander, rebelled against the Khalîf in Persia, and drove the Khâkbân Khalîf.
out of that country. We must here beg leave to observe, that Khâkbân was a general title made use of by all those princes who reigned in the Transoxanian provinces; amongst which we may reckon the Khâns of the Turks, Tartars, and Moguls. The old church at Edeffa was thrown down this year by an earthquake, which did considerable damage in the neighbouring parts of Mesopotamia<sup>f</sup>.

THE following year, being the eightieth of the Hejra, and the 699th of the Christian Heraclius æra, the Khalîf sent a general, called Mohammed, with a powerful army, into Per- destroys sia; who, after he had been joined by the Khâkbân, overthrew Abd'alrahmân with very 200,000 great slaughter, killed him upon the spot, and reinstated the Khâkbân in the government of Arabs.

<sup>c</sup> AL MAKIN, ubi sup. p. 64, 65. EBN AL ATHIR, MS. Poc. num. 137. in Bibl. Bodl. Oxon. Al Kor. MOHAM. f. cxii, lxi. SALE's prelim. disc. p. 69. THEOPHAN. chronograph. p. 304, 305, 306. GEORG. CEDREN. historiar. compend. p. 441.

<sup>d</sup> THEOPHAN. ubi sup. p. 309. CEDREN. ubi sup. p. 443.

PHAN. & CEDREN. ubi sup.

<sup>e</sup> THEOPHAN. ubi sup. p. 310. GEORG. CEDREN. p. 444. D'HERBEL. Biblioth. orient. in art. Khacan, p. 983. DIONYS. TELMARENS. apud Jos. Sim. Asseman. ubi sup. p. 104.

Persia,

Perſia. About the ſame time, Heraclius, one of Tiberius's generals, taking advantage of the diviſions that now reigned amongſt the Arabs, penetrated into Syria, as far as Samoſata, waſted all the adjacent territory; and put to the ſword about 200,000 of the enemy. After which, he returned to Cappadocia; loaded with the immenſe booty he had acquired in this expedition <sup>a</sup>.

Mohammed
Ebn Hanifi-
yah dies.

In the 81ſt year of the Hejra, A. C. 700, died Mohammed Ebn Hanifiyah; who, by ſeveral of his followers was conſidered, after Hoſein's death, as lawful Khalif and Imâm. Some of the Shiites look upon him as an illuſtrious prophet, taken and preſerved by God in mount Redwa, who ſhall hereafter appear, and fill the earth with piety and juſtice; though others of them utterly explode ſo ridiculous a notion. His father's name, or rather ſurname, according to the Arab poet Al Hamiri, one of his admirers; was Seth; after whoſe death, Kawla, his mother, and Seth's widow, was married to Ali; ſo that he was not, properly ſpeaking, the ſon of that Imâm, nor deſcended from Mohammed, as Haſan and Hoſein were. He ſeveral times reſuſed the Khalifat, and was ſurnamed Ebn Hanifiyah, that, by this appellation, he might be diſtinguiſhed from the two laſt mentioned Imâms, who were truly and properly Ali's ſons, by Fâtema, the daughter of the prophet. Which if, with M. D'Herbelot, we admit, Mr. Ockley muſt have been guilty of a miſtake (as indeed the ſurname Ebn Hanifiyah itſelf ſeems clearly enough to evince) when he makes this Mohammed to have been the real ſon of Ali. We are told by the Greek writers, that the Arabs made an irruption this year into the imperial territories, and laid ſiege to Antaradus in Syria; but not being able to maſter that place, they returned to Mopſueſtia in Cilicia, and left a garifon there. The text of Theophanes, in the paſſage referred to, exhibiting Tarantum for Antaradus, may be emended by that of Cedrenus, which has preſerved the true reading Antaradus here. One Abd'allah, according to thoſe authors, commanded the Moslem forces this campaign <sup>b</sup>.

Abd'alrah-
mân deſcends Al Hejâj; but is at laſt overthrown by that general.

THE expedition placed by the Greek writers in the 79th year of the Hejra, and ſaid by them to have been undertaken by Abd'alrahmân againſt the Khâkbân, really happened in the 82d year of that æra, according to the Arab hiſtorians. Whichſoever of theſe may be in the right as to the year, our curious readers will not be diſpleaſed to find here the following particulars, extracted from the oriental authors, relating to that expedition. Al Hejâj, hating Abd'alrahmân Ebn Mohammed Ebn Aſhab Al Kendi, ordered him to advance againſt Zentil, king of the Turks, or the Khâkbân, and, with an inconfiderable force that he aſſigned him, to make an irruption into his dominions. This Al Hejâj did in order to deſtroy him; of which being ſecretly informed, he took care to acquaint the troops under his command with the motive to this expedition. The ſoldiers finding that they were to be ſacrificed to Al Hejâj's malice againſt their general, reſolved to be revenged of the governor for his barbarity; and therefore unanimouſly took an oath to ſupport Abd'alrahmân Ebn Mohammed. Abd'alrahmân hereupon concluded a peace with the Turk, returned into Irâk, and marched directly againſt Al Hejâj; who, having received advice of what had happened, had ſent to the Khalif for a reinforcement of the Syrian troops. After the arrival of theſe ſuccours, Al Hejâj attacked Abd'alrahmân Ebn Mohammed Ebn Aſhab Al Kendi; but, being overthrown, Abd'alrahmân carried his victorious arms to Baſra, and was joined by a great number of the inhabitants of that place, who took the oath of allegiance to him. Then intrenching himſelf on one ſide of the city, he found an opportunity of attacking, to great advantage, Al Hejâj, in his turn, and gained a ſecond victory over him. From the ſcene of action he moved to Cûſa, and was received with open arms by the people of that city. In the mean time, Al Hejâj aſſembled all the forces he was able, and led them againſt Abd'alrahmân; whoſe army, by the acceſſion of the Baſrans, who had conceived an invincible averſion to Al Hejâj, on account of his enormous cruelty, amounted to 100,000 men. Al Hejâj incamped at a place called Dairkorrah, and Abd'alrahmân at another denominated Dairaljamajim, at a ſmall diſtance from the enemy; and, in the ſpace of an hundred days, theſe two commanders are ſaid to have fought eighty-one battles. At laſt, Al Hejâj put Abd'alrahmân to flight, and cut off 4000 of his men; after which, the latter retreated to Sabân, where he was ſeized by Al Hejâj's lieutenant, and reſcued by Zentil, the Turk, his friend and ally. Al Hejâj, receiving intelligence of this, ſent Yezid Ebn Al Mobolleb againſt Zentil, in order to force him to deliver up Abd'alrahmân into his hands. Zentil made the proper diſpoſitions for his defence, and engaged Yezid with an army of 60,000 men; but he was ſoon overthrown, had many of his men killed, and a great number of them taken priſoners; amongſt whom was Abd'alrahmân himſelf. With regard to the manner of that general's death, the Arab writers are not perfectly agreed; but, according to ſome of the beſt of them, he threw himſelf headlong from the top of an high houſe, in order to avoid a falling into the hands of his most implacable enemy. What became of Hasan Al Basri, Saï'd Ebn Hosein, Nadi Ebn Abuleil, and others of his principal accomplices, we are not told by the Moslem historians. Some of those writers assert, that Al Moballeb Ebn Abusafra, Al Hejāj's lieutenant of Khorasān, died this year; that he was succeeded by his son Yezid in that post; and that, upon Yezid's removal some time after from thence, Fadl, another of Al Moballeb's sons, was substituted in his room. The Greek writers relate, that Baanes, surnamed Heptadæmon, from the seven devils with which he was supposed to have been possessed, betrayed this year likewise Armenia to the Arabs, for which he doubtless received a very considerable reward<sup>1</sup>.

<sup>a</sup> THEOPHAN. & CEDREN. ubi ſup. <sup>b</sup> D. HAMIR, apud Al Makîn, ubi ſup. p. 65. ut & ipſe AL MAKIN. ibid. ISM. ABU'LFED. ubi ſup. MS. Laud. num. 161. ubi ſup. D'HERBEEL. Biblioth. orient. in art. Hanifah, p. 428, 429. OCKLEY'S hiſt. of the Sarac. vol. ii. p. 80, 272, 370. THEOPHAN. chronograph. p. 310, 311. CEDREN. ubi ſup.

b THE following year, being the 83d of the Hejra, and of CHRIST 702, Al Hejāj built a city upon the Tigris, which he called Wāset. That name signifies the middle in the Arabic language, because this city stood in the mid-way between Basra and Cūfa. The eastern authors, however, a little differ about the year of its foundation; Ebn Shohnah making this to have been the 83d, and Khondemir the 84th of the Moslem æra. The Arabs call the circumjacent tract Al Abār, the wells, as it abounds with wells; and near the city there is a place bearing the name of Al Abār Al Arab, the wells of the Arabs. Wāset, according to the Arab tables, is situated in Chaldæa, or Babylonian Irāk, in long. 81° 30', and lat. 32° 20' N. The Persian geographer says, that it is seated upon the Tigris, at an equal distance from Baghdād Cūfa, Basra, and Abwāz; that is, about fifty parasangs from every one of those cities. This year the nobility of Armenia drove the Arabs out of their country, and sent to Apfimar, or Tiberius, for assistance. But, in the mean time, Mohammed, one of the Khalif's generals, entering Armenia with a powerful army, recovered that province; and, having got the authors of the revolt into his hands, burnt them all alive. Encouraged with this success, the Moslems invaded Cilicia once more under the conduct of Azar; but were, to the number of 10,000, either cut in pieces by Heraclius, or taken prisoners, and sent in chains to Constantinople. That Wāset was founded this year, as Ebn Shohnah affirms, notwithstanding what has been advanced to the contrary by Khondemir, may be inferred from Abu'l-Faraj<sup>2</sup>.

